Lazar, a Rumanian, born in 1894, studied at Bucharest and later at Leipsic. His "Gypsies" describes their dancing, shouting, wrangling near the court yard of a boyard. The belle among the women dances a dance of seduction and then leaves at twilight. The men would fain renew the dance, but they are driven away by the boyard's attendants, who were not to be blamed; nay, they were to be applauded, if the gypsy music in any way resembled Lazar's scherzo. A man of pronounced technical proficiency, his musical ideas, so far as the scherzo is concerned, are commonplace, not pleasing in an obvious way, not fascinating by exotic charm or fury. There was a chance for relieving contrast, for voluptuous measures in the episode of the woman's pas seul, but how dry, how tame the music Lazar provided for her!

To us the most prominent feature of the concert was the dazzling, marvelous performance of the "Roman Carnival." This music, composed over 80 years ago, is still irresistible in the beauty of the opening—the English horn solo was admirably played by Mr. Speyer—in the vivacity and dash of the allegro measures.

Will Respighi's "Pines of Rome" wear as well as his "Fountains of Rome"? We doubt it. After a third hearing the section "Pines near a Catacomb" is still the most imaginative, poetical, impressive. The effect of "The Appian Way" consists chiefly in its rhythm and the ever increasing sonority till the climax crashes.

The concert will be repeated tonight. As the orchestra will be out of town next week there will be no concerts. The program of Nov. 12, 13 will be as follows: Arensky, Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky, op. 35, a (first time in Boston); Schumann, Symphony, No. 1, B flat major; Bartok, Three Village Scenes (first time in Boston).

NEW MUSIC PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Lazar's 'Gypsies' Given First Public Performance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Optimism or pessimism regarding the present estate of musical composition is apt to be governed by the listener's most recent experience with it. At the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, for example, two contemporary composers, the Italian Respighi and the Rumanian Filip Lazar, each represented by comparatively recent music, quite held their own with such departed worthies as Berlioz and Borodin.

LAZAR'S MUSIC FRESH

Queen Marie's young countryman, the Filip Lazar in question, was until yesterday unknown to Boston, probably to the United States. Moreover the piece through which he was then heard, "Tziganes" (Gypsies), an orchestral Scherzo, received its first public performance. How strange, by the way, it would seem were some Bostonian piece to receive its initial hearing in Bucharest!

It is Mr. Koussevitzky's own altogether reasonable conviction that the freshest music of our immediate time is coming from those countries which have not already been saying their say in symphonic compositions for a century or two, and the abounding vitality of Mr. Lazar's Scherzo, contrasted, for convenient instance, with the polished superficialities of M. Ibert's "Rencontres" of last week, assuredly endorsed that point of view.

Has Primitive Vigor

That Mr. Lazar's is a new and important voice in music might hardly be inferred from this "Tziganes," but the young man (he is not yet 33) writes with his ear to the earth. In his music is a primitive vigor and the unbridled abandon that one would expect of a Rumanian peasant's holiday. A pity that the composer could not have heard the remarkable performance of yesterday, a performance fittingly rhapsodic.

As for Respighi he was represented in Symphony Hall yesterday, and for the seventh time in 10 months, through his imaginative and effective "Pines of Rome." In the opinion of one who has heard five of those seven performances, the "Pines of Rome" would stand a frequency of repetition that would be fatal to most contemporary pieces. To be sure a hundred performances would hardly justify that plain lapse from artistic rectitude, the use of the phonograph record of the nightingale's song. The relentless approach of Cesar's legions may not quicken the pulse to quite the degree of last February. But the "Pines of Rome" still makes good listening. The shrilling exuberance of the first section, the solemnity of the second, the poetry of the third are still grateful to hear, while the final march is still stirring, still overpoweringly sonorous in its final climax.

One of the numbers on Mr. Kous-

Second Symphony of Borodin the other hand, had not been heard here since the brief sojourn in our midst of Henri Rabaud. In the words of the composer's friend Stasov, Borodin was in the writing of this symphony haunted by the picture of feudal Russia. There is in the first movement something of the epic spirit that pervades Moussorgsky's "Boris."

This music speaks to us of an age half splendid, half barbaric. But Borodin, remarkably gifted man that he was, might hardly sustain himself throughout the four movements of a symphony. His genius has found fitter, more convincing expression in that more familiar music, the superb Dances from "Prince Igor."

Brass Choir Direct

With his unfailing aptitude for all things Russian, Mr. Koussevitzky read this Symphony with full sympathy, laid bare its inmost soul. The performance of it, like that of Berlioz's Overture, was brilliant in the extreme: in one respect almost too brilliant.

In view of the terrific force of which the trombones and trumpets of the Symphony Orchestra are now capable might it not be the course of discretion, even of mercy, to return this choir to its former position at the side of the stage? As it is, to hear in fortissimo these brasses with bells directed straight towards the audience is a bit like looking at the sun.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

OCT 30 1926

Borodin Symphony on Radio Program

Is Work That Boston Orchestra Will Give in Auditorium Here Nov. 16.

The broadcasting of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening will have special interest to local music lovers, as the Borodin Symphony, which the orchestra will play, is the symphony to be done by the Springfield Symphony Orchestra at its first concert in the Auditorium Nov. 16. Many students and musicians are studying the programs to be played by the orchestra and this will afford them an excellent opportunity to familiarize themselves with this modern Russian composition which will be heard next month.

THIS CLIPPING FROM UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

OCT 30 1926

Borodin Symphony Will Be Broadcast by WBZ Tonight

Work of Russian Composer to Be Featured in Boston Symphony Radio Concert.

"The finest broadcast ever presented and the interpretative talks of Prof. Marshall are invaluable" is the manner in which radio listeners throughout the United States are commenting on the concerts of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast by Westinghouse saation WBZ and the chain including WJZ, WGY and WRC. Already thousands of letters have been received by W. S. Quinby, who is sponsoring the series of broadcasts through the various stations on the symphony chain which attest to the enthusiasm of the Saturday "symphonic nights."

Tonight's symphony program will only be sent out through WBZ and WBZA as the other stations in the network could not arrange to take more than 15 of the 24 concerts. Prof. John Patten Marshall, who is interpreting the selections for the radio audience, classes this week's concert as a modern one for, with the exception of a number by Berlioz, all the selections are of recent date.

Borodin, whose Symphony No. 2 furnishes the feature on tonight's program, was one of the five composers who were associated together in an attempt to found a Russian school of composition. During the intermission, Prof. Marshall will illustrate with the assistance of Marjorie Posselt, violinist, the themes from Borodin's symphony and will tell of the music of the new Russian school. The two numbers after the intermission are by living composers, Lazar, a Rumanian, and Respighi, one of the most prominent of modern Italian composers.

Prof. Marshall will tell his audience something about Rumanian music and in discussing Respighi's symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," he will explain the connection between the music and the subtitles which are "The Pines."

The complete program is as follows:

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra at Elmwood Music hall next Wednesday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.

OCT 30 1926

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C.

OCT 30 1926

Taking it by and large, this evening will produce more different things for loud speaker delivery than any evening for many a long day—things that are worth while and that are happening at about the same time. Most of these things are three very famous symphony orchestras, or rather two famous orchestras and one famous orchestra director in a musical lecture that usually draws a larger audience than a concert of his orchestra. And there are also the famous Hill Billies!

The students' series of concerts broadcast annually by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra will be inaugurated this evening for the season of 1926-27 through WRC, WJZ and WGY. The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays its weekly concert through the microphones of WBZ and WEAF and its affiliated chain of stations will broadcast the musical lecture of Dr. Walter Damrosch on Wagnerian music, illustrated by the director with piano scores. The two symphonies begin shortly after 8 o'clock and play about two hours and a half and Dr. Damrosch opens his program at 9 o'clock and lectures for a bit more than an hour. You can choose your concert—and tune as static, sun spots, Aurora Borealis and WJZ's famous semi-detached transmission system permits!

The wise WRC listener will probably elect to remain tuned with WRC so long as the transmission from New York holds good—and this may be one of the nights when it gives plu-perfect service—who knows? If that is done the early evening will bring the usual Saturday Bible talk, two political arguments, an orchestral concert from the Washington Hotel and a talk on "Apple Week" before time for the philharmonic to begin.

The first number of the student course program is the "Sinfonia" overture by Bach. This will be followed by Bloch's symphony, "Israel" After the intermission Hanson's "Pan and the Preist" will be played and the concert will close with the "Finlandia" overture of Sibelius. Of the four numbers to be presented—all of them presenting different types of music and great musical color, perhaps the one I would choose to hear most carefully would be the last—the "Finlandia" number of Sibelius. The outer world—the world to which Finland was but a name on a map—was a very long time in discovering the vivid musical personality of Silelius. When the discovery was made nothing impressed it so deeply on music lovers as this overture—a sweeping tone poem of powerful, dynamic form that tells the story of Finnish individuality and force as nothing else does or can. With the strength of an entire symphony orchestra to give it voice, this bit of music will sing its song most surely and directly to almost any sort of an audience. Will Handy, the composer of the negro "blues" form of music told me the other day that "Finlandia" had impressed itself on him as no other composition he had ever heard. Give an ear to it this evening and discover its grandeur for yourself.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES UNION
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

OCT 30 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Prof. John Patten Marshall, who is interpreting the Boston Symphony selections for the radio audience, classes this week's concert as a modern one, for, with the exception of a number by Berlioz, all the selections are of recent date.

Borodin's Symphony No. 2 furnishes the "piece de resistance" on tonight's program. Professor Marshall, during intermission, will illustrate with the assistance of Marjorie Posselt, violinist, the themes from Borodin's symphony and will tell of the music of the new Russian school. The two numbers after the intermission are by living composers, Lazar, a Roumanian, and Respighi, one of the most prominent of modern Italian composers.

Professor Marshall will tell his audience something about Roumanian music and in discussing Respighi's symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," he will explain the connection between the music and the subtitles, which are "The Pines."

The complete program is as follows:

Overture, "Le Carnival Romain" ..... Berlioz

Symphony No. 2 in B Minor.Borodin
1. Allegro moderato.
2. Molto vivo.
3. Andante.
4. Allegro.

"Tziganes" Scherzo ..... Lazar

Symphonic Poem, "Pini di Roma" (Pines of Rome) ..... Respighi
1. The pines of the Villa Borghese.
2. The pines near a Catacomb.
3. The pines of the Janiculum.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.

OCT 30 1926

Symphony Orchestra Well Broadcast From Boston at 8:10 Tonight

Tonight's programme by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will only be sent out through WBZ and WBZA, as the chain network could not arrange to take more than 15 of the 24 concerts to be broadcast by the Westinghouse stations. Prof. John Patten Marshall, who is interpreting the selections for the radio audience, classes tonight's concert as a modern one, for with the exception of a number of Berlioz, all the selections are of recent date.

Borodin, whose Symphony No. 2 furnishes, "piece de resistance" on tonight's programme, was one of the five composers who were associated in an attempt to found a Russian school of composition. Prof. Marshall will tell his audience something about Rumanian music, and in discussing Respighi's symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," he will explain the connection between the music and the subtitles which are "The Pines."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES UNION
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

OCT 30 1926

House Sold Out For Boston Symphony Concert Thursday

No Seats Available for Opening Event in Series C at the Eastman Theater — Koussevitzky To Make His First Appearance in Rochester.

With Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, the Boston Symphony will pay its first visit to Rochester in four years next Thursday night, as the opening event in Series C at the Eastman Theater. The orchestra, which has always rated as one of America's finest symphonic organizations, has continued its high repute under the leadership of Koussevitzky, who was engaged in 1924, following sensational reports of his success in Europe. This will be the only appearance here this season of an important out-of-town symphony orchestra.

The seating capacity of the theater has been completely exhausted for this concert, but a limited number of standing room admissions will be placed on sale the night of the concert, beginning at 7:30 o'clock. The program follows:

Mozart, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Serenade for string orchestra (K 525)

Debussy ..... Two Nocturnes
(a) Nuages (Clouds)
(b) Fetes (Festivals)

Prokofieff . Suite from the Ballet "Chout" (Buffoon) Op. 21
1. Dance of the buffoon's daughters.
2. In the tradesman's bedroom.
3. The Young woman is transformed into a goat.
4. Final dance.

Intermission.

Tchaikowsky . . Symphony No. 4 in F. Minor, Op. 36.

OCT 30 1926
Pittsburgh Pa

ORCHESTRAS WILL OPEN

Boston Symphony to Offer Friday Night and Saturday Matinee Programs.

A feature of the Friday night concert, November 5, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque, under Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, will be "Pines of Rome," the latest symphonic poem of Respighi, the Italian composer. Other numbers in the Friday night program include the Ceasar Franck Symphony in D minor; Berlioz Overture "La Carnaval Romain;" Suite from the ballet "Chout" by Prokofieff; and Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin."

Serge Koussevitzky

The Saturday afternoon program includes Tschaikowsky Symphone No. 4; Stravinsky Orchestral Suite from the ballet "Petrouchka;" Two nocturne
Serenade
The t Symphon series o chestras
Pittsbur
May Be

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.

OCT 30 1926

OPENING the orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, the Boston Symphony orchestra comes to Elmwood Music hall next Wednesday evening in a program notable for beauty and novelty.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct his men in the following:

Overture, Le Carnival Romain Op. 9 . . . . . Berlioz

Symphony in D minor ..... Franck
Lento; Allegro non troppo.
Allegretto.
Allegro non troppo.

Suite from the Ballet Chout (Buffoon) Op. 21 ..... Prokofieff
Dance of the buffoon's daughters.
In the tradesman's bedroom.
The young woman transformed into a goat.
Final dance.

Prelude to Lohengrin ..... Wagner

Symphonic Poem, Pini di Roma (Pines of Rome) ..... Respighi
The Pines of the Villa Borghese.
The Pines near a Catacomb.
The Pines of the Janiculum.
The Pines of the Appian Way.

From the slow and mysterious introduction of the Franck symphony to its exalted close, is a gradual ascent from darkness into the splendid altitudes which reflect the soaring spirit of this organist composer. The middle movement has a beautiful song for the English horn solo.

The Roman Carnival overture, with its brilliant, triumphant beauty, opens the program.

"In the "Chout" (Buffoon) by the talented young Russian composer, a novelty is presented. It is fantastic, woven from the half farce and half fantasy which is the story of the ballet, brought out by the Diaghileff Russian ballet at the Theater de la Gaiete Lyrique a number of years ago. It is the story of the Young Buffoon, who plays a trick on Seven Old Buffoons, gets into trouble, disguises himself and at once finds himself in the midst of a whirlwind of farcical difficulties.

"The clear blue of heaven and the presence of the Angelic Hosts" pictured in the "Lohengrin" prelude follows in the program, with the descriptive symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," as a glorious climax to the concert.

NEW MUSIC PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Lazar's 'Gypsies' Given First Public Performance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Optimism or pessimism regarding the present estate of musical composition is apt to be governed by the listener's most recent experience with it. At the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, for example, two contemporary composers, the Italian Respighi and the Rumanian Filip Lazar, each represented by comparatively recent music, quite held their own with such departed worthies as Berlioz and Borodin.

LAZAR'S MUSIC FRESH

Queen Marie's young countryman, the Filip Lazar in question, was until yesterday unknown to Boston, probably to the United States. Moreover the piece through which he was then heard, "Tziganes" (Gypsies), an orchestral Scherzo, received its first public performance. How strange, by the way, it would seem were some Bostonian piece to receive its initial hearing in Bucharest!

It is Mr. Koussevitzky's own altogether reasonable conviction that the freshest music of our immediate time is coming from those countries which have not already been saying their say in symphonic compositions for a century or two, and the abounding vitality of Mr. Lazar's Scherzo, contrasted, for convenient instance, with the polished superficialities of M. Ibert's "Rencontres" of last week, assuredly endorsed that point of view.

Has Primitive Vigor

That Mr. Lazar's is a new and important voice in music might hardly be inferred from this "Tziganes," but the young man (he is not yet 33) writes with his ear to the earth. In his music is a primitive vigor and the unbridled abandon that one would expect of a Rumanian peasant's holiday. A pity that the composer could not have heard the remarkable performance of yesterday, a performance fittingly rhapsodic.

As for Respighi he was represented in Symphony Hall yesterday, and for the seventh time in 10 months, through his imaginative and effective "Pines of Rome." In the opinion of one who has heard five of those seven performances, the "Pines of Rome" would stand a frequency of repetition that would be fatal to most contemporary pieces. To be sure a hundred performances would hardly justify that plain lapse from artistic rectitude, the use of the phonograph record of the nightingale's song. The relentless approach of Cesar's legions may not quicken the pulse to quite the degree of last February. But the "Pines of Rome" still makes good listening. The shrilling exuberance of the first section, the solemnity of the second, the poetry of the third are still grateful to hear, while the final march is still stirring, still overpoweringly sonorous in its final climax.

One of the numbers on Mr. Koussevitzky's first Boston [illegible]

Second Symphony of Borodin this other hand, had not been heard here since the brief sojourn in our midst of Henri Rabaud. In the words of the composer's friend Stasov, Borodin was in the writing of this symphony haunted by the picture of feudal Russia. There is in the first movement something of the epic spirit that pervades Moussorgsky's "Boris."

This music speaks to us of an age half splendid, half barbaric. But Borodin, remarkably gifted man that he was, might hardly sustain himself throughout the four movements of a symphony. His genius has found fitter, more convincing expression in that more familiar music, the superb Dances from "Prince Igor."

Brass Choir Direct

With his unfailing aptitude for all things Russian, Mr. Koussevitzky read this Symphony with full sympathy, laid bare its inmost soul. The performance of it, like that of Berlioz's Overture, was brilliant in the extreme: in one respect almost too brilliant.

In view of the terrific force of which the trombones and trumpets of the Symphony Orchestra are now capable might it not be the course of discretion, even of mercy, to return this choir to its former position at the side of the stage? As it is, to hear in fortissimo these brasses with bells directed straight towards the audience is a bit like looking at the sun.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
OCT 30 1926

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra at Elmwood Music hall next Wednesday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
OCT 30 1926

Borodin Symphony on Radio Program

Is Work That Boston Orchestra Will Give in Auditorium Here Nov. 16.

The broadcasting of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening will have special interest to local music lovers, as the Borodin Symphony, which the orchestra will play, is the symphony to be done by the Springfield Symphony Orchestra at its first concert in the Auditorium Nov. 16. Many students and musicians are studying the programs to be played by the orchestra and this will afford them an excellent opportunity to familiarize themselves with this modern Russian composition which will be heard next month.

THIS CLIPPING FROM UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
OCT 30 1926

Borodin Symphony Will Be Broadcast by WBZ Tonight

Work of Russian Composer to Be Featured in Boston Symphony Radio Concert.

"The finest broadcast ever presented and the interpretative talks of Prof. Marshall are invaluable" is the manner in which radio listeners throughout the United States are commenting on the concerts of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast by Westinghouse saation WBZ and the chain including WJZ, WGY and WRC. Already thousands of letters have been received by W. S. Quinby, who is sponsoring the series of broadcasts through the various stations on the symphony chain which attest to the enthusiasm of the Saturday "symphonic nights."

Tonight's symphony program will only be sent out through WBZ and WBZA as the other stations in the network could not arrange to take more than 15 of the 24 concerts. Prof. John Patten Marshall, who is interpreting the selections for the radio audience, classes this week's concert as a modern one for, with the exception of a number by Berlioz, all the selections are of recent date.

Borodin, whose Symphony No. 2 furnishes the feature on tonight's program, was one of the five composers who were associated together in an attempt to found a Russian school of composition. During the intermission, Prof. Marshall will illustrate with the assistance of Marjorie Posselt, violinist, the themes from Borodin's symphony and will tell of the music of the new Russian school. The two numbers after the intermission are by living composers, Lazar, a Rumanian, and Respighi, one of the most prominent of modern Italian composers.

Prof. Marshall will tell his audience something about Rumanian music and in discussing Respighi's symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," he will explain the connection between the music and the subtitles which are "The Pines."

The complete program is as follows:

Overture, "Le Carnival Romain" ..... Berlioz

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C.
OCT 30 1926

Taking it by and large, this evening will produce more different things for loud speaker delivery than any evening for many a long day—things that are worth while and that are happening at about the same time. Most of these things are three very famous symphony orchestras, or rather two famous orchestras and one famous orchestra director in a musical lecture that usually draws a larger audience than a concert of his orchestra. And there are also the famous Hill Billies!

The students' series of concerts broadcast annually by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra will be inaugurated this evening for the season of 1926-27 through WRC, WJZ and WGY. The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays its weekly concert through the microphones of WBZ and WEAF and its affiliated chain of stations will broadcast the musical lecture of Dr. Walter Damrosch on Wagnerian music, illustrated by the director with piano scores. The two symphonies begin shortly after 8 o'clock and play about two hours and a half and Dr. Damrosch opens his program at 9 o'clock and lectures for a bit more than an hour. You can choose your concert—and tune as static, sun spots, Aurora Borealis and WJZ's famous semi-detached transmission system permits!

The wise WRC listener will probably elect to remain tuned with WRC so long as the transmission from New York holds good—and this may be one of the nights when it gives plu-perfect service—who knows? If that is done the early evening will bring the usual Saturday Bible talk, two political arguments, an orchestral concert from the Washington Hotel and a talk on "Apple Week" before time for the philharmonic to begin.

The first number of the student course program is the "Sinfonia" overture by Bach. This will be followed by Bloch's symphony, "Israel" After the intermission Hanson's "Pan and the Preist" will be played and the concert will close with the "Finlandia" overture of Sibelius. Of the four numbers to be presented—all of them presenting different types of music and great musical color, perhaps the one I would choose to hear most carefully would be the last—the "Finlandia" number of Sibelius. The outer world—the world to which Finland was but a name on a map—was a very long time in discovering the vivid musical personality of Silelius. When the discovery was made nothing impressed it so deeply on music lovers as this overture—a sweeping tone poem of powerful, dynamic form that tells the story of Finnish individuality and force as nothing else does or can. With the strength of an entire symphony orchestra to give it voice, this bit of music will sing its song most surely and directly to almost any sort of an audience. Will Handy, the composer of the negro "blues" form of music told me the other day that "Finlandia" had impressed itself on him as no other composition he had ever heard. Give an ear to it this evening and discover its grandeur for yourself.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES UNION
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
OCT 30 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Prof. John Patten Marshall, who is interpreting the Boston Symphony selections for the radio audience, classes this week's concert as a modern one, for, with the exception of a number by Berlioz. all the selections are of recent date.

Borodin's Symphony No. 2 furnishes the "piece de resistance" on tonight's program. Professor Marshall, during intermission, will illustrate with the assistance of Marjorie Posselt, violinist, the themes from Borodin's symphony and will tell of the music of the new Russian school. The two numbers after the intermission are by living composers, Lazar, a Roumanian, and Respighi, one of the most prominent of modern Italian composers.

Professor Marshall will tell his audience something about Roumanian music and in discussing Respighi's symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," he will explain the connection between the music and the subtitles, which are "The Pines."

The complete program is as follows:

Overture, "Le Carnival Romain" ..... Berlioz

Symphony No. 2 in B Minor. Borodin
1. Allegro moderato.
2. Molto vivo.
3. Andante.
4. Allegro.

"Tziganes" Scherzo ..... Lazar

Symphonic Poem, "Pini di Roma" (Pines of Rome) ..... Respighi
1. The pines of the Villa Borghese.
2. The pines near a Catacomb.
3. The pines of the Janiculum.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
OCT 30 1926

Symphony Orchestra Well Broadcast From Boston at 8:10 Tonight

Tonight's programme by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will only be sent out through WBZ and WBZA, as the chain network could not arrange to take more than 15 of the 24 concerts to be broadcast by the Westinghouse stations. Prof. John Patten Marshall, who is interpreting the selections for the radio audience, classes tonight's concert as a modern one, for with the exception of a number of Berlioz, all the selections are of recent date.

Borodin, whose Symphony No. 2 furnishes, "piece de resistance" on tonight's programme, was one of the five composers who were associated in an attempt to found a Russian school of composition. Prof. Marshall will tell his audience something about Rumanian music, and in discussing Respighi's symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," he will explain the connection between the music and the subtitles which are "The Pines."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES UNION
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
OCT 30 1926

House Sold Out For Boston Symphony Concert Thursday

No Seats Available for Opening Event in Series C at the Eastman Theater — Koussevitzky To Make His First Appearance in Rochester.

With Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, the Boston Symphony will pay its first visit to Rochester in four years next Thursday night, as the opening event in Series C at the Eastman Theater. The orchestra, which has always rated as one of America's finest symphonic organizations, has continued its high repute under the leadership of Koussevitzky, who was engaged in 1924, following sensational reports of his success in Europe. This will be the only appearance here this season of an important out-of-town symphony orchestra.

The seating capacity of the theater has been completely exhausted for this concert, but a limited number of standing room admissions will be placed on sale the night of the concert, beginning at 7:30 o'clock. The program follows:

Mozart, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Serenade for string orchestra (K 525)

Debussy ..... Two Nocturnes
(a) Nuages (Clouds)
(b) Fetes (Festivals)

Prokofieff . . Suite from the Ballet "Chout" (Buffoon) Op. 21
1. Dance of the buffoon's daughters.
2. In the tradesman's bedroom.
3. The Young woman is transformed into a goat.
4. Final dance.

Intermission.

Tchaikowsky . . Symphony No. 4 in F. Minor, Op. 36.

OCT 30 1926
Pittsburgh Pa

ORCHESTRAS WILL OPEN

Boston Symphony to Offer Friday Night and Saturday Matinee Programs.

A feature of the Friday night concert, November 5, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque, under Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, will be "Pines of Rome," the latest symphonic poem of Respighi, the Italian composer. Other numbers in the Friday night program include the Ceasar Franck Symphony in D minor; Berlioz Overture "La Carnaval Romain;" Suite from the ballet "Chout" by Prokofieff; and Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin."

Serge Koussevitzky

The Saturday afternoon program includes Tschaikowsky Symphone No. 4; Stravinsky Orchestral Suite from the ballet "Petrouchka;" Two nocturne[illegible] Serenade

The t[illegible] Symphon[illegible] series o[illegible] chestras Pittsbur[illegible] May Be

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
OCT 30 1926

OPENING the orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, the Boston Symphony orchestra comes to Elmwood Music hall next Wednesday evening in a program notable for beauty and novelty.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct his men in the following:

Overture, Le Carnival Romain Op. 9 ..... Berlioz

Symphony in D minor ..... Franck
Lento; Allegro non troppo.
Allegretto.
Allegro non troppo.

Suite from the Ballet Chout (Buffoon) Op. 21 ..... Prokofieff
Dance of the buffoon's daughters.
In the tradesman's bedroom.
The young woman transformed into a goat.
Final dance.

Prelude to Lohengrin ..... Wagner

Symphonic Poem, Pini di Roma (Pines of Rome) ..... Respighi
The Pines of the Villa Borghese.
The Pines near a Catacomb.
The Pines of the Janiculum.
The Pines of the Appian Way.

From the slow and mysterious introduction of the Franck symphony to its exalted close, is a gradual ascent from darkness into the splendid altitudes which reflect the soaring spirit of this organist composer. The middle movement has a beautiful song for the English horn solo.

The Roman Carnival overture, with its brilliant, triumphant beauty, opens the program.

"In the "Chout" (Buffoon) by the talented young Russian composer, a novelty is presented. It is fantastic, woven from the half farce and half fantasy which is the story of the ballet, brought out by the Diaghileff Russian ballet at the Theater de la Gaiete Lyrique a number of years ago. It is the story of the Young Buffoon, who plays a trick on Seven Old Buffoons, gets into trouble, disguises himself and at once finds himself in the midst of a whirlwind of farcical difficulties.

"The clear blue of heaven and the presence of the Angelic Hosts" pictured in the "Lohengrin" prelude follows in the program, with the descriptive symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," as a glorious climax to the concert.

NEW MUSIC PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Lazar's 'Gypsies' Given First Public Performance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Optimism or pessimism regarding the present estate of musical composition is apt to be governed by the listener's most recent experience with it. At the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, for example, two contemporary composers, the Italian Respighi and the Rumanian Filip Lazar, each represented by comparatively recent music, quite held their own with such departed worthies as Berlioz and Borodin.

LAZAR'S MUSIC FRESH

Queen Marie's young countryman, the Filip Lazar in question, was until yesterday unknown to Boston, probably to the United States. Moreover the piece through which he was then heard, "Tziganes" (Gypsies), an orchestral Scherzo, received its first public performance. How strange, by the way, it would seem were some Bostonian piece to receive its initial hearing in Bucharest!

It is Mr. Koussevitzky's own altogether reasonable conviction that the freshest music of our immediate time is coming from those countries which have not already been saying their say in symphonic compositions for a century or two, and the abounding vitality of Mr. Lazar's Scherzo, contrasted, for convenient instance, with the polished superficialities of M. Ibert's "Rencontres" of last week, assuredly endorsed that point of view.

Has Primitive Vigor

That Mr. Lazar's is a new and important voice in music might hardly be inferred from this "Tziganes," but the young man (he is not yet 33) writes with his ear to the earth. In his music is a primitive vigor and the unbridled abandon that one would expect of a Rumanian peasant's holiday. A pity that the composer could not have heard the remarkable performance of yesterday, a performance fittingly rhapsodic.

As for Respighi he was represented in Symphony Hall yesterday, and for the seventh time in 10 months, through his imaginative and effective "Pines of Rome." In the opinion of one who has heard five of those seven performances, the "Pines of Rome" would stand a frequency of repetition that would be fatal to most contemporary pieces. To be sure a hundred performances would hardly justify that plain lapse from artistic rectitude, the use of the phonograph record of the nightingale's song. The relentless approach of Cesar's legions may not quicken the pulse to quite the degree of last February. But the "Pines of Rome" still makes good listening. The shrilling exuberance of the first section, the solemnity of the second, the poetry of the third are still grateful to hear, while the final march is still stirring, still overpoweringly sonorous in its final climax.

One of the numbers on Mr. Koussevitsky's first Boston program two season's ago, Berlioz's "Roman Carnaval" Overture received yesterday, as then, an electrifying performance, one in which the typical Berliozian brilliance was raised to the nth power. Second Symphony of Borodin on the other hand, had not been heard here since the brief sojourn in our midst of Henri Rabaud. In the words of the composer's friend Stasov, Borodin was in the writing of this symphony haunted by the picture of feudal Russia. There is in the first movement something of the epic spirit that pervades Moussorgsky's "Boris."

This music speaks to us of an age half splendid, half barbaric. But Borodin, remarkably gifted man that he was, might hardly sustain himself throughout the four movements of a symphony. His genius has found fitter, more convincing expression in that more familiar music, the superb Dances from "Prince Igor."

Brass Choir Direct

With his unfailing aptitude for all things Russian, Mr. Koussevitzky read this Symphony with full sympathy, laid bare its inmost soul. The performance of it, like that of Berlioz's Overture, was brilliant in the extreme: in one respect almost too brilliant.

In view of the terrific force of which the trombones and trumpets of the Symphony Orchestra are now capable might it not be the course of discretion, even of mercy, to return this choir to its former position at the side of the stage? As it is, to hear in fortissimo these brasses with bells directed straight towards the audience is a bit like looking at the sun.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra at Elmwood Music hall next Wednesday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVE. UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

OCT 30 1926

Borodin Symphony on Radio Program

Is Work That Boston Orchestra Will Give in Auditorium Here Nov. 16.

The broadcasting of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening will have special interest to local music lovers, as the Borodin Symphony, which the orchestra will play, is the symphony to be done by the Springfield Symphony Orchestra at its first concert in the Auditorium Nov. 16. Many students and musicians are studying the programs to be played by the orchestra and this will afford them an excellent opportunity to familiarize themselves with this modern Russian composition which will be heard next month.

THIS CLIPPING FROM UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

OCT 30 1926

Borodin Symphony Will Be Broadcast by WBZ Tonight

Work of Russian Composer to Be Featured in Boston Symphony Radio Concert.

"The finest broadcast ever presented and the interpretative talks of Prof. Marshall are invaluable" is the manner in which radio listeners throughout the United States are commenting on the concerts of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast by Westinghouse saation WBZ and the chain including WJZ, WGY and WRC. Already thousands of letters have been received by W. S. Quinby, who is sponsoring the series of broadcasts through the various stations on the symphony chain which attest to the enthusiasm of the Saturday "symphonic nights."

Tonight's symphony program will only be sent out through WBZ and WBZA as the other stations in the network could not arrange to take more than 15 of the 24 concerts. Prof. John Patten Marshall, who is interpreting the selections for the radio audience, classes this week's concert as a modern one for, with the exception of a number by Berlioz, all the selections are of recent date.

Borodin, whose Symphony No. 2 furnishes the feature on tonight's program, was one of the five composers who were associated together in an attempt to found a Russian school of composition. During the intermission, Prof. Marshall will illustrate with the assistance of Marjorie Posselt, violinist, the themes from Borodin's symphony and will tell of the music of the new Russian school. The two numbers after the intermission are by living composers, Lazar, a Rumanian, and Respighi, one of the most prominent of modern Italian composers.

Prof. Marshall will tell his audience something about Rumanian music and in discussing Respighi's symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," he will explain the connection between the music and the subtitles which are "The Pines."

The complete program is as follows:

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C.

OCT 30 1926

Taking it by and large, this evening will produce more different things for loud speaker delivery than any evening for many a long day—things that are worth while and that are happening at about the same time. Most of these things are three very famous symphony orchestras, or rather two famous orchestras and one famous orchestra director in a musical lecture that usually draws a larger audience than a concert of his orchestra. And there are also the famous Hill Billies!

The students' series of concerts broadcast annually by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra will be inaugurated this evening for the season of 1926-27 through WRC, WJZ and WGY. The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays its weekly concert through the microphones of WBZ and WEAF and its affiliated chain of stations will broadcast the musical lecture of Dr. Walter Damrosch on Wagnerian music, illustrated by the director with piano scores. The two symphonies begin shortly after 8 o'clock and play about two hours and a half and Dr. Damrosch opens his program at 9 o'clock and lectures for a bit more than an hour. You can choose your concert—and tune as static, sun spots, Aurora Borealis and WJZ's famous semi-detached transmission system permits!

The wise WRC listener will probably elect to remain tuned with WRC so long as the transmission from New York holds good—and this may be one of the nights when it gives plu-perfect service—who knows? If that is done the early evening will bring the usual Saturday Bible talk, two political arguments, an orchestral concert from the Washington Hotel and a talk on "Apple Week" before time for the philharmonic to begin.

The first number of the student course program is the "Sinfonia" overture by Bach. This will be followed by Bloch's symphony, "Israel" After the intermission Hanson's "Pan and the Preist" will be played and the concert will close with the "Finlandia" overture of Sibelius. Of the four numbers to be presented—all of them presenting different types of music and great musical color, perhaps the one I would choose to hear most carefully would be the last—the "Finlandia" number of Sibelius. The outer world—the world to which Finland was but a name on a map—was a very long time in discovering the vivid musical personality of Silelius. When the discovery was made nothing impressed it so deeply on music lovers as this overture—a sweeping tone poem of powerful, dynamic form that tells the story of Finnish individuality and force as nothing else does or can. With the strength of an entire symphony orchestra to give it voice, this bit of music will sing its song most surely and directly to almost any sort of an audience. Will Handy, the composer of the negro "blues" form of music told me the other day that "Finlandia" had impressed itself on him as no other composition he had ever heard. Give an ear to it this evening and discover its grandeur for yourself.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES UNION
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

OCT 30 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Prof. John Patten Marshall, who is interpreting the Boston Symphony selections for the radio audience, classes this week's concert as a modern one, for, with the exception of a number by Berlioz, all the selections are of recent date.

Borodin's Symphony No. 2 furnishes the "piece de resistance" on tonight's program. Professor Marshall, during intermission, will illustrate with the assistance of Marjorie Posselt, violinist, the themes from Borodin's symphony and will tell of the music of the new Russian school. The two numbers after the intermission are by living composers, Lazar, a Roumanian, and Respighi, one of the most prominent of modern Italian composers.

Professor Marshall will tell his audience something about Roumanian music and in discussing Respighi's symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," he will explain the connection between the music and the subtitles, which are "The Pines."

The complete program is as follows:

Overture, "Le Carnival Romain" ..... Berlioz

Symphony No. 2 in B Minor.Borodin
1. Allegro moderato.
2. Molto vivo.
3. Andante.
4. Allegro.

"Tziganes" Scherzo ..... Lazar

Symphonic Poem, "Pini di Roma" (Pines of Rome) ..... Respighi
1. The pines of the Villa Borghese.
2. The pines near a Catacomb.
3. The pines of the Janiculum.
4. The pines of the Appian Way.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.

OCT 30 1926

Symphony Orchestra Well Broadcast From Boston at 8:10 Tonight

Tonight's programme by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will only be sent out through WBZ and WBZA, as the chain network could not arrange to take more than 15 of the 24 concerts to be broadcast by the Westinghouse stations. Prof. John Patten Marshall, who is interpreting the selections for the radio audience, classes tonight's concert as a modern one, for with the exception of a number of Berlioz, all the selections are of recent date.

Borodin, whose Symphony No. 2 furnishes, "piece de resistance" on tonight's programme, was one of the five composers who were associated in an attempt to found a Russian school of composition. Prof. Marshall will tell his audience something about Rumanian music, and in discussing Respighi's symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," he will explain the connection between the music and the subtitles which are "The Pines."

OCT 30 1926
Pittsburgh Pa

ORCHESTRAS WILL OPEN

Boston Symphony to Offer Friday Night and Saturday Matinee Programs.

A feature of the Friday night concert, November 5, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque, under Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, will be "Pines of Rome," the latest symphonic poem of Respighi, the Italian composer. Other numbers in the Friday night program include the Ceasar Franck Symphony in D minor; Berlioz Overture "La Carnaval Romain;" Suite from the ballet "Chout" by Prokofieff; and Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin."

Serge Koussevitzsky

The Saturday afternoon program includes Tschaikowsky Symphone No. 4; Stravinsky Orchestral Suite from the ballet "Petrouchka;" Two nocturnes by Debussy; and Mozart Serenade for string orchestra.

The two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the series of seven pairs by visiting orchestras; under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, May Beegle, manager.

[illegible] will conduct his men in the following:

Overture, Le Carnival Romain Op. 9 ..... Berlioz

Symphony in D minor ..... Franck
Lento; Allegro non troppo.
Allegretto.
Allegro non troppo.

Suite from the Ballet Chout (Buffoon) Op. 21 ..... Prokofieff
Dance of the buffoon's daughters.
In the tradesman's bedroom.
The young woman transformed into a goat
Final dance.

Prelude to Lohengrin ..... Wagner

Symphonic Poem, Pini di Roma (Pines of Rome) ..... Respighi
The Pines of the Villa Borghese.
The Pines near a Catacomb.
The Pines of the janiculum.
The Pines of the Appian Way.

From the slow and mysterious introduction of the Franck symphony to its exalted close, is a gradual ascent from darkness into the splendid altitudes which reflect the soaring spirit of this organist composer. The middle movement has a beautiful song for the English horn solo.

The Roman Carnival overture, with its brilliant, triumphant beauty opens the program.

"In the "Chout" (Buffoon) by the talented young Russian composer, a novelty is presented. It is fantastic, woven from the half farce and half fantasy which is the story of the ballet, brought out by the Diaghileff Russian ballet at the Theater de la Gaiete Lyrique a number of years ago. It is the story of the Young Buffoon, who plays a trick on Seven Old Buffoons, gets into trouble, disguises himself and at once finds himself in the midst of a whirlwind of farcical difficulties.

"The clear blue of heaven and the presence of the Angelic Hosts" pictured in the "Lohengrin" prelude follows in the program, with the descriptive symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," as a glorious climax to the concert.

House Sold Out For Boston Symphony Concert Thursday

No Seats Available for Opening Event in Series C at the Eastman Theater — Koussevitzky To Make His First Appearance in Rochester.

With Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, the Boston Symphony will pay its first visit to Rochester in four years next Thursday night, as the opening event in Series C at the Eastman Theater. The orchestra, which has always rated as one of America's finest symphonic organizations, has continued its high repute under the leadership of Koussevitzky, who was engaged in 1924, following sensational reports of his success in Europe. This will be the only appearance here this season of an important out-of-town symphony orchestra.

The seating capacity of the theater has been completely exhausted for this concert, but a limited number of standing room admissions will be placed on sale the night of the concert, beginning at 7:30 o'clock. The program follows:

Mozart, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Serenade for string orchestra (K 525)

Debussy .....Two Nocturnes
(a) Nuages (Clouds)
(b) Fetes (Festivals)

Prokofieff..Suite from the Ballet "Chout" (Buffoon) Op. 21
1. Dance of the buffoon's daughters.
2. In the tradesman's bedroom.
3. The Young woman is transformed into a goat.
4. Final dance.

Intermission.

Tchaikowsky..Symphony No. 4 in F. Minor, Op. 36.

SYMPHONY GETS MUSICAL CURIOS

Herald Oct 30th

(Photo by Underwood & Underwood)

Among a collection of 144 ancient musical instruments, acquired by Henry Casadosus and presented to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in memory of Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, are the largest and smallest string instruments in the world. The largest is the "Tromba Marino," used in the 18th century. The largest is the "Tromba Marino," used in the 18th century. In the other is a pocket violin made in the early 17th century. In the picture they are held by Miss Elizabeth Benton, assistant director in the Museum of Fine Arts.

ROMAN TONE POEMS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Oct 30

Berlioz and Respighi Works Vividly Interpreted

Yesterday's Boston Symphony concert began with a remarkably brilliant performance of Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture. The final number was Respighi's "Pines of Rome," undeniably one of the most popular of tone poems. Mr Koussevitzky's reading had the theatrical effectiveness which dazzled the audiences at the several performances last season.

The symphony was Borodin's second. The novelty of the afternoon, a scherzo entitled "Gipsies," composed by a young Rumanian, Filip Lazar, and played for the first time in public, proved dull and noisy.

One wondered how far the music of Berlioz and Respighi depends for its effect on the associations of the word "Rome." The "Roman Carnival" overture, originally intended as an introduction to the second act of Berlioz' opera "Benvenuto Cellini," based on themes drawn from that era, and written doubtless with considerably more reference to the dramatic situations as to the 16th century Rome of which Cellini has left us so vivid a picture in his Memoirs.

Respighi's tone poem has a program note, printed in the score, explaining that the first of the four sections depicts children at play in the pine grove of the Villa Borghese, the second, "the shadows of the pines which overhang the entrance to a catacomb," the third, moonlight on the pines of one of the seven hills, the Janiculum, and the fourth a vision of Roman legions seen at sunrise on the Via Sacra.

Here the attempt at picture making is more definite and the appeal to the fringe of memories clustering in the listener's imagination around such words as "catacombs" and "the army of the consul" more direct.

Yet one wondered whether Respighi wrote this program note before or after composing the music. One wondered also whether he or another might not easily supply for this music 20 programs as ingenious, all of them different, and none of them Roman.

Borodin's Second Symphony sounded yesterday turgid, lacking in melodic inspiration, full of passages in which the composer, his constructive sense faulty, or in abeyance, marked time vaguely without knowing whither he was proceeding. The repetitious confused rhetoric of many Russian pieces may or may not reflect something in the Slavic temperament. It certainly tends to weary the hearer.

This symphony's chief merit is its vigorous rhythms. There is a certain amount of use of material suggesting Russian popular music, but one again found reason for a belief that the difference between the much touted "Five" Russian Nationalist composers and such avowed eclectics as Tchaikovsky and Rubinstein has been absurdly exaggerated.

Filip Lazar's name was unknown here until the other day. He is not to be found in most books of reference. From the program notes one gleans the information that he lives at Bucharest, Rumania, and studied in 1913-14 at Leipzig. His scherzo, "Gipsies", played from manuscript, has in the score an explanation that the music depicts gipsies dancing, singing, quarreling over a pretty girl, and then driven from the village by the henchmen of the local landlord.

Lazar has used a very large orchestra, chosen with care, and including a great deal of percussion. He asks for three assorted saxophones, for which assorted clarinets were substituted yesterday. He uses the orchestra like a child with a new toy, trying many original effects, some of which come off.

His treatment of folk themes in modern guise is far from being as skilful and satisfying as that of Stravinsky or even Prokofieff. "Much ado about nothing," was one's snap judgment.

There are no concerts in the regular Symphony series next week, as the Mr Koussevitzky has at last put on a Symphony program music by Bela Bartok, a modernist strangely neglected hereabouts in view of his great European reputation. This week we are to hear three "Village Scenes," which one assumes to be a "Dance Suite" by Bartok. The rest of the program is changed from that at first announced.

The other recitals of the week include Isidor Cohn, a 20-year-old Russian pianist, who will play among more conventional choices his own arrangement for piano solo of George Gershwin's much discussed Rhapsody in Blue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RADIO DIGEST
NOV 1 — 1926

If any of us worshipping, high-galleried standees, whose ambition was never to miss a concert by the Boston symphony orchestra, were to have been told that within ten years millions would be listening to its rendition of Beethoven's "Eroica"—sans hours standing in line, we would have awaited Chopin's Marche Funebre. But there it was, and with it the beautifully impressionistic Nocturnes of Debussy, interpreted with Slavic shadings yet executed by expert instrumentalists. Mr. Quinby should find no doubt in his mind as to the extent such generosity is appreciated, nor undervalue its contribution to musical education.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
OCT 30 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON "BZ" ALONE

Chain Stations Unable to Accommodate Tonight's Broadcast — Borodin's No 2 and "Pines of Rome" Offering

"The finest broadcast ever presented and the interpretive talks of Prof Marshall are invaluable" is the manner in which radio listeners throughout the United States are commenting on the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra sent out through Westinghouse station WBZ. Already thousands of letters have been received by W. S. Quimby of Boston, who is sponsoring the series of broadcasts and the various stations on the symphony chain which attest to the enthusiasm of the Saturday "symphonic nights."

Tonight's symphony program will only be sent out through WBZ, as the chain network could not arrange to take more than 15 of the 24 concerts. Prof John Patten Marshall, who is interpreting the selections for the radio audience, classes this week's concert as a modern one for, with the exception of a number by Berlioz, all the selections are of recent dates.

Borodin, whose Symphony No 2 furnishes the "piece de resistance" on tonight's program, was one of the five composers who were associated together in an attempt to found a Russian school of composition. During the intermission Prof Marshall will illustrate with the assistance of Marjorie Posselt, violinist, the themes from Borodin's symphony and will tell of the music of the new Russian school. The two numbers after the intermission are by living composers, Lazas, a Rumanian, and Respighi, one of the most prominent of modern Italian composers.

Prof Marshall will tell his audience something about Rumanian music, and in discussing Respighi's symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," he will explain the connection between the music and the subtitles which are "The Pines."

The complete program follows:—

Berlioz ... Overture "Le Carnival Romain"
Borodin ..... Symphony No 2 in B minor
(a) Allegro moderato
(b) Molto vivo
(c) Andante
(d) Allegro
Lazar ..... "Tziganes" Scherzo
Respighi ..Symphonic poem, "Pini di Roma" ("Pines of Rome)
(a) The pines of the Villa Borghese
(b) The pines near a catacomb
(c) The pines of the Haniculum
(d) The pines of the Appian way.

Down Hartford Way

Though somewhat eclipsed by the caliber of the program at WBZ, Hartford, WTIC, will have a big evening on another wave which may appeal to some, for Mary Carson Orr inaugurates the first of a series of broadcasts to be known as "Hartford composers' night," at 8 o'clock.

This series will give Hartford composers and authors of renown a chance to present to WTIC'S radio audience some of their newest and best works.

This evening also finds WTIC presenting a program by the Colonial male quartet at 9 o'clock. New Eng-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR
OCT 30 1926

FIRST TIME IN CANADA

Boston Symphony to Introduce Two Numbers Here

At the Forum on Monday evening, Montrealers will have the only opportunity of the season to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, having at its head the great Serge Koussevitzky, the idol of London and Paris symphonic concert audiences

Koussevitzky's leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has exceeded all expectations. When the great orchestra begins to play, there is in every bar of the music evidence of the exacting, yet persuasive, hand of the conductor. The hundred and twelve musicians respond as a single, rare instrument to Koussevitzky's slightest gesture.

The programme for Monday evening contains two novelties which will have their first Canadian premieres, the Ballet Suite by Prokofieff and the Symphonic Poem by Respighi. The latter composer is a young Italian who has gained fame during the last three years throughout the world and who will come to America during the present season as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony, New York Symphony, the Philadelphia Symphony, the Chicago Symphony, the New York Philharmonic, the Cleveland Symphony and other equally important organizations. Prokofieff is Russia's youngest composer and also a very fine pianist. He has toured this continent twice, and met immediate favor with the musical public. His opera, "The Love of Three Oranges," was produced five years ago by the Chicago Opera, Prokofieff conducting.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.
43
OCT 30 1926

Will Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra In Concerts Here

Serge Koussevitzky.

A feature of the Friday night concert, November 5, by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Syria Mosque, will be "Pines of Rome," the latest symphonic poem of Respighi, the famous Italian composer. Special attention has been attracted by an episode in the third movement, the introduction of a phonograph into an orchestral score for the first time in history. So great was the success of "The Pines of Rome" when it was performed by Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians at the regular concerts in Boston that it was repeated. The score is descriptive music, suggesting historical spots in the Eternal City. Other members in the Friday night program include the Caesar Franck "Symphony in D Minor"; Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnavel Romain"; suite from the ballet "Chout," by Prokofieff, and Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin." The Saturday afternoon program includes Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4, Stravinsky's orchestral suite from the ballet "Petrouchka," two nocturnes by Debussy and "Mozart Serenade" for string orchestra. These concerts will open the series of seven pairs by visiting orchestras, under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, May Beegle, manager.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
OCT 31 1926

Koussevitzky Coming Here Soon With Boston Symphony Orchestra

Sergei Koussevitzky, the conductor, arrived in Boston September 22, last, bringing with him from Europe some new scores of interest and many promising plans for a remarkable Boston Symphony Orchestra season, which will include a visit to this city. His sojourn in Europe began with his series of "concerts Koussevitzky," which are the principal event of each spring season in Paris. Subsequently he spent much time consulting composers and publishers in quest of new music. The latter part of the summer he took a real vacation in Switzerland and at the watering places of France. Koussevitzky brought back with him manuscript scores of works by Respighi, Roussel and Tansman which have been written especially for the Russian conductor and his orchestra, and which are to have their first performance in Boston.

A reviewer of Koussevitzky's opening concert in Boston this season, says:

"The great walls of the Forum rang with deafening applause, from the many thousands of enthusiastic and fortunate music lovers, on the fulfillment of the many brilliant, soulful and expressive, combinations offered by the great leader. The city's musical fraternity supported the program en masse and the huge Forum was filled to its appointed capacity to some six or seven thousands."

There will be notable choral concerts, and a Beethoven centennial festival in the spring, in observance of the master's death. Every effort is being made by Mr. Sedgwick to secure Mr. Koussevitzky's consent to present a Beethoven program for his Hartford concert. Seats are on sale at McCoy's music store, No. 89 Asylum street. Mail orders will have careful attention and the best seats will be allotted nearest to the location specified.

ENJOY SYMPHONY CONCERT BY RADIO

Public Pleased by Prof. Marshall's Interpretive Talks

Herald Oct 30

"The finest broadcast ever presented" and "Prof. Marshall's interpretive talks are invaluable" attest the extravagant manner in which listeners throughout the United States are commenting on the concerts of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra sent out by Westinghouse Station WBZ and the chain including WJZ, WGY and WRC.

Thousands of letters have already been received by W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago, who is sponsoring the series of broadcasts and the various stations on the symphony chain which attest to the enthusiastic reception of the Saturday "symphonic night."

Stations WBZ and WBZA are the only stations which are to broadcast the concert tonight, since arrangements for the chain broadcasts could not be made for more than 15 of the season's 24 concerts, all of which are to be broadcast by the Westinghouse stations at Springfield and Boston. Prof. John Patten Marshall, who is interpreting the selections for the radio audience, classes this week's concert as a modern one for, with the exception of a number by Berlioz, all the selections are of recent date.

Borodin, whose Symphony No. 2 furnishes the "piece de resistance" on tonight's program, was one of the five composers who were associated in an attempt to found a Russian school of composition. During the intermission, Prof. Marshall will illustrate with the assistance of Marjorie Posselt, violinist, the themes from Borodin's symphony, and will tell of the music of the new Russian school. The two numbers after the intermission are by living composers, Lazar, a Rumanian, and Respighi, one of the most prominent of modern Italian composers.

Prof. Marshall will tell his audience something about Rumanian music and in discussing Respighi's symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," he will explain the connection between the music and the sub-titles. The complete program follows:

Berlioz.....Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain
Borodin.....Symphony No. 2 in B Minor
I. Allegro moderato, II. Molto vivo, III. Andante, IV. Allegro
Lazar......"Tziganes," Scherzo
Respighi..Symphonic poem, "Pini di Roma" (Pines of Rome)
I. The Pines of the Villa Borghese, II. The Pines near a Catacomb, III. The Pines of the Janiculum, IV. The Pines of the Appian Way.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS BEE
TOLEDO, OHIO
NOV 1 - 1926

SUNDAY afternoon radio fans are promised added entertainment thru the rest of the fall and winter, due to the broadcasting of the concerts of the Detroit Symphony orchestra from Orchestra hall, Detroit, by station WWJ.

The first of these concerts to take the air was that of Sunday afternoon which followed, a little later, the concert by the Detroit News orchestra, and continued up to 5:30. This first program was a delight. Now Detroit is in a class with Cleveland, New York and Boston, in which cities the symphony orchestras are on the air regularly.

* * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NOV 1 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES CONCERT WEDNESDAY NIGHT

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert Wednesday evening in Elmwood Music hall, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The concert will begin as near 8:10 o'clock as possible, and, in order that late comers need not miss the symphony, the overture to "The Roman Carnival" by Hector Berlioz will be played as the opening number.

The orchestra makes only one week's tour every year, opening Monday night in Montreal, playing Toronto Tuesday night, Buffalo Wednesday night, Rochester Thursday night and so on east through the state, arriving in Boston Saturday for a concert in Symphony hall.

William H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, formerly of this city, says the symphony season was sold out in Boston weeks ago.

SYMPHONY GETS MUSICAL CURIOS

HERALD Oct 30th

(Photo by Underwood & Underwood)

Among a collection of 144 ancient musical instruments, acquired by Henry Casadosus and presented to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in memory of Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, are the largest and smallest string instruments in the world. The largest is the "Tromba Marino," used in the 18th century. The other is a pocket violin made in the early 17th century. In the picture they are held by Miss Elizabeth Benton, assistant director in the Museum of Fine Arts.

ROMAN TONE POEMS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Berlioz and Respighi Works Vividly Interpreted

Yesterday's Boston Symphony concert began with a remarkably brilliant performance of Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture. The final number was Respighi's "Pines of Rome," undeniably one of the most popular of tone poems. Mr Koussevitzky's reading had the theatrical effectiveness which dazzled the audiences at the several performances last season.

The symphony was Borodin's second. The novelty of the afternoon, a scherzo entitled "Gipsies," composed by a young Rumanian, Filip Lazar, and played for the first time in public, proved dull and noisy.

One wondered how far the music of Berlioz and Respighi depends for its effect on the associations of the word "Rome." The "Roman Carnival" overture, originally intended as an introduction to the second [illegible]erlioz' opera "Benvenuto Cellin[illegible]ed on themes drawn from th[illegible]a, and written doubtless with [illegible]s much reference to the dramatic [illegible]tuations as to the 16th century Rome of which Cellini has left us so vivid a picture in his Memoirs.

Respighi's tone poem has a program note, printed in the score, explaining that the first of the four sections depicts children at play in the pine grove of the Villa Borghese, the second, "the shadows of the pines which overhang the entrance to a catacomb," the third, moonlight on the pines of one of the seven hills, the Janiculum, and the fourth a vision of Roman legions seen at sunrise on the Via Sacra.

Here the attempt at picture making is more definite and the appeal to the fringe of memories clustering in the listener's imagination around such words as "catacombs" and "the army of the consul" more direct.

Yet one wondered whether Respighi wrote this program note before or after composing the music. One wondered also whether he or another might not easily supply for this music 20 programs as ingenious, all of them different, and none of them Roman.

Borodin's Second Symphony sounded yesterday turgid, lacking in melodic inspiration, full of passages in which the composer, his constructive sense faulty, or in abeyance, marked time vaguely without knowing whither he was proceeding. The repetitious confused rhetoric of many Russian pieces may or may not reflect something in the Slavic temperament. It certainly tends to weary the hearer.

This symphony's chief merit is its vigorous rhythms. There is a certain amount of use of material suggesting Russian popular music, but one again found reason for a belief that the difference between the much touted "Five" Russian Nationalist composers and such avowed eclectics as Tchaikovsky and Rubinstein has been absurdly exaggerated.

Filip Lazar's name was unknown here until the other day. He is not to be found in most books of reference. From the program notes one gleans the information that he lives at Bucharest, Rumania, and studied in 1913-14 at Leipzig. His scherzo, "Gipsies", played from manuscript, has in the score an explanation that the music depicts gipsies dancing, singing, quarreling over a pretty girl, and then driven from the village by the henchmen of the local landlord.

Lazar has used a very large orchestra, chosen with care, and including a great deal of percussion. He asks for three assorted saxophones, for which assorted clarinets were substituted yesterday. He uses the orchestra like a child with a new toy, trying many original effects, some of which come off.

His treatment of folk themes in modern guise is far from being as skilful and satisfying as that of Stravinsky or even Prokofieff. "Much ado about nothing," was one's snap judgment.

There are no concerts in the regular Symphony series next week, as the

THIS CLIPPING FROM RADIO DIGEST
NOV 1 1926

If any of us worshipping, high-galleried standees, whose ambition was never to miss a concert by the Boston symphony orchestra, were to have been told that within ten years millions would be listening to its rendition of Beethoven's "Eroica"—sans hours standing in line, we would have awaited Chopin's Marche Funebre. But there it was, and with it the beautifully impressionistic Nocturnes of Debussy, interpreted with Slavic shadings yet executed by expert instrumentalists. Mr. Quinby should find no doubt in his mind as to the extent such generosity is appreciated, nor undervalue its contribution to musical education.

Mr Koussevitzky has at last put on a Symphony program music by Bela Bartok, a modernist strangely neglected hereabouts in view of his great European reputation. This week we are to hear three "Village Scenes," which one assumes to be a "Dance Suite" by Bartok. The rest of the program is changed from that at first announced.

The other recitals of the week include Isidor Cohn, a 20-year-old Russian pianist, who will play among more conventional choices his own arrangement for piano solo of George Gershwin's much discussed Rhapsody in Blue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
OCT 30 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON "BZ" ALONE

Chain Stations Unable to Accommodate Tonight's Broadcast — Borodin's No 2 and "Pines of Rome" Offering

"The finest broadcast ever presented and the interpretive talks of Prof Marshall are invaluable" is the manner in which radio listeners throughout the United States are commenting on the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra sent out through Westinghouse station WBZ. Already thousands of letters have been received by W. S. Quimby of Boston, who is sponsoring the series of broadcasts and the various stations on the symphony chain which attest to the enthusiasm of the Saturday "symphonic nights."

Tonight's symphony program will only be sent out through WBZ, as the chain network could not arrange to take more than 15 of the 24 concerts. Prof John Patten Marshall, who is interpreting the selections for the radio audience, classes this week's concert as a modern one for, with the exception of a number by Berlioz, all the selections are of recent dates.

Borodin, whose Symphony No 2 furnishes the "piece de resistance" on tonight's program, was one of the five composers who were associated together in an attempt to found a Russian school of composition. During the intermission Prof Marshall will illustrate with the assistance of Marjorie Posselt, violinist, the themes from Borodin's symphony and will tell of the music of the new Russian school. The two numbers after the intermission are by living composers, Lazas, a Rumanian, and Respighi, one of the most prominent of modern Italian composers.

Prof Marshall will tell his audience something about Rumanian music, and in discussing Respighi's symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," he will explain the connection between the music and the subtitles which are "The Pines."

The complete program follows:—

Berlioz ... Overture "Le Carnival Romain"
Borodin ..... Symphony No 2 in B minor
(a) Allegro moderato
(b) Molto vivo
(c) Andante
(d) Allegro
Lazar ..... "Tziganes" Scherzo
Respighi ..Symphonic poem, "Pini di Roma" ("Pines of Rome)
(a) The pines of the Villa Borghese
(b) The pines near a catacomb
(c) The pines of the Haniculum
(d) The pines of the Appian way.

Down Hartford Way

Though somewhat eclipsed by the caliber of the program at WBZ, Hartford, WTIC, will have a big evening on another wave which may appeal to some, for Mary Carson Orr inaugurates the first of a series of broadcasts to be known as "Hartford composers' night," at 8 o'clock.

This series will give Hartford composers and authors of renown a chance to present to WTIC'S radio audience some of their newest and best works.

This evening also finds WTIC presenting a program by the Colonial male quartet at 9 o'clock. New Eng-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR
OCT 30 1926

FIRST TIME IN CANADA

Boston Symphony to Introduce Two Numbers Here

At the Forum on Monday evening, Montrealers will have the only opportunity of the season to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, having at its head the great Serge Koussevitzky, the idol of London and Paris symphonic concert audiences

Koussevitzky's leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has exceeded all expectations. When the great orchestra begins to play, there is in every bar of the music evidence of the exacting, yet persuasive, hand of the conductor. The hundred and twelve musicians respond as a single, rare instrument to Koussevitzky's slightest gesture.

The programme for Monday evening contains two novelties which will have their first Canadian premieres, the Ballet Suite by Prokofieff and the Symphonic Poem by Respighi. The latter composer is a young Italian who has gained fame during the last three years throughout the world and who will come to America during the present season as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony, New York Symphony, the Philadelphia Symphony, the Chicago Symphony, the New York Philharmonic, the Cleveland Symphony and other equally important organizations. Prokofieff is Russia's youngest composer and also a very fine pianist. He has toured this continent twice, and met immediate favor with the musical public. His opera, "The Love of Three Oranges," was produced five years ago by the Chicago Opera, Prokofieff conducting.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.
43
OCT 30 1926

Will Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra In Concerts Here

Serge Koussevitzky.

A feature of the Friday night concert, November 5, by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Syria Mosque, will be "Pines of Rome," the latest symphonic poem of Respighi, the famous Italian composer. Special attention has been attracted by an episode in the third movement, the introduction of a phonograph into an orchestral score for the first time in history. So great was the success of "The Pines of Rome" when it was performed by Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians at the regular concerts in Boston that it was repeated. The score is descriptive music, suggesting historical spots in the Eternal City. Other members in the Friday night program include the Caesar Franck "Symphony in D Minor"; Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnavel Romain"; suite from the ballet "Chout," by Prokofieff, and Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin." The Saturday afternoon program includes Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4, Stravinsky's orchestral suite from the ballet "Petrouchka," two nocturnes by Debussy and "Mozart Serenade" for string orchestra. These concerts will open the series of seven pairs by visiting orchestras, under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, May Beegle, manager.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
OCT 31 1926

Koussevitzky Coming Here Soon With Boston Symphony Orchestra

Sergei Koussevitzky, the conductor, arrived in Boston September 22, last, bringing with him from Europe some new scores of interest and many promising plans for a remarkable Boston Symphony Orchestra season, which will include a visit to this city. His sojourn in Europe began with his series of "concerts Koussevitzky," which are the principal event of each spring season in Paris. Subsequently he spent much time consulting composers and publishers in quest of new music. The latter part of the summer he took a real vacation in Switzerland and at the watering places of France. Koussevitzky brought back with him manuscript scores of works by Respighi, Roussel and Tansman which have been written especially for the Russian conductor and his orchestra, and which are to have their first performance in Boston.

A reviewer of Koussevitzky's opening concert in Boston this season, says:

"The great walls of the Forum rang with deafening applause, from the many thousands of enthusiastic and fortunate music lovers, on the fulfillment of the many brilliant, soulful and expressive, combinations offered by the great leader. The city's musical fraternity supported the program en masse and the huge Forum was filled to its appointed capacity to some six or seven thousands."

There will be notable choral concerts, and a Beethoven centennial festival in the spring, in observance of the master's death. Every effort is being made by Mr. Sedgwick to secure Mr. Koussevitzky's consent to present a Beethoven program for his Hartford concert. Seats are on sale at McCoy's music store, No. 89 Asylum street. Mail orders will have careful attention and the best seats will be allotted nearest to the location specified.

ENJOY SYMPHONY CONCERT BY RADIO

Public Pleased by Prof. Marshall's Interpretive Talks

Herald Oct 30

Which comments as "the most enjoyable broadcast ever presented," and "Prof. Marshall's interpretive talks are invaluable" attest the extravagant manner in which listeners throughout the United States are commenting on the concerts of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra sent out by Westinghouse Station WBZ and the chain including WJZ, WGY and WRC.

Thousands of letters have already been received by W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago, who is sponsoring the series of broadcasts and the various stations on the symphony chain which attest to the enthusiastic reception of the Saturday "symphonic night."

Stations WBZ and WBZA are the only stations which are to broadcast the concert tonight, since arrangements for the chain broadcasts could not be made for more than 15 of the season's 24 concerts, all of which are to be broadcast by the Westinghouse stations at Springfield and Boston. Prof. John Patten Marshall, who is interpreting the selections for the radio audience, classes this week's concert as a modern one for, with the exception of a number by Berlioz, all the selections are of recent date.

Borodin, whose Symphony No. 2 furnishes the "piece de resistance" on tonight's program, was one of the five composers who were associated in an attempt to found a Russian school of composition. During the intermission, Prof. Marshall will illustrate with the assistance of Marjorie Posselt, violinist, the themes from Borodin's symphony, and will tell of the music of the new Russian school. The two numbers after the intermission are by living composers, Lazar, a Rumanian, and Respighi, one of the most prominent of modern Italian composers.

Prof. Marshall will tell his audience something about Rumanian music and in discussing Respighi's symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," he will explain the connection between the music and the sub-titles. The complete program follows:

Berlioz.....Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain
Borodin.....Symphony No. 2 in B Minor
I. Allegro moderato, II. Molto vivo, III. Andante, IV. Allegro
Lazar.....Tziganes," Scherzo
Respighi..Symphonic poem, "Pini di Roma" (Pines of Rome)
I. The Pines of the Villa Borghese, II. The Pines near a Catacomb, III. The Pines of the Janiculum, IV. The Pines of the Appian Way.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS BEE
TOLEDO, OHIO
NOV 1 - 1926

SUNDAY afternoon radio fans are promised added entertainment thru the rest of the fall and winter, due to the broadcasting of the concerts of the Detroit Symphony orchestra from Orchestra hall, Detroit, by station WWJ.

The first of these concerts to take the air was that of Sunday afternoon which followed, a little later, the concert by the Detroit News orchestra, and continued up to 5:30. This first program was a delight. Now Detroit is in a class with Cleveland, New York and Boston, in which cities the symphony orchestras are on the air regularly.

* * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NOV 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES CONCERT WEDNESDAY NIGHT

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert Wednesday evening in Elmwood Music hall, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The concert will begin as near 8:10 o'clock as possible, and, in order that late comers need not miss the symphony, the overture to "The Roman Carnival" by Hector Berlioz will be played as the opening number.

The orchestra makes only one week's tour every year, opening Monday night in Montreal, playing Toronto Tuesday night, Buffalo Wednesday night, Rochester Thursday night and so on east through the state, arriving in Boston Saturday for a concert in Symphony hall.

William H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, formerly of this city, says the symphony season was sold out in Boston weeks ago.

SYMPHONY GETS MUSICAL CURIOS

HERALD Oct 30th

(Photo by Underwood & Underwood)

Among a collection of 144 ancient musical instruments, acquired by Henry Casadosus and presented to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in memory of Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, are the largest and smallest string instruments in the world. The largest is the "Tromba Marino," used in the 18th century. The other is a pocket violin made in the early 17th century. In the picture they are held by Miss Elizabeth Benton, assistant director in the Museum of Fine Arts.

ROMAN TONE POEMS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Oct 30

Berlioz and Respighi Works Vividly Interpreted

Yesterday's Boston Symphony concert began with a remarkably brilliant performance of Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture. The final number was Respighi's "Pines of Rome," undeniably one of the most popular of tone poems. Mr Koussevitzky's reading had the theatrical effectiveness which dazzled the audiences at the several performances last season.

The symphony was Borodin's second. The novelty of the afternoon, a scherzo entitled "Gipsies," composed by a young Rumanian, Filip Lazar, and played for the first time in public, proved dull and noisy.

One wondered how far the music of Berlioz and Respighi depends for its effect on the associations of the word "Rome." The "Roman Carnival" overture, originally intended as an introduction to the second [illegible] erlioz' opera "Benvenuto Cellini, [illegible]sed on themes drawn from th[illegible]a, and written doubtless with [illegible]s much reference to the dramatic [illegible]tuations as to the 16th century Rome of which Cellini has left us so vivid a picture in his Memoirs.

Respighi's tone poem has a program note, printed in the score, explaining that the first of the four sections depicts children at play in the pine grove of the Villa Borghese, the second, "the shadows of the pines which overhang the entrance to a catacomb," the third, moonlight on the pines of one of the seven hills, the Janiculum, and the fourth a vision of Roman legions seen at sunrise on the Via Sacra.

Here the attempt at picture making is more definite and the appeal to the fringe of memories clustering in the listener's imagination around such words as "catacombs" and "the army of the consul" more direct.

Yet one wondered whether Respighi wrote this program note before or after composing the music. One wondered also whether he or another might not easily supply for this music 20 programs as ingenious, all of them different, and none of them Roman.

Borodin's Second Symphony sounded yesterday turgid, lacking in melodic inspiration, full of passages in which the composer, his constructive sense faulty, or in abeyance, marked time vaguely without knowing whither he was proceeding. The repetitious confused rhetoric of many Russian pieces may or may not reflect something in the Slavic temperament. It certainly tends to weary the hearer.

This symphony's chief merit is its vigorous rhythms. There is a certain amount of use of material suggesting Russian popular music, but one again found reason for a belief that the difference between the much touted "Five" Russian Nationalist composers and such avowed eclectics as Tchaikovsky and Rubinstein has been absurdly exaggerated.

Filip Lazar's name was unknown here until the other day. He is not to be found in most books of reference. From the program notes one gleans the information that he lives at Bucharest, Rumania, and studied in 1913-14 at Leipzig. His scherzo, "Gipsies", played from manuscript, has in the score an explanation that the music depicts gipsies dancing, singing, quarreling over a pretty girl, and then driven from the village by the henchmen of the local landlord.

Lazar has used a very large orchestra, chosen with care, and including a great deal of percussion. He asks for three assorted saxophones, for which assorted clarinets were substituted yesterday. He uses the orchestra like a child with a new toy, trying many original effects, some of which come off.

His treatment of folk themes in modern guise is far from being as skilful and satisfying as that of Stravinsky or even Prokofieff. "Much ado about nothing," was one's snap judgment.

There are no concerts in the regular Symphony series next week, as the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RADIO DIGEST
NOV 1 - 1926

If any of us worshipping, high-galleried standees, whose ambition was never to miss a concert by the Boston symphony orchestra, were to have been told that within ten years millions would be listening to its rendition of Beethoven's "Eroica"—sans hours standing in line, we would have awaited Chopin's Marche Funebre. But there it was, and with it the beautifully impressionistic Nocturnes of Debussy, interpreted with Slavic shadings yet executed by expert instrumentalists. Mr. Quinby should find no doubt in his mind as to the extent such generosity is appreciated, nor undervalue its contribution to musical education.

Mr Koussevitzky has at last put on a Symphony program music by Bela Bartok, a modernist strangely neglected hereabouts in view of his great European reputation. This week we are to hear three "Village Scenes," which one assumes to be a "Dance Suite" by Bartok. The rest of the program is changed from that at first announced.

The other recitals of the week include Isidor Cohn, a 20-year-old Russian pianist, who will play among more conventional choices his own arrangement for piano solo of George Gershwin's much discussed Rhapsody in Blue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
OCT 30 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON "BZ" ALONE

Chain Stations Unable to Accommodate Tonight's Broadcast — Borodin's No 2 and "Pines of Rome" Offering

"The finest broadcast ever presented and the interpretive talks of Prof Marshall are invaluable" is the manner in which radio listeners throughout the United States are commenting on the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra sent out through Westinghouse station WBZ. Already thousands of letters have been received by W. S. Quimby of Boston, who is sponsoring the series of broadcasts and the various stations on the symphony chain which attest to the enthusiasm of the Saturday "symphonic nights."

Tonight's symphony program will only be sent out through WBZ, as the chain network could not arrange to take more than 15 of the 24 concerts. Prof John Patten Marshall, who is interpreting the selections for the radio audience, classes this week's concert as a modern one for, with the exception of a number by Berlioz, all the selections are of recent dates.

Borodin, whose Symphony No 2 furnishes the "piece de resistance" on tonight's program, was one of the five composers who were associated together in an attempt to found a Russian school of composition. During the intermission Prof Marshall will illustrate with the assistance of Marjorie Posselt, violinist, the themes from Borodin's symphony and will tell of the music of the new Russian school. The two numbers after the intermission are by living composers, Lazas, a Rumanian, and Respighi, one of the most prominent of modern Italian composers.

Prof Marshall will tell his audience something about Rumanian music, and in discussing Respighi's symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," he will explain the connection between the music and the subtitles which are "The Pines."

The complete program follows:—

Berlioz ... Overture "Le Carnival Romain"
Borodin ..... Symphony No 2 in B minor
(a) Allegro moderato
(b) Molto vivo
(c) Andante
(d) Allegro
Lazar ..... "Tziganes" Scherzo
Respighi ..Symphonic poem, "Pini di Roma" ("Pines of Rome)
(a) The pines of the Villa Borghese
(b) The pines near a catacomb
(c) The pines of the Haniculum
(d) The pines of the Appian way.

Down Hartford Way

Though somewhat eclipsed by the caliber of the program at WBZ, Hartford, WTIC, will have a big evening on another wave which may appeal to some, for Mary Carson Orr inaugurates the first of a series of broadcasts to be known as "Hartford composers' night," at 8 o'clock.

This series will give Hartford composers and authors of renown a chance to present to WTIC'S radio audience some of their newest and best works.

This evening also finds WTIC presenting a program by the Colonial male quartet at 9 o'clock. New England's premier male quartet promises some new and interesting numbers for this occasion. Programs:—

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
OCT 30 1926

FIRST TIME IN CANADA

Boston Symphony to Introduce Two Numbers Here

At the Forum on Monday evening, Montrealers will have the only opportunity of the season to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, having at its head the great Serge Koussevitzky, the idol of London and Paris symphonic concert audiences

Koussevitzky's leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has exceeded all expectations. When the great orchestra begins to play, there is in every bar of the music evidence of the exacting, yet persuasive, hand of the conductor. The hundred and twelve musicians respond as a single, rare instrument to Koussevitzky's slightest gesture.

The programme for Monday evening contains two novelties which will have their first Canadian premieres, the Ballet Suite by Prokofieff and the Symphonic Poem by Respighi. The latter composer is a young Italian who has gained fame during the last three years throughout the world and who will come to America during the present season as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony, New York Symphony, the Philadelphia Symphony, the Chicago Symphony, the New York Philharmonic, the Cleveland Symphony and other equally important organizations. Prokofieff is Russia's youngest composer and also a very fine pianist. He has toured this continent twice, and met immediate favor with the musical public. His opera, "The Love of Three Oranges," was produced five years ago by the Chicago Opera, Prokofieff conducting.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.
43
OCT 30 1926

Will Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra In Concerts Here

Serge Koussevitzky.

A feature of the Friday night concert, November 5, by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Syria Mosque, will be "Pines of Rome," the latest symphonic poem of Respighi, the famous Italian composer. Special attention has been attracted by an episode in the third movement, the introduction of a phonograph into an orchestral score for the first time in history. So great was the success of "The Pines of Rome" when it was performed by Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians at the regular concerts in Boston that it was repeated. The score is descriptive music, suggesting historical spots in the Eternal City. Other members in the Friday night program include the Caesar Franck "Symphony in D Minor"; Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnavel Romain"; suite from the ballet "Chout," by Prokofieff, and Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin." The Saturday afternoon program includes Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4, Stravinsky's orchestral suite from the ballet "Petrouchka," two nocturnes by Debussy and "Mozart Serenade" for string orchestra. These concerts will open the series of seven pairs by visiting orchestras, under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, May Beegle, manager.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
OCT 31 1926

Koussevitzky Coming Here Soon With Boston Symphony Orchestra

Sergei Koussevitzky, the conductor, arrived in Boston September 22, last, bringing with him from Europe some new scores of interest and many promising plans for a remarkable Boston Symphony Orchestra season, which will include a visit to this city. His sojourn in Europe began with his series of "concerts Koussevitzky," which are the principal event of each spring season in Paris. Subsequently he spent much time consulting composers and publishers in quest of new music. The latter part of the summer he took a real vacation in Switzerland and at the watering places of France. Koussevitzky brought back with him manuscript scores of works by Respighi, Roussel and Tansman which have been written especially for the Russian conductor and his orchestra, and which are to have their first performance in Boston.

A reviewer of Koussevitzky's opening concert in Boston this season, says:

"The great walls of the Forum rang with deafening applause, from the many thousands of enthusiastic and fortunate music lovers, on the fulfillment of the many brilliant, soulful and expressive, combinations offered by the great leader. The city's musical fraternity supported the program en masse and the huge Forum was filled to its appointed capacity to some six or seven thousands."

There will be notable choral concerts, and a Beethoven centennial festival in the spring, in observance of the master's death. Every effort is being made by Mr. Sedgwick to secure Mr. Koussevitzky's consent to present a Beethoven program for his Hartford concert. Seats are on sale at McCoy's music store, No. 89 Asylum street. Mail orders will have careful attention and the best seats will be allotted nearest to the location specified.

ENJOY SYMPHONY CONCERT BY RADIO

Public Pleased by Prof. Marshall's Interpretive Talks

Herald Oct 30

"Which is immediately the most enjoyable broadcast ever presented," and "Prof. Marshall's interpretive talks are invaluable" attest the extravagant manner in which listeners throughout the United States are commenting on the concerts of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra sent out by Westinghouse Station WBZ and the chain including WJZ, WGY and WRC.

Thousands of letters have already been received by W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago, who is sponsoring the series of broadcasts and the various stations on the symphony chain which attest to the enthusiastic reception of the Saturday "symphonic night."

Stations WBZ and WBZA are the only stations which are to broadcast the concert tonight, since arrangements for the chain broadcasts could not be made for more than 15 of the season's 24 concerts, all of which are to be broadcast by the Westinghouse stations at Springfield and Boston. Prof. John Patten Marshall, who is interpreting the selections for the radio audience, classes this week's concert as a modern one for, with the exception of a number by Berlioz, all the selections are of recent date.

Borodin, whose Symphony No. 2 furnishes the "piece de resistance" on tonight's program, was one of the five composers who were associated in an attempt to found a Russian school of composition. During the intermission, Prof. Marshall will illustrate with the assistance of Marjorie Posselt, violinist, the themes from Borodin's symphony, and will tell of the music of the new Russian school. The two numbers after the intermission are by living composers, Lazar, a Rumanian, and Respighi, one of the most prominent of modern Italian composers.

Prof. Marshall will tell his audience something about Rumanian music and in discussing Respighi's symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," he will explain the connection between the music and the sub-titles. The complete program follows:

Berlioz.....Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain
Borodin.....Symphony No. 2 in B Minor
I. Allegro moderato, II. Molto vivo. III. Andante, IV. Allegro
Lazar......"Tziganes," Scherzo
Respighi..Symphonic poem, "Pini di Roma" (Pines of Rome)
I. The Pines of the Villa Borghese. II. The Pines near a Catacomb. III. The Pines of the Janiculum. IV. The Pines of the Appian Way.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS BEE
TOLEDO, OHIO
NOV 1 - 1926

SUNDAY afternoon radio fans are promised added entertainment thru the rest of the fall and winter, due to the broadcasting of the concerts of the Detroit Symphony orchestra from Orchestra hall, Detroit, by station WWJ.

The first of these concerts to take the air was that of Sunday afternoon which followed, a little later, the concert by the Detroit News orchestra, and continued up to 5:30. This first program was a delight. Now Detroit is in a class with Cleveland, New York and Boston, in which cities the symphony orchestras are on the air regularly.

* * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NOV - 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES CONCERT WEDNESDAY NIGHT

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert Wednesday evening in Elmwood Music hall, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The concert will begin as near 8:10 o'clock as possible, and, in order that late comers need not miss the symphony, the overture to "The Roman Carnival" by Hector Berlioz will be played as the opening number.

The orchestra makes only one week's tour every year, opening Monday night in Montreal, playing Toronto Tuesday night, Buffalo Wednesday night, Rochester Thursday night and so on east through the state, arriving in Boston Saturday for a concert in Symphony hall.

William H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, formerly of this city, says the symphony season was sold out in Boston weeks ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
STAR
MONTREAL, CANADA
Gazette
NOV 3 - 1926

BIRD'S SONG ON RECORD

Brunswick Panatrope Used in Boston Symphony Number

An innovation, as interesting as it is revolutionary, is the introduction of special recording into the middle of a symphony, and which was demonstrated for the first time on Monday night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra used the Brunswick Panatrope to faithfully render the song of the nightingale in Respighi's "Pines of Rome." The effect it had upon the large audience at the Forum was immense, and sounded more like real birdsong than recording of any kind.

The term gramophone is really a misnomer; for the Brunswick Panatrope is neither that nor phonograph, although it takes the music from the record in a similar way as does its brothers, but without a sound box or tone arm in the full sense of the word. Its direct connection with the record is an electrical "pick-up" which carries the vibrations of the record to an electrical chamber, capable of determining sound waves of a wide variation, and from thence through amplifying tubes to the unit which electrically gives out these sounds for humans to enjoy. Without the aid of electricity it would be impossible to accomplish this. Much has heretofore been registered on a record which has never been reproduced, and this is the difference between the Panatrope and ordinary phonographs or gramophones. The quality and individuality of the instrument or voice is reproduced one hundred per cent. The naturalness of the singing birds during Monday evening's performance was so realistic that one was unwilling to believe that it was anything but the voices of birds. The Panatrope has advanced further in the art of phonographic reproduction than any other instrument; in fact, it might be said that it has reached the pinnacle, for it is impossible to improve upon it. The Panatrope used by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was supplied by C. W. Lindsay, Limited.

PRESS
PITTSBURG, PA.
NOV 3 1926

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS TOMORROW.

The Boston Symphony orchestra with 100 players, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open the symphony season in Pittsburgh tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon, at Syria mosque. The program for these concerts will be analyzed tonight at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute, Bellefield ave. The speaker will be Charles N. Boyd, with piano illustrations by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. This entertainment is free to the public.

The symphonies to be played this week are the Caesar Franck symphony in D Minor, Friday night, and the Tchaikovsky No. 4, on Saturday afternoon. Other works to be heard this week include Roman Carnival overture by Berlioz; Prokofieff suite from the ballet "Chout;" Wagner's

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.
NOV 3 1926

Boston Symphony Plays Here Friday

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with 100 players, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open the symphony season in Pittsburgh Friday night and Saturday afternoon, at Syria Mosque. The program for these concerts will be analyzed tomorrow at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute, on Bellefield avenue. The speaker will be Charles N. Boyd, with piano illustrations by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. This entertainment is free to the public, and all interestedl orchestra patrons are welcome.

The symphonies to be played this week and the Caesar Franck Symphony in D minor Friday night and the Tchaikovsky No. 4 on Saturday afternoon. Other works to be heard this week include "Roman Carnival" Overture by Berlioz, Prokofieff suite from the Ballet "Chout," Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," by Respighi; Mozart serenade for string orchestra, two nocturnes by Debussy and Stravinsky's orchestral suite from the Ballet "Petrouchka."

Ff or Ppp? Trans. Nov. 4

Once upon a time irreverent Manhattanese spoke and wrote of the Boston Orchestra as Mr. Gericke's "Damenkapelle," or "Ladies' Orchestra." There are those who would still have the Symphony Concerts inns of tranquillity, and who are disturbed at the large sonorities, usually ordained by the composer, that Mr. Koussevitzky now projects over them. One such sends to The Transcript this pleasing letter:

Is it possible that volume of sound per se is acquiring a merit of its own? Are our ear-drums changing like the respiratory organs of aviators? For one who has frequented the Symphony Concerts for thirty years, the climaxes of Mr. Koussevitzky have become painful to the ear-drums—so much so that I feel forced to propound these questions:

Can it be that Mr. Koussevitzky is flattering our national weaknesses to the extent of creating an orchestra on a par with the sky-scrapers of New York or of the Falls of Niagara? Or is he a believer in the theory evolved from the war, that concussion resulting from high explosives opened brain-cells that otherwise were dormant? Of course we are a little somnolent sometimes in Boston, but may not our evolution arrive, even if slowly? I hope, even as I scarcely dare entertain the thought, that the otherwise dignified Mr. Koussevitzky is not laughing in his sleeve at us, nor that he is harboring the sinister design of practising the laws of rhythm and sound that were fatal to the walls of Jericho.

Continued on Following Page

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Continued from Preceding Page

Programs in Prospect

From the program originally assembled for the Symphony Concerts of next week, Mr. Koussevitzky now retains only the Suite from Prokofiev's opera, "The Love of Three Oranges." Arensky's set of Variations, once before announced, reconsidered and rejected, again goes by the board. Schumann's First Symphony, which many would have heard gladly, gives way to Brahms's Fourth. For the recent "Village Scenes" of Bartok the conductor substitutes an earlier "Dance-Suite"; while with a Concerto of Bach he now prefaces the whole. Here, in order, is the revised list:

Concerto in C-major for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra ..... Bach
Dance-Suite ..... Bartok
Suite from the Opera, "The Love of Three Oranges" ..... Prokofiev
(Fools; Infernal Scene; March; Scherzo; Prince and Princess; Flight)
Symphony in E-minor, No. 4 ..... Brahms

For his concert in Symphony Hall on Monday evening next, Mr. Dohnányi, pianist of all the sobrieties, divides his program between Beethoven, Chopin and himself. Here it is:

Serenade for String Orchestra ("Eine Kleine Nachtmusik") ..... Mozart
Three Pieces from the Ballet, "Les Rencontres" ..... Ibert
Rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," ..... Strauss
Symphony in D-minor ..... Franck

For the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening of next week Mr. Koussevitzky announces the following numbers:

Variations on An Hungarian Theme—Introduction and Fugue from "Humoresques"—Adagio and Presto from "Ruralia Hungarica" ..... Dohnányi
Sonata in E-flat, Op. 31, No. 3 ..... Beethoven
Nocturne in C-sharp minor—Impromptu in A-flat—Mazurka in D ..... Chopin
Intermezzo in E-flat, Op. 117, No. 1 ..... Brahms
Rondo alla Zingarese ..... Brahms-Dohnányi

Items of the Day

Miss Leginska and the Boston Philharmonic Orchestra have adjourned their next concert to Sunday afternoon, Nov. 21, in Mechanics Hall. Meanwhile rehearsals are in abeyance and the assembling of a board of directors is in progress. There are also pending changes in the list of guarantors.

Mr. Tito Schipa, one of the rare operatic tenors who is also versed in the singing of songs, will be heard in a concert of his own at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 28. He does not come to Boston, later in the winter, with the Chicago Opera Company. To him, on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 5, succeeds Mr. Hofmann, more than ever praised this autumn in England.

The first of the annual concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its Pension Fund is now set for Sunday afternoon, Dec. 26—the day after Christmas and a difficult date for touring virtuosi.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS
PITTSBURG, PA.
NOV 4 1926

Analyze Concert Tonight.

The Boston Symphony orchestra programs, to be given at Syria Mosque this week, Friday night and Saturday afternoon, will be analyzed at the Pittsburgh Musical institute tonight Charles N. Boyd will speak on the different works, and piano illustrations will be given by Dallmyer Russell and William H. Oetting.

The symphony to be given Friday night is the Caesar Franck in D minor; the other interesting numbers on this program include Respighi's "Pines of Rome," Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin," Prokofieff's suite from the ballet "Chout," and Roman Carnival Overture by Berlioz. The symphony Saturday afternoon is Tschaikowsky's No. 4.

TIMES UNION
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
NOV 4 - 1926

Boston Symphony Will Give Concert Tonight In Eastman Theater

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to the Eastman Theater tonight for its first visit in several years and the opening event in Series C. Seats for this entire series were sold out several weeks ago, and standing room only is available for tonight's concert. This will be placed on sale at 7:30 o'clock.

The famous orchestra will be under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor, who is credited with achieving a spectacular success since his assumption of the baton over the historic orchestra.

The program for tonight will include the Tschaikovsky Fourth Symphony; Mozart's "Nachtmusik"; two Nocturnes by Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and the "Chout" ballet of Prokofief, which the Boston Symphony played for the first time in this country only a few weeks ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHRONICLE TELEGRAPH
PITTSBURGH, PA.
NOV 5 - 1926

SYMPHONY HERE TONIGHT

Boston Orchestra Opening Series at Syria Mosque; Matinee Tomorrow.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with 100 players under Serge Koussevitzky, will give the opening symphony orchestra concerts at Syria Mosque tonight and tomorrow afternoon. The following programs are announced:

TONIGHT.
Overture "Roman Carnival" ..... Berlioz
Symphony in D minor ..... Franck
Suite from the Ballet "Chout" (Buffoon) ..... Prokofieff
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Symphonic Poem, "Pines of Rome" ..... Respighi

SATURDAY MATNEE.
"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Serenade for String Orchestra ..... Mozart
Two Nocturnes "Nuages" and "Fetes" ..... Debussy
Orchestral Suite from the Ballett "Petrouchka" ..... Stravinsky
Symphony No. 4 in F minor ..... Tschaikowsky

Much Newness

THE Fourth Symphony of Brahms, in which Mr. Koussevitzky excelled two years ago, is the one familiar item in the program for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. Even the Concerto of Bach—fourth in the Brandenberg series—for violin, two flutes and string orchestra is seldom heard nowadays. Revived in London last spring, it made no small stir. Hence, possibly, re-discovery for Boston. The Dance-Suite of Bartok, wholly new hereabouts, is representative music of a vivid and vigorous modernist, already hailed as a minor master. Elsewhere on these pages is some account of him. Finally, Prokofiev's fantastic opera, "The Love of Three Oranges," yields an orchestral suite of six numbers. In the year of Miss Garden as manager, the Chicago Company produced it. Now it is gradually gaining place in Europe. Much of it courts the vein of sardonic humor and brave fantasy in which the composer excels.

At Cambridge

For the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening, Mr. Koussevitzky announces the following numbers, all from recent programs in Boston:

Serenade for String Orchestra ("Eine Kleine Nachtmusik") ..... Mozart
Three Pieces from the Ballet, "Les Rencontres" ..... Ibert
Rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," ..... Strauss
Symphony in D-minor ..... Franck

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
NOV 6 1926

Feature artists on tonight's WTAG program will include Edward Boulay, pianist, and Edmund Dupre, violinist. The latter is concert master of the High School of Commerce orchestra and will be heard in joint recital with Mr. Boulay and the Commonwealth quartet at 9.01 this evening.

Mr. Dupre, though still in his "teens," has been heard from the local station in several recitals. He is a pupil of Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

In tonight's recital, Mr. Boulay, who needs no introduction to local radio fans, will play "Slave Song," one of his recent compositions.

Brooklyn Bulletin
1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ACQUIRES COLLECTION OF OLD INSTRUMENTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has come into permanent possession of a collection of ancient instruments which are considered one of the finest in existence. The collection was given by a group of citizens of Boston, in memory of HENRY LEE HIGGINSON, the Orchestra's founder.

These rare instruments were assembled by HENRI CASADÉSUS, a French musician who has devoted his life to early instruments and their music. Mr. KOUSSEVITZKY, whose double bass is a 17th century instrument, has long shared the enthusiasms of M. CASADÉSUS. Years ago the two musicians gave recitals in

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY EXAMINING THE GROUP OF RARE VIOLS, OF WHICH HE IS HOLDING THE BASS

Moscow, performing early double concertos for double bass and viola d'amour. M. CASADÉSUS visited the United States with his "Société des Instruments Anciens" in 1918, giving recitals upon a quartet of viols. It was on Mr. KOUSSEVITZKY'S recommendation that this collection was acquired last spring.

The collection contains some fine specimens of the earliest of string instruments such as the hurdy gurdy, monochord, marine trumpet, some beautiful pearl-inlaid lutes and zithers, some grotesque serpents, richly carved. There is a department of oriental instruments, some drums with ornamentation beautifully wrought. The viols are among the finest in existence.

NEWS
NEWARK, N. J.
NOV 6 - 1926

Concert by the Boston Symphony.

After an absence of a year the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Serge Koussevitzky is the conductor, will return to Montclair Wednesday night, November 24, and give a concert in the auditorium of the Montclair High School. As heretofore it will appear under the auspices of the Unity Concert Course.

The Boston Symphony is one of the foremost organizations of its kind in the country and its ability to stir enthusiasm by its performances when they are guided by Mr. Koussevitzky is so well known that it is needless to comment on its virtuosity.

* * *

NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 6 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT HERE NOV. 23

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit to Providence for a concert in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Nov. 23.

Serge Koussevitzky will present the overture to Beethoven's "Egmont" and the same composer's third symphony in E flat, "Eroica." These masterpieces will be played in observance of the 100th anniversary of the great composer's death, which is observed throughout the world this season.

The other numbers will be a suite from Prokofieff's "The Love of the Three Oranges," the opera of the talented Russian composer, which was produced several seasons ago in Chicago. The movements are as follows: "Les Ridicules," infernal scene, march, scherzo, the prince and princess, the flight. The closing number will be Respighi's "Pines of Rome," a symphonic poem played in Providence and other cities last season with conspicuous success.

MUSIC
Manitar Nov 16

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the first of its Monday series of concerts last night in Symphony Hall. The program was made up of Mozart's Serenade for String Orchestra, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik;" Prokofieff's Suite from the Ballet, "Chout"; Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and Franck's Symphony.

These numbers had all been performed this season at the Friday and Saturday subscription concerts. So much the pleasanter to listen to them again. Novel works, or fresh interpretations of familiar ones, are bound to make a clearer impression, if not inded to disclose previously unmarked beauties, when reheard after a brief interval. Most of the audience, of course, had probably not heard this music at the previous concerts. Nevertheless, they were fortunate, in that they had the benefit of the orchestra's own greater familiarity with Mr. Koussevitzky's readings. And they knew their good fortune. It was a pleasure to sit with a body of listeners so receptive and responsive. So far from being shocked by Prokofies horrit noises, they wee vastly amused at his funmaking. After this item, and again after the Strauss and the Franck, they applauded until the conductor called the players to their feet.

The rehearing of Prokofieff's Suite did not serve to convince one of its immortality. Granted that, like the Suite from "The Love for Three Oranges," played last week, it is masterly in contrivance; nevertheless, it does not avoid monotony. It definitely suffered last night from proximity to Strauss's Rondo, which again was performed with such vividness and vivacity that while recognizing the entire propriety of the hero's punishment, one felt a twinge of real sorrow for the culprit.

As for the Symphony, we were confirmed last night in the impression that Mr. Koussevitzky has given it a new tenure. There may be some who will deplore his infusion of dramatic vigor into it, but for our part we were getting pretty well bored with the alleged loftiness of this music, and we are delighted with its palingenesis.

L. A.

THIS CLIPPING FROM STAR
MONTREAL, CANADA

NOV 3 - 1926

BIRD'S SONG ON RECORD

Brunswick Panatrope Used in Boston Symphony Number

An innovation, as interesting as it is revolutionary, is the introduction of special recording into the middle of a symphony, and which was demonstrated for the first time on Monday night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra used the Brunswick Panatrope to faithfully render the song of the nightingale in Respighi's "Pines of Rome." The effect it had upon the large audience at the Forum was immense, and sounded more like real birdsong than recording of any kind.

The term gramophone is really a misnomer; for the Brunswick Panatrope is neither that nor phonograph, although it takes the music from the record in a similar way as does its brothers, but without a sound box or tone arm in the full sense of the word. Its direct connection with the record is an electrical "pick-up" which carries the vibrations of the record to an electrical chamber, capable of determining sound waves of a wide variation, and from thence through amplifying tubes to the unit which electrically gives out these sounds for humans to enjoy. Without the aid of electricity it would be impossible to accomplish this. Much has heretofore been registered on a record which has never been reproduced, and this is the difference between the Panatrope and ordinary phonographs or gramophones. The quality and individuality of the instrument or voice is reproduced one hundred per cent. The naturalness of the singing birds during Monday evening's performance was so realistic that one was unwilling to believe that it was anything but the voices of birds. The Panatrope has advanced further in the art of phonographic reproduction than any other instrument; in fact, it might be said that it has reached the pinnacle, for it is impossible to improve upon it. The Panatrope used by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was supplied by C. W. Lindsay, Limited.

PRESS
PITTSBURG, PA.

NOV 3 1926

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS TOMORROW.

The Boston Symphony orchestra with 100 players, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open the symphony season in Pittsburgh tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon, at Syria mosque. The program for these concerts will be analyzed tonight at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute, Bellefield ave. The speaker will be Charles N. Boyd, with piano illustrations by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. This entertainment is free to the public.

The symphonies to be played this week are the Caesar Franck symphony in D Minor, Friday night, and the Tchaikovsky No. 4, on Saturday afternoon. Other works to be heard this week include Roman Carnival overture by Berlioz; Prokofieff suite from the ballet "Chout"; Wagner's

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUN
PITTSBURG, PA.

NOV 3 1926

Boston Symphony Plays Here Friday

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with 100 players, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open the symphony season in Pittsburgh Friday night and Saturday afternoon, at Syria Mosque. The program for these concerts will be analyzed tomorrow at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute, on Bellefield avenue. The speaker will be Charles N. Boyd, with piano illustrations by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. This entertainment is free to the public, and all interestedl orchestra patrons are welcome.

The symphonies to be played this week and the Caesar Franck Symphony in D minor Friday night and the Tchaikovsky No. 4 on Saturday afternoon. Other works to be heard this week include "Roman Carnival" Overture by Berlioz, Prokofieff suite from the Ballet "Chout," Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," by Respighi; Mozart serenade for string orchestra, two nocturnes by Debussy and Stravinsky's orchestral suite from the Ballet "Petrouchka."

Ff or Ppp? Trans. Nov. 4

Once upon a time irreverent Manhattanese spoke and wrote of the Boston Orchestra as Mr. Gericke's "Damenkapelle," or "Ladies' Orchestra." There are those who would still have the Symphony Concerts inns of tranquillity, and who are disturbed at the large sonorities, usually ordained by the composer, that Mr. Koussevitzky now projects over them. One such sends to The Transcript this pleasing letter:

Is it possible that volume of sound per se is acquiring a merit of its own? Are our ear-drums changing like the respiratory organs of aviators? For one who has frequented the Symphony Concerts for thirty years, the climaxes of Mr. Koussevitzky have become painful to the ear-drums—so much so that I feel forced to propound these questions:

Can it be that Mr. Koussevitzky is flattering our national weaknesses to the extent of creating an orchestra on a par with the sky-scrapers of New York or of the Falls of Niagara? Or is he a believer in the theory evolved from the war, that concussion resulting from high explosives opened brain-cells that otherwise were dormant? Of course we are a little somnolent sometimes in Boston, but may not our evolution arrive, even if slowly? I hope, even as I scarcely dare entertain the thought, that the otherwise dignified Mr. Koussevitzky is not laughing in his sleeve at us, nor that he is harboring the sinister design of practising the laws of rhythm and sound that were fatal to the walls of Jericho.

Continued on Following Page

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Continued from Preceding Page

Programs in Prospect

From the program originally assembled for the Symphony Concerts of next week, Mr. Koussevitzky now retains only the Suite from Prokofiev's opera, "The Love of Three Oranges." Arensky's set of Variations, once before announced, reconsidered and rejected, again goes by the board. Schumann's First Symphony, which many would have heard gladly, gives way to Brahms's Fourth. For the recent "Village Scenes" of Bartok the conductor substitutes an earlier "Dance-Suite"; while with a Concerto of Bach he now prefaces the whole. Here, in order, is the revised list:

Concerto in G-major for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra.....Bach
Dance-Suite.....Bartok
Suite from the Opera, "The Love of Three Oranges".....Prokofiev
(Fools; Infernal Scene; March; Scherzo; Prince and Princess; Flight)
Symphony in E-minor, No. 4.....Brahms

For his concert in Symphony Hall on Monday evening next, Mr. Dohnányi, pianist of all the sobrieties, divides his program between Beethoven, Chopin and himself. Here it is:

Serenade for String Orchestra ("Eine Kleine Nachtmusik").....Mozart
Three Pieces from the Ballet, "Les Rencontres".....Ibert
Rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."
Strauss
Symphony in D-minor.....Franck

For the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening of next week Mr. Koussevitzky announces the following numbers:

Variations on An Hungarian Theme—Introduction and Fugue from "Humoresques"—Adagio and Presto from "Ruralia Hungarica".....Dohnányi
Sonata in E-flat, Op. 31, No. 3.....Beethoven
Nocturne in C-sharp minor—Impromptu in A-flat—Mazurka in D.....Chopin
Intermezzo in E-flat, Op. 117, No. 1....Brahms
Rondo alla Zingarese.....Brahms-Dohnányi

Items of the Day

Miss Leginska and the Boston Philharmonic Orchestra have adjourned their next concert to Sunday afternoon, Nov. 21, in Mechanics Hall. Meanwhile rehearsals are in abeyance and the assembling of a board of directors is in progress. There are also pending changes in the list of guarantors.

Mr. Tito Schipa, one of the rare operatic tenors who is also versed in the singing of songs, will be heard in a concert of his own at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 28. He does not come to Boston, later in the winter, with the Chicago Opera Company. To him, on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 5, succeeds Mr. Hofmann, more than ever praised this autumn in England.

The first of the annual concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its Pension Fund is now set for Sunday afternoon, Dec. 26—the day after Christmas and a difficult date for touring virtuosi.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS
PITTSBURG, PA.

NOV 4 1926

Analyze Concert Tonight.

The Boston Symphony orchestra programs, to be given at Syria Mosque this week, Friday night and Saturday afternoon, will be analyzed at the Pittsburgh Musical institute tonight. Charles N. Boyd will speak on the different works, and piano illustrations will be given by Dallmyer Russell and William H. Oetting.

The symphony to be given Friday night is the Caesar Franck in D minor; the other interesting numbers on this program include Respighi's "Pines of Rome," Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin," Prokofieff's suite from the ballet "Chout," and Roman Carnival Overture by Berlioz. The symphony Saturday afternoon is Tschaikowsky's No. 4.

TIMES UNION
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

NOV 4 - 1926

Boston Symphony Will Give Concert Tonight In Eastman Theater

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to the Eastman Theater tonight for its first visit in several years and the opening event in Series C. Seats for this entire series were sold out several weeks ago, and standing room only is available for tonight's concert. This will be placed on sale at 7:30 o'clock.

The famous orchestra will be under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor, who is credited with achieving a spectacular success since his assumption of the baton over the historic orchestra.

The program for tonight will include the Tschaikovsky Fourth Symphony; Mozart's "Nachtmusik"; two Nocturnes by Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and the "Chout" ballet of Prokofief, which the Boston Symphony played for the first time in this country only a few weeks ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHRONICLE TELEGRAPH
PITTSBURGH, PA.

NOV 5 - 1926

SYMPHONY HERE TONIGHT

Boston Orchestra Opening Series at Syria Mosque; Matinee Tomorrow.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with 100 players under Serge Koussevitzky, will give the opening symphony orchestra concerts at Syria Mosque tonight and tomorrow afternoon. The following programs are announced:

TONIGHT.
Overture "Roman Carnival".....Berlioz
Symphony in D minor.....Franck
Suite from the Ballet "Chout" (Buffoon).....Prokofieff
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Symphonic Poem, "Pines of Rome".....Respighi
SATURDAY MATNEE.
"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Serenade for String Orchestra.....Mozart
Two Nocturnes "Nuages" and "Fetes".....Debussy
Orchestral Suite from the Ballett "Petrouchka".....Stravinsky
Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Tschaikowsky

Much Newness

THE Fourth Symphony of Brahms, in which Mr. Koussevitzky excelled two years ago, is the one familiar item in the program for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. Even the Concerto of Bach—fourth in the Brandenberg series—for violin, two flutes and string orchestra is seldom heard nowadays. Revived in London last spring, it made no small stir. Hence, possibly, re-discovery for Boston. The Dance-Suite of Bartok, wholly new hereabouts, is representative music of a vivid and vigorous modernist, already hailed as a minor master. Elsewhere on these pages is some account of him. Finally, Prokofiev's fantastic opera, "The Love of Three Oranges," yields an orchestral suite of six numbers. In the year of Miss Garden as manager, the Chicago Company produced it. Now it is gradually gaining place in Europe. Much of it courts the vein of sardonic humor and brave fantasy in which the composer excels.

At Cambridge

For the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening, Mr. Koussevitzky announces the following numbers, all from recent programs in Boston:

Serenade for String Orchestra ("Eine Kleine Nachtmusik").....Mozart
Three Pieces from the Ballet, "Les Rencontres".....Ibert
Rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."
Strauss
Symphony in D-minor.....Franck

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.

NOV 6 1926

Feature artists on tonight's WTAG program will include Edward Boulay, pianist, and Edmund Dupre, violinist. The latter is concert master of the High School of Commerce orchestra and will be heard in joint recital with Mr. Boulay and the Commonwealth quartet at 9.01 this evening.

Mr. Dupre, though still in his "teens," has been heard from the local station in several recitals. He is a pupil of Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

In tonight's recital, Mr. Boulay, who needs no introduction to local radio fans, will play "Slave Song," one of his recent compositions.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ACQUIRES COLLECTION OF OLD INSTRUMENTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has come into permanent possession of a collection of ancient instruments which are considered one of the finest in existence. The collection was given by a group of citizens of Boston, in memory of HENRY LEE HIGGINSON, the Orchestra's founder.

These rare instruments were assembled by HENRI CASADÉSUS, a French musician who has devoted his life to early instruments and their music. Mr. KOUSSEVITZKY, whose double bass is a 17th century instrument, has long shared the enthusiasms of M. CASADÉSUS. Years ago the two musicians gave recitals in

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY EXAMINING THE GROUP OF RARE VIOLS, OF WHICH HE IS HOLDING THE BASS

Moscow, performing early double concertos for double bass and viola d'amour. M. CASADÉSUS visited the United States with his "Société des Instruments Anciens" in 1918, giving recitals upon a quartet of viols. It was on Mr. KOUSSEVITZKY'S recommendation that this collection was acquired last spring.

The collection contains some fine specimens of the earliest of string instruments such as the hurdy gurdy, monochord, marine trumpet, some beautiful pearl-inlaid lutes and zithers, some grotesque serpents, richly carved. There is a department of oriental instruments, some drums with ornamentation beautifully wrought. The viols are among the finest in existence.

NEWS
NEWARK, N. J.

NOV 6 - 1926

Concert by the Boston Symphony.

After an absence of a year the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Serge Koussevitzky is the conductor, will return to Montclair Wednesday night, November 24, and give a concert in the auditorium of the Montclair High School. As heretofore it will appear under the auspices of the Unity Concert Course.

The Boston Symphony is one of the foremost organizations of its kind in the country and its ability to stir enthusiasm by its performances when they are guided by Mr. Koussevitzky is so well known that it is needless to comment on its virtuosity.

* * *

NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

NOV 6 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT HERE NOV. 23

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit to Providence for a concert in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Nov. 23.

Serge Koussevitzky will present the overture to Beethoven's "Egmont" and the same composer's third symphony in E flat, "Eroica." These masterpieces will be played in observance of the 100th anniversary of the great composer's death, which is observed throughout the world this season.

The other numbers will be a suite from Prokofieff's "The Love of Three Oranges," the opera of the talented Russian composer, which was produced several seasons ago in Chicago. The movements are as follows: "Les Ridicules," infernal scene, march, scherzo, the prince and princess, the flight. The closing number will be Respighi's "Pines of Rome," a symphonic poem played in Providence and other cities last season with conspicuous success.

MUSIC
Mentor Nov 16

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the first of its Monday series of concerts last night in Symphony Hall. The program was made up of Mozart's Serenade for String Orchestra, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik;" Prokofieff's Suite from the Ballet, "Chout"; Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and Franck's Symphony.

These numbers had all been performed this season at the Friday and Saturday subscription concerts. So much the pleasanter to listen to them again. Novel works, or fresh interpretations of familiar ones, are bound to make a clearer impression, if not inded to disclose previously unmarked beauties, when reheard after a brief interval. Most of the audience, of course, had probably not heard this music at the previous concerts. Nevertheless, they were fortunate, in that they had the benefit of the orchestra's own greater familiarity with Mr. Koussevitzky's readings. And they knew their good fortune. It was a pleasure to sit with a body of listeners so receptive and responsive. So far from being shocked by Prokofies horrit noises, they wee vastly amused at his fun-making. After this item, and again after the Strauss and the Franck, they applauded until the conductor called the players to their feet.

The rehearing of Prokofieff's Suite did not serve to convince one of its immortality. Granted that, like the Suite from "The Love for Three Oranges," played last week, it is masterly in contrivance; nevertheless, it does not avoid monotony. It definitely suffered last night from proximity to Strauss's Rondo, which again was performed with such vividness and vivacity that while recognizing the entire propriety of the hero's punishment, one felt a twinge of real sorrow for the culprit.

As for the Symphony, we were confirmed last night in the impression that Mr. Koussevitzky has given it a new tenure. There may be some who will deplore his infusion of dramatic vigor into it, but for our part we were getting pretty well bored with the alleged loftiness of this music, and we are delighted with its palingenesis.

L. A.

THIS CLIPPING FROM STAR
MONTREAL, CANADA

NOV 3 _ 1926

BIRD'S SONG ON RECORD

Brunswick Panatrope Used in Boston Symphony Number

An innovation, as interesting as it is revolutionary, is the introduction of special recording into the middle of a symphony, and which was demonstrated for the first time on Monday night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra used the Brunswick Panatrope to faithfully render the song of the nightingale in Respighi's "Pines of Rome." The effect it had upon the large audience at the Forum was immense, and sounded more like real birdsong than recording of any kind.

The term gramophone is really a misnomer; for the Brunswick Panatrope is neither that nor phonograph, although it takes the music from the record in a similar way as does its brothers, but without a sound box or tone arm in the full sense of the word. Its direct connection with the record is an electrical "pick-up" which carries the vibrations of the record to an electrical chamber, capable of determining sound waves of a wide variation, and from thence through amplifying tubes to the unit which electrically gives out these sounds for humans to enjoy. Without the aid of electricity it would be impossible to accomplish this. Much has heretofore been registered on a record which has never been reproduced, and this is the difference between the Panatrope and ordinary phonographs or gramophones. The quality and individuality of the instrument or voice is reproduced one hundred per cent. The naturalness of the singing birds during Monday evening's performance was so realistic that one was unwilling to believe that it was anything but the voices of birds. The Panatrope has advanced further in the art of phonographic reproduction than any other instrument; in fact, it might be said that it has reached the pinnacle, for it is impossible to improve upon it. The Panatrope used by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was supplied by C. W. Lindsay, Limited.

PRESS
PITTSBURG, PA.

NOV 3 1926

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS TOMORROW.

The Boston Symphony orchestra with 100 players, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open the symphony season in Pittsburgh tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon, at Syria mosque. The program for these concerts will be analyzed tonight at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute, Bellefield ave. The speaker will be Charles N. Boyd, with piano illustrations by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. This entertainment is free to the public.

The symphonies to be played this week are the Caesar Franck symphony in D Minor, Friday night, and the Tchaikovsky No. 4, on Saturday afternoon. Other works to be heard this week include Roman Carnival overture by Berlioz; Prokofieff suite from the ballet "Chout;" Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin;" Symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," by Respighi; Mozart serenade for string orchestra, two Nocturnes by Debussy and Stravinsky's orchestral suite from the ballet "Petrouchka."

...ra, with ...
...sevitzky, wh... season son in Pittsburgh ... and Saturday afternoon, at ... sque.
The program for these concerts will be analyzed tomorrow at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute, on Bellefield avenue. The speaker will be Charles N. Boyd, with piano illustrations by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. This entertainment is free to the public, and all interestedl orchestra patrons are welcome.

The symphonies to be played this week and the Caesar Franck Symphony in D minor Friday night and the Tchaikovsky No. 4 on Saturday afternoon. Other works to be heard this week include "Roman Carnival" Overture by Berlioz, Prokofieff suite from the Ballet "Chout," Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," by Respighi; Mozart serenade for string orchestra, two nocturnes by Debussy and Stravinsky's orchestral suite from the Ballet Petrouchka."

Fff or Ppp? Trans. Nov. 4

Once upon a time irreverent Manhattanese spoke and wrote of the Boston Orchestra as Mr. Gericke's "Damenkapelle," or "Ladies' Orchestra." There are those who would still have the Symphony Concerts inns of tranquillity, and who are disturbed at the large sonorities, usually ordained by the composer, that Mr. Koussevitzky now projects over them. One such sends to The Transcript this pleasing letter:

Is it possible that volume of sound per se is acquiring a merit of its own? Are our ear-drums changing like the respiratory organs of aviators? For one who has frequented the Symphony Concerts for thirty years, the climaxes of Mr. Koussevitzky have become painful to the ear-drums—so much so that I feel forced to propound these questions:

Can it be that Mr. Koussevitzky is flattering our national weaknesses to the extent of creating an orchestra on a par with the sky-scrapers of New York or of the Falls of Niagara? Or is he a believer in the theory evolved from the war, that concussion resulting from high explosives opened brain-cells that otherwise were dormant? Of course we are a little somnolent sometimes in Boston, but may not our evolution arrive, even if slowly? I hope, even as I scarcely dare entertain the thought, that the otherwise dignified Mr. Koussevitzky is not laughing in his sleeve at us, nor that he is harboring the sinister design of practising the laws of rhythm and sound that were fatal to the walls of Jericho.

Continued on Following Page

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Continued from Preceding Page

Programs in Prospect

From the program originally assembled for the Symphony Concerts of next week, Mr. Koussevitzky now retains only the Suite from Prokofiev's opera, "The Love of Three Oranges." Arensky's set of Variations, once before announced, reconsidered and rejected, again goes by the board. Schumann's First Symphony, which many would have heard gladly, gives way to Brahms's Fourth. For the recent "Village Scenes" of Bartok the conductor substitutes an earlier "Dance-Suite"; while with a Concerto of Bach he now prefaces the whole. Here, in order, is the revised list:

Concerto in C-major for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra.....Bach
Dance-Suite.....Bartok
Suite from the Opera, "The Love of Three Oranges".....Prokofiev
(Fools; Infernal Scene; March; Scherzo; Prince and Princess; Flight)
Symphony in E-minor, No. 4.....Brahms

For his concert in Symphony Hall on Monday evening next, Mr. Dohnányi, pianist of all the sobrieties, divides his program between Beethoven, Chopin and himself. Here it is:

Serenade for String Orchestra ("Eine Kleine Nachtmusik").....Mozart
Three Pieces from the Ballet, "Les Rencontres".....Ibert
Rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks,".....Strauss
Symphony in D-minor.....Franck

For the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening of next week Mr. Koussevitzky announces the following numbers:

Variations on An Hungarian Theme—Introduction and Fugue from "Humoresques"—Adagio and Presto from "Ruralia Hungarica".....Dohnányi
Sonata in E-flat, Op. 31, No. 3.....Beethoven
Nocturne in C-sharp minor—Impromptu in A-flat—Mazurka in D.....Chopin
Intermezzo in E-flat, Op. 117, No. 1.....Brahms
Rondo alla Zingarese.....Brahms-Dohnányi

Items of the Day

Miss Leginska and the Boston Philharmonic Orchestra have adjourned their next concert to Sunday afternoon, Nov. 21, in Mechanics Hall. Meanwhile rehearsals are in abeyance and the assembling of a board of directors is in progress. There are also pending changes in the list of guarantors.

Mr. Tito Schipa, one of the rare operatic tenors who is also versed in the singing of songs, will be heard in a concert of his own at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 28. He does not come to Boston, later in the winter, with the Chicago Opera Company. To him, on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 5, succeeds Mr. Hofmann, more than ever praised this autumn in England.

The first of the annual concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its Pension Fund is now set for Sunday afternoon, Dec. 26—the day after Christmas and a difficult date for touring virtuosi.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PRESS
PITTSBURG, PA.

NOV 4 1926

Analyze Concert Tonight.

The Boston Symphony orchestra programs, to be given at Syria Mosque this week, Friday night and Saturday afternoon, will be analyzed at the Pittsburgh Musical institute tonight. Charles N. Boyd will speak on the different works, and piano illustrations will be given by Dallmyer Russell and William H. Oetting.

The symphony to be given Friday night is the Caesar Franck in D minor; the other interesting numbers on this program include Respighi's "Pines of Rome," Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin," Prokofieff's suite from the ballet "Chout," and Roman Carnival Overture by Berlioz. The symphony Saturday afternoon is Tschaikowsky's No. 4.

TIMES UNION
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

NOV 4 - 1926

Boston Symphony Will Give Concert Tonight In Eastman Theater

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to the Eastman Theater tonight for its first visit in several years and the opening event in Series C. Seats for this entire series were sold out several weeks ago, and standing room only is available for tonight's concert. This will be placed on sale at 7:30 o'clock.

The famous orchestra will be under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor, who is credited with achieving a spectacular success since his assumption of the baton over the historic orchestra.

The program for tonight will include the Tschaikovsky Fourth Symphony; Mozart's "Nachtmusik"; two Nocturnes by Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and the "Chout" ballet of Prokofief, which the Boston Symphony played for the first time in this country only a few weeks ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHRONICLE TELEGRAPH
PITTSBURGH, PA.

NOV 5 - 1926

SYMPHONY HERE TONIGHT

Boston Orchestra Opening Series at Syria Mosque; Matinee Tomorrow.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with 100 players under Serge Koussevitzky, will give the opening symphony orchestra concerts at Syria Mosque tonight and tomorrow afternoon. The following programs are announced:

TONIGHT.
Overture "Roman Carnival".....Berlioz
Symphony in D minor.....Franck
Suite from the Ballet "Chout" (Buffoon).....Prokofieff
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Symphonic Poem, "Pines of Rome".....Respighi

SATURDAY MATNEE.
"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Serenade for String Orchestra.....Mozart
Two Nocturnes "Nuages" and "Fetes".....Debussy
Orchestral Suite from the Ballett "Petrouchka".....Stravinsky
Symphony No. 4 in F minor.....Tschaikowsky

Much Newness

THE Fourth Symphony of Brahms, in which Mr. Koussevitzky excelled two years ago, is the one familiar item in the program for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. Even the Concerto of Bach—fourth in the Brandenberg series—for violin, two flutes and string orchestra is seldom heard nowadays. Revived in London last spring, it made no small stir. Hence, possibly, re-discovery for Boston. The Dance-Suite of Bartok, wholly new hereabouts, is representative music of a vivid and vigorous modernist, already hailed as a minor master. Elsewhere on these pages is some account of him. Finally, Prokofiev's fantastic opera, "The Love of Three Oranges," yields an orchestral suite of six numbers. In the year of Miss Garden as manager, the Chicago Company produced it. Now it is gradually gaining place in Europe. Much of it courts the vein of sardonic humor and brave fantasy in which the composer excels.

At Cambridge

For the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening, Mr. Koussevitzky announces the following numbers, all from recent programs in Boston:

Serenade for String Orchestra ("Eine Kleine Nachtmusik").....Mozart
Three Pieces from the Ballet, "Les Rencontres".....Ibert
Rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks,".....Strauss
Symphony in D-minor.....Franck

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.

NOV 6 1926

Feature artists on tonight's WTAG program will include Edward Boulay, pianist, and Edmund Dupre, violinist. The latter is concert master of the High School of Commerce orchestra and will be heard in joint recital with Mr. Boulay and the Commonwealth quartet at 9.01 this evening.

Mr. Dupre, though still in his "teens," has been heard from the local station in several recitals. He is a pupil of Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

In tonight's recital, Mr. Boulay, who needs no introduction to local radio fans, will play "Slave Song," one of his recent compositions.

NEWS
NEWARK, N. J.

NOV 6 - 1926

Concert by the Boston Symphony.

After an absence of a year the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Serge Koussevitzky is the conductor, will return to Montclair Wednesday night, November 24, and give a concert in the auditorium of the Montclair High School. As heretofore it will appear under the auspices of the Unity Concert Course.

The Boston Symphony is one of the foremost organizations of its kind in the country and its ability to stir enthusiasm by its performances when they are guided by Mr. Koussevitzky is so well known that it is needless to comment on its virtuosity.

* * *

NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

NOV 6 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT HERE NOV. 23

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit to Providence for a concert in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Nov. 23.

Serge Koussevitzky will present the overture to Beethoven's "Egmont" and the same composer's third symphony in E flat, "Eroica." These masterpieces will be played in observance of the 100th anniversary of the great composer's death, which is observed throughout the world this season.

The other numbers will be a suite from Prokofieff's "The Love of the Three Oranges," the opera of the talented Russian composer, which was produced several seasons ago in Chicago. The movements are as follows: "Les Ridicules," infernal scene, march, scherzo, the prince and princess, the flight. The closing number will be Respighi's "Pines of Rome," a symphonic poem played in Providence and other cities last season with conspicuous success.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ACQUIRES COLLECTION OF OLD INSTRUMENTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has come into permanent possession of a collection of ancient instruments which are considered one of the finest in existence. The collection was given by a group of citizens of Boston, in memory of HENRY LEE HIGGINSON, the Orchestra's founder.

These rare instruments were assembled by HENRI CASADÉSUS, a French musician who has devoted his life to early instruments and their music. Mr. KOUSSEVITZKY, whose double bass is a 17th century instrument, has long shared the enthusiasms of M. CASADÉSUS. Years ago the two musicians gave recitals in

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY EXAMINING THE GROUP OF RARE VIOLS, OF WHICH HE IS HOLDING THE BASS

Moscow, performing early double concertos for double bass and viola d'amour. M. CASADÉSUS visited the United States with his "Société des Instruments Anciens" in 1918, giving recitals upon a quartet of viols. It was on Mr. KOUSSEVITZKY's recommendation that this collection was acquired last spring.

The collection contains some fine specimens of the earliest of string instruments such as the hurdy gurdy, monochord, marine trumpet, some beautiful pearl-inlaid lutes and zithers, some grotesque serpents, richly carved. There is a department of oriental instruments, some drums with ornamentation beautifully wrought. The viols are among the finest in existence.

MUSIC
Monitor Nov 16

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the first of its Monday series of concerts last night in Symphony Hall. The program was made up of Mozart's Serenade for String Orchestra, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik;" Prokofieff's Suite from the Ballet, "Chout"; Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and Franck's Symphony

These numbers had all been performed this season at the Friday and Saturday subscription concerts. So much the pleasanter to listen to them again. Novel works, or fresh interpretations of familiar ones, are bound to make a clearer impression, if not inded to disclose previously unmarked beauties, when reheard after a brief interval. Most of the audience, of course, had probably not heard this music at the previous concerts. Nevertheless, they were fortunate, in that they had the benefit of the orchestra's own greater familiarity with Mr. Koussevitzky's readings. And they knew their good fortune. It was a pleasure to sit with a body of listeners so receptive and responsive. So far from being shocked by Prokofies horrit noises, they wee vastly amused at his funmaking. After this item, and again after the Strauss and the Franck, they applauded until the conductor called the players to their feet.

The rehearing of Prokofieff's Suite did not serve to convince one of its immortality. Granted that, like the Suite from "The Love for Three Oranges," played last week, it is masterly in contrivance; nevertheless, it does not avoid monotony. It infinitely suffered last night from proximity to Strauss's Rondo, which in was performed with such ...dness and vivacity that while ...gnizing the entire propriety of ...hero's punishment, one felt a ...e of real sorrow for the culprit. ...for the Symphony, we were ...ed last night in the impres... Mr. Koussevitzky has given ... tenure. There may be some ...ill deplore his infusion of ... vigor into it, but for our ... were getting pretty well ...h the alleged loftiness of ...is music, and we are delighted with its palingenesis.

L. A. ...

NEW YORK
BROOKLYN EAGLE

NOV 7 1926

* * *

The opening concert in this season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 26.

* * *

A joint recital by Paula Hemminghaus, contralto, and Marshal Monroe, tenor, is announced by the Institute for the afternoon of Friday Nov. 12.

* * *

SPOKESMAN REVIEW
SPOKANE, WASH.

NOV 7 1926

Boston Symphony Radio Does Not Cut Revenue

Arrangements made to broadcast every Boston Symphony orchestra regular concert this season is another bit of evidence to support contentions that the radio does not injure concerts, according to the Musical Digest. Though perhaps still early to speak with incontestable certainty, there has been a marked growth in the quantity of good music dispensed via radio during the last twelvemonth. Many of the foremost artists have yielded to tempting inducements without affecting their concert incomes. And other symphony orchestras than the Boston have seemingly suffered no loss of revenue through the broadcasting of their concerts. There was a great hue and cry among printers when the linotype machine was introduced, but subsequent events saw more compositors at work than during the days when all type was hand set.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT CHRONICLE
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

NOV - 7 1926

Referring to the Rochester Philharmonic as one of "the great symphony orchestras of the country," and speaking of the fact that its afternoon concerts are now radiocast a Boston critic goes on to say:

"Eugene Goossens, the brilliant young Britisher who served as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony last season and with the New York Symphony, is conducting all of the concerts. Last summer he filled a week's engagement with the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra at the Hollywood Bowl, where he further distinguished himself as one of the great masters of the baton. Mr. Goossens is a composer as well as conductor, and is one of the youngest leaders of a major symphonic organization in the country, being not yet 33 years of age. This will be his fourth season as conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic, which he has developed into a fine ensemble."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN

NOV 8 1926

Boston Symphony Sold Out.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's season of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts, in Carnegie Hall, will open on November 25.

Seats for all series of Boston Symphony concerts in Boston, New York, and elsewhere were re-engaged for this season by former subscribers, and by the waiting lists of prospective [illegible] was not

THIS CLIPPING FROM EVERY EVENING
WILMINGTON, DEL.

NOV 9 - 1926

CONCERT TICKETS WILL BE ON SALE TOMORROW

The sale of subscriptions for the two symphony concerts which will be given this season in The Shubert Playhouse, under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association, will open tomorrow at Robelen's and will continue until the end of the week.

The first concert will be given by the Cleveland Orchestra on November 18, and the second by the Boston Symphony on January 31.

Mr. Koussevitzy has deferred to a later occasion the seldom heard Concerto of Bach—for violins, flutes and strings—announced for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. Instead, Beethoven's overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont," will be heard. Yes: this is the great Ludwig's centenary year.

Though tender ears may shudder at the prospect, there are to be more modernists at the Symphony Concerts of next week—no less indeed than four: Tansman of Paris with a "Dance of the Sorceress"; Krasa of Budapest with a little Symphony; Webern of Vienna with five brief orchestral pieces; Walton of London with an acclaimed overture, "Portsmouth Point." The balm is Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Globe Nov 10

Franck First TRANS NOV 12

An exultant mood arising from their own luscious sonorities stirred Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony players at Sanders Theater in Cambridge last evening, and César Franck's symphony in D minor carried the close-packed gathering to similar enthusiasms. The concert was the second of the Cambridge series. Numbers assembled from previous Symphony Hall concerts made up the program. Wagner was absent; so were Haydn, Beethoven and Brahms. Father Franck had to fill their shoes to provide the unquestioned solid fare of the evening, and he did so with sounding strings, full toned-brass, satisfying modulations and mingling melodies. Above all, Mr. Koussevitzky gloried in the euphonies of the devout-sensuous founder of the French school. In the first movement he opened his arms to the first violins, gathered them in one and all, and together they proclaimed the glory of singing strings; in the second movement, as well, he urged on the persistent beat of the rhythm as it moved from one choir to another, and kept the pizzicati in piquant unison, and in the third, he amplified the syncopated strength of the rhythm, maintained careful watch over the recombining themes of the composer, and brought the whole to its majestic close. Certain it is, at least, that César Franck dominated the evening at Cambridge, and the composer in turn received a full measure of ardent attention, discernment, and orchestral skill on the part of those who gave his music audible life. Religious and fervid Father Franck was not disappointed when first he heard his symphony. Might he not have found it sounding better than he had thought, if he had heard a performance by a Koussevitzky who has caught his own ardor and who can command such technical finish as that of the Boston Symphony?

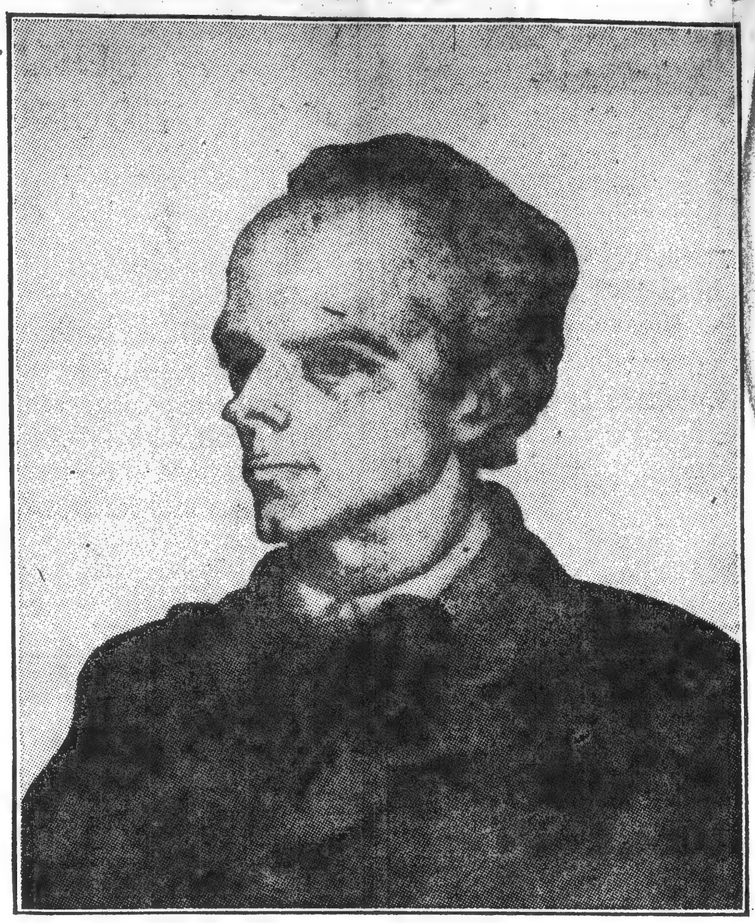
Somehow—the Strauss rondo excepted—other pieces set down and played left only passing impression, however sufficient and exacting the performance. It will be recorded that Mr. Koussevitzky again introduced Ibert's "Les Rencontres," three pieces for the ballet, at the concert last evening. But judging from the reception of this number, Cambridge preferred its chromatic descendings and climbings from the practiced hand of Strauss. Strauss is the more familiar and established. Compared with his Wagnerianism and his more frequent use of the full instrumentation, Ibert's choirs, speaking in colorful sections more often than in sonorous unison, appeared too unorthodox. Yet Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with the purpose of the composer in mind, interpreting the three brief pieces as whimsical fancies, as their program indicates them to be. In somewhat quizzical manner he directed the antics of the individual instrumental groups, turned after completing them, and smiled the unspoken question: "Now, what do you think of them?" Cambridge found them strangely interesting, but preferred Til Eulenspiegel's merry pranks. Even genial Mozart aroused less interest, though he, alone, represented the untouched classic style. "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," serenade for the string orchestra, was the Mozart number. Mr. Koussevitzky's refinements had their all-revealing way with it. Moodiness and muddiness failed to envelop Mozart's finely chiseled lines, and clear moonlight beams, instead, shed their light upon his arabesques. Sharp and precise as the Mozart piece may have appeared when performed in other halls, however, the seasoned wood of Sanders Theater mellowed the strings and gave them a richer tone.

But Til Eulenspiegel easily might have had the evening if César Franck had been omitted. Irrepressible Til once more played his roguish tricks. Once more he tipped the apple cart, routed the pious procession of reformers, lost in love, and skipped blithely from pursuers. Caught and hauled to court, he again pleaded a poor cause and once more was hanged only to live again in fable and story, more irresistible than before. Til has become a familiar character to American concert-goers. The Boston Symphony retold the story last evening persuasively.

N. M. J.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, came back to Rochester Nov. 4, after an absence of four years and played its second concert in the Eastman Theatre before a huge audience that filled every seat in the house and most of the available standing room. A. J. Warner wrote in the Rochester Times-Union: "Given the combination of one of the four greatest orchestras in the country and a conductor of intensely dynamic musicianship, whose occasionally erratic temperament was in its best form, and something thrilling in the way of an orchestral fiesta was inevitable — especially with 3,500 eager listeners contributing the tremendous stimulus of their collective spontaneous enthusiasm. The result of these felicific circumstances was an electrifying evening which culminated, at the concert's close, in an ovation for Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians."

Sharpened Singularity



Bela Bartok

Hungarian Modernist, Entering the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow for the First Time

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN

NOV 12 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY RESUMES PROGRAMS

To-morrow's Concert Will Be Through WBZ Only.

After a week's absence following its first concert tour of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the fifth of the series of radio concerts made available to listeners by W. S. Quinby of Boston, through station WBZ to-morrow evening, at 8:10.

This week's program by the celebrated orchestra of 107 musicians under the direction of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, will only be heard on the WBZ wave. The network of stations including WJZ, WGY and WRC has arranged to broadcast fifteen of the twenty-four concerts, which will be sent out through WBZ, and the chain will not tie in with the Westinghouse station until the Saturday concert of November 20.

Continuing the policy outlined at the start of the symphony broadcasts, Prof. John P. Marshall will interpret the selections on this week's program for the radio audience. Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will assist him in illustrating musically his interpretations.

Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont" will open the symphony concert and before this number is played Prof. Marshall will tell his listeners something of Beethoven's life and the style of his compositions. Bartok, whose "Dance Suite" will be played on this program, is a Hungarian composer, and in speaking of his work Prof. Marshall will point out the national characteristics so prominent in Hungarian music.

Incidents and Prospects Nov 24

When the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra mistakenly permitted the radio to intrude into its concerts, they fondly believed that broadcasting would not lessen audiences. Now, after only six months, the sale of tickets for the series of Tuesday afternoons lags, while conspicuously and rather pathetically, the management announces in a circular: "These programs will not be broadcast." Possibly hard necessity is bringing wisdom back to Symphony Hall.

Mr. Toscanini has devised a new grouping of Beethoven's Symphonies into four concerts, which Mr. Koussevitzky might reasonably consider when, next spring, he arranges his centenary rites. Upon his first program Mr. Toscanini puts the first, second and fifth; next, the third and fourth; then, the sixth and seventh; finally, the eighth and ninth.

N.Y. Times Nov 14 Tuesday

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 12 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The superlative performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra are indeed a thing to wonder at. But just how and why this organization has come to be one of the very greatest in the world leaves little room for speculation or debate. The simple facts of its history are self-explanatory.

In 1881 the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston a full-sized symphony orchestra.

The second conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, had two terms (1884-9 and 1898-1906). Dr. Karl Muck was the conductor from 1906 to 1918, with the exception of the years 1908-12, which were held by Max Fielder. The orchestra next had two French conductors—Henri Rabaud in the season of 1918-19, and Pierre Monteux (1919-24). In the autumn of 1924 Serge Koussevitzky first crossed the Atlantic to become the conductor of the orchestra. With such a combination of a great orchestra and a great leader, it is not surprisng that a Boston Symphony concert is regarded as one of the finest achievements in the musical performances of our day.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

Frank A. Sedgwick brings the Boston Symphony orchestra to Hartford this season and theer is a lively interest in securing tickets for the concert at McCoy's Music Store, No. 89 Asylum street.

MODERN MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Bartok's 'Dance Suite' and Prokofieff Suite Heard

Globe — Nov 15

The program of yesterday's Symphony concert, after many changes, took final shape as follows: "Egmont" overture, Beethoven; suite from the opera "Love for Three Oranges," Prokofieff; dance suite, Bela Bartok; Fourth Symphony, Brahms. The modern pieces by Bartok and Prokofieff, played for the first time here, were coldly received, despite remarkably clear and brilliant performances.

The inertia and apathy of the average audience toward new music can only be overcome by such courageous and persistent performance of even the least-liked novelties as shall assure to the geniuses of the present day the perpetuation of their work.

It can hardly be too often repeated that not only Beethoven and Wagner, but even Mozart and Haydn, were regarded by the conservatives of their days as dangerous musical radicals, and denounced in the same phrases now used by irate listeners to condemn Bartok, Prokofieff, Stravinsky, Schoenberg Honegger, Copland and other 20th-century composers. The history of music did not end, nor did it begin, with the death of Brahms.

Mr Koussevitzky has planned for next week a program divided evenly between assorted modernists, sure to irritate many in the audience, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, which, it is to be hoped will come as balm to sore ears. The conductor's taste and courage in performing a reasonable amount of modern music deserve high praise.

Bartok's Dance Suite is the first characteristic work in large form by that much discussed Hungarian modernist to be played here. The Allegro barbaro, and "Bear Dance" for piano, and an early string quartet, have hitherto scantily represented him in the memories of Boston cncert goers.

One felt like exclaiming yesterday over this Dance Suite in Schumann's familiar phrase of salute to the youthful Brahms, "Hats off! A Genius!" It is music of extraordinary individuality and power. The rhythmic intricacy and intensity recall Stravinsky, but the themes are characteristic of Bartok, who has absorbed, it is said, the essence of Hungarian folk tunes as Stravinsky has of Russian.

The harmonies clash in this piece. There is what to many ears must seem wanton and wilful polytonality. Yet one felt that Bartok had not the slightest intention of startling his hearers. His interest appeared to be in interweaving rhythmic and melodic strands with a polyphony too free to deserve to be called counterpoint.

The themes are powerful, his use of them masterly. The emotional effect of the pieces is heightened by repeated contrasting use of a sort of motto theme, labelled in the score a "ritornello" and having something of the plaintive antique grace the name suggests.

It is curious that Bartok's music has been so little heard in a city to which some other modernists are well enough known. One hopes Mr Koussevitzky will repeat this Dance Suite and offer us still more of Bartok.

The fragments from Prokofieff's opera, "Love for Three Oranges," arranged into a suite by that excellent musician, the violinist, Albert Spalding, suffer, of course, from the absence of the illustrative action. But they reveal an ability to depict the realm of fairy tales and folk lore with a curious blend of farce and horror far more human and plausible than the Shaksperian fairy music of Mendelssohn.

Prokofieff, one reflected, could write the score of a first-rate comic opera if only a librettist with genuine ironic wit and audiences eager to use rather than to forget their intelligence were to be had.

Mr Koussevitzky was at his best as a poetic and emotional interpreter in Brahms' Fourth Symphony. He managed to disengage the real nobility and tragic power of the music from the turgid and curiously constricted score.

The first two movements, which are much the best in the symphony, were poignantly and powerfully played, without any substitution of hysteria for passion. The reading of the "Egmont" overture was superficial, and, except for the introductory measures, unemotional.

P. R.

The series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin at Symphony Hall, Nov 30, at 3:15. A few seats are still to be had for this series. Mr Koussevitzky's programs will be divided according to the various national schools of music. The first one, devoted to German composers, will include Beethoven's Leonore No. 3 overture, The Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde," of Wagner; Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

Globe — Nov 16

For the next concerts in the regular Symphony series, which will be given Dec 3 and 4, Mr Koussevitzky now contemplates this program: "Brandenburg Concerto" in G major, Bach; concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, Mozart; Symphonic Variations, Franck; "Iberia," Debussy. Soloist, Alfred Cortot. Mr Cortot will, of course, take the piano part in Franck's Variations, as well as in the unspecified Mozart concerto, one of the many that master wrote.

Nov 16
ncert
hy Orchestra, nductor, gave eries of conmphony Hall.
e up of Moring Orches-Nachtmusik;"
the Ballet,
Till Eulen-
Symphony.
all been per-he Friday and concerts. So to listen to orks, or fresh iliar ones, are er impression, se previously when reheard
. Most of the had probably at the previous ss, they were had the benefit own greater Koussevitzky's knew their good pleasure to sit ers so receptive far from being es horrif noises, used at his fun-item, and again and the Franck, til the conductor to their feet.
Prokofieff's Suite
nvince one of its ed that, like the Love for Three last week, it is vance; neverthevoid monotony. It last night from ss's Rondo, which rmed with such acity that while ntire propriety of ment, one felt a ow for the culprit.
mphony, we were ht in the impres-ssevitzky has given
There may be some e his infusion of nto it, but for our etting pretty well lleged loftiness of e are delighted with
L. A

NEW YORK
BROOKLYN EAGLE

NOV 7 1926

The opening concert in this season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 26.

A joint recital by Paula Hemminghaus, contralto, and Marshal Monroe, tenor, is announced by the Institute for the afternoon of Friday Nov. 12.

SPOKESMAN REVIEW
SPOKANE, WASH.

NOV 7 1926

Boston Symphony Radio Does Not Cut Revenue

Arrangements made to broadcast every Boston Symphony orchestra regular concert this season is another bit of evidence to support contentions that the radio does not injure concerts, according to the Musical Digest. Though perhaps still early to speak with incontestable certainty, there has been a marked growth in the quantity of good music dispensed via radio during the last twelvemonth. Many of the foremost artists have yielded to tempting inducements without affecting their concert incomes. And other symphony orchestras than the Boston have seemingly suffered no loss of revenue through the broadcasting of their concerts. There was a great hue and cry among printers when the linotype machine was introduced, but subsequent events saw more compositors at work than during the days when all type was hand set.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEMOCRAT CHRONICLE
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

NOV - 7 1926

Referring to the Rochester Philharmonic as one of "the great symphony orchestras of the country," and speaking of the fact that its afternoon concerts are now radiocast a Boston critic goes on to say:

"Eugene Goossens, the brilliant young Britisher who served as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony last season and with the New York Symphony, is conducting all of the concerts. Last summer he filled a week's engagement with the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra at the Hollywood Bowl, where he further distinguished himself as one of the great masters of the baton. Mr. Goossens is a composer as well as conductor, and is one of the youngest leaders of a major symphonic organization in the country, being not yet 33 years of age. This will be his fourth season as conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic, which he has developed into a fine ensemble."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN

NOV 8 1926

Boston Symphony Sold Out.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's season of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts, in Carnegie Hall, will open on November 25.

Seats for all series of Boston Symphony concerts in Boston, New York, and elsewhere were re-engaged for this season by former subscribers, and by the waiting lists of prospective subscribers, so that there was not even a public season sale for any series.

...E ON SALE TOMORROW

The sale of subscriptions for the two symphony concerts which will be given this season in The Shubert Playhouse, under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association, will open tomorrow at Robelen's and will continue until the end of the week.

The first concert will be given by the Cleveland Orchestra on November 18, and the second by the Boston Symphony on January 31.

Mr. Koussevitzy has deferred to a later occasion the seldom heard Concerto of Bach—for violins, flutes and strings—announced for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. Instead, Beethoven's overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont," will be heard. Yes: this is the great Ludwig's centenary year.

Though tender ears may shudder at the prospect, there are to be more modernists at the Symphony Concerts of next week—no less indeed than four: Tansman of Paris with "Dance of the Sorceress"; Krasa of Budapest with a little Symphony; Webern of Vienna with five brief orchestral pieces; Walton of London with an acclaimed overture, "Portsmouth Point." The balm is Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Franck First

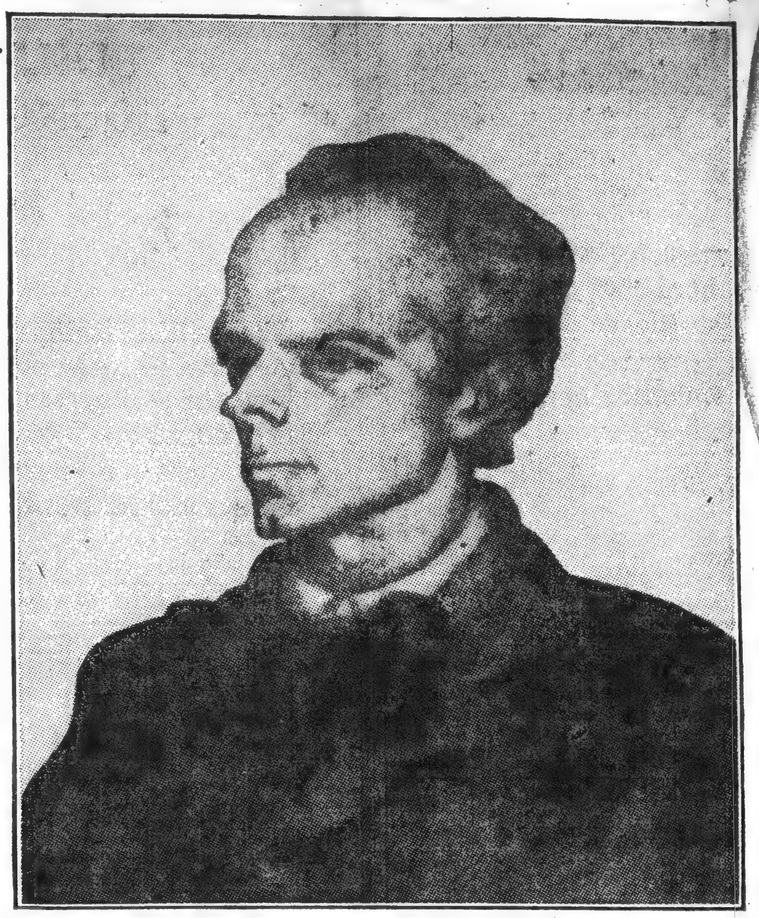
An exultant mood arising from their own luscious sonorities stirred Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony players at Sanders Theater in Cambridge last evening, and César Franck's symphony in D minor carried the close-packed gathering to similar enthusiasms. The concert was the second of the Cambridge series. Numbers assembled from previous Symphony Hall concerts made up the program. Wagner was absent; so were Haydn, Beethoven and Brahms. Father Franck had to fill their shoes to provide the unquestioned solid fare of the evening, and he did so with sounding strings, full toned-brass, satisfying modulations and mingling melodies. Above all, Mr. Koussevitzky gloried in the euphonies of the devout-sensuous founder of the French school. In the first movement he opened his arms to the first violins, gathered them in one and all, and together they proclaimed the glory of singing strings; in the second movement, as well, he urged on the persistent beat of the rhythm as it moved from one choir to another, and kept the pizzicati in piquant unison, and in the third, he amplified the syncopated strength of the rhythm, maintained careful watch over the recombining themes of the composer, and brought the whole to its majestic close. Certain it is, at least, that César Franck dominated the evening at Cambridge, and the composer in turn received a full measure of ardent attention, discernment, and orchestral skill on the part of those who gave his music audible life. Religious and fervid Father Franck was not disappointed when first he heard his symphony. Might he not have found it sounding better than he had thought, if he had heard a performance by a Koussevitzky who has caught his own ardor and who can command such technical finish as that of the Boston Symphony?

Somehow—the Strauss rondo excepted—other pieces set down and played left only passing impression, however sufficient and exacting the performance. It will be recorded that Mr. Koussevitzky again introduced Ibert's "Les Rencontres," three pieces for the ballet, at the concert last evening. But judging from the reception of this number, Cambridge preferred its chromatic descendings and climbings from the practiced hand of Strauss. Strauss is the more familiar and established. Compared with his Wagnerianism and his more frequent use of the full instrumentation, Ibert's choirs, speaking in colorful sections more often than in sonorous unison, appeared too unorthodox. Yet Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with the purpose of the composer in mind, interpreting the three brief pieces as whimsical fancies, as their program indicates them to be. In somewhat quizzical manner he directed the antics of the individual instrumental groups, turned after completing them, and smiled the unspoken question: "Now, what do you think of them?" Cambridge found them strangely interesting, but preferred Til Eulenspiegel's merry pranks. Even genial Mozart aroused less interest, though he, alone, represented the untouched classic style. "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," serenade for the string orchestra, was the Mozart number. Mr. Koussevitzky's refinements had their all-revealing way with it. Moodiness and muddiness failed to envelop Mozart's finely chiseled lines, and clear moonlight beams, instead, shed their light upon his arabesques. Sharp and precise as the Mozart piece may have appeared when performed in other halls, however, the seasoned wood of Sanders Theater mellowed the strings and gave them a richer tone.

But Til Eulenspiegel easily might have had the evening if César Franck had been omitted. Irrepressible Til once more played his roguish tricks. Once more he tipped the apple cart, routed the pious procession of reformers, lost in love, and skipped blithely from pursuers. Caught and hauled to court, he again pleaded a poor cause and once more was hanged only to live again in fable and story, more irresistible than before. Til has become a familiar character to American concert-goers. The Boston Symphony retold the story last evening persuasively. N. M. J.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, came back to Rochester Nov. 4, after an absence of four years and played its second concert in the Eastman Theatre before a huge audience that filled every seat in the house and most of the available standing room. A. J. Warner wrote in the Rochester Times-Union: "Given the combination of one of the four greatest orchestras in the country and a conductor of intensely dynamic musicianship, whose occasionally erratic temperament was in its best form, and something thrilling in the way of an orchestral fiesta was inevitable—especially with 3,500 eager listeners contributing the tremendous stimulus of their collective spontaneous enthusiasm. The result of these felicific circumstances was an electrifying evening which culminated, at the concert's close, in an ovation for Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians."

Sharpened Singularity



Bela Bartok

Hungarian Modernist, Entering the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow for the First Time

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN

NOV 12 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY RESUMES PROGRAMS

To-morrow's Concert Will Be Through WBZ Only.

After a week's absence following its first concert tour of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the fifth of the series of radio concerts made available to listeners by W. S. Quinby of Boston, through station WBZ to-morrow evening, at 8:10.

This week's program by the celebrated orchestra of 107 musicians under the direction of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, will only be heard on the WBZ wave. The network of stations including WJZ, WGY and WRC has arranged to broadcast fifteen of the twenty-four concerts, which will be sent out through WBZ, and the chain will not tie in with the Westinghouse station until the Saturday concert of November 20.

Continuing the policy outlined at the start of the symphony broadcasts, Prof. John P. Marshall will interpret the selections on this week's program for the radio audience. Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will assist him in illustrating musically his interpretations.

Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont" will open the symphony concert and before this number is played Prof. Marshall will tell his listeners something of Beethoven's life and the style of his compositions. Bartok, whose "Dance Suite" will be played on this program, is a Hungarian composer, and in speaking of his work Prof. Marshall will point out the national characteristics so prominent in Hungarian music.

Incidents and Prospects

When the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra mistakenly permitted the radio to intrude into its concerts, they fondly believed that broadcasting would not lessen audiences. Now, after only six months, the sale of tickets for the series of Tuesday afternoon lags, while conspicuously and rather pathetically, the management announces in a circular: "These programs will not be broadcast." Possibly hard necessity is bringing wisdom back to Symphony Hall.

Mr. Toscanini has devised a new grouping of Beethoven's Symphonies into four concerts, which Mr. Koussevitzky might reasonably consider when, next spring, he arranges his centenary rites. Upon his first program Mr. Toscanini puts the first, second and fifth; next, the third and fourth; then, the sixth and seventh; finally, the eighth and ninth.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 12 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The superlative performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra are indeed a thing to wonder at. But just how and why this organization has come to be one of the very greatest in the world leaves little room for speculation or debate. The simple facts of its history are self-explanatory.

In 1881 the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston a full-sized symphony orchestra.

The second conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, had two terms (1884-9 and 1898-1906). Dr. Karl Muck was the conductor from 1906 to 1918, with the exception of the years 1908-12, which were held by Max Fielder. The orchestra next had two French conductors—Henri Rabaud in the season of 1918-19, and Pierre Monteux (1919-24). In the autumn of 1924 Serge Koussevitzky first crossed the Atlantic to become the conductor of the orchestra. With such a combination of a great orchestra and a great leader, it is not surprisng that a Boston Symphony concert is regarded as one of the finest achievements in the musical performances of our day.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

Frank A. Sedgwick brings the Boston Symphony orchestra to Hartford this season and theer is a lively interest in securing tickets for the concert at McCoy's Music Store, No. 89 Asylum street.

MODERN MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Bartok's 'Dance Suite' and Prokofieff Suite Heard

Globe — Nov 15

The program of yesterday's Symphony concert, after many changes, took final shape as follows: "Egmont" overture, Beethoven; suite from the opera "Love for Three Oranges," Prokofieff; dance suite, Bela Bartok; Fourth Symphony, Brahms. The modern pieces by Bartok and Prokofieff, played for the first time here, were coldly received, despite remarkably clear and brilliant performances.

The inertia and apathy of the average audience toward new music can only be overcome by such courageous and persistent performance of even the least-liked novelties as shall assure to the geniuses of the present day the perpetuation of their work.

It can hardly be too often repeated that not only Beethoven and Wagner, but even Mozart and Haydn, were regarded by the conservatives of their days as dangerous musical radicals, and denounced in the same phrases now used by irate listeners to condemn Bartok, Prokofieff, Stravinsky, Schoenberg Honegger, Copland and other 20th-century composers. The history of music did not end, nor did it begin, with the death of Brahms.

Mr Koussevitzky has planned for next week a program divided evenly between assorted modernists, sure to irritate many in the audience, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, which, it is to be hoped will come as balm to sore ears. The conductor's taste and courage in programming a reasonable amount of modern music deserve high praise.

Bartok's Dance Suite is the first characteristic work in large form by that much discussed Hungarian modernist to be played here. The Allegro barbaro, and "Bear Dance" for piano, and an early string quartet, have hitherto scantily represented him in the memories of Boston concert goers.

One felt like exclaiming yesterday over this Dance Suite in Schumann's familiar phrase of salute to the youthful Brahms, "Hats off! A Genius!" It is music of extraordinary individuality and power. The rhythmic intricacy and intensity recall Stravinsky, but the themes are characteristic of Bartok, who has absorbed, it is said, the essence of Hungarian folk tunes as Stravinsky has of Russian.

The harmonies clash in this piece. There is what to many ears must seem wanton and wilful polytonality. Yet one felt that Bartok had not the slightest intention of startling his hearers. His interest appeared to be in interweaving rhythmic and melodic strands with a polyphony too free to deserve to be called counterpoint.

The themes are powerful, his use of them masterly. The emotional effect of the pieces is heightened by repeated contrasting use of a sort of motto theme, labelled in the score a "ritornello" and having something of the plaintive antique grace the name suggests.

It is curious that Bartok's music has been so little heard in a city to which some other modernists are well enough known. One hopes Mr Koussevitzky will repeat this Dance Suite and offer us still more of Bartok.

The fragments from Prokofieff's opera, "Love for Three Oranges," arranged into a suite by that excellent musician, the violinist, Albert Spalding, suffer, of course, from the absence of the illustrative action. But they reveal an ability to depict the realm of fairy tales and folk lore with a curious blend of farce and horror far more human and plausible than the Shaksperian fairy music of Mendelssohn.

Prokofieff, one reflected, could write the score of a first-rate comic opera if only a librettist with genuine ironic wit and audiences eager to use rather than to forget their intelligence were to be had.

Mr Koussevitzky was at his best as a poetic and emotional interpreter in Brahms' Fourth Symphony. He managed to disengage the real nobility and tragic power of the music from the turgid and curiously constricted score.

The first two movements, which are much the best in the symphony, were poignantly and powerfully played, without any substitution of hysteria for passion. The reading of the "Egmont" overture was superficial, and, except for the introductory measures, unemotional. P. R.

The series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin at Symphony Hall, Nov 30, at 3:15. A few seats are still to be had for this series. Mr Koussevitzky's programs will be divided according to the various national schools of music. The first one, devoted to German composers, will include Beethoven's Leonore No. 3 overture, The Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde," of Wagner; Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

Globe — Nov 16

For the next concerts in the regular Symphony series, which will be given Dec 3 and 4, Mr Koussevitzky now contemplates this program: "Brandenburg Concerto" in G major, Bach; concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, Mozart; Symphonic Variations, Franck; "Iberia," Debussy. Soloist, Alfred Cortot. Mr Cortot will, of course, take the piano part in Franck's Variations, as well as in the unspecified Mozart concerto, one of the many that master wrote.

Symphony Has a Mystery; But Maybe You Can Solve It

Monitor — Nov 12

It's an Instrument Yet They Can't Name It—That Is, Oh Well, Now You Guess

Symphony Hall has a mystery. It is unnamed and that is part of the mystery.

In the Casadesus collection of ancient musical instruments which has been given into permanent custody of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there is a narrow, and nameless item. Perhaps it has 12 inches of length, and 3 of width. It is thin and sheath-like.

If the strings could be blurred from sight it might be the make-believe sword of some little boy of ancient Greece. The instrument is too short to be clasped against the knees in the manner of a musician playing the 'cello. Nor yet may it be bowed as a fiddle.

Evenly its strings are set, from one end to within two inches of the other. They are curious strings, stout and with a patina of venerable dignity to them, as strings that have given forth the tunes of noble tribal festivals or sounded a saga of some picturesque and ancient civilization.

The sultry grain of the wood has darkened with no telling how many passing centuries. And who can say what fingers of genius have swept tentatively across the strings to turn them to the color of mellowed black walnut.

Of all the instruments in the collection, not forgetting the strange wind instruments, blocked with medallions of painted wood and scored with bands of vermilion decoration, which neighbor the eighteenth century Chinese guitar, this one best defies the revelation either of its history or its tone.

For, having no name, having no slightest familiarity or appearance even for those to whom instrumental mysteries are not always undecipherable, none has come forward to say, "Ah, yes, that instrument. Once, in a minute village on the bank of a yellow river in China I heard a poet singing his poems and it was to the music of such an instrument."

Nor has anyone explained: "But that is half stringed instrument and half comb and when Lorelei sat on the glistening rock that rose out of the river Rhine near St. Goar the music fishermen heard was the music of her brilliant hair whispering against the strings." Or yet, "Why that is the instrument that welcomed the new moon in Greece, long before the Christian era."

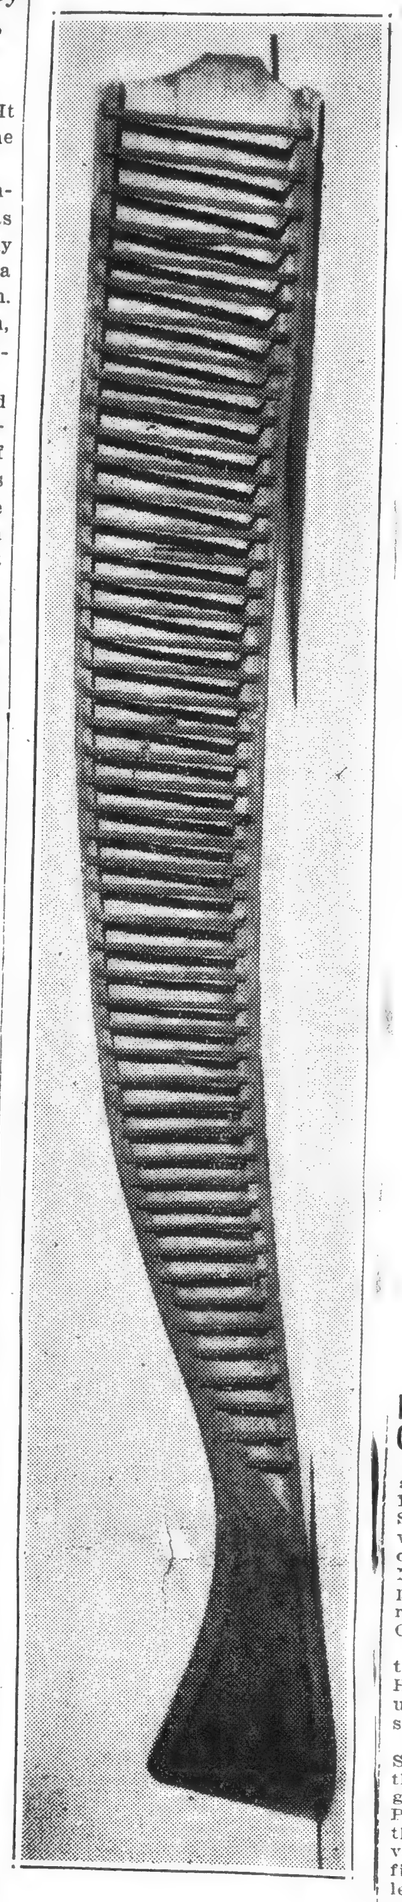
Some argumentatively inclined critic has pointed out that the instrument has the appearance of a fossilized "ganoid," perhaps, which was an armored fish that may, in times of peace, have been sufficiently versatile to give off a strange and eerie music to the importunate fingers of the sea.

But one man's guess is as good as another, and the instrument remains acute, titillating the desire to call up all knowledge of fables ever had which might give some clue to its rightful offices.

As a matter of fact there is a clue. It is pasted on the obverse side of the instrument. A yellowed bit of parchment. Minutely lettered in Chinese. strange adventures of the chiropher of some bygone age. Perhaps most dialect. But even the presence the Chinese explanation, yet to be deciphered, does not necessarily obvithe the hazard that the instrument ay once have served the Lorelie for comb.

Because far back in China there is cord of Chinese prisoners giving, in change for their liberty, secrets Chinese ways of making music ich, shortly thereafter, made their pearance in Greece and in Gerny.

WHAT IS IT?



Mr Koussevitzky proposes to introduce a number of works by young and presumably modernist composers at this week's Symphony concerts and then to placate the conservative portion of the audience by taking the curse off with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Of his assorted moderns Tansman has been previously represented on these programs, and Webern is known as a disciple and pupil of Schoenberg in Vienna. His music has not hitherto been played here. Now that Mr Koussevitzky has discovered the Schoenberg pupils he may eventually discover the master himself, known to Boston Symphony audiences only by the much discussed "Fivie Orchestral Pieces" played under Dr Muck, and the early and beautiful Wagnerian "Verklarte Nacht" played and repeated under Monteux.

The first of the five Monday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony will be given tomorrow night in Symphony Hall. Mr Koussevitzky's program includes Mozart's "Little Night Music," the suite from Prokofieff's ballet "Chout," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and the Franck symphony. All these numbers have been played this season in the regular Symphony series.

NEW WORKS PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Post — Nov 13

Bartok's Dances and Prokofieff's Suite Performed

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In that it offered through that composer's Dance Suite the first performance in this city of an orchestral piece by the Hungarian Bela Bartok, the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon may, at some future date, be set down as a red-letter occasion.

It is never easy to evaluate one's contemporaries. Meyerbeer was once preferred to Schumann and Gyrowetz to Beethoven. And it is within the range of possibility that Bartok, whose music is now a stumbling-block to many, may some day be assigned a place among the foremost composers of this generation.

BRAHMS SOUNDS MELLOW

In the text of the programme-book there is a reference to the "acerbity" of Brahms' Fourth Symphony, which follows this Dance Suite at this week's pair of Symphony concerts. Yet in contrast with the sour, astringent music of Bartok that of Brahms seemed yesterday in the last degree mellow and mellifluous, and this once baffling music must have fallen as balm upon many ears.

On the other hand it was also possible to find the first taste of Brahms in this juxtaposition a trifle flat and flavorless.

Written for the concert celebrating the 50th anniversary of the union of the cities of Buda and Pesth, Bartok's Suite has little of the festive element and none of the emptiness of most such occasional music. Its six movements bear no title other than the conventional Italian tempo indications: Moderato, Allegro molto, etc. And the musical idiom in which they are couched is so individual, so independent of conventionally sensuous elements that whether it repels, fascinates or merely fails to interest the listener, there is at present little point in disputing its merits.

Prokofieff's Suite

Distinctly less original, indeed, than Bartok's Dances is the suite drawn from Prokofieff's fantastic opera "The Love For Three Oranges," publicly performed yesterday for the first time in the United States. Prokofieff is always entertaining, but he is usually more strikingly himself than in this particular music, which suggests now Rimsky-Korsakov of the folk-operas, now Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird," which itself stems from Rimsky, and, in the movement "De Prince et la Princesse," Ravel.

With an ear for contrasts and likewise a feeling for compensations, Mr. Koussevitzky has set his two moderns between the symphony aforementioned and Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," which, in an uncommonly vital and stirring performance, began the concert. Nobly played, too, was Brahms' Symphony. Here, save for a fleeting instant or two, there was no hint of that more wayward Koussevitzky who sometimes remembers at inopportune moments his Slavic musical heritage. On a former occaion, in fact, there were those who found Mr. Koussevitzky Rusianizing this very music. But not so yesterday. Brahms spoke, and spoke eloquently, with his own voice, albeit with a pasionately earnest conductor and a marvellously expressive orchestra to give him substantial aid.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.

NOV 14 1926

FOUR STATIONS WILL OFFER BOSTON SYMPHONY

Stations WJZ, WRC and WGY will again broadcast the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 8:10 Saturday night. For the last three weeks, the Saturday night symphony concerts have been furnished by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra playing their Student's Concert Series in Carnegie Hall, New York City.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony in Symphony Hall, Boston, where the radio pick-up will be made by the technical staff of Station WBZ.

One of the features of the Boston Symphony conrets arethe notes on the selections to be played which are given to the radio audiences by Professor John P. Marshall, head of the music department of Boston University and Holy Cross College. For five minutes preceding the first selection and again during the 15 minute intermission, Professor Marshall will give instructive information and comment corresponding to the notes in the program used by the audience in Symphony Hall. Realizing that the majority of the vast radio audience resides in localities where symphony orchestras and symphonic music are seldom heard, he will make his remarks in non-technical language.

Monday evening at Symphony Hall will come the first of the Monday evening series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky has set a programme that begins with Mozart's serenade for strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," includes the suite from Prokofieff's ballet "Chout" (Clown) and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and ends with the Symphony of Cesar Franck.

Post ... Nov 14

For the ... y

STANDARD
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.

DEC 18 1926

Empire."

Boston Cellist in Hospital.

Baltimore, Dec. 18 (AP)— Arthur Hadley, cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a patient at the Johns Hopkins Hospital, it was learned yesterday when his brother, Henry Hadley, guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, visited him here.

The nature of the illness was not revealed. Hospital authorities said it was not serious.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Serge Koussevitsky will conduct four new scores. Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress," a symphony by Krasa, "Five Orchestral Pieces" by Webern and the Overture, "Portsmouth Point," by Walton, an English composer. The program will close with Beethoven's fifth symphony.

MONDAY SYMPHONY

Tomorrow evening, in Symphony Hall, at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first concert of its Monday evening series. The program will include Mozart's "Serenade for Strings," Prokofieff's suite from the ballet "Buffoon," Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor.

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

The series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in Symphony Hall on Tuesday afternoon, November 30. The five programs of this series will be grouped according to the various national schools of music.

SYMPHONY BEGINS MONDAY CONCERTS

Large Audience Applauds Koussevitzky

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky opened its series of Monday evening concerts last night at Symphony Hall. The house seemed no less crowded than at the Saturday night performances and the audience was extremely enthusiastic in its applause.

The program consisted of Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik," Serenade for string orchestra, Prokofieff's suite from the ballet "Chout" ("Buffoon"), Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor. All these works have already been discussed in detail on the occasion of their performance in the orchestra's regular series. In their playing last night Mr Koussevitzky and his men surpassed themselves.

The delightful Mozart "Nachtmusik" was rendered with a delicacy, humor, flexibility and precision which would be remarkable under any circumstances, but which are a miracle when achieved by so large a body of strings. Even so, one cannot help feeling that the number of the players could have been halved with advantage, for their tone had sometimes a robustness unsuited to the style and period of the music.

Prokofieff's sly, rollicking and satirical humor in the music to "Chout" was brilliantly rendered, with abundance of comic emphasis and a wealth of dynamic and coloristic effect.

Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," heard today and immediately after the work of one of a new generation of rebels, seems the product of a gentle, whimsical humor and an adventurous technique and is soothing by contrast. The more this work is heard, however, the more one is impressed by its real economy of means, in spite of the large orchestral force it demands, by the variety and delicacy of its effects, its humanity and expressive power and the perfection of its form.

The D-minor symphony of Cesar Franck received a magnificently dramatic and colorful performance, full of that movement and climax which this work demands if it is not to sound pedantic and prosy. Franck's rather obvious and incessantly repeated mannerisms have too often produced this effect. But under Koussevitzky's baton the symphony is transfigured and glows with color and new life.

On all counts this was an unusually enjoyable and brilliantly executed program and the audience's response was

SYMPHONY IN FIFTH CONCERT

Herald — Nov 13

Prokofieff, Beethoven, Bartok and Brahms Works on Program

SAME BILL TO BE GIVEN TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Overture to Goethe's "Egmont"; Prokofieff, Suite from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges" (first time in this country); Bartok, Dance Suite (first time in Boston), Brahms, Symphony No. 4, E minor.

Mr. Koussevitzky is to be thanked heartily for producing Prokofieff's fascinating Suite and acquainting us with music by Bartok, concerning whose worth as a composer there is hot discussion. It would have been to the advantage of the composers and the audience if a repetition of the Suites had taken the place of the symphony with which we are all familiar. (No disrespect to Johannes.)

Prokofieff's opera, from which his Suite is derived, is based on Gozzi's satirical fairy play, which might well excite the imagination of any composer. There is no need in this instance of restating the old saw: "This music is for the stage and suffers when it is transferred to the concert hall," for with one possible exception, the "Scene Infernale," the movements are interesting, yes, delightful, as absolute music. They are not only brilliantly and, often, surprisingly orchestrated; they have original musical ideas, now impressive by their force, now giving great pleasure by their indisputable and peculiar beauty, as in the slow movement where the beauty of thought and expression is most poetic, a type of beauty that has not been revealed in other modern compositions now known to us. In the wilder passages there is no extravagance for the sake of making the bourgeois sit up. One feels throughout the suite the honesty of Prokofieff. This he thought; so he expressed himself; and how well he did it! A remarkable man this Serge Prokofieff, to us the most original, the most imaginative and the best equipped composer now creating music. With the hearing of each work by him, our admiration for him waxes stronger.

One has not heard enough of Bartok's music in Boston to judge him fairly; even with some show of intelligence. For many his music is a stumbling block; to some, the abomination of desolation; yet no less a man than the conservative Adolf Weissmann does not hesitate to say of Bartok's music that "even an unsympathetic hearer must feel that it is the work of a master musician and a man of character."

Bartok is a Hungarian. This Dance Suite was written for the celebration of the 50th anniversary of the union of the two cities Buda and Pest. As he is a zealous collector of folk music which has often served as the basis of his own, it is natural to suppose that for a civic and national celebration he made use of Hungarian folk tunes.

Last month in London Mme. Basilides sang "with evident conviction" songs by Bartok and Kodaly, and sang them in the Hungarian language. Mr. Ernest Newman, reviewing her recital, acknowleged his ignorance of Hungarian. "The singer seemed to be in turns tragic, minatory, sad and coquettish, but precisely why the one or the other I could not say. Mme. Basilides must not think our comparative apathy under the circumstances my reflection on her as an artist. After all we should hardly expect a Buda-Pest audience to be completely responsive to the subleties of such typically English songs as 'Please sell no more drink to my father' or 'Don't tell my mother I'm living in sin.'"

Many hearers yesterday, knowing that Bartok is a Hungarian, remembering Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies, and reading that Bartok was an admirer of Liszt, probably expected to hear music of the gypsy order, intoxicating rhythms and effects like those produced by hammering on the cymbalom. They were disappointed. They heard little tunes without drunken frenzy; there were few madding, dissolute rhythms.

We could not help recalling the remark of the Sar Peladan concerning the music of our old friend Johannes Brahms: "that it was like a gypsy attempting to dance in a tightly laced corset."

Nor were we led astray by the title "Dance Suite." "Dance" admits of several definitions; there are solemn, sacred dances; dances, too, that are almost static; dances like those now popular, in which a young man embracing his girl shoves her backward and forwards and sideways and zigzag along a floor. Bartok's music seemed to us to be without sensuousness, without sentiment, without emotion. No doubt he felt his music; but in a way that is still foreign to us and in an idiom that, with slight knowledge of his work, is at present not easily understood or appreciated.

The orchestral performance of the two suites was of a dazzling brilliance. Mr. Koussevitzky gave a superb and appropriately dramatic reading of the overture, which, we should not forget, was written for a play and for performance in a theatre. To the joy of the faithful, a symphony by Brahms brought the end. Mr. Koussevitzky is fond of Brahms; he conducts the music of Johannes in a masterly manner—but Toujours Brahms—toujours perdrix.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week comprises four unfamiliar pieces: Tansman's Dance of The Sorceress from a ballet "The Garden of Paradise"; Krasa's March and Pastorale from a symphony; Webern's five pieces for orchestra

Symphony Has a Mystery; But Maybe You Can Solve It

Monitor — Nov 12

It's an Instrument Yet They Can't Name It—That Is, Oh Well, Now You Guess

Symphony Hall has a mystery. It is unnamed and that is part of the mystery.

In the Casadesus collection of ancient musical instruments which has been given into permanent custody of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there is a narrow, and nameless item. Perhaps it has 12 inches of length, and 3 of width. It is thin and sheath-like.

If the strings could be blurred from sight it might be the make-believe sword of some little boy of ancient Greece. The instrument is too short to be clasped against the knees in the manner of a musician playing the 'cello. Nor yet may it be bowed as a fiddle.

Evenly its strings are set, from one end to within two inches of the other. They are curious strings, stout and with a patina of venerable dignity to them, as strings that have given forth the tunes of noble tribal festivals or sounded a saga of some picturesque and ancient civilization.

The sultry grain of the wood has darkened with no telling how many passing centuries. And who can say what fingers of genius have swept tentatively across the strings to turn them to the color of mellowed black walnut.

Of all the instruments in the collection, not forgetting the strange wind instruments, blocked with medallions of painted wood and scored with bands of vermilion decoration, which neighbor the eighteenth century Chinese guitar, this one best defies the revelation either of its history or its tone.

For, having no name, having no slightest familiarity or appearance even for those to whom instrumental mysteries are not always undecipherable, none has come forward to say, "Ah, yes, that instrument. Once, in a minute village on the bank of a yellow river in China I heard a poet singing his poems and it was to the music of such an instrument."

Nor has anyone explained: "But that is half stringed instrument and half comb and when Lorelei sat on the glistening rock that rose out of the river Rhine near St. Goar the music fishermen heard was the music of her brilliant hair whispering against the strings." Or yet, "Why that is the instrument that welcomed the new moon in Greece, long before the Christian era."

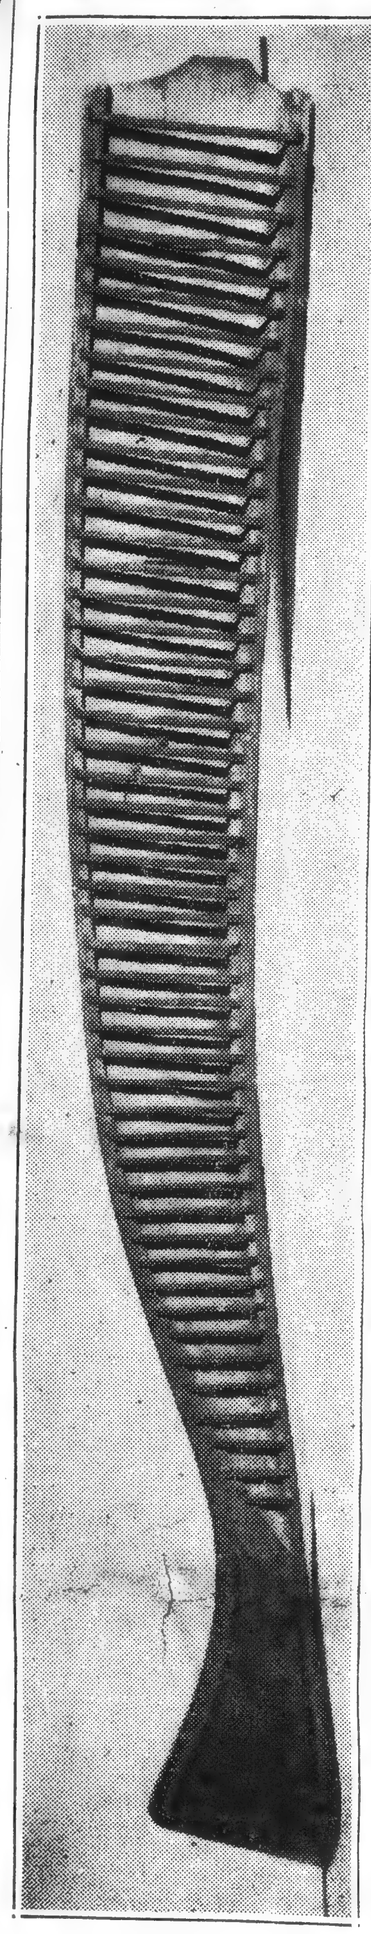
Some argumentatively inclined critic has pointed out that the instrument has the appearance of a fossilized "ganoid," perhaps, which was an armored fish that may, in times of peace, have been sufficiently versatile to give off a strange and eerie music to the importunate fingers of the sea.

But one man's guess is as good as another, and the instrument remains acute, titillating the desire to call up all knowledge of fables ever had which might give some clue to its rightful offices.

As a matter of fact there is a clue. It is pasted on the obverse side of the instrument. A yellowed bit of parchment. Minutely lettered in Chinese. Strange adventures of the chirographer of some bygone age. Perhaps in lost dialect. But even the presence of the Chinese explanation, yet to be deciphered, does not necessarily obviate the hazard that the instrument may once have served the Lorelie for a comb.

Because far back in China there is a record of Chinese prisoners giving, in exchange for their liberty, secrets of Chinese ways of making music which, shortly thereafter, made their appearance in Greece and in Germany.

WHAT IS IT?



Mr Koussevitzky proposes to introduce a number of works by young and presumably modernist composers at this week's Symphony concerts and then to placate the conservative portion of the audience by taking the curse off with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Of his assorted moderns Tansman has been previously represented on these programs, and Webern is known as a disciple and pupil of Schoenberg in Vienna. His music has not hitherto been played here. Now that Mr Koussevitzky has discovered the Schoenberg pupils he may eventually discover the master himself, known to Boston Symphony audiences only by the much discussed "Fivie Orchestral Pieces" played under Dr Muck, and the early and beautiful Wagnerian "Verklarte Nacht" played and repeated under Monteux.

The first of the five Monday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony will be given tomorrow night in Symphony Hall. Mr Koussevitzky's program includes Mozart's "Little Night Music," the suite from Prokofieff's ballet "Chout," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and the Franck symphony. All these numbers have been played this season in the regular Symphony series.

NEW WORKS PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Post — Nov 13

Bartok's Dances and Prokofieff's Suite Performed

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In that it offered through that composer's Dance Suite the first performance in this city of an orchestral piece by the Hungarian Bela Bartok, the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon may, at some future date, be set down as a red-letter occasion.

It is never easy to evaluate one's contemporaries. Meyerbeer was once preferred to Schumann and Gyrowetz to Beethoven. And it is within the range of possibility that Bartok, whose music is now a stumbling-block to many, may some day be assigned a place among the foremost composers of this generation.

BRAHMS SOUNDS MELLOW

In the text of the programme-book there is a reference to the "acerbity" of Brahms' Fourth Symphony, which follows this Dance Suite at this week's pair of Symphony concerts. Yet in contrast with the sour, astringent music of Bartok that of Brahms seemed yesterday in the last degree mellow and mellifluous, and this once baffling music must have fallen as balm upon many ears.

On the other hand it was also possible to find the first taste of Brahms in this juxtaposition a trifle flat and flavorless.

Written for the concert celebrating the 50th anniversary of the union of the cities of Buda and Pesth, Bartok's Suite has little of the festive element and none of the emptiness of most such occasional music. Its six movements bear no title other than the conventional Italian tempo indications: Moderato, Allegro molto, etc. And the musical idiom in which they are couched is so individual, so independent of conventionally sensuous elements that whether it repels, fascinates or merely fails to interest the listener, there is at present little point in disputing its merits.

Prokofieff's Suite

Distinctly less original, indeed, than Bartok's Dances is the suite drawn from Prokofieff's fantastic opera "The Love For Three Oranges," publicly performed yesterday for the first time in the United States. Prokofieff is always entertaining, but he is usually more strikingly himself than in this particular music, which suggests now Rimsky-Korsakov of the folk-operas, now Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird," which itself stems from Rimsky, and, in the movement "De Prince et la Princesse," Ravel.

With an ear for contrasts and likewise a feeling for compensations, Mr. Koussevitzky has set his two moderns between the symphony aforementioned and Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," which, in an uncommonly vital and stirring performance, began the concert. Nobly played, too, was Brahms' Symphony. Here, save for a fleeting instant or two, there was no hint of that more wayward Koussevitzky who sometimes remembers at inopportune moments his Slavic musical heritage. On a former occaion, in fact, there were those who found Mr. Koussevitzky Rusianizing this very music. But not so yesterday. Brahms spoke, and spoke eloquently, with his own voice, albeit with a pasionately earnest conductor and a marvellously expressive orchestra to give him substantial aid.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
NOV 14 1926

FOUR STATIONS WILL OFFER BOSTON SYMPHONY

Stations WJZ, WRC and WGY will again broadcast the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 8:10 Saturday night. For the last three weeks, the Saturday night symphony concerts have been furnished by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra playing their Student's Concert Series in Carnegie Hall, New York City.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony in Symphony Hall, Boston, where the radio pick-up will be made by the technical staff of Station WBZ.

One of the features of the Boston Symphony conrets arethe notes on the selections to be played which are given to the radio audiences by Professor John P. Marshall, head of the music department of Boston University and Holy Cross College. For five minutes preceding the first selection and again during the 15 minute intermission, Professor Marshall will give instructive information and comment corresponding to the notes in the program used by the audience in Symphony Hall. Realizing that the majority of the vast radio audience resides in localities where symphony orchestras and symphonic music are seldom heard, he will make his remarks in non-technical language.

Monday evening at Symphony Hall will come the first of the Monday evening series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky has set a programme that begins with Mozart's serenade for strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," includes the suite from Prokofieff's ballet "Chout" (Clown) and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and ends with the Symphony of Cesar Franck.

Post ... Nov 14

For the regular concerts of Friday and Saturday Mr. Koussevitzky announces the first Boston performance of works from four composers conspicuous in the present generation: the "Dance of the Sorceress," from Tansman's ballet, "The Garden of Paradise," a Symphony of Krasa, five orchestral pieces by Webern and the overture, "Portsmouth Point," by the Englishman, Walton. Beethoven's tra, visited him ne...

---

The nature of the illness was not revealed. Hospital authorities said it was not serious.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct four new scores. Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress," a symphony by Krasa, "Five Orchestral Pieces" by Webern and the Overture, "Portsmouth Point," by Walton, an English composer. The program will close with Beethoven's fifth symphony.

MONDAY SYMPHONY

Tomorrow evening, in Symphony Hall, at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first concert of its Monday evening series. The program will include Mozart's "Serenade for Strings," Prokofieff's suite from the ballet "Buffoon," Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor.

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

The series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in Symphony Hall on Tuesday afternoon, November 30. The five programs of this series will be grouped according to the various national schools of music.

SYMPHONY BEGINS MONDAY CONCERTS

Large Audience Applauds Koussevitzky

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky opened its series of Monday evening concerts last night at Symphony Hall. The house seemed no less crowded than at the Saturday night performances and the audience was extremely enthusiastic in its applause.

The program consisted of Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik," Serenade for string orchestra, Prokofieff's suite from the ballet "Chout" ("Buffoon"), Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor. All these works have already been discussed in detail on the occasion of their performance in the orchestra's regular series. In their playing last night Mr Koussevitzky and his men surpassed themselves.

The delightful Mozart "Nachtmusik" was rendered with a delicacy, humor, flexibility and precision which would be remarkable under any circumstances, but which are a miracle when achieved by so large a body of strings. Even so, one cannot help feeling that the number of the players could have been halved with advantage, for their tone had sometimes a robustness unsuited to the style and period of the music.

Prokofieff's sly, rollicking and satirical humor in the music to "Chout" was brilliantly rendered, with abundance of comic emphasis and a wealth of dynamic and coloristic effect.

Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," heard today and immediately after the work of one of a new generation of rebels, seems the product of a gentle, whimsical humor and an adventurous technique and is soothing by contrast. The more this work is heard, however, the more one is impressed by its real economy of means, in spite of the large orchestral force it demands, by the variety and delicacy of its effects, its humanity and expressive power and the perfection of its form.

The D-minor symphony of Cesar Franck received a magnificently dramatic and colorful performance, full of that movement and climax which this work demands if it is not to sound pedantic and prosy. Franck's rather obvious and incessantly repeated mannerisms have too often produced this effect. But under Koussevitzky's baton the symphony is transfigured and glows with color and new life.

On all counts this was a most unusually enjoyable and brilliantly executed program and the audience's response was

SYMPHONY IN FIFTH CONCERT

Herald — Nov 13

Prokofieff, Beethoven, Bartok and Brahms Works on Program

SAME BILL TO BE GIVEN TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Overture to Goethe's "Egmont"; Prokofieff, Suite from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges" (first time in this country); Bartok, Dance Suite (first time in Boston); Brahms, Symphony No. 4, E minor.

Mr. Koussevitzky is to be thanked heartily for producing Prokofieff's fascinating Suite and acquainting us with music by Bartok, concerning whose worth as a composer there is hot discussion. It would have been to the advantage of the composers and the audience if a repetition of the Suites had taken the place of the symphony with which we are all familiar. (No disrespect to Johannes.)

Prokofieff's opera, from which his Suite is derived, is based on Gozzi's satirical fairy play, which might well excite the imagination of any composer. There is no need in this instance of restating the old saw: "This music is for the stage and suffers when it is transferred to the concert hall,' for with one possible exception, the "Scene Infernale," the movements are interesting, yes, delightful, as absolute music. They are not only brilliantly and, often, surprisingly orchestrated; they have original musical ideas, now impressive by their force, now giving great pleasure by their indisputable and peculiar beauty, as in the slow movement where the beauty of thought and expression is most poetic, a type of beauty that has not been revealed in other modern compositions now known to us. In the wilder passages there is no extravagance for the sake of making the bourgeois sit up. One feels throughout the suite the honesty of Prokofieff. Thus he thought; so he expressed himself; and how well he did it! A remarkable man this Serge Prokofieff, to us the most original, the most imaginative, and the best equipped composer now creating music. With the hearing of each work by him, our admiration for him waxes stronger.

One has not heard enough of Bartok's music in Boston to judge him fairly, even with some show of intelligence. To many his music is a stumbling block; to some, the abomination of desolation; yet no less a man than the conservative Adolf Weissmann does not hesitate to say of Bartok's music that "even an unsympathetic hearer must feel that it is the work of a master musician and a man of character."

Bartok is a Hungarian. This Dance Suite was written for the celebration of the 50th anniversary of the union of the two cities Buda and Pest. As he is a zealous collector of folk music which has often served as the basis of his own, it is natural to suppose that for a civic and national celebration he made use of Hungarian folk tunes.

Last month in London Mme. Basilides sang "with evident conviction" songs by Bartok and Kodaly, and sang them in the Hungarian language. Mr. Ernest Newman, reviewing her recital, acknowleged his ignorance of Hungarian. "The singer seemed to be in turns tragic, minatory, sad and coquettish, but precisely why the one or the other I could not say. Mme. Basilides must not think our comparative apathy under the circumstances my reflection on her as an artist. After all we should hardly expect a Buda-Pest audience to be completely responsive to the subleties of such typically English songs as, 'Please sell no more drink to my father' or 'Don't tell my mother I'm living in sin.'"

Many hearers yesterday, knowing that Bartok is a Hungarian, remembering Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies, and reading that Bartok was an admirer of Liszt, probably expected to hear music of the gypsy order, intoxicating rhythms and effects like those produced by hammering on the cymbalom. They were disappointed. They heard little tunes without drunken frenzy; there were few madding, dissolute rhythms.

We could not help recalling the remark of the Sar Peladan concerning the music of our old friend Johannes Brahms: "that it was like a gypsy attempting to dance in a tightly laced corset."

Nor were we led astray by the title "Dance Suite." "Dance" admits of several definitions; there are solemn, sacred dances; dances, too, that are almost static; dances like those now popular, in which a young man embracing his girl shoves her backward and forwards and sideways and zigzag along a floor. Bartok's music seemed to us to be without sensuousness, without sentiment, without emotion. No doubt he felt his music; but in a way that is still foreign to us and in an idiom that, with slight knowledge of his work, is at present not easily understood or appreciated.

The orchestral performance of the two suites was of a dazzling brilliance. Mr. Koussevitzky gave a superb and appropriately dramatic reading of the overture, which, we should not forget, was written for a play and for performance in a theatre. To the joy of the faithful, a symphony by Brahms brought the end. Mr. Koussevitzky is fond of Brahms; he conducts the music of Johannes in a masterly manner—but Toujours Brahms—toujours perdrix.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week comprises four unfamiliar pieces: Tansman's Dance of The Sorceress from a ballet "The Garden of Paradise"; Krasa's March and Pastorale from a symphony;

THIS CLIPPING FROM MUSICAL LEADER
NOV 13 1926
NOV 11 1926
NOV 13 1926

COMPOSERS' LEAGUE TO GIVE NOVELTIES

Koussevitzky to Lead New Works of Bartók, Webern, Krasa and Gruenberg

When Serge Koussevitzky conducts the second concert of the League of Composers in Town Hall, on Nov. 27, he will introduce four works new to New York, two of which will have their world première, and will give a revival of Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat," which was first heard in this city at a League concert in March, 1924. The new works are by Béla Bartók, Louis Gruenberg, Anton von Webern and Hans Krasa.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who leads an ensemble of men from the Boston Symphony at this concert, appears by special permission of the board of trustees of that organization.

Bartók's work, entitled "Village Scenes," is his latest composition, and was written especially for the League of Composers. This new opus is for four female voices and small ensemble. The Brahms Vocal Quartet will interpret the songs, which are taken from the Slavic and celebrate the preparation of a young girl for her wedding. They are written in the manner of Bartók's later works. There is a slight use of actual folk-idiom in the melodic line.

Mr. Gruenberg's work, "The Creation," is a setting, for voice and chamber orchestra, of the poem by James Weldon Johnson. This work will be sung by Julius Bledsoe, Negro baritone. "The Creation" is a Negro sermon, which tells in detail of the making of the universe. Unlike Mr. Gruenberg's earlier venture with a work employing Negro subject matter, "The Daniel Jazz," it is of a serious nature. Musically, the Negro idiom is not frequently employed in a literal way. The work was completed last year, but has not yet been performed.

The "Five Orchestral Pieces" by Anton von Webern are the much-discussed works which were given at the Zurich Festival last summer. They are sixteen years old, but their revival at Zurich was in the nature of a discovery. They are very short, each of them extending a little more or less than a minute. Hans Krasa contributes two movements from a chamber symphony, "Marche" and "Pastorale," This work was also performed at Zurich. Krasa was born in Prague in 1899, and became a student of Alexander von Zemlinsky. The "Pastorale" and "Marche" were completed in 1925.

"L'Histoire du Soldat" was written by Stravinsky in 1918, the period of "Renard" and "Mavra." It is for chamber orchestra and may be accompanied by stage pantomime, though this performance will be in concert version.

The next concert of the League will be an afternoon recital of American works by young composers. It will take place in January, the exact date and place to be announced. In March the League will give a performance of [illegible] orm-tails

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
NOV 16 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Nothing, save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, than the circumstances of his career. He first conducted as a boy of twelve, when he led the local theater orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in northern Russia. Attending the conservatory at Moscow, he was required to study an instrument. He chose the double bass, and the noted master Ramboussec, with his teacher. His proficiency upon this unusual instrument became so extraordinary that he toured all of Europe and became famous before he was even known as a conductor.

Koussevitsky's abilities, indeed, were not of the sort to be so confined to a limited field, and from 1909 he devoted all his energies to conducting. He organized his own symphony orchestra in Moscow, which soon came to be considered the finest in Russia. In Moscow and Petrograd he conducted the classics, gave Beethoven, Bach, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, and other festivals each season, and championed works by young composers then unknown but since accepted.

But Koussevitsky could not rest content with bringing music to the city folk of Russia. He chartered a large steamer on the Volga river, and, taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends, made several voyages along the 2,500 miles of its basin.

Frank A. Sedgwick brings the Boston Symphony to Hartford and the ticket sale is now in progress. Reservations may be made by calling 2-0147.

IN S[illegible]ONY HALL

Tomorrow evening, in Symphony hall, at 8:15, the Boston Symphony orchestra will give the first concert of its Monday evening series. The program will include Mozart's Serenade for Strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"; Prokofieff's Suite from the ballet "Chout" ("Buffoon"); Strauss's Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

Frieda Hempel, soprano, will sing in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 21, at 3:30 o'clock. It will be her only recital here.

Tito Schipa, tenor, will give his only recital in Boston on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 28. Herald Nov 14

Josef Hofmann will play the piano in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 5.

The series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will open in Symphony hall on Tuesday afternoon, Nov. 30, at 3:15.

The five programs of this series will be grouped according to the various national schools of music. A few season tickets are still available at the subscription office in Symphony hall.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The sixth regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, will be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Four new compositions will then be heard for the first time in Boston: Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress" from his ballet, "The Garden of Paradise"; march and pastorale from a symphony of Krasa; five orchestral pieces by Webern, and the overture, "Portsmouth Point," by Walton, the English composer. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will be the final number.

SYMPHONY IN FIRST MONDAY CONCERT

Globe Nov 16

Orchestra Twice Called to Feet by Applause

Herald Nov 16

The first of five Monday night concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place last evening in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Eine Kleine Nachtmzesik; Prokofieff, suite from the ballet "Chout," (Buffoon"); Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"; Franck, smyphony, D minor.

All these pieces have been performed this season at the orchestra's subscription concerts. The pieces by Strauss and Cesar Franck have long been familiar to Boston's musical public, so it is hardly necessary to speak about their structure or other characteristics. Yet a note about "Chout" may be allowed.

This ballet, entitled "The Buffoon," was performed at the Neighborhood playhouse in New York in March, 1924. When the suite was played here early in October the question was raised whether Prokofieff's score had been used in the production in New York. The scenario itself had been "adapted" from the original one. It was thought that the New York audiences had really heard Prokofieff's music which calls for a very large orchestra.

A program of the performance in New York, recently obtained, gives the names of the musicians with their instruments. They were only six in number; they played two pianos, a violin, a flute, an oboe, and percussion instruments. The question now arises, were the parts for the violin, wind instruments and percussion faked from the version for two pianos?

The program was well devised to show the great talent of Mr. Koussevitzky; to made one wonder at his versatility; his ability to catch the spirit of various schools, even centuries, and to express it. For the beautiful music of Mozart was no more foreign to him than was the Suite of Prokofieff, a modern of the moderns; if the pranks of Till were vividly portrayed in tones—and this composition is one of Strauss's best, and the most characteristic because it reveals peculiarities of the composer's nature. The pure and noble thoughts of Cesar Franck even gained in eloquence by the performance.

The audience, which filled the house, was so appreciative that twice the orchestra was called to its feet to share the vociferous applause with Mr.

FIRST OF MONDAYS' CONCERTS

Post Nov 16

Symphony Gives of Its Best Opening Series

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The subscribers to the Monday Symphony concerts have no reason to complain. In the matter of programme they receive the pick of the season's repertory; and they are likely to be treated to performances better adjusted, more eloquent of the conductor's intentions than those of the Friday afternoons, when the pieces in question are first presented.

RISE THREE TIMES

Last evening, the first of this season's Monday concerts, came to pass before an audience that filled every seat and, withal, one so cordial and enthusiastic that the men of the orchestra were brought to their feet no less than three times in acknowledgement of the applause—at the conclusion of the suite from Prokofieff's ballet, "Chout" ("Clown"), at the end of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and after the Symphony of Franck, which closed the concert.

Heard a second time, Proffofieff's gay, fantastic music pleased even more than before. In his music for the stage Prokofieff seems less distinctly himself than in his purely orchestral pieces. This music to "Chout," for example, derives quite directly from Stravinsky's "Petruchka." But it is none the less enjoyable because of that, and last evening it was given an uncommonly brilliant and exhilarating performance.

A Slightly Tamed "Till"

Was it its proximity to this audacious music, by the way, that caused "Till" to sound last evening less exuberant, less puckish than it has generally seemed? Or does Mr. Koussevitzky, in his desire to extract from the score the last ounce of poetic significance and of musical effect, rob it of a bit of its rightful bouyancy and spontaneity? In any event the performance of last evening, within the limits Mr. Koussevitzky has defined for it, was remarkably eloquent, and, incidentally, more clearly articulated, better proportioned than that of a few weeks ago. And the same may be said of Franck's Symphony, while last evening there was here less reason to cry extravagance and distortion.

To a noticeable degree the brass was less strident, less aggressive than before, and as with "Till" the performance, was beautifully moulded, alive in every part, permitting the listener to revel in the ever-changing orchestral sonorities.

Finale at Giddy Pace

Specifically, there was reason to quarrel last evening only with the giddy tempo assigned to the chief theme of the Finale. Somehow, one thinks of Franck's mood in this instance as being one of serene exaltation rather than of delirious, frenzied joy, a la Tchai-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
DEC 18 1926

Symphony Player Under Knife

Baltimore, Dec. 18.—(AP)—Arthur Hadley, cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a patient at the Johns Hopkins Hospital it was learned today when his brother, Henry Hadley, guest conductor of the New York Philaharmonic Orchestra visited him here.

MONDAY NIGHT SYMPHONY BEGINS

AMERICAN Nov 16

By MOSES SMITH

The opening concert of the Monday evening series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought out a full house that greeted Serge Koussevitzky in hearty fashion. The length and strength of the applause indicated that the Russian conductor has established himself firmly in the hearts of this public.

Both the conductor and orchestra were brilliant throughout the concert, and Mr. Koussevitzky called upon his men to rise to receive their share of the plaudits. The playing of last night's program offered fresh proof of the fact that the shorter series of extra concerts maintain a higher level throughout than the regular weekly series.

The program included pieces already heard here this year—Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Prokofieff's Suite from the Ballot, "Chout," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and Cesar Franck's Symphony. Without exception the pieces were rendered with greater finish than when heard previously.

The reason undoubtedly is that the men were more familiar with the scores and with the conductor's interpretation. Here alone is a good reason for the alleviation of the flood of modernist music which Koussevitzky plays at the regular concerts. New works call for greater pains in rehearsals, with the result that the standard pieces in the symphonic repertory suffer.

A concert like last night's showed what the men are capable of when they are sufficiently familiar with the music, and what the conductor can do in interpreting a score. The Franck Symphony was given a performance that has not been matched here in ages. It was a rendition of eloquence to meet the eloquence of the music itself.

A second hearing of Prokofieff's music suggests a revision of a previous opinion. The Suite gains from better acquaintance, and leads one to say that it is among the finest of his scores offered for consumption to a Boston public.

To Hear His Music Post Though Across Sea

Post Nov 17

(AP)—A young musician will listen while a great American orchestra, 3000 miles distant, plays his composition next Saturday night. The composer is Alexander Tansman, who will wait in the Eiffel Tower in Paris while the big French government station, FL, tries to pick up the radio broadcast of the "Dance of the Sorceress," being presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in America.

The composition was chosen by the famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, as the opening number on his symphony programme Saturday night. The young composer has arranged with the French station, located in the great steel tower, to try to pick up the broadcast as sent out by one of four powerful stations linked up for the concert—WBZ, WJZ WGY or WRC.

GAZETTE
TRENTON, N. J.
NOV 17 1926

Stravinsky Revival to Be Heard in New York

Four works new in New York City and a Stravinsky revival, with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, will make the program of the second concert by the League of Composers this season. Mr. Koussevitzky, who appears by courtesy of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will lead an ensemble of players chosen from that organization. The program includes two works which will be heard for the first time anywhere—Bela Bartok's "Village Scenes," the latest composition from his pen, written especially for the league on a commission undertaken two years ago, and Louis Gruenberg's "Creation," a setting of the poem of that name by James Weldon Johnson. Bartok's work is for chamber orchestra, and four female voices. Gruenberg's work is for an instrumental ensemble and a singer, who, for this evening, will be Julius Bledsoe, the negro baritone, late of "Deep River."

The Stravinsky revival will be that of "L'Histoire du Soldat," written in 1918, and first produced in America with full instrumental score by the League of Composers in 1924. This work will replace "Mavra," previously announced on the program. "L'Histoire," "Renard" and "Mavra" are works of the same character are more or less of one period, the latter two being for voices and chamber orchestra, and all three lending themselves to stage pantomime.

Anton von Webern's much-discussed "Five Orchestral Pieces," will be heard for the first time in America. The same thing holds true of Hans Krasa's chamber symphony—a "Pastorale" and "Marche."

The league will give a concert of modern works at the Brooklyn Museum on Friday, November 19, under the auspices of the Societe Anonyme. The program includes works by Malipiero, Frederick Jacobi, Marion Bauer, Stravinsky and Emerson Whithorne; songs by Richard Hammond and Lazare Saminsky. The assisting artists will be the Helen Tas Quartet, Marion Rous and Ruth Rodgers.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
NOV 17 1926

Composer in Paris Will Try to Pick Up Concert in Boston

Boston, Nov. 16.—(AP.)—A young Russian composer will listen while a great American orchestra, 3,000 miles distant, plays his composition next

TUESDAY AFTERNOON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Nov 20 Lynn News

The new series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians, in Symphony hall, Boston, will provide a splendid chance for out-of-town subscribers to enjoy the Boston Symphony orchestra under its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitsky.

This series, instituted last year, will be given on five Tuesday afternoons beginning Nov. 30. Since the concerts begin at 3.15 promptly and never last later than 5 o'clock, they have a very large patronage from the subscribers of outlying towns of Boston.

Mr. Koussevitsky is dividing the five programs according to various important national schools of music. The first, on November 30, will be of German music and will include Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Wagner's prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde;" Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the "Fourth Symphony" of Brahms. There will be a French program, including Berlioz' "Roman Carnaval Overture;" Debussey's nocturnes," Clouds" and "Festivals;" Ravel's "La Valse" and Franck's "Symphony in D-Minor." The Russian program will include the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina;" Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," numbers from Stravinsky's "Fire Bird," a suite from Prokofieff's "The Love for Three Oranges," and the "Fourth Symphony" of Tchaikowsky. The remaining two programs are still to be announced.

Mr. Koussevitzky attended the Court Festival of the International Society for New Music held last June at Zurich, Switzerland. He was especially impressed by four compositions which will be heard in Boston for the first time at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow afternoon and Saturday night: Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress" from the ballet "The Garden of Paradise" (based on a fairy story by Hans Christian Andersen); Krasa's March and Pastorale from a symphony in three movements. Webern's Five Pieces for Orchestra op. 10, and Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point." This overture was performed for the first time at the Zurich Festival. Walton was the only English composer thus represented. The symphony this week will be Beethoven's Fifth, C minor. Tansman has already been represented at the Symphony concerts. Beethoven's Fifth symphony has been performed at these and other orchestral concerts in Boston. No doubt many of the conservatives in the audience can hum or whistle some of the themes in a tolerably accurate manner.

N. Y. EVENING SUN
NOV 19 1926

BOSTON CONCERT MAY REACH PARIS

Eifel Tower Will Attempt to Pick Up U. S. Stations.

The French Government radio station FL, located in the Eifel Tower in Paris, will endeavor to pick up the sixth of the series of Saturday night concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast by WBZ and its associated stations when the program goes on the air at 8:10 o'clock to-morrow evening.

Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress," from the ballet "The Garden of Paradise," has been selected as the opening number on Saturday's symphony program. The young Russian composer has made arrangements with the French Government for Station FL to pick up the signals of WJZ, WGY and WRC in the Eifel Tower, where he will be stationed so that he may hear the first presentation in America of his composition by the orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

To Tell of Composer's Work.

In accordance with the cabled arrangements between Tansman and the Symphony management, Nicolai Slonimsky, noted pianist and secretary to Serge Koussevitzky, will take Prof. Marshall's place at the microphone to tell the radio audiences something of Tansman's work. He will also play a part of the composition on the piano and extend greetings to Tansman in Russian. If the experiment is a success Tansman will receive the message in Paris about 1:10 A. M.

Between the various numbers Prof. Marshall will tell his listeners something about each of the composers. He will devote the entire intermission to a talk on Beethoven's style and an analysis of the Fifth Symphony. Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Stone MacLain

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Following its trip to New York next week, the Boston Symphony orchestra will give its next regular pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 3 and 4.

The soloist will be Alfred Cortot, the French pianist, who will appear with the orchestra in a concerto of Mozart, and Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations. Serge Koussevitzky will open the program with Bach's Brandenberg Concerto in G major for violin, solo with two flutes, and close it with Debussy's "Iberia."

TUESDAY SERIES

Serge Koussevitzky announces the program for the opening concert of the Tuesday afternoon series of five by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Symphony hall, on Nov. 30, at 3:15. Devoted to the German school of music, this program will include Beethoven's Leonora Overture No. 3, the Prelude and Love Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," Richard Strauss's humorous tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Marry Pranks" and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor.

The five programs will be divided according to the various national [illegible] of music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MUSICAL LEADER
NOV 13 1926
NOV 11 1926
NOV 13 1926

COMPOSERS' LEAGUE TO GIVE NOVELTIES

Koussevitzky to Lead New Works of Bartók, Webern, Krasa and Gruenberg

When Serge Koussevitzky conducts the second concert of the League of Composers in Town Hall, on Nov. 27, he will introduce four works new to New York, two of which will have their world première, and will give a revival of Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat," which was first heard in this city at a League concert in March, 1924. The new works are by Béla Bartók, Louis Gruenberg, Anton von Webern and Hans Krasa.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who leads an ensemble of men from the Boston Symphony at this concert, appears by special permission of the board of trustees of that organization.

Bartók's work, entitled "Village Scenes," is his latest composition, and was written especially for the League of Composers. This new opus is for four female voices and small ensemble. The Brahms Vocal Quartet will interpret the songs, which are taken from the Slavic and celebrate the preparation of a young girl for her wedding. They are written in the manner of Bartók's later works. There is a slight use of actual folk-idiom in the melodic line.

Mr. Gruenberg's work, "The Creation," is a setting, for voice and chamber orchestra, of the poem by James Weldon Johnson. This work will be sung by Julius Bledsoe, Negro baritone. "The Creation" is a Negro sermon, which tells in detail of the making of the universe. Unlike Mr. Gruenberg's earlier venture with a work employing Negro subject matter, "The Daniel Jazz," it is of a serious nature. Musically, the Negro idiom is not frequently employed in a literal way. The work was completed last year, but has not yet been performed.

The "Five Orchestral Pieces" by Anton von Webern are the much-discussed works which were given at the Zurich Festival last summer. They are sixteen years old, but their revival at Zurich was in the nature of a discovery. They are very short, each of them extending a little more or less than a minute. Hans Krasa contributes two movements from a chamber symphony, "Marche" and "Pastorale," This work was also performed at Zurich. Krasa was born in Prague in 1899, and became a student of Alexander von Zemlinsky. The "Pastorale" and "Marche" were completed in 1925.

"L'Histoire du Soldat" was written by Stravinsky in 1918, the period of "Renard" and "Mavra." It is for chamber orchestra and may be accompanied by stage pantomime, though this performance will be in concert version.

The next concert of the League will be an afternoon recital of American works by young composers. It will take place in January, the exact date and place to be announced. In March the League will [illegible] ormtails

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 16 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Nothing, save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, than the circumstances of his career. He first conducted as a boy of twelve, when he led the local theater orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in northern Russia. Attending the conservatory at Moscow, he was required to study an instrument. He chose the double bass, and the noted master Ramboussec, with his teacher. His proficiency upon this unusual instrument became so extraordinary that he toured all of Europe and became famous before he was even known as a conductor.

Koussevitzky's abilities, indeed, were not of the sort to be so confined to a limited field, and from 1909 he devoted all his energies to conducting. He organized his own symphony orchestra in Moscow, which soon came to be considered the finest in Russia. In Moscow and Petrograd he conducted the classics, gave Beethoven, Bach, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, and other festivals each season, and championed works by young composers then unknown but since accepted.

But Koussevitzky could not rest content with bringing music to the city folk of Russia. He chartered a large steamer on the Volga river, and, taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends, made several voyages along the 2,500 miles of its basin.

Frank A. Sedgwick brings the Boston Symphony to Hartford and the ticket sale is now in progress. Reservations may be made by calling 2-6147.

IN SYMPHONY HALL

Tomorrow evening, in Symphony hall, at 8:15, the Boston Symphony orchestra will give the first concert of its Monday evening series. The program will include Mozart's Serenade for Strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"; Prokofieff's Suite from the ballet "Chout" ("Buffoon"); Strauss's Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

Frieda Hempel, soprano, will sing in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 21, at 3:30 o'clock. It will be her only recital here.

Tito Schipa, tenor, will give his only recital in Boston on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 28. Herald Nov 14

Josef Hofmann will play the piano in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 5.

The series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will open in Symphony hall on Tuesday afternoon, Nov. 30, at 3:15.

The five programs of this series will be grouped according to the various national schools of music. A few season tickets are still available at the subscription office in Symphony hall.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The sixth regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, will be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Four new compositions will then be heard for the first time in Boston: Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress" from his ballet, "The Garden of Paradise"; march and pastorale from a symphony of Krasa; five orchestral pieces by Webern, and the overture, "Portsmouth Point," by Walton, the English composer. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will be the final number.

FIRST OF MONDAYS' CONCERTS

Post Nov 16

Symphony Gives of Its Best Opening Series.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The subscribers to the Monday Symphony concerts have no reason to complain. In the matter of programme they receive the pick of the season's repertory; and they are likely to be treated to performances better adjusted, more eloquent of the conductor's intentions than those of the Friday afternoons, when the pieces in question are first presented.

RISE THREE TIMES

Last evening, the first of this season's Monday concerts, came to pass before an audience that filled every seat and, withal, one so cordial and enthusiastic that the men of the orchestra were brought to their feet no less than three times in acknowledgement of the applause—at the conclusion of the suite from Prokofieff's ballet, "Chout" ("Clown"), at the end of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and after the Symphony of Franck, which closed the concert.

Heard a second time, Proffofieff's gay, fantastic music pleased even more than before. In his music for the stage Prokofieff seems less distinctly himself than in his purely orchestral pieces. This music to "Chout," for example, derives quite directly from Stravinsky's "Petruchka." But it is none the less enjoyable because of that, and last evening it was given an uncommonly brilliant and exhilarating performance.

A Slightly Tamed "Till"

Was it its proximity to this audacious music, by the way, that caused "Till" to sound last evening less exuberant, less puckish than it has generally seemed? Or does Mr. Koussevitzky, in his desire to extract from the score the last ounce of poetic significance and of musical effect, rob it of a bit of its rightful bouyancy and spontaneity? In any event the performance of last evening, within the limits Mr. Koussevitzky has defined for it, was remarkably eloquent, and, incidentally, more clearly articulated, better proportioned than that of a few weeks ago. And the same may be said of Franck's Symphony, while last evening there was here less reason to cry extravagance and distortion.

To a noticeable degree the brass was less strident, less aggressive than before, and as with "Till" the performance, was beautifully moulded, alive in every part, permitting the listener to revel in the ever-changing orchestral sonorities.

Finale at Giddy Pace

Specifically, there was reason to quarrel last evening only with the giddy tempo assigned to the chief theme of the Finale. Somehow, one thinks of Franck's mood in this instance as being one of serene exaltation rather than of delirious, frenzied joy, a la Tchai-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

DEC 18 1926

Symphony Player Under Knife

Baltimore, Dec. 18.—(AP)—Arthur Hadley, cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a patient at the Johns Hopkins Hospital it was learned today when his brother, Henry Hadley, guest conductor of the New York Philaharmonic Orchestra visited him here.

SYMPHONY IN FIRST MONDAY CONCERT

Globe Nov 16

Orchestra Twice Called to Feet by Applause

HERALD Nov 16

The first of five Monday night concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place last evening in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Eine Kleine Nachtmzesik; Prokofieff suite from the ballet "Chout," (Buffoon"); Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"; Franck, smyphony, D minor.

All these pieces have been performed this season at the orchestra's subscription concerts. The pieces by Strauss and Cesar Franck have long been familiar to Boston's musical public, so it is hardly necessary to speak about their structure or other characteristics. Yet a note about "Chout" may be allowed.

This ballet, entitled "The Buffoon," was performed at the Neighborhood playhouse in New York in March, 1924. When the suite was played here early in October the question was raised whether Prokofieff's score had been used in the production in New York. The scenario itself had been "adapted" from the original one. It was thought that the New York audiences had really heard Prokofieff's music which calls for a very large orchestra.

A program of the performance in New York, recently obtained, gives the names of the musicians with their instruments. They were only six in number; they played two pianos, a violin, a flute, an oboe, and percussion instruments. The question now arises, were the parts for the violin, wind instruments and percussion faked from the version for two pianos?

The program was well devised to show the great talent of Mr. Koussevitzky; to made one wonder at his versatility; his ability to catch the spirit of various schools, even centuries, and to express it. For the beautiful music of Mozart was no more foreign to him than was the Suite of Prokofieff, a modern of the moderns; if the pranks of Till were vividly portrayed in tones—and this composition is one of Strauss's best, and the most characteristic because it reveals peculiarities of the composer's nature. The pure and noble thoughts of Cesar Franck even gained in eloquence by the performance.

The audience, which filled the house, was so appreciative that twice the orchestra was called to its feet to share the vociferous applause with Mr.

MONDAY NIGHT SYMPHONY BEGINS

AMERICAN Nov 16

By MOSES SMITH

The opening concert of the Monday evening series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought out a full house that greeted Serge Koussevitzky in hearty fashion. The length and strength of the applause indicated that the Russian conductor has established himself firmly in the hearts of this public.

Both the conductor and orchestra were brilliant throughout the concert, and Mr. Koussevitzky called upon his men to rise to receive their share of the plaudits. The playing of last night's program offered fresh proof of the fact that the shorter series of extra concerts maintain a higher level throughout than the regular weekly series.

The program included pieces already heard here this year—Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Prokofieff's Suite from the Ballot, "Chout," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and Cesar Franck's Symphony. Without exception the pieces were rendered with greater finish than when heard previously.

The reason undoubtedly is that the men were more familiar with the scores and with the conductor's interpretation. Here alone is a good reason for the alleviation of the flood of modernist music which Koussevitzky plays at the regular concerts. New works call for greater pains in rehearsals, with the result that the standard pieces in the symphonic repertory suffer.

A concert like last night's showed what the men are capable of when they are sufficiently familiar with the music, and what the conductor can do in interpreting a score. The Franck Symphony was given a performance that has not been matched here in ages. It was a rendition of eloquence to meet the eloquence of the music itself.

A second hearing of Prokofieff's music suggests a revision of a previous opinion. The Suite gains from better acquaintance, and leads one to say that it is among the finest of his scores offered for consumption to a Boston public.

To Hear His Music Though Across Sea

Post Nov 17

(AP)—A young musician will listen while a great American orchestra, 3000 miles distant, plays his composition next Saturday night. The composer is Alexander Tansman, who will wait in the Eiffel Tower in Paris while the big French government station, FL, tries to pick up the radio broadcast of the "Dance of the Sorceress," being presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in America.

The composition was chosen by the famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, as the opening number on his symphony programme Saturday night. The young composer has arranged with the French station, located in the great steel tower, to try to pick up the broadcast as sent out by one of four powerful stations linked up for the concert—WBZ, WJZ WGY or WRC.

GAZETTE
TRENTON, N. J.

NOV 17 1926

Stravinsky Revival to Be Heard in New York

Four works new in New York City and a Stravinsky revival, with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, will make the program of the second concert by the League of Composers this season. Mr. Koussevitzky, who appears by courtesy of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will lead an ensemble of players chosen from that organization. The program includes two works which will be heard for the first time anywhere—Bela Bartok's "Village Scenes," the latest composition from his pen, written especially for the league on a commission undertaken two years ago, and Louis Gruenberg's "Creation," a setting of the poem of that name by James Weldon Johnson. Bartok's work is for chamber orchestra, and four female voices. Gruenberg's work is for an instrumental ensemble and a singer, who, for this evening, will be Julius Bledsoe, the negro baritone, late of "Deep River."

The Stravinsky revival will be that of "L'Histoire du Soldat," written in 1918, and first produced in America with full instrumental score by the League of Composers in 1924. This work will replace "Mavra," previously announced on the program. "L'Histoire," "Renard" and "Mavra" are works of the same character are more or less of one period, the latter two being for voices and chamber orchestra, and all three lending themselves to stage pantomime.

Anton von Webern's much-discussed "Five Orchestral Pieces," will be heard for the first time in America. The same thing holds true of Hans Krasa's chamber symphony—a "Pastorale" and "Marche."

The league will give a concert of modern works at the Brooklyn Museum on Friday, November 19, under the auspices of the Societe Anonyme. The program includes works by Malipiero, Frederick Jacobi, Marion Bauer, Stravinsky and Emerson Whithorne; songs by Richard Hammond and Lazare Saminsky. The assisting artists will be the Helen Tas Quartet, Marion Rous and Ruth Rodgers.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 17 1926

Composer in Paris Will Try to Pick Up Concert in Boston

Boston, Nov. 16.—(AP.)—A young Russian composer will listen while a great American orchestra, 3,000 miles distant, plays his composition next Saturday night. The composer is Al[illegible]

TUESDAY AFTERNOON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Nov 20
LYNN NEWS

The new series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians, in Symphony hall, Boston, will provide a splendid chance for out-of-town subscribers to enjoy the Boston Symphony orchestra under its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitsky.

This series, instituted last year, will be given on five Tuesday afternoons beginning Nov. 30. Since the concerts begin at 3.15 promptly and never last later than 5 o'clock, they have a very large patronage from the subscribers of outlying towns of Boston.

Mr. Koussevitsky is dividing the five programs according to various important national schools of music. The first, on November 30, will be of German music and will include Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Wagner's prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde;" Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the "Fourth Symphony" of Brahms. There will be a French program, including Berlioz' "Roman Carnaval Overture;" Debussey's nocturnes," Clouds" and "Festivals;" Ravel's "La Valse" and Franck's "Symphony in D-Minor." The Russian program will include the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina;" Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," numbers from Stravinsky's "Fire Bird," a suite from Prokofieff's "The Love for Three Oranges," and the "Fourth Symphony" of Tchaikowsky. The remaining two programs are still to be announced.

Mr. Koussevitzy attended the Fourt Festival of the International Society fo New Music held last June at Zurich Switzerland. He was especially impressed by four compositions which will be heard in Boston for the first time at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow afternoon and Saturday night: Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress" from the ballet "The Garden of Paradise" (based on a fairy story by Hans Christian Andersen); Krasa's March and Pastorale from a symphony in three movements. Webern's Five Pieces for Orchestra op. 10, and Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point." This overture was performed for the first time at the Zurich Festival. Walton was the only English composer thus represented. The symphony this week will be Beethoven's Fifth, C minor. Tansman has already been represented at the Symphony concerts. Beethoven's Fifth symphony has been performed at these and other orchestral concerts in Boston. No doubt many of the conservatives in the audience can hum or whistle some of the themes in a tolerably accurate manner.

N. Y. EVENING SUN

NOV 19 1926

BOSTON CONCERT MAY REACH PARIS

Eifel Tower Will Attempt to Pick Up U. S. Stations.

The French Government radio station FL, located in the Eifel Tower in Paris, will endeavor to pick up the sixth of the series of Saturday night concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast by WBZ and its associated stations when the program goes on the air at 8:10 o'clock to-morrow evening.

Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress," from the ballet "The Garden of Paradise," has been selected as the opening number on Saturday's symphony program. The young Russian composer has made arrangements with the French Government for Station FL to pick up the signals of WJZ, WGY and WRC in the Eifel Tower, where he will be stationed so that he may hear the first presentation in America of his composition by the orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

To Tell of Composer's Work.

In accordance with the cabled arrangements between Tansman and the Symphony management, Nicolai Slonimsky, noted pianist and secretary to Serge Koussevitzky, will take Prof. Marshall's place at the microphone to tell the radio audiences something of Tansman's work. He will also play a part of the composition on the piano and extend greetings to Tansman in Russian. If the experiment is a success Tansman will receive the message in Paris about 1:10 A. M.

Between the various numbers Prof. Marshall will tell his listeners something about each of the composers. He will devote the entire intermission to a talk on Beethoven's style and an analysis of the Fifth Symphony. Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Following its trip to New York next week, the Boston Symphony orchestra will give its next regular pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 3 and 4.

The soloist will be Alfred Cortot, the French pianist, who will appear with the orchestra in a concerto of Mozart, and Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations. Serge Koussevitzky will open the program with Bach's Brandenberg Concerto in G major for violin solo with two flutes, and close it with Debussy's "Iberia."

TUESDAY SERIES

Serge Koussevitzky announces the program for the opening concert of the Tuesday afternoon series of five by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Symphony hall, on Nov. 30, at 3:15. Devoted to the German school of music, this program will include Beethoven's Leonora Overture No. 3, the Prelude and Love Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," Richard Strauss's humorous tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor.

The five programs will be divided according to the various national [illegible] of music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MUSICAL LEADER
NOV 13 1926
NOV 11 1926
NOV 13 1926

COMPOSERS' LEAGUE TO GIVE NOVELTIES

Koussevitzky to Lead New Works of Bartók, Webern, Krasa and Gruenberg

When Serge Koussevitzky conducts the second concert of the League of Composers in Town Hall, on Nov. 27, he will introduce four works new to New York, two of which will have their world première, and will give a revival of Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat," which was first heard in this city at a League concert in March, 1924. The new works are by Béla Bartók, Louis Gruenberg, Anton von Webern and Hans Krasa.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who leads an ensemble of men from the Boston Symphony at this concert, appears by special permission of the board of trustees of that organization.

Bartók's work, entitled "Village Scenes," is his latest composition, and was written especially for the League of Composers. This new opus is for four female voices and small ensemble. The Brahms Vocal Quartet will interpret the songs, which are taken from the Slavic and celebrate the preparation of a young girl for her wedding. They are written in the manner of Bartók's later works. There is a slight use of actual folk-idiom in the melodic line.

Mr. Gruenberg's work, "The Creation," is a setting, for voice and chamber orchestra, of the poem by James Weldon Johnson. This work will be sung by Julius Bledsoe, Negro baritone. "The Creation" is a Negro sermon, which tells in detail of the making of the universe. Unlike Mr. Gruenberg's earlier venture with a work employing Negro subject matter, "The Daniel Jazz," it is of a serious nature. Musically, the Negro idiom is not frequently employed in a literal way. The work was completed last year, but has not yet been performed.

The "Five Orchestral Pieces" by Anton von Webern are the much-discussed works which were given at the Zurich Festival last summer. They are sixteen years old, but their revival at Zurich was in the nature of a discovery. They are very short, each of them extending a little more or less than a minute. Hans Krasa contributes two movements from a chamber symphony, "Marche" and "Pastorale," This work was also performed at Zurich. Krasa was born in Prague in 1899, and became a student of Alexander von Zemlinsky. The "Pastorale" and "Marche" were completed in 1925.

"L'Histoire du Soldat" was written by Stravinsky in 1918, the period of "Renard" and "Mavra." It is for chamber orchestra and may be accompanied by stage pantomime, though this performance will be in concert version.

The next concert of the League will be an afternoon recital of American works by young composers. It will take place in January, the exact date and place to be announced. In March the League will give an evening performance of works for the stage, the details to be made public later.

IN S...ONY HALL

Tomorrow evening, in Symphony hall, at 8:15, the Boston Symphony orchestra will give the first concert of its Monday evening series. The program will include Mozart's Serenade for Strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"; Prokofieff's Suite from the ballet "Chout" ("Buffoon"); Strauss's Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

Frieda Hempel, soprano, will sing in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 21, at 3:30 o'clock. It will be her only recital here.

Tito Schipa, tenor, will give his only recital in Boston on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 28. Herald Nov 14

Josef Hofmann will play the piano in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 5.

The series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will open in Symphony hall on Tuesday afternoon, Nov. 30, at 3:15.

The five programs of this series will be grouped according to the various national schools of music. A few season tickets are still available at the subscription office in Symphony hall.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The sixth regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, will be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Four new compositions will then be heard for the first time in Boston: Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress" from his ballet, "The Garden of Paradise"; march and pastorale from a symphony of Krasa; five orchestral pieces by Webern, and the overture, "Portsmouth Point," by Walton, the English composer. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will be the final number.

To Hear His Music Post Though Across Sea

Nov 17

(AP)—A young musician will listen while a great American orchestra, 3000 miles distant, plays his composition next Saturday night. The composer is Alexander Tansman, who will wait in the Eiffel Tower in Paris while the big French government station, FL, tries to pick up the radio broadcast of the "Dance of the Sorceress," being presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in America.

The composition was chosen by the famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, as the opening number on his symphony programme Saturday night. The young composer has arranged with the French station, located in the great steel tower, to try to pick up the broadcast as sent out by one of four powerful stations linked up for the concert—WBZ, WJZ WGY or WRC.

SYMPHONY IN FIRST MONDAY CONCERT

Globe Nov 16

Orchestra Twice Called to Feet by Applause

HERALD Nov 16

The first of five Monday night concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place last evening in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Eine Kleine Nachtmzesik; Prokofieff, suite from the ballet "Chout," (Buffoon"); Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"; Franck, smyphony, D minor.

All these pieces have been performed this season at the orchestra's subscription concerts. The pieces by Strauss and Cesar Franck have long been familiar to Boston's musical public, so it is hardly necessary to speak about their structure or other characteristics. Yet a note about "Chout" may be allowed.

This ballet, entitled "The Buffoon," was performed at the Neighborhood playhouse in New York in March, 1924. When the suite was played here early in October the question was raised whether Prokofieff's score had been used in the production in New York. The scenario itself had been "adapted" from the original one. It was thought that the New York audiences had really heard Prokofieff's music which calls for a very large orchestra.

A program of the performance in New York, recently obtained, gives the names of the musicians with their instruments. They were only six in number; they played two pianos, a violin, a flute, an oboe, and percussion instruments. The question now arises, were the parts for the violin, wind instruments and percussion faked from the version for two pianos?

The program was well devised to show the great talent of Mr. Koussevitzky; to made one wonder at his versatility; his ability to catch the spirit of various schools, even centuries, and to express it. For the beautiful music of Mozart was no more foreign to him than was the Suite of Prokofieff, a modern of the moderns; if the pranks of Till were vividly portrayed in tones—and this composition is one of Strauss's best, and the most characteristic because it reveals peculiarities of the composer's nature. The pure and noble thoughts of Cesar Franck even gained in eloquence by the performance.

The audience, which filled the house, was so appreciative that twice the orchestra was called to its feet to share the vociferous applause with Mr. Koussevitzky. This occurred after the Prokofieff suite, of which the Final Dance was performed with special brilliance, and again after "Till Eulenspiegel."

FIRST OF MONDAYS' CONCERTS

Post Nov 16

Symphony Gives of Its Best Opening Series

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The subscribers to the Monday Symphony concerts have no reason to complain. In the matter of programme they receive the pick of the season's repertory; and they are likely to be treated to performances better adjusted, more eloquent of the conductor's intentions than those of the Friday afternoons, when the pieces in question are first presented.

RISE THREE TIMES

Last evening, the first of this season's Monday concerts, came to pass before an audience that filled every seat and, withal, one so cordial and enthusiastic that the men of the orchestra were brought to their feet no less than three times in acknowledgement of the applause—at the conclusion of the suite from Prokofieff's ballet, "Chout" ("Clown"), at the end of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and after the Symphony of Franck, which closed the concert.

Heard a second time, Proffofieff's gay, fantastic music pleased even more than before. In his music for the stage Prokofieff seems less distinctly himself than in his purely orchestral pieces. This music to "Chout," for example, derives quite directly from Stravinsky's "Petruchka." But it is none the less enjoyable because of that, and last evening it was given an uncommonly brilliant and exhilarating performance.

A Slightly Tamed "Till"

Was it its proximity to this audacious music, by the way, that caused "Till" to sound last evening less exuberant, less puckish than it has generally seemed? Or does Mr. Koussevitzky, in his desire to extract from the score the last ounce of poetic significance and of musical effect, rob it of a bit of its rightful bouyancy and spontaneity? In any event the performance of last evening, within the limits Mr. Koussevitzky has defined for it, was remarkably eloquent, and, incidentally, more clearly articulated, better proportioned than that of a few weeks ago. And the same may be said of Franck's Symphony, while last evening there was here less reason to cry extravagance and distortion.

To a noticeable degree the brass was less strident, less aggressive than before, and as with "Till" the performance, was beautifully moulded, alive in every part, permitting the listener to revel in the ever-changing orchestral sonorities.

Finale at Giddy Pace

Specifically, there was reason to quarrel last evening only with the giddy tempo assigned to the chief theme of the Finale. Somehow, one thinks of Franck's mood in this instance as being one of serene exaltation rather than of delirious, frenzied joy, a la Tchaikovsky.

Finally, it should not go unrecorded that last evening's concert began with an exquisite performance of Mozart's charming serenade for strings, "Ein Kleine Nachtmusik."

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Nothing, save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, than the circumstances of his career. He first conducted as a boy of twelve, when he led the local theater orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in northern Russia. Attending the conservatory at Moscow, he was required to study an instrument. He chose the double bass, and the noted master Rambousseo, with his teacher. His proficiency upon this unusual instrument became so extraordinary that he toured all of Europe and became famous before he was even known as a conductor.

Koussevitzky's abilities, indeed, were not of the sort to be so confined to a limited field, and from 1909 he devoted all his energies to conducting. He organized his own symphony orchestra in Moscow, which soon came to be considered the finest in Russia. In Moscow and Petrograd he conducted the classics, gave Beethoven, Bach, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, and other festivals each season, and championed works by young composers then unknown but since accepted.

But Koussevitzky could not rest content with bringing music to the city folk of Russia. He chartered a large steamer on the Volga river, and, taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends, made several voyages along the 2,500 miles of its basin.

Frank A. Sedgwick brings the Boston Symphony to Hartford and the ticket sale is now in progress. Reservations may be made by calling 2-6147.

Symphony Player Under Knife

Baltimore, Dec. 18.—(AP)—Arthur Hadley, cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a patient at the Johns Hopkins Hospital it was learned today when his brother, Henry Hadley, guest conductor of the New York Philaharmonic Orchestra visited him here.

GAZETTE
TRENTON, N. J.
NOV 1926

Stravinsky Revival to Be Heard in New York

Four works new in New York City and a Stravinsky revival, with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, will make the program of the second concert by the League of Composers this season. Mr. Koussevitzky, who appears by courtesy of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will lead an ensemble of players chosen from that organization. The program includes two works which will be heard for the first time anywhere—Bela Bartok's "Village Scenes," the latest composition from his pen, written especially for the league on a commission undertaken two years ago, and Louis Gruenberg's "Creation," a setting of the poem of that name by James Weldon Johnson. Bartok's work is for chamber orchestra, and four female voices. Gruenberg's work is for an instrumental ensemble and a singer, who, for this evening, will be Julius Bledsoe, the negro baritone, late of "Deep River."

The Stravinsky revival will be that of "L'Histoire du Soldat," written in 1918, and first produced in America with full instrumental score by the League of Composers in 1924. This work will replace "Mavra," previously announced on the program. "L'Histoire," "Renard" and "Mavra" are works of the same character are more or less of one period, the latter two being for voices and chamber orchestra, and all three lending themselves to stage pantomime.

Anton von Webern's much-discussed "Five Orchestral Pieces," will be heard for the first time in America. The same thing holds true of Hans Krasa's chamber symphony—a "Pastorale" and "Marche."

The league will give a concert of modern works at the Brooklyn Museum on Friday, November 19, under the auspices of the Societe Anonyme. The program includes works by Malipiero, Frederick Jacobi, Marion Bauer, Stravinsky and Emerson Whithorne; songs by Richard Hammond and Lazare Saminsky. The assisting artists will be the Helen Tas Quartet, Marion Rous and Ruth Rodgers.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
NOV 17 1926

Composer in Paris Will Try to Pick Up Concert in Boston

Boston, Nov. 16.—(AP.)—A young Russian composer will listen while a great American orchestra, 3,000 miles distant, plays his composition next Saturday night. The composer is Alexander Tansman who will wait in the Eiffel Tower in Paris while the big French government station FL tries to pick up the radio broadcast of the "Dance of the Sorceress" being presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in America.

...and is bound to please some-
...in a good location; convenient
...a reasonable price—11 rooms,
...s, nice graded lot with garage.

500

...concerts begin at 3.15 promptly and never last later than 5 o'clock, they have a very large patronage from the subscribers of outlying towns of Boston.

Mr. Koussevitsky is dividing the five programs according to various important national schools of music. The first, on November 30, will be of German music and will include Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Wagner's prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde;" Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the "Fourth Symphony" of Brahms. There will be a French program, including Berlioz' "Roman Carnaval Overture;" Debussey's nocturnes," Clouds" and "Festivals;" Ravel's "La Valse" and Franck's "Symphony in D-Minor." The Russian program will include the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina;" Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," numbers from Stravinsky's "Fire Bird," a suite from Prokofieff's "The Love for Three Oranges," and the "Fourth Symphony" of Tchaikowsky. The remaining two programs are still to be announced.

Mr. Koussevitzky attended the Zuart Festival of the International Society fe New Music held last June at Zurich Switzerland. He was especially impressed by four compositions which will be heard in Boston for the first time at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow afternoon and Saturday night: Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress" from the ballet "The Garden of Paradise" (based on a fairy story by Hans Christian Andersen); Krasa's March and Pastorale from a symphony in three movements. Webern's Five Pieces for Orchestra op. 10, and Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point." This overture was performed for the first time at the Zurich Festival. Walton was the only English composer thus represented. The symphony this week will be Beethoven's Fifth, C-minor. Tansman has already been represented at the Symphony concerts. Beethoven's Fifth symphony has been performed at these and other orchestral concerts in Boston. No doubt many of the conservatives in the audience can hum or whistle some of the themes in a tolerably accurate manner.

N. Y. EVENING SUN
NOV 19 1926

BOSTON CONCERT MAY REACH PARIS

Eifel Tower Will Attempt to Pick Up U. S. Stations.

The French Government radio station FL, located in the Eifel Tower in Paris, will endeavor to pick up the sixth of the series of Saturday night concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast by WBZ and its associated stations when the program goes on the air at 8:10 o'clock to-morrow evening.

Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress," from the ballet "The Garden of Paradise," has been selected as the opening number on Saturday's symphony program. The young Russian composer has made arrangements with the French Government for Station FL to pick up the signals of WJZ, WGY and WRC in the Eifel Tower, where he will be stationed so that he may hear the first presentation in America of his composition by the orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

To Tell of Composer's Work.

In accordance with the cabled arrangements between Tansman and the Symphony management, Nicolai Slonimsky, noted pianist and secretary to Serge Koussevitzky, will take Prof. Marshall's place at the microphone to tell the radio audiences something of Tansman's work. He will also play a part of the composition on the piano and extend greetings to Tansman in Russian. If the experiment is a success Tansman will receive the message in Paris about 1:10 A. M.

Between the various numbers Prof. Marshall will tell his listeners something about each of the composers. He will devote the entire intermission to a talk on Beethoven's style and an analysis of the Fifth Symphony. Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Following its trip to New York next week, the Boston Symphony orchestra will give its next regular pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 3 and 4.

The soloist will be Alfred Cortot, the French pianist, who will appear with the orchestra in a concerto of Mozart, and Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations. Serge Koussevitzky will open the program with Bach's Brandenberg Concerto in G major for violin, solo with two flutes, and close it with Debussy's "Iberia."

TUESDAY SERIES

Serge Koussevitzky announces the program for the opening concert of the Tuesday afternoon series of five by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Symphony hall, on Nov. 30, at 3:15. Devoted to the German school of music, this program will include Beethoven's Leonora Overture No. 3, the Prelude and Love Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," Richard Strauss's humorous tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor.

The five programs will be divided according to the various national ... of music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MUSICAL LEADER
NOV 13 1926
NOV 11 1926
NOV 13 1926

COMPOSERS' LEAGUE TO GIVE NOVELTIES

Koussevitzky to Lead New Works of Bartók, Webern, Krasa and Gruenberg

When Serge Koussevitzky conducts the second concert of the League of Composers in Town Hall, on Nov. 27, he will introduce four works new to New York, two of which will have their world première, and will give a revival of Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat," which was first heard in this city at a League concert in March, 1924. The new works are by Béla Bartók, Louis Gruenberg, Anton von Webern and Hans Krasa.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who leads an ensemble of men from the Boston Symphony at this concert, appears by special permission of the board of trustees of that organization.

Bartók's work, entitled "Village Scenes," is his latest composition, and was written especially for the League of Composers. This new opus is for four female voices and small ensemble. The Brahms Vocal Quartet will interpret the songs, which are taken from the Slavic and celebrate the preparation of a young girl for her wedding. They are written in the manner of Bartók's later works. There is a slight use of actual folk-idiom in the melodic line.

Mr. Gruenberg's work, "The Creation," is a setting, for voice and chamber orchestra, of the poem by James Weldon Johnson. This work will be sung by Julius Bledsoe, Negro baritone. "The Creation" is a Negro sermon, which tells in detail of the making of the universe. Unlike Mr. Gruenberg's earlier venture with a work employing Negro subject matter, "The Daniel Jazz," it is of a serious nature. Musically, the Negro idiom is not frequently employed in a literal way. The work was completed last year, but has not yet been performed.

The "Five Orchestral Pieces" by Anton von Webern are the much-discussed works which were given at the Zurich Festival last summer. They are sixteen years old, but their revival at Zurich was in the nature of a discovery. They are very short, each of them extending a little more or less than a minute. Hans Krasa contributes two movements from a chamber symphony, "Marche" and "Pastorale," This work was also performed at Zurich. Krasa was born in Prague in 1899, and became a student of Alexander von Zemlinsky. The "Pastorale" and "Marche" were completed in 1925.

"L'Histoire du Soldat" was written by Stravinsky in 1918, the period of "Renard" and "Mavra." It is for chamber orchestra and may be accompanied by stage pantomime, though this performance will be in concert version.

The next concert of the League will be an afternoon recital of American works by young composers. It will take place in January, the exact date and place to be announced. In March the League will give an evening performance of works for the stage, the details to be made public later.

IN SYMPHONY HALL

Tomorrow evening, in Symphony hall, at 8:15, the Boston Symphony orchestra will give the first concert of its Monday evening series. The program will include Mozart's Serenade for Strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"; Prokofieff's Suite from the ballet "Chout" ("Buffoon"); Strauss's Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

Frieda Hempel, soprano, will sing in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 21, at 3:30 o'clock. It will be her only recital here.

Tito Schipa, tenor, will give his only recital in Boston on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 28. Herald Nov 14

Josef Hofmann will play the piano in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 5.

The series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will open in Symphony hall on Tuesday afternoon, Nov. 30, at 3:15.

The five programs of this series will be grouped according to the various national schools of music. A few season tickets are still available at the subscription office in Symphony hall.

FIRST OF MONDAYS' CONCERTS

Post Nov 16

Symphony Gives of Its Best Opening Series.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The subscribers to the Monday Symphony concerts have no reason to complain. In the matter of programme they receive the pick of the season's repertory; and they are likely to be treated to performances better adjusted, more eloquent of the conductor's intentions than those of the Friday afternoons, when the pieces in question are first presented.

RISE THREE TIMES

Last evening, the first of this season's Monday concerts, came to pass before an audience that filled every seat and, withal, one so cordial and enthusiastic that the men of the orchestra were brought to their feet no less than three times in acknowledgement of the applause—at the conclusion of the suite from Prokofieff's ballet, "Chout" ("Clown"), at the end of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and after the Symphony of Franck, which closed the concert.

Heard a second time, Proffofieff's gay, fantastic music pleased even more than before. In his music for the stage Prokofieff seems less distinctly himself than in his purely orchestral pieces. This music to "Chout," for example, derives quite directly from Stravinsky's "Petruchka." But it is none the less enjoyable because of that, and last evening it was given an uncommonly brilliant and exhilarating performance.

A Slightly Tamed "Till"

Was it its proximity to this audacious music, by the way, that caused "Till" to sound last evening less exuberant, less puckish than it has generally seemed? Or does Mr. Koussevitzky, in his desire to extract from the score the last ounce of poetic significance and of musical effect, rob it of a bit of its rightful bouyancy and spontaneity? In any event the performance of last evening, within the limits Mr. Koussevitzky has defined for it, was remarkably eloquent, and, incidentally, more clearly articulated, better proportioned than that of a few weeks ago. And the same may be said of Franck's Symphony, while last evening there was here less reason to cry extravagance and distortion.

To a noticeable degree the brass was less strident, less aggressive than before, and as with "Till" the performance, was beautifully moulded, alive in every part, permitting the listener to revel in the ever-changing orchestral sonorities.

Finale at Giddy Pace

Specifically, there was reason to quarrel last evening only with the giddy tempo assigned to the chief theme of the Finale. Somehow, one thinks of Franck's mood in this instance as being one of serene exaltation rather than of delirious, frenzied joy, a la Tchaikovsky.

Finally, it should not go unrecorded that last evening's concert began with an exquisite performance of Mozart's charming serenade for strings, "Ein Kleine Nachtmusik."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The sixth regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, will be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Four new compositions will then be heard for the first time in Boston: Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress" from his ballet, "The Garden of Paradise"; march and pastorale from a symphony of Krasa; five orchestral pieces by Webern, and the overture, "Portsmouth Point," by Walton, the English composer. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will be the final number.

SYMPHONY IN FIRST MONDAY CONCERT

Globe Nov 16

Orchestra Twice Called to Feet by Applause

Herald Nov 16

The first of five Monday night concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place last evening in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Eine Kleine Nachtmzesik; Prokofieff, suite from the ballet "Chout," (Buffoon"); Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"; Franck, smyphony, D minor.

All these pieces have been performed this season at the orchestra's subscription concerts. The pieces by Strauss and Cesar Franck have long been familiar to Boston's musical public, so it is hardly necessary to speak about their structure or other characteristics. Yet a note about "Chout" may be allowed.

This ballet, entitled "The Buffoon," was performed at the Neighborhood playhouse in New York in March, 1924. When the suite was played here early in October the question was raised whether Prokofieff's score had been used in the production in New York. The scenario itself had been "adapted" from the original one. It was thought that the New York audiences had really heard Prokofieff's music which calls for a very large orchestra.

A program of the performance in New York, recently obtained, gives the names of the musicians with their instruments. They were only six in number; they played two pianos, a violin, a flute, an oboe, and percussion instruments. The question now arises, were the parts for the violin, wind instruments and percussion faked from the version for two pianos?

The program was well devised to show the great talent of Mr. Koussevitzky; to made one wonder at his versatility; his ability to catch the spirit of various schools, even centuries, and to express it. For the beautiful music of Mozart was no more foreign to him than was the Suite of Prokofieff, a modern of the moderns; if the pranks of Till were vividly portrayed in tones—and this composition is one of Strauss's best, and the most characteristic because it reveals peculiarities of the composer's nature. The pure and noble thoughts of Cesar Franck even gained in eloquence by the performance.

The audience, which filled the house, was so appreciative that twice the orchestra was called to its feet to share the vociferous applause with Mr. Koussevitzky. This occurred after the Prokofieff suite, of which the Final Dance was performed with special brilliance, and again after "Till Eulenspiegel."

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Nothing, save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, than the circumstances of his career. He first conducted as a boy of twelve, when he led the local theater orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in northern Russia. Attending the conservatory at Moscow, he was required to study an instrument. He chose the double bass, and the noted master Ramboussec, with his teacher. His proficiency upon this unusual instrument became so extraordinary that he toured all of Europe and became famous before he was even known as a conductor.

Koussevitzky's abilities, indeed, were not of the sort to be so confined to a limited field, and from 1909 he devoted all his energies to conducting. He organized his own symphony orchestra in Moscow, which soon came to be considered the finest in Russia. In Moscow and Petrograd he conducted the classics, gave Beethoven, Bach, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, and other festivals each season, and championed works by young composers then unknown but since accepted.

But Koussevitzky could not rest content with bringing music to the city folk of Russia. He chartered a large steamer on the Volga river, and, taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends, made several voyages along the 2,500 miles of its basin.

Frank A. Sedgwick brings the Boston Symphony to Hartford and the ticket sale is now in progress. Reservations may be made by calling 2-6147.

Symphony Player Under Knife

Baltimore, Dec. 18.—(AP)—Arthur Hadley, cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a patient at the Johns Hopkins Hospital it was learned today when his brother, Henry Hadley, guest conductor of the New York Philaharmonic Orchestra visited him here.

To Hear His Music Post Though Across Sea

Nov 17

(AP)—A young musician will listen while a great American orchestra, 3000 miles distant, plays his composition next Saturday night. The composer is Alexander Tansman, who will wait in the Eiffel Tower in Paris while the big French government station, FL, tries to pick up the radio broadcast of the "Dance of the Sorceress," being presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in America.

The composition was chosen by the famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, as the opening number on his symphony programme Saturday night. The young composer has arranged with the French station, located in the great steel tower, to try to pick up the broadcast as sent out by one of four powerful stations linked up for the concert—WBZ, WJZ WGY or WRC.

GAZETTE
RENTON, N. J.

1926

Stravinsky Revival to Be Heard in New York

Four works new in New York City and a Stravinsky revival, with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, will make the program of the second concert by the League of Composers this season. Mr. Koussevitzky, who appears by courtesy of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will lead an ensemble of players chosen from that organization. The program includes two works which will be heard for the first time anywhere—Bela Bartok's "Village Scenes," the latest composition from his pen, written especially for the league on a commission undertaken two years ago, and Louis Gruenberg's "Creation," a setting of the poem of that name by James Weldon Johnson. Bartok's work is for chamber orchestra, and four female voices. Gruenberg's work is for an instrumental ensemble and a singer, who, for this evening, will be Julius Bledsoe, the negro baritone, late of "Deep River."

The Stravinsky revival will be that of "L'Histoire du Soldat," written in 1918, and first produced in America with full instrumental score by the League of Composers in 1924. This work will replace "Mavra," previously announced on the program. "L'Histoire," "Renard" and "Mavra" are works of the same character are more or less of one period, the latter two being for voices and chamber orchestra, and all three lending themselves to stage pantomime.

Anton von Webern's much-discussed "Five Orchestral Pieces," will be heard for the first time in America. The same thing holds true of Hans Krasa's chamber symphony—a "Pastorale" and "Marche."

The league will give a concert of modern works at the Brooklyn Museum on Friday, November 19, under the auspices of the Societe Anonyme. The program includes works by Malipiero, Frederick Jacobi, Marion Bauer, Stravinsky and Emerson Whithorne; songs by Richard Hammond and Lazare Saminsky. The assisting artists will be the Helen Tas Quartet, Marion Rous and Ruth Rodgers.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 17 1926

Composer in Paris Will Try to Pick Up Concert in Boston

Boston, Nov. 16.—(AP.)—A young Russian composer will listen while a great American orchestra, 3,000 miles distant, plays his composition next Saturday night. The composer is Alexander Tansman who will wait in the Eiffel Tower in Paris while the big French government station FL tries to pick up the radio broadcast of the "Dance of the Sorceress" being presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in America.

LOOK...HALL'S
MACK SIDE

and is bound to please somein a good location; convenient
a reasonable price—11 rooms,
s, nice graded lot with garage.

500

concerts begin at 3.15 promptly and never last later than 5 o'clock, they have a very large patronage from the subscribers of outlying towns of Boston.

Mr. Koussevitsky is dividing the five programs according to various important national schools of music. The first, on November 30, will be of German music and will include Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Wagner's prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde;" Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the "Fourth Symphony" of Brahms. There will be a French program, including Berlioz' "Roman Carnaval Overture;" Debussey's nocturnes," Clouds" and "Festivals;" Ravel's "La Valse" and Franck's "Symphony in D-Minor." The Russian program will include the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina;" Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," numbers from Stravinsky's "Fire Bird," a suite from Prokofieff's "The Love for Three Oranges," and the "Fourth Symphony" of Tchaikowsky. The remaining two programs are still to be announced.

Mr. Koussevitzy attended the Fourt Festival of the International Society fo New Music held last June at Zurich Switzerland. He was especially impressed by four compositions which will be heard in Boston for the first time at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow afternoon and Saturday night: Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress" from the ballet "The Garden of Paradise" (based on a fairy story by Hans Christian Andersen); Krasa's March and Pastorale from a symphony in three movements. Webern's Five Pieces for orchestra op. 10, and Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point." This overture was performed for the first time at the Zurich Festival. Walton was the only English composer there represented. The symphony this week will be Beethoven's Fifth, C-minor. Tansman has already been represented at the Symphony concerts. Beethoven's Fifth symphony has been performed at these and other orchestral concerts in Boston. No doubt many of the conservatives in the audience can hum or whistle some of the themes in a tolerably accurate manner.

N. Y. EVENING SUN

NOV 19 1926

BOSTON CONCERT MAY REACH PARIS

Eifel Tower Will Attempt to Pick Up U. S. Stations.

The French Government radio station FL, located in the Eifel Tower in Paris, will endeavor to pick up the sixth of the series of Saturday night concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast by WBZ and its associated stations when the program goes on the air at 8:10 o'clock to-morrow evening.

Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress," from the ballet "The Garden of Paradise," has been selected as the opening number on Saturday's symphony program. The young Russian composer has made arrangements with the French Government for Station FL to pick up the signals of WJZ, WGY and WRC in the Eifel Tower, where he will be stationed so that he may hear the first presentation in America of his composition by the orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

To Tell of Composer's Work.

In accordance with the cabled arrangements between Tansman and the Symphony management, Nicolai Slonimsky, noted pianist and secretary to Serge Koussevitzky, will take Prof. Marshall's place at the microphone to tell the radio audiences something of Tansman's work. He will also play a part of the composition on the piano and extend greetings to Tansman in Russian. If the experiment is a success Tansman will receive the message in Paris about 1:10 A. M.

Between the various numbers Prof. Marshall will tell his listeners something about each of the composers. He will devote the entire intermission to a talk on Beethoven's style and an analysis of the Fifth Symphony. Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Following its trip to New York next week, the Boston Symphony orchestra will give its next regular pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 3 and 4.

The soloist will be Alfred Cortot, the French pianist, who will appear with the orchestra in a concerto of Mozart, and Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations. Serge Koussevitzky will open the program with Bach's Brandenberg Concerto in G major for violin solo with two flutes, and close it with Debussy's "Iberia."

TUESDAY SERIES

Serge Koussevitzky announces the program for the opening concert of the Tuesday afternoon series of five by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Symphony hall, on Nov. 30, at 3:15. Devoted to the German school of music, this program will include Beethoven's Leonora Overture No. 3, the Prelude and Love Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," Richard Strauss's humorous tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Marry Franks" and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor.

The five programs will be divided according to the various national of music.

NEW YORK
BROOKLYN EAGLE
NOV 19 1926

PARIS TO LISTEN IN TEST ACROSS ATLANTIC OCEAN

Special Broadcast From WJZ Chain Scheduled for Tomorrow Night.

The French Government radio Station F L, located in the Eifel Tower in Paris, will endeavor to pick up the sixth of the series of Saturday night concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, broadcast by W J Z and its associated stations and Alexandre Tansman, noted symphony composer, will be one of the most interested listeners of the radio audience when the program goes on the air at 8:10 o'clock Saturday evening, Nov. 20.

Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress," from the ballet. "The Garden of Paradise," has been selected as the opening number on Saturday's symphony program. The young Russian composer has made arrangements with the French Government for Station F L to pick up the signals of the Westinghouse station or W J Z, W G Y or W R C, in the Eifel Tower, where he will be stationed so that he may hear the first presentation in America of his composition by the celebrated orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky.

Success Predicted.

In acordance with the cabled arrangements between Tansman and the Symphony management, Nicolai Slonimsky, noted pianist and secretary to Serge Koussevitsky, will take Professor Marshall's place at the microphone to tell the radio audience something of Tansman's work. He will also play a part of the composition on the piano and extend greetings to Tansman in Russian. It is anticipated that success will attend the transmission with W B Z, W J Z and W G Y, three of the most powerful stations in America, and that Tansman will receive the message in Paris about 1:10 a.m.

Modern Music.

The other three selections appearing on the program before Beethoven's Fifth Symphony are all examples of modern schools and those interested in the most recent phase of musical development will revel in this part of the program. Between the various numbers Professor Marshall will tell his listeners something about each of the composers. He will devote the entire intermission to a talk on Beethoven's style and an analysis of the Fifth Symphony. Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will assist Professor Marshall in his musical illustrations.

The program will come to listeners through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago.

Boston Symphony Concert Series on Tuesday Afternoons

Attention is called to the new series of five, Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians, in Symphony hall, Boston, as a splendid opportunity for out-of-town subscribers to enjoy the Boston Symphony orchestra under its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

This series, instituted last year, will be given on five Tuesday afternoons beginning Nov. 30. Since the concert begin at 2:15 promptly and never last later than 5 P. M. they have a very large patronage from the subscribers of outlying towns of Boston.

This Tuesday series is the one remaining opportunity for those who wish to become Symphony subscribers, since the other four series of 62 concerts in greater Boston, are subscribed by the season to the last seat.

Mr. Koussevitzky is dividing the five programs according to the various important national schools of music. The first program on Nov. 30 will be of German music and will include Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. Three, Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's merry pranks," and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

There will be a French program including Berlioz' Roman Carnaval overture; Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," Ravel's "La Valse," and Franck's Symphony in D minor.

The Russian program will include the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," numbers from Stravinsky's "Fire bird," a suite from Prokofieff's "The love for three oranges," and the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky. The remaining two programs are still to be announced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
AKRON, O.

A concert of appropriate Yuletide compositions will make up the program of the Boston Symphony orchestra tonight in its concert at 8:10 from stations WJZ, New York; WBZ, Springfield; WGY, Schenectady; WFBL, Syracuse; WMAK, Buffalo, and WHAM, Rochester.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
DEC 25 1926

Boston Symphony Opens New York Season Thursday

N.Y. Herald Tribune Nov 21

Koussevitzky Will Present 2 Prokofieff Numbers; Week's Programs of the New York Orchestras

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its third season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will begin its usual series of five Thursday nights and five Saturday afternoons in Carnegie Hall, and five Friday nights at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, this week. Thursday and Friday nights Mr. Koussevitzky's programs will include Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and music from Serge Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." Another Prokofieff novelty will be offered Saturday afternoon, a suite from the ballet "Chout" (Buffoon).

Both Prokofieff works are new here in this form, though the Chicago Opera, during its last New York visit, on February 14, 1922, gave "The Love for Three Oranges," and "Chout" began a run at the Neighborhood Playhouse, Howard Barlow conducting, on March 6, 1924. The suite from "The Love for Three Oranges" is made up of five numbers edited by Albert Spalding.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES UNION
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEC 24 1926

After her debut in New York, Miss Renard was soloist with the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic and the Chicago and St. Louis Orchestras, and just before returning to Germany she made a transcontinental tour in concert with Geraldine Farrar. Rochesterians who have heard Miss Renard are looking forward with keen pleasure to her concert here.

HANDEL, WAGNER, IN BOSTON MUSIC

With Symphonic Suite, "Scheherezade," to Conclude the Orchestral Offering From the Hub

The concert by the Boston Symphony ocrestra which will be broadcast this evening through station WBZ and the chain network under the direction of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, is the most varied, and in many respects, the most interesting thus far in the series, according to Prof John Patten Marshall, who interprets for the radio audience.

Lovers of old music will delight in Handel's concerto, Wagnerians will welcome the performance of the Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," the modernists will receive their portion in the Vaughan Williams Norfolk Rhapsody and everyone will thoroughly enjoy Rimsky-Korsakov's popular symphonic suite, "Scheherezade."

In addition to WBZ, the "key" station, six stations will make this concert available to an audience aggregating millions, WBZ, Boston and Springfield; WJZ, New York; WGY, Schenectady; WFBL, Syracuse; WHAM, Rochester, and WMAK, Buffalo.

Before the program, Prof Marshall will tell the audience something about Vaughan Williams's work, which is performed at this concert for the first time in America, and will illustrate the motives from Isolde's Love-Death. During the intermission he will, with the assistance of Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, illustrate the fascinating melodies of the Scheherezade whi appears in the music as a dream-like vision. Prof Marshall will not analyze this music, for such analysis will not help the listeners; he will confine himself to telling the story and pointing out some of the features of the work which the radio audience should not miss.

The complete program follows:—

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM
DEC 19 1926

Premier Flute Player Today At City Hall

George Laurent Of Boston Symphony Orchestra Assisting Artist

George Laurent
Solo flutist, who will be assisting artist at the municipal concert today.

Georges Laurent, a solo flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one of the premier flute players of the world, will be the assisting artist at the municipal concert this afternoon at City Hall.

His coming will be hailed with great enthusiasm by all who remember his remarkable work with the orchestra as well as those who may have been privileged to hear him as a flute virtuoso, for he is greatly in demand for concert engagements.

Mr. Laurent is a native of Paris, a graduate of the Paris Conservatory, and known as a solo flutist in all the leading capitals of Europe. He was flutist for Melba and Eva Gauthier in this Country and with Litvinne and Patti abroad. He plays the flute as the average person does not dream that it could possibly be played, and his selections for today are admirably chosen to display the brilliance of his technique, including a concertino by Chaminade for flute and piano and three short numbers.

Municipal Organist Charles R. Cronham will have a thought to the seasonal in his organ program, playing two Christmas selections: Dubois' stately March of the Magi Kings and Yon's more sprightly Christmas in Sicily, where Christmas dawns to the tune of bagpipes played on the hillsides.

Aside from the Christmas selections his featured numbers will be Toccata and Fugue in D Minor of Bach and Liszt's melodious and ever-beloved Liebestraum.

The program in full follows:

Lohengrin ..... Wagner
Procession to the Cathedral.
Moment Musical, Op. 94, No. 3
Arr. Cronham ..... Schubert
Liebestraum ..... Liszt
Concertino for Flute and Piano
..... Chaminade
Mr. Laurent and Howard W. Clark.
Toccata and Fugue in D minor
..... Bach
Two Christmas pieces.
March of the Magi Kings . Dubois
Christmas in Sicily-tone pic-
..... Yon

TELEGRAM
YOUNGSTOWN, O.
DEC 24 1926

The Boston Symphony orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky will be on the air from WJZ WBZ, WGY and several other stations at 8:10 p. m. Christmas night. Explanatory notes on the program will be given by Professor Marshall head of the department of music of Holy Cross college.

First Performances on Program of Boston Symphony Society's Opening Concert Here—Philharmonic Orchestra Back in the Field—Chamber Music Society

N.Y. Evening Post Nov 20

TWO suites from scores of Serge Prokofieff are to have their first performances in New York, in this form, at the opening Boston Symphony concerts of the season here, in Carnegie Hall next week. Serge Koussevitsky will present music from the opera "The Love for Three Oranges" at the Thursday evening performance, and the suite from the ballet "Chout" ("Buffoon") on Saturday afternoon. "The Love for Three Oranges" was produced by the Chicago Opera Company in Chicago on December 30, 1921, and at the Manhattan Opera House in New York on February 14, 1922. The suite is made up of five numbers which have been edited by Albert Spalding. They include "Les Ridicules," "March," "Scherzo," "The Prince and the Princess," and "The Flight."

"Chout," which is numbered opus 21, was originally a ballet in six scenes on a bizarre story on the doings of buffoons. It was produced by Diaghilev's Russian ballet in Paris and in London in 1921. The ballet suite was performed for the first time at Brussels in 1924. This will not be, strictly speaking, the first New York performance of this music, since it was presented at the Neighborhood Playhouse on March 6, 1924. The scenes of the suite include Dance of the Buffoon's Daughters, In the Merchant's Bedroom, the Young Woman Is Turned Into a Goat, and Final Dance. This suite had its first Boston performance at the opening of Koussevitzky's season there on last October 8. Other Thursday numbers will be Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and "Egmont" overture and Respighi's "Pines of Rome." The rest of the Saturday program will be Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Mozarth's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Roussel's "Opera Ballet Suite."

RECORD
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
DEC 20 1926

AMOUNT OF FAN MAIL IS HOOKUM

Superintendent of Station Says That But One Out of 500 Listeners Writes.

After a radio fan has been listening all evening to various stations, and each and every one of these latter have exhorted him to "be sure and write in and tell just how the music got across," he begins to wonder how many people do write in.

The superintendent of broadcasting of WEEI, Boston, Mr. Charles W. Burton, gives some interesting points on fan mail in a special statement printed in the January Radio Broadcast magazine. "When WEEI broadcast the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time, the novelty of th ething attracted to our wavelength about 1,500,000 people," he asys. "This number was estimated from the number of sales of tubes and batteries, and by another way. We are convinced that only one person in every five hundred tuned-in on a program will write a letter to the station about it. Three thousand letters followed the initial Symphony Orchestra broadcast.

"Most stations and program sponsors exaggerate the importance of fan mail," thinks Mr. Burton. "It cannot reflect the attitude of the audience in general; it rarely offers any intelligent criticism, and its requests, if complied with, add to the deadly similitude of programs. Many program sponsors, in order to stimulate letter writing, are offering samples, radio logs, and other articles as an inducement. Of what value to radio, or their campaign, is this? It merely indicates that people like to get something for nothing. It doesn't show whether the program has a popular appeal. Indeed, I have seen letters something like this: 'Your tenor ought to have his throat cut, and obviously your orchestra was organized fifteen minutes before the program opened. Please send me one of your handy bottle openers.' A great many kind listeners do write fine letters to WEEI, however, and we love them for it. We hope their numbers will increase. But we do not hold with the old tradition that fan mail is the very blood of the broadcasting industry."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH
NOV 21 1926

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York season next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at 8:30 and 2:30, in Carnegie Hall.

At the Thursday concert Serge Koussevitzky will present Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3, which will be preceded by the same composer's overture to "Egmont." A score which is to have its first New York performance in its symphonic version is the suite from Prokofieff's Opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." The movements include "Les Ridicules," "March," "Scherzo," "The Prince and the Princess," and "The Flight." The program will end with Respighi's symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," in which the song of the nightingale is introduced by means of a phonographic record.

The matinee program will have as its symphony the fifth of Beethoven in C minor. There will be two novelties—the suite from Roussel's opera-ballet, "Padmavati," and a suite from Prokofieff's ballet, "Chout" ("Buffoon"). The program will be opened with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," a serenade for string orchestra.

"Prokofieff's opera, from which his suite is derived, is based on Gozzi's satirical fairy play, which might well excite the imagination of an ycomposer," said Philip Hale, critic of the Boston Herald, last week.

"A remarkable man this Serge Prokofieff, to us the most original, the most imaginative, and the best equipped composer now creating music. With the hearing of each work by him our admiration for him waxes stronger.

"There is no need in this instance of restating the old saw: 'This music is for the stage and suffers when it is transferred to the concert hall,' for the movements are interesting; yes, delightful, as absolute music. They are not only brilliantly and, often, surprisingly orchestrated; they have original musical ideas, now impressive by their force, now giving great pleasure by their indisputable and peculiar beauty, as in the slow movement where the beauty of thought and expression is most poetic, a type of beauty that has not been revealed in other modern compositions now known to us. In the wilder passages there is no extravagance for the sake of making the bourgeois sit up.

Koussevitzky Offers Sibelius Symphony

Musical Digest Dec 21

Boston Audience Is Pleased With Composition.

Boston, Mass., Dec. 17.—The eighth concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, took place on the afternoon of December 10, in Symphony Hall. The program included the C. P. E. Bach Concerto in D major, Stravinsky's Suite from the Firebird, Sibelius's Seventh Symphony, heard for the first time here, and Finlandia.

In the critical opinion of Mr. Hale of the Herald, "one does not, in the seventh symphony "find the freshness, the wild charm, the tragic and sinister darkness associated with much of Sibelius's music. It is scholarly rather than spontaneous, nor do the themes have the former distinction and personal quality.

To Mr. Smith of the Post—"music such as this not only merits but demands a rehearing, and Mr. Koussevitzky should afford it. In yesterday's audience there were enough who felt its power and mastery, its sober eloquence and grave beauty, to make a fair show of enthusiasm, though it was plain that the noisy obviousness of Finlandia, played with amazing brilliance, was more to the liking of the majority."

NEW YORK
BROOKLYN EAGLE
NOV 19 1926

PARIS TO LISTEN IN TEST ACROSS ATLANTIC OCEAN

Special Broadcast From WJZ Chain Scheduled for Tomorrow Night.

The French Government radio Station FL, located in the Eifel Tower in Paris, will endeavor to pick up the sixth of the series of Saturday night concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, broadcast by WBZ and its associated stations and Alexandre Tansman, noted symphony composer, will be one of the most interested listeners of the radio audience when the program goes on the air at 8:10 o'clock Saturday evening, Nov. 20.

Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress," from the ballet. "The Garden of Paradise," has been selected as the opening number on Saturday's symphony program. The young Russian composer has made arrangements with the French Government for Station FL to pick up the signals of the Westinghouse station or WJZ, WGY or WRC, in the Eifel Tower, where he will be stationed so that he may hear the first presentation in America of his composition by the celebrated orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky.

Success Predicted.

In acordance with the cabled arrangements between Tansman and the Symphony management, Nicolai Slonimsky, noted pianist and secretary to Serge Koussevitsky, will take Professor Marshall's place at the microphone to tell the radio audience something of Tansman's work. He will also play a part of the composition on the piano and extend greetings to Tansman in Russian. It is anticipated that success will attend the transmission with WBZ, WJZ and WGY, three of the most powerful stations in America, and that Tansman will receive the message in Paris about 1:10 a.m.

Modern Music.

The other three selections appearing on the program before Beethoven's Fifth Symphony are all examples of modern schools and those interested in the most recent phase of musical development will revel in this part of the program. Between the various numbers Professor Marshall will tell his listeners something about each of the composers. He will devote the entire intermission to a talk on Beethoven's style and an analysis of the Fifth Symphony. Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will assist Professor Marshall in his musical illustrations.

The program will come to listeners through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM
DEC 19 1926

Boston Symphony Concert Series on Tuesday Afternoons

Attention is called to the new series of five, Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians, in Symphony hall, Boston, as a splendid opportunity for out-of-town subscribers to enjoy the Boston Symphony orchestra under its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

This series, instituted last year, will be given on five Tuesday afternoons, beginning Nov. 30. Since the concerts begin at 2 promptly and never last later than 5 P. M. they have a very large patronage from the subscribers of outlying towns of Boston.

This Tuesday series is the one remaining opportunity for those who wish to become Symphony subscribers, since the other four series of 62 concerts in greater Boston, are subscribed by the season to the last seat.

Mr. Koussevitzky is dividing the five programs according to the various important national schools of music. The first program on Nov. 30 will be of German music and will include Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. Three, Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's merry pranks," and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

There will be a French program including Berlioz' Roman Carnaval overture; Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," Ravel's "La Valse," and Franck's Symphony in D minor.

The Russian program will include the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," numbers from Stravinsky's "Fire bird," a suite from Prokofieff's "The love for three oranges," and the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky. The remaining two programs are still to be announced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
AKRON, O.

A concert of appropriate Yuletide compositions will make up the program of the Boston Symphony orchestra tonight in its concert at 8:10 from stations WJZ, New York; WBZ, Springfield; WGY, Schenectady; WFBL, Syracuse; WMAK, Buffalo, and WHAM, Rochester.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
DEC 25 1926

Boston Symphony Opens New York Season Thursday

N.Y. Herald Tribune Nov 21

Koussevitzky Will Present 2 Prokofieff Numbers; Week's Programs of the New York Orchestras

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its third season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will begin its usual series of five Thursday nights and five Saturday afternoons in Carnegie Hall, and five Friday nights at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, this week. Thursday and Friday nights Mr. Koussevitzky's programs will include Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and music from Serge Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." Another Prokofieff novelty will be offered Saturday afternoon, a suite from the ballet "Chout" (Buffoon).

Both Prokofieff works are new here in this form, though the Chicago Opera, during its last New York visit, on February 14, 1922, gave "The Love for Three Oranges," and "Chout" began a run at the Neighborhood Playhouse, Howard Barlow conducting, on March 6, 1924. The suite from "The Love for Three Oranges" is made up of five numbers edited by Albert Spalding.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES UNION
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEC 24 1926

After her debut in New York, Miss Renard was soloist with the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic and the Chicago and St. Louis Orchestras, and just before returning to Germany she made a transcontinental tour in concert with Geraldine Farrar. Rochesterians who have heard Miss Renard are looking forward with keen pleasure to her concert here.

HANDEL, WAGNER, IN BOSTON MUSIC

With Symphonic Suite, "Scheherezade," to Conclude the Orchestral Offering From the Hub

The concert by the Boston Symphony ocrestra which will be broadcast this evening through station WBZ and the chain network under the direction of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, is the most varied, and in many respects, the most interesting thus far in the series, according to Prof John Patten Marshall, who interprets for the radio audience.

Lovers of old music will delight in Handel's concerto, Wagnerians will welcome the performance of the Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," the modernists will receive their portion in the Vaughan Williams Norfolk Rhapsody and everyone will thoroughly enjoy Rimsky-Korsakov's popular symphonic suite, "Scheherezade."

In addition to WBZ, the "key" station, six stations will make this concert available to an audience aggregating millions, WBZ, Boston and Springfield; WJZ, New York; WGY, Schenectady; WFBL, Syracuse; WHAM, Rochester, and WMAK, Buffalo.

Before the program, Prof Marshall will tell the audience something about Vaughan Williams's work, which is performed at this concert for the first time in America, and will illustrate the motives from Isolde's Love-Death. During the intermission he will, with the assistance of Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, illustrate the fascinating melodies of the Scheherezade whi appears in the music as a dream-like vision. Prof Marshall will not analyze this music, for such analysis will not help the listeners; he will confine himself to telling the story and pointing out some of the features of the work which the radio audience should not miss.

The complete program follows:—

Premier Flute Player Today At City Hall

George Laurent Of Boston Symphony Orchestra Assisting Artist

George Laurent
Solo flutist, who will be assisting artist at the municipal concert today.

Georges Laurent, a solo flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one of the premier flute players of the world, will be the assisting artist at the municipal concert this afternoon at City Hall.

His coming will be hailed with great enthusiasm by all who remember his remarkable work with the orchestra as well as those who may have been privileged to hear him as a flute virtuoso, for he is greatly in demand for concert engagements.

Mr. Laurent is a native of Paris, a graduate of the Paris Conservatory, and known as a solo flutist in all the leading capitals of Europe. He was flutist for Melba and Eva Gauthier in this Country and with Litvinne and Patti abroad. He plays the flute as the average person does not dream that it could possibly be played, and his selections for today are admirably chosen to display the brilliance of his technique, including a concertino by Chaminade for flute and piano and three short numbers.

Municipal Organist Charles R. Cronham will have a thought to the seasonal in his organ program, playing two Christmas selections: Dubois' stately March of the Magi Kings and Yon's more sprightly Christmas in Sicily, where Christmas dawns to the tune of bagpipes played on the hillsides.

Aside from the Christmas selections his featured numbers will be Toccata and Fugue in D Minor of Bach and Liszt's melodious and ever-beloved Liebestraum.

The program in full follows:

Lohengrin ..... Wagner
Procession to the Cathedral.
Moment Musical, Op. 94, No. 3
Arr. Cronham ..... Schubert
Liebestraum ..... Liszt
Concertino for Flute and Piano
..... Chaminade
Mr. Laurent and Howard W. Clark.
Toccata and Fugue in D minor
..... Bach
Two Christmas pieces.
March of the Magi Kings .. Dubois
Christmas in Sicily-tone pic-
..... Yon

TELEGRAM
YOUNGSTOWN, O.
DEC 24 1926

The Boston Symphony orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky will be on the air from WJZ WBZ, WGY and several other stations at 8:10 p. m. Christmas night Explanatory notes on the program will be given by Professor Marshall head of the department of music of Holy Cross college.

First Performances on Program of Boston Symphony Society's Opening Concert Here—Philharmonic Orchestra Back in the Field—Chamber Music Society

N.Y. Evening Post Nov 20

TWO suites from scores of Serge Prokofieff are to have their first performances in New York, in this form, at the opening Boston Symphony concerts of the season here, in Carnegie Hall next week. Serge Koussevitzky will present music from the opera "The Love for Three Oranges" at the Thursday evening performance, and the suite from the ballet "Chout" ("Buffoon") on Saturday afternoon. "The Love for Three Oranges" was produced by the Chicago Opera Company in Chicago on December 30, 1921, and at the Manhattan Opera House in New York on February 14, 1922. The suite is made up of five numbers which have been edited by Albert Spalding. They include "Les Ridicules," "March," "Scherzo," "The Prince and the Princess," and "The Flight."

"Chout," which is numbered opus 21, was originally a ballet in six scenes on a bizarre story on the doings of buffoons. It was produced by Diaghilev's Russian ballet in Paris and in London in 1921. The ballet suite was performed for the first time at Brussels in 1924. This will not be, strictly speaking, the first New York performance of this music, since it was presented at the Neighborhood Playhouse on March 6, 1924. The scenes of the suite include Dance of the Buffoon's Daughters, In the Merchant's Bedroom, the Young Woman Is Turned Into a Goat, and Final Dance. This suite had its first Boston performance at the opening of Koussevitzky's season there on last October 8. Other Thursday numbers will be Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and "Egmont" overture and Respighi's "Pines of Rome." The rest of the Saturday program will be Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Mozarth's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Roussel's "Opera Ballet Suite."

RECORD
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
DEC 2 01926

AMOUNT OF FAN MAIL IS HOOKUM

Superintendent of Station Says That But One Out of 500 Listeners Writes.

After a radio fan has been listening all evening to various stations, and each and every one of these latter have exhorted him to "be sure and write in and tell just how the music got across," he begins to wonder how many people do write in.

The superintendent of broadcasting of WEEI, Boston, Mr. Charles W. Burton, gives some interesting points on fan mail in a special statement printed in the January Radio Broadcast magazine. "When WEEI broadcast the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time, the novelty of th ething attracted to our wavelength about 1,500,000 people," he asys. "This number was estimated from the number of sales of tubes and batteries, and by another way. We are convinced that only one person in every five hundred tuned-in on a program will write a letter to the station about it. Three thousand letters followed the initial Symphony Orchestra broadcast.

"Most stations and program sponsors exaggerate the importance of fan mail," thinks Mr. Burton. "It cannot reflect the attitude of the audience in general; it rarely offers any intelligent criticism, and its requests, if complied with, add to the deadly similitude of programs. Many program sponsors, in order to stimulate letter writing, are offering samples, radio logs, and other articles as an inducement. Of what value to radio, or their campaign, is this? It merely indicates that people like to get something for nothing. It doesn't show whether the program has a popular appeal. Indeed, I have seen letters something like this: 'Your tenor ought to have his throat cut, and obviously your orchestra was organized fifteen minutes before the program opened. Please send me one of your handy bottle openers.' A great many kind listeners do write fine letters to WEEI, however, and we love them for it. We hope their numbers will increase. But we do not hold with the old tradition that fan mail is the very blood of the broadcasting industry."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH
NOV 21 1926

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York season next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at 8:30 and 2:30, in Carnegie Hall.

At the Thursday concert Serge Koussevitzky will present Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3, which will be preceded by the same composer's overture to "Egmont." A score which is to have its first New York performance in its symphonic version is the suite from Prokofieff's Opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." The movements include "Les Ridicules," "March," "Scherzo," "The Prince and the Princess," and "The Flight." The program will end with Respighi's symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," in which the song of the nightingale is introduced by means of a phonographic record.

The matinee program will have as its symphony the fifth of Beethoven in C minor. There will be two novelties—the suite from Roussel's opera-ballet, "Padmavati," and a suite from Prokofieff's ballet, "Chout" ("Buffoon"). The program will be opened with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," a serenade for string orchestra.

"Prokofieff's opera, from which his suite is derived, is based on Gozzi's satirical fairy play, which might well excite the imagination of an ycomposer," said Philip Hale, critic of the Boston Herald, last week.

"A remarkable man this Serge Prokofieff, to us the most original, the most imaginative, and the best equipped composer now creating music. With the hearing of each work by him our admiration for him waxes stronger.

"There is no need in this instance of restating the old saw: 'This music is for the stage and suffers when it is transferred to the concert hall,' for the movements are interesting; yes, delightful, as absolute music. They are not only brilliantly and, often, surprisingly orchestrated; they have original musical ideas, now impressive by their force, now giving great pleasure by their indisputable and peculiar beauty, as in the slow movement where the beauty of thought and expression is most poetic, a type of beauty that has not been revealed in other modern compositions now known to us. In the wilder passages there is no extravagance for the sake of making the bourgeois sit up.

Koussevitzky Offers Sibelius Symphony

Musical Digest Dec 2.

Boston Audience Is Pleased With Composition.

Boston, Mass., Dec. 17.—The eighth concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, took place on the afternoon of December 10, in Symphony Hall. The program included the C. P. E. Bach Concerto in D major, Stravinsky's Suite from the Firebird, Sibelius's Seventh Symphony, heard for the first time here, and Finlandia.

In the critical opinion of Mr. Hale of the Herald, "one does not, in the seventh symphony "find the freshness, the wild charm, the tragic and sinister darkness associated with much of Sibelius's music. It is scholarly rather than spontaneous, nor do the themes have the former distinction and personal quality.

To Mr. Smith of the Post—"music such as this not only merits but demands a rehearing, and Mr. Koussevitzky should afford it. In yesterday's audience there were enough who felt its power and mastery, its sober eloquence and grave beauty, to make a fair show of enthusiasm, though it was plain that the noisy obviousness of Finlandia, played with amazing brilliance, was more to the liking of the majority."

NEW YORK
BROOKLYN EAGLE

NOV 19 1926

PARIS TO LISTEN IN TEST ACROSS ATLANTIC OCEAN

Special Broadcast From WJZ Chain Scheduled for Tomorrow Night.

The French Government radio Station FL, located in the Eifel Tower in Paris, will endeavor to pick up the sixth of the series of Saturday night concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, broadcast by WBZ and its associated stations and Alexandre Tansman, noted symphony composer, will be one of the most interested listeners of the radio audience when the program goes on the air at 8:10 o'clock Saturday evening, Nov. 20.

Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress," from the ballet. "The Garden of Paradise," has been selected as the opening number on Saturday's symphony program. The young Russian composer has made arrangements with the French Government for Station FL to pick up the signals of the Westinghouse station or WJZ, WGY or WRC, in the Eifel Tower, where he will be stationed so that he may hear the first presentation in America of his composition by the celebrated orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky.

Success Predicted.

In acordance with the cabled arrangements between Tansman and the Symphony management, Nicolai Slonimsky, noted pianist and secretary to Serge Koussevitsky, will take Professor Marshall's place at the microphone to tell the radio audience something of Tansman's work. He will also play a part of the composition on the piano and extend greetings to Tansman in Russian. It is anticipated that success will attend the transmission with WBZ, WJZ and WGY, three of the most powerful stations in America, and that Tansman will receive the message in Paris about 1:10 a.m.

Modern Music.

The other three selections appearing on the program before Beethoven's Fifth Symphony are all examples of modern schools and those interested in the most recent phase of musical development will revel in this part of the program. Between the various numbers Professor Marshall will tell his listeners something about each of the composers. He will devote the entire intermission to a talk on Beethoven's style and an analysis of the Fifth Symphony. Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will assist Professor Marshall in his musical illustrations.

The program will come to listeners through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM
DEC 19 1926

Boston Symphony Concert Series on Tuesday Afternoons

Attention is called to the new series of five, Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians, in Symphony hall, Boston, as a splendid opportunity for out-of-town subscribers to enjoy the Boston Symphony orchestra under its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

This series, instituted last year, will be given on five Tuesday afternoons beginning Nov. 30. Since the concerts begin at 2:30 promptly and never last later than 5 P. M. they have a very large patronage from the subscribers of outlying towns of Boston.

This Tuesday series is the one remaining opportunity for those who wish to become Symphony subscribers, since the other four series of 62 concerts in greater Boston, are subscribed by the season to the last seat.

Mr. Koussevitzky is dividing the five programs according to the various important national schools of music. The first program on Nov. 30 will be of German music and will include Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. Three, Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's merry pranks," and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

There will be a French pro- including Berlioz' Roman Ca- overture; Debussy's Noc- "Clouds" and "Festivals," Ra- "La Valse," and Franck's Symph- in D minor.

The Russian program will include the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," numbers from Stravinsky's "Fire bird," a suite from Prokofieff's "The love for three oranges," and the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky. The remaining two programs are still to be announced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
AKRON, O.

DEC 25 1926

A co- ... granted Licenses ... were granted ... Those who were: Friday ... Harold M. Tippett, 30, ... Clinton, teacher; Betty L. ... 53 Hillbish av. ... Horace Earl Dobbs, 2 ... rubber worker; Nancy ... E. Park blvd. ... William F. Schueller ... st.; Gladys E. Morton ... av.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
DEC 25 1926

Boston Symphony Opens New York Season Thursday

N.Y. Herald Tribune Nov 21

Koussevitzky Will Present 2 Prokofieff Numbers; Week's Programs of the New York Orchestras

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its third season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will begin its usual series of five Thursday nights and five Saturday afternoons in Carnegie Hall, and five Friday nights at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, this week. Thursday and Friday nights Mr. Koussevitzky's programs will include Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and music from Serge Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." Another Prokofieff novelty will be offered Saturday afternoon, a suite from the ballet "Chout" (Buffoon).

Both Prokofieff works are new here in this form, though the Chicago Opera, during its last New York visit, on February 14, 1922, gave "The Love for Three Oranges," and "Chout" began a run at the Neighborhood Playhouse, Howard Barlow conducting, on March 6, 1924. The suite from "The Love for Three Oranges" is made up of five numbers edited by Albert Spalding.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES UNION
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEC 24 1926

After her debut in New York, Miss Renard was soloist with the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic and the Chicago and St. Louis Orchestras, and just before returning to Germany she made a transcontinental tour in concert with Geraldine Farrar. Rochesterians who have heard Miss Renard are looking forward with keen pleasure to her concert here.

HANDEL, WAGNER, IN BOSTON MUSIC

With Symphonic Suite, "Scheherezade," to Conclude the Orchestral Offering From the Hub

The concert by the Boston Symphony ocrestra which will be broadcast this evening through station WBZ and the chain network under the direction of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, is the most varied, and in many respects, the most interesting thus far in the series, according to Prof John Patten Marshall, who interprets for the radio audience.

Lovers of old music will delight in Handel's concerto, Wagnerians will welcome the performance of the Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," the modernists will receive their portion in the Vaughan Williams Norfolk Rhapsody and everyone will thoroughly enjoy Rimsky-Korsakov's popular symphonic suite, "Scheherezade."

In addition to WBZ, the "key" station, six stations will make this concert available to an audience aggregating millions, WBZ, Boston and Springfield; WJZ, New York; WGY, Schenectady; WFBL, Syracuse; WHAM, Rochester, and WMAK, Buffalo.

Before the program, Prof Marshall will tell the audience something about Vaughan Williams's work, which is performed at this concert for the first time in America, and will illustrate the motives from Isolde's Love-Death. During the intermission he will, with the assistance of Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, illustrate the fascinating melodies of the Scheherezade whi appears in the music as a dream-like vision. Prof Marshall will not analyze this music, for such analysis will not help the listeners; he will confine himself to telling the story and pointing out some of the features of the work which the radio audience should not miss.

The complete program follows:—

Premier Flute Player Today At City Hall

George Laurent Of Boston Symphony Orchestra Assisting Artist

George Laurent
Solo flutist, who will be assisting artist at the municipal concert today.

Georges Laurent, a solo flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one of the premier flute players of the world, will be the assisting artist at the municipal concert this afternoon at City Hall.

His coming will be hailed with great enthusiasm by all who remember his remarkable work with the orchestra as well as those who may have been privileged to hear him as a flute virtuoso, for he is greatly in demand for concert engagements.

Mr. Laurent is a native of Paris, a graduate of the Paris Conservatory, and known as a solo flutist in all the leading capitals of Europe. He was flutist for Melba and Eva Gauthier in this Country and with Litvinne and Patti abroad. He plays the flute as the average person does not dream that it could possibly be played, and his selections for today are admirably chosen to display the brilliance of his technique, including a concertino by Chaminade for flute and piano and three short numbers.

Municipal Organist Charles R. Cronham will have a thought to the seasonal in his organ program, playing two Christmas selections: Dubois' stately March of the Magi Kings and Yon's more sprightly Christmas in Sicily, where Christmas dawns to the tune of bagpipes played on the hillsides.

Aside from the Christmas selections his featured numbers will be Toccata and Fugue in D Minor of Bach and Liszt's melodious and ever-beloved Liebestraum.

The program in full follows:

Lohengrin ..... Wagner
Procession to the Cathedral.
Moment Musical, Op. 94, No. 3
Arr. Cronham ..... Schubert
Liebestraum ..... Liszt
Concertino for Flute and Piano
..... Chaminade
Mr. Laurent and Howard W. Clark.
Toccata and Fugue in D minor
..... Bach
Two Christmas pieces.
March of the Magi Kings .. Dubois
Christmas in Sicily-tone picture ..... Yon
6th Flute solo ..... Demersman
Romance ..... Widor
Badinerie ..... Bach
Mr. Laurent.
Concerto Gregoriano: Finale (Allegro giusto) ..... Yon.

head of the department of music of Holy Cross college.

First Performances on Program of Boston Symphony Society's Opening Concert Here—Philharmonic Orchestra Back in the Field—Chamber Music Society

N.Y. Evening Post Nov 20

Two suites from scores of Serge Prokofieff are to have their first performances in New York, in this form, at the opening Boston Symphony concerts of the season here, in Carnegie Hall next week. Serge Koussevitzky will present music from the opera "The Love for Three Oranges" at the Thursday evening performance, and the suite from the ballet "Chout" ("Buffoon") on Saturday afternoon. "The Love for Three Oranges" was produced by the Chicago Opera Company in Chicago on December 30, 1921, and at the Manhattan Opera House in New York on February 14, 1922. The suite is made up of five numbers which have been edited by Albert Spalding. They include "Les Ridicules," "March," "Scherzo," "The Prince and the Princess," and "The Flight."

"Chout," which is numbered opus 21, was originally a ballet in six scenes on a bizarre story on the doings of buffoons. It was produced by Diaghilev's Russian ballet in Paris and in London in 1921. The ballet suite was performed for the first time at Brussels in 1924. This will not be, strictly speaking, the first New York performance of this music, since it was presented at the Neighborhood Playhouse on March 6, 1924. The scenes of the suite include Dance of the Buffoon's Daughters, In the Merchant's Bedroom, the Young Woman Is Turned Into a Goat, and Final Dance. This suite had its first Boston performance at the opening of Koussevitzky's season there on last October 8. Other Thursday numbers will be Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and "Egmont" overture and Respighi's "Pines of Rome." The rest of the Saturday program will be Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Mozarth's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Roussel's "Opera Ballet Suite."

RECORD
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
DEC 2 01926

AMOUNT OF FAN MAIL IS HOOKUM

Superintendent of Station Says That But One Out of 500 Listeners Writes.

After a radio fan has been listening all evening to various stations, and each and every one of these latter have exhorted him to "be sure and write in and tell just how the music got across," he begins to wonder how many people do write in.

The superintendent of broadcasting of WEEI, Boston, Mr. Charles W. Burton, gives some interesting points on fan mail in a special statement printed in the January Radio Broadcast magazine. "When WEEI broadcast the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time, the novelty of th ething attracted to our wavelength about 1,500,000 people," he asys. "This number was estimated from the number of sales of tubes and batteries, and by another way. We are convinced that only one person in every five hundred tuned-in on a program will write a letter to the station about it. Three thousand letters followed the initial Symphony Orchestra broadcast.

"Most stations and program sponsors exaggerate the importance of fan mail," thinks Mr. Burton. "It cannot reflect the attitude of the audience in general; it rarely offers any intelligent criticism, and its requests, if complied with, add to the deadly similitude of programs. Many program sponsors, in order to stimulate letter writing, are offering samples, radio logs, and other articles as an inducement. Of what value to radio, or their campaign, is this? It merely indicates that people like to get something for nothing. It doesn't show whether the program has a popular appeal. Indeed, I have seen letters something like this: 'Your tenor ought to have his throat cut, and obviously your orchestra was organized fifteen minutes before the program opened. Please send me one of your handy bottle openers.' A great many kind listeners do write fine letters to WEEI, however, and we love them for it. We hope their numbers will increase. But we do not hold with the old tradition that fan mail is the very blood of the broadcasting industry."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH
NOV 21 1926

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York season next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at 8:30 and 2:30, in Carnegie Hall.

At the Thursday concert Serge Koussevitzky will present Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3, which will be preceded by the same composer's overture to "Egmont." A score which is to have its first New York performance in its symphonic version is the suite from Prokofieff's Opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." The movements include "Les Ridicules," "March," "Scherzo," "The Prince and the Princess," and "The Flight." The program will end with Respighi's symphonic poem, "Pines of Rome," in which the song of the nightingale is introduced by means of a phonographic record.

The matinee program will have as its symphony the fifth of Beethoven in C minor. There will be two novelties—the suite from Roussel's opera-ballet, "Padmavati," and a suite from Prokofieff's ballet, "Chout" ("Buffoon"). The program will be opened with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," a serenade for string orchestra.

"Prokofieff's opera, from which his suite is derived, is based on Gozzi's satirical fairy play, which might well excite the imagination of an ycomposer," said Philip Hale, critic of the Boston Herald, last week.

"A remarkable man this Serge Prokofieff, to us the most original, the most imaginative, and the best equipped composer now creating music. With the hearing of each work by him our admiration for him waxes stronger.

"There is no need in this instance of restating the old saw: 'This music is for the stage and suffers when it is transferred to the concert hall,' for the movements are interesting; yes, delightful, as absolute music. They are not only brilliantly and, often, surprisingly orchestrated; they have original musical ideas, now impressive by their force, now giving great pleasure by their indisputable and peculiar beauty, as in the slow movement where the beauty of thought and expression is most poetic, a type of beauty that has not been revealed in other modern compositions now known to us. In the wilder passages there is no extravagance for the sake of making the bourgeois sit up.

Koussevitzky Offers Sibelius Symphony

Musical Digest Dec 2.

Boston Audience Is Pleased With Composition.

Boston, Mass., Dec. 17.—The eighth concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, took place on the afternoon of December 10, in Symphony Hall. The program included the C. P. E. Bach Concerto in D major, Stravinsky's Suite from the Firebird, Sibelius's Seventh Symphony, heard for the first time here, and Finlandia.

In the critical opinion of Mr. Hale of the Herald, "one does not, in the seventh symphony "find the freshness, the wild charm, the tragic and sinister darkness associated with much of Sibelius's music. It is scholarly rather than spontaneous, nor do the themes have the former distinction and personal quality.

To Mr. Smith of the Post—"music such as this not only merits but demands a rehearing, and Mr. Koussevitzky should afford it. In yesterday's audience there were enough who felt its power and mastery, its sober eloquence and grave beauty, to make a fair show of enthusiasm, though it was plain that the noisy obviousness of Finlandia, played with amazing brilliance, was more to the liking of the majority."

TIGHT BINDING

Boston
oncert Back Society

NG FROM ORK
RAPH
V 21 1926

ony Orchestra will York season next d Saturday after-
, in Carnegie Hall.
ncert Serge Kousseethoven's "Eroica" ch will be preceded oser's overture to which is to have its rmance in its sym-
e suite from Proko-
Love for Three ements include "Les
" "Scherzo," "The
rincess," and "The ram will end with c poem, "Pines of song of the nightin-means of a phono-

ram will have as its of Beethoven in C e two novelties—the s opera-ballet, "Pad-te from Prokofieff's uffoon"). The pro-with Mozart's "Eine
" a serenade for a, from which his sed on Gozzi's satiri-

h might well excite n ycomposer," said
the Boston Herald,

n this Serge Prokooriginal, the most best equipped com-music. With the by him our admira-
tronger.
in this instance of : 'This music is for rs when it is trans-hall,' for the move-
ing; yes, delightful,
They are not only en, surprisingly or-ave original musical e by their force, now e by their indisputauty, as in the slow beauty of thought ost poetic, a type of ot been revealed in ositions now known er passages there is the sake of making ky Offers s Symphony est Dec 21 nce Is Pleased omposition.

., Dec. 17.—The this season by the ny Orchestra with zky conducting, took ernoon of December ny Hall. The pro-
the C. P. E. Bach major, Stravinsky's
Firebird, Sibelius's ony, heard for the and Finlandia.
cal opinion of Mr.
erald, "one does not,
symphony "find the wild charm, the tragic rkness associated with ius's music. It is schol-n spontaneous, nor do ve the former distinc-
nal quality.
mith of the Post—s this not only merits a rehearing, and Mr. should afford it. In udience there were felt its power and sober eloquence and to make a fair show
, though it was plain y obviousness of Find with amazing bril-
ore to the liking of the Koussevitzky—Prokofieff—Bartók

MONITOR
NOV 13

SYMPHONY HALL, Boston — Fifth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Nov. 12 and 13, 1926. The program:

Beethoven—
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84
Prokofieff—
Suite from the Opera, "The Love for Three Oranges"
Bartók.....Dance Suite for Orchestra
Brahms—
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98

Prokofieff's Suite was played for the first time in the United States, Bartók's for the first time in Boston. Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," based on Carlo Gozzi's eighteenth-century comedy, was first performed by the Chicago Opera Company nearly five years ago. This Suite, played a year ago in Paris, is in six divisions, representing severally the "Jesters" of the play, the "Scène Infernale," March, Scherzo, the Prince and the Princess, and the Flight of Fata Morgana. We had previously heard from Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston, Prokofieff's Scythian Suite, his Violin Concerto, his Akkadian Incantation, "Sept, Ils Sont Sept." and his third piano Concerto, and had been duly impressed with the composer's powers.

Why did this Suite make less impression? Was it because Prokofieff is not inspired by the comic muse? There is plenty of contrast, a great deal of noise and considerable melodic loveliness in the Suite, but little effect of originality. The Violin Concerto and the Akkadian Incantation smite the listener with a sense of necessity. This suite gives an effect of cerebration, and also, alas, of familiarity. As a whole it is perhaps in direct descent from Rimsky-Korsakoff's musical fairy tales, but other names, too, are called up in memory. The Flight, for example, is distinctly Straussian. The Prince and the Princess obviously have wandered from the Bois de Boulogne into fairyland within quite recent years. And as for the march—it seems incredible, but it is the work of a Russian Sousa. Nevertheless there are moments of great beauty in those Parisian memories, and a lot of real fun in the Scherzo. And who, not having seen and heard the opera, can say that the score is not admirably wedded to the action?

Probably the principal fault of Prokofieff's Suite is a lack of rhythmic vigor and variety. And it was particularly in that respect that Bartók's Suite shone by comparison. Bartók, strangely enough, was new to the programs of this orchestra, and he had been known previously in Boston only by his short piano pieces and his first String Quartet. It was time his orchestral work was introduced. The Dance Suite, played last year in Cincinnati and Chicago, starts under a handicap of suspicion, since it is "occasional" music, composed for a celebration of the fiftieth anniversary in 1923 of the union of the cities of Buda and Pesth. It is significant that the composition overcomes this handicap at once, and bears out in considerable degree the impression of originality given by the previously heard works of the composer.

Bartók, who seems to be a retiring and modest gentleman, has confessed to being influenced by Brahms, Dohnányi, Liszt, Wagner and Strauss. We ought to be glad to have him tell us of this indebtedness, for we should be unlikely to discover it in his work. But most astonishing of all is his statement that after falling under the spell of "Zarathustra" he reverted to Liszt, and presently "acknowledged in him a genius far greater than Wagner's or Strauss's." Certainly a man is "an original" who places Liszt above Wagner. How fortunate it is that his opinions do not affect his work. For nothing could be farther from Liszt than the utterly direct, sincere and straightforward writing of this modern Hungarian. It is mercifully distant from Gypsy tunes, and entirely free from both sentimentality and blatancy.

Like Prokofieff's, Bartók's Suite is divided into six sections, but there the resemblance ends. Bartók's Suite progresses from a Moderato through an Allegro molto to an Allegro vivace; then drops into a Molto tranquillo of exquisitely delicate melodic and harmonic beauty, and slips from a Commodo into a thrilling Finale. A sort of motto serves to connect the sections. Throughout there is material of value, remarkable economy of means in its use, and above all, the vital pulse of vigorous rhythm. There is other music by Bartók for orchestra. Let us hope we shall hear it.

Both these novel pieces were played with great virtuosity by the orchestra, and were received with quite extraordinary calm by the Friday afternoon audience, which much preferred the magnificent distances of Herr Brahms. Why was it that we constantly were thinking, during the Symphony, of "Tannhäuser"? Was it perhaps because the Brahms of 1885 had about caught up with the Wagner of 1850? L. A. S.

MAIL
TORONTO, CAN.
NOV 6 1926

Music in Our Town

If Torontonians have turned their thumbs down and decided that they want no more visits from first rank orchestras, then there is nothing more to be said. Apparently, they have deliberately decided to leave high and dry anybody who brings to the city a costly organization like the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We cannot blame Mr. Norman Withrow if he decides that there are not enough people in the city who care for high class orchestral music to make it possible for him to give us another glorious concert like that which delighted half a house of music lovers, in Massey Hall last Tuesday night. Twice, now, this so-called musical city has failed to support him. Some of us may be hoping that he will take the risk again, but we cannot be at all suprised if he doesn't

The conclusions that we must draw from the neglect of the good orchestras are not very flattering to ourselves as a music centre. It may be that a great many Torontonians are ignorant of the perfections of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and that they are not aware of the interesting personality of Koussevitzky, their really sensational conductor. If that happens to be the case, it is bad enough. But I am inclined to think we have frozen the four outstanding American orchestras out of Toronto because we have not the necessary enthusiasm for orchestral music. If that be true, there is a great deal of magnificant effort being wasted in Toronto. Musicians are giving their talent and a few enthusiasts are giving their time to the planting of a great deal of seed on rocky soil. Instead of having a really discriminating musical public that could miss anything rather than a high class orchestra concert, we are still at the stage where there is a great deal of spade work to be done. There is no hungry public waiting in this city for an opportunity to hear orchestral music. The real enthusiasts number about two thousand, and that of course is not enough. These comments on the musical taste of Toronto are not intended to discourage the men and women whose labors have made the New Symphony Orchestra possible. But they must face facts. Apparently they have a great deal of educational work to do before Toronto can possess a hungry group of music lovers who will demand at least the annual visit from the Boston, New York, Philharmonic and Philadelphia Orchestras. The task before the New Symphony band is all the more difficult because of that lack of appreciation of orchestral music, and the only possible comfort to them is that the lamentable fact makes their labors all the more valuable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING POST
NOV 13 1926

FOUR works new to New York and a Stravinsky revival will make up the program of the second concert this season by the League of Composers next week. They will be performed under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, who appears by courtesy of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will build an ensemble of men chosen from that organization. It will be the second time that the conductor appears under any auspices other than those of the Boston Symphony, the first having been the League of Composers' concert led by him last year.

The program includes two works which will be heard for the first time anywhere, Bela Bartok's "Village Scenes," the latest from his pen, written especially for the league on a commission undertaken two years ago, and Louis Gruenberg's "Creation," a setting to the poem of that name by James Weldon Johnson, which was finished last year. Bartok's work is for chamber orchestra and four female voices; the latter will be interpreted by the Brahms Vocal Quartet. Gruenberg's work is for an instrumental ensemble and a singer, who, for this evening, will be Julius Bledsoe, the negro baritone, late of "Deep River."

The fifth work consists of two movements from Hans Krasa's Chamber Symphony, a pastorale and marche, which were also heard at the Zurich festival, where the ingenious orchestral invention of the young composer—he is only twenty-nine—won him considerable recognition.

Four Masterpieces and a Novelty in Symphony Programme

PROV. JOURNAL NOV 21

Written for the Sunday Journal
By WARREN STOREY SMITH.

Four acknowledged masterpieces stand on the programme that Mr. Koussevitzky has prepared for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening. Of the fifth, the suite drawn from Albert Roussel's oriental opera-ballet "Padmavati," it may only be said that time has yet to decide the place that this and other works from this singular French composer are to occupy in the world's music. At least Roussel is no stealer of other men's thunder. His voice is his own. He is beyond disputing a master-craftsman, and his long sojourn in the Orient has endowed him with the authority to treat in music of an Eastern subject. This music from "Padmavati" is exotic, but hardly in the conventional exotic manner: not for Roussel are the stock tricks of "oriental colors" that every tyro composer now has at his fingerends. The separate numbers of this suite, not hitherto played in Providence, are the Prelude to Act 1: "Danse guerriere" and "Danse des Femmes Esclaves."

So much for the novelty of the evening. The masterpieces, all familiar music, are Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," last played by the Boston Orchestra in Providence at a concert of the Music League May 23, 1924, but unheard at the regular series of concerts since November, 1917, and that composer's "Eroica" Symphony, last played in Providence just five years ago, in November, 1921, together with Wagner's Preludes to "Lohengrin" and to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," heard here more recently, the former in April, 1925, the latter no longer ago than last March.

Like Wagner's "Ring" and Berlioz's "Frantasite" Symphony, Beethoven's "Eroica" is one of those scores for which there was no precedent, whose coming no earlier work by the same or any other composer might have foretold. The third of Beethoven's symphonies, the "Eroica" is almost as far removed from its two predecessors as it is from the most important symphonies of Mozart or of Haydn, and as with other compositions of a revolutionary character, the "Eroica" was not understood by its first hearers. More than one commentator expressed the hope that Beethoven would revert to his earlier and simpler style.

Except, however, for its essential vigor and a certain heroic utterance that Beethoven's predecessors hard not commanded, the opening of this "Eroica" could scarcely have surprised that Viennese audience of 1804. Indeed, the chief theme of the first movement bears an almost note-for-note resemblance to a melody in a youthful opera of Mozart's "Bastien and Bastienne," and while somewhat bolder in outline and in harmony, the second and the closing subjects were hardly radical. But once his exposition is behind him and Beethoven is fairly launched upon the development section the boldness, the titanic strength that were a new voice in symphonic music make themselves felt. Mark those loud and clamorous chords that even to-day sound stridently dissonant! And what harmonic audacity is shown in that hushed passage just before the reprise of the first section when, under a violin tremolo A-flat and B-flat a horn intones the E-flat, G, E-flat, B-flat of the chief theme, virtually an instance of polyharmony and as such perhaps the first of its kind.

The "Eroica" was, and is still, a symphony of large dimensions, and the coda to the first movement was of unheard-of length. Nor is the suceeding Funeral March exactly laconic. In so extended a threnody a lesser composer might easily achieve a sort of lugurious monotony. Not so Beethoven. To the mournful yet impressive first section there succeeds a trio that breathes consolation. The march returns: its themes undergo development and the mood changes from that of lamentation to one of heroic proclamation, almost of exultation. Then by way of coda the funeral march proper is heard once again.

Less significant than the other movements the Scherzo is nevertheless a fine example of its particular species, and the bold horn fanfares of the trio are still stirring to hear.

Of singular construction is the Finale, a set of variations in which the bass is announced and twice varied before the melody itself appears. These variations are exceedingly free in form. Much use is made of the fugal style of treatment, and toward the end there is a sonorous and uplifting proclamation of the chief melody.

The "Eroica," as is generally known, was originally dedicated to Napoleon, but when his idol had himself crowned emperor, Beethoven in disgust erased the dedication.

Also in heroic vein is the Overture to "Egmont," Goethe's drama of the great patriot of the Netherlands. Here in the introduction we may hear the lamentations of a proud people oppressed by the tyrannous yoke of Spain, while the Allegro may be taken as a portrait of Egmont himself and the coda is a paean of triumphant rejoicing.

It was Beethoven who, through his Overtures to "Egmont," Coriolanus and "Leonore," showed Wagner how to condense a drama into a few moments of instrumental music. Such an epitome is the glorious Prelude to the "Mastersingers." In it we hear first the music of the worthy burghers themselves. then Walther is introduced by the melody of his prize song. There is the conflict of these opposing forces the hostile carping of Beckmesser, symbol for Wagner's own critics, is heralded by a shrill caricature of the mastersinger-motive. In the end comes reconciliation and jubilation.

The beautiful "Lohengrin" Prelude, on the other hand, is simple in design. A single poetic idea dominates it—the descent from heaven to earth and the reascending to the heights of a company of angels bearing the Holy Grail. And thus the music, beginning in the ethereal tones of divided violins, gradually swells to the full-toned voice of the whole orchestra, then diminishes, to end as it began.

WARREN STOREY SMITH.

THIS CLIPPING FROM EXPRESS
PORTLAND, ME.
DEC 16 1926

Solo Flutist To Assist At Organ Program

Georges Laurent Of The Boston Symphony In Sunday Recital

"Fullest and richest of all the flute players."

Such is Philip Hale's description of Georges Laurent, solo flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will appear as assisting artist at the municipal concert on Sunday.

Mr. Laurent, first out of state artist to appear on the municipal concert programs this season and the precursor, it is said, of a brilliant group who will make the series of winter concerts memorable, is probably one of the world's greatest flutists, and is considered the most accomplished musician who ever played that instrument in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For two years Mr. Laurent was flutist for Frieda Hempel and Eva Gauthier in this Country, and abroad he has been flutist for such distinguished artists as Melba, Litvinne, Demougeot and Patti.

He has toured Europe as a flute virtuoso and the plaudits which have been accorded him have been many.

Mr. Laurent will present a concertino for flute and piano with Howard W. Clark as accompanist on Sunday, and will also give a group of three flute selections.

Municipal Organist Charles R. Cronham will present a brilliant and delightful program, opening with Procession to the Cathedral from Wagner's Lohengrin.

His featured selections will be Toccata and Fugue in D Minor by Bach and two Christmas selections: March of the Magi Kings by Dubois, and Yon's attractive and colorful picture of Christmas under a warmer sun, Christmas in Sicily.

NEW YORK
BROOKLYN EAGLE
DEC 19

WE hastened to assure this gentleman that few major cities of the United States enjoyed a more comprehensive or satisfactory musical program than that of Brooklyn. There were, we pointed out, the sixteen concerts given by the Philharmonic Society, the Symphony Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We recalled to our questioner the fact that we had heard in a Brooklyn season the conducting of Mengelberg, Toscanini, Furtwaengler, Koussewitsky, Damrosch and Klemperer; that, during the ten performances of opera given at the Academy by the Metropolitan Opera Company, we had heard Mmes. Jeritza, Rethberg, Ponselle, Aida, Talley, Galli-Curci, Larsen-Todsen, Branzell, Matzenauer, Mueller, Easton, Mario and Messrs. Gigli, Martinelli, Lauri-Volpi, Laubenthal, Scotti, Chaliapin, Ruffo Tibbett, Whitehill, Bender, Bohnen, Schorr and many others. We counted off the operas that we could remember having heard at the Academy during the past few seasons—"Die Meistersinger," "Die Walkure," "Lohengrin," "Tannhauser," "Die Zauberfloete," "Falstaff," "Tosca," "Boheme," "Cena delle Beffe," "Boris," "Faust," "Rigoletto," "Aida," "Lucia di Lammermoor," "Dinorah," "Der Rosenkavalier" and many others. Then, there were recitals. Who had played or sung in Brooklyn? Those we mentioned were Geraldine Farrar, Maria Jeritza, Fritz Kreisler, Roland Hayes, Sergi Rachmaninoff, Paderewski, Jascha Heifetz, Josef Hofmann, Efrem Zimbalist, Felix Salmond, Pablo Casals, John McCormack, Reinald Werrenrath, Feodor Chaliapin. Doubtless there were others. We could not be expected to recall without the omission of an event the musical biography of the boro in a brief fifteen minutes of intermission between Kaminski's "Concerto Grosso" and Strauss' "Don Quixote." And that reminded our acquaintance—what did the orchestras play for their Brooklyn public? The usual symphonies, the music of Strauss and Strawinsky, Debussy and Ravel, novelties by Prokofieff, Respighi, Honegger, Copland, De Falla and other of the modernists. It was, we thought, comprehensive enough. Aside perhaps from Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago and one or two other cities, where, away from New York, would it be possible to hear so much good music?

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 13 1926

PROGRAMME FOR SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT CHANGED

Numbers to Include Work of Beethoven, Wagner and Roussel.

A change in the programme originally planned for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the E. F. Albee Theatre, on Tuesday evening, Nov. 23, has just been announced by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.

As revised, the programme will be divided between the music of Beethoven, Wagner and Roussel. Beethoven's "Eroica," Symphony No. 3, one of the mightiest of the immortal nine, will be the principal score and will be introduced by the same composer's overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont."

The second portion of the concert will include a notable novelty, the suite from "Padmavati," the opera ballet by Roussel, the noted French composer, besides two Wagnerian excerpts. These will be the prelude to "Lohengrin," considered one of Koussevitsky's most admirable interpretations, and for a brilliant finale, the prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg."

A critical discussion of this programme will appear in the Providence Journal next Wednesday.

TIGHT BINDING

Boston
Concert
Back Society

NG FROM YORK
RAPH
V 21 1926

hony Orchestra will York season next nd Saturday after-
30, in Carnegie Hall.
oncert Serge Kousse-Beethoven's "Eroica" hich will be preceded poser's overture to which is to have its formance in its symhe suite from Prokohe Love for Three vements include "Les
," "Scherzo," "The
Princess," and "The gram will end with nic poem, "Pines of e song of the nightinby means of a phono-

gram will have as its h of Beethoven in C be two novelties—the
's opera-ballet, "Paduite from Prokofieff's Buffoon"). The prod with Mozart's "Eine k," a serenade for era, from which his based on Gozzi's satiriich might well excite an ycomposer," said of the Boston Herald, han this Serge Proko-ost original, the most e best equipped com-g music. With the k by him our admirastronger.

ed in this instance of aw: 'This music is for ffers when it is trans-ert hall,' for the moveesting; yes, delightful, d. They are not only often, surprisingly or-have original musical sive by their force, now sure by their indisput-beauty, as in the slow the beauty of thought most poetic, a type of not been revealed in mpositions now known ilder passages there is for the sake of making up.

tzky Offers us Symphony gest Dec 21
dience Is Pleased Composition.

lass., Dec. 17.—The rt this season by the phony Orchestra with vitzky conducting, took afternoon of December hony Hall. The pro-
ed the C. P. E. Bach
D major, Stravinsky's the Firebird, Sibelius's mphony, heard for the re, and Finlandia.
ritical opinion of Mr.
Herald, "one does not,
nth symphony "find the he wild charm, the tragic darkness associated with ibelius's music. It is schol-than spontaneous, nor do have the former distincersonal quality.
. Smith of the Post—ch as this not only merits nds a rehearing, and Mr.
zky should afford it. In audience there were who felt its power and its sober eloquence and uty, to make a fair show iasm, though it was plain noisy obviousness of Finlayed with amazing bril-
as more to the liking of the
"

Koussevitzky—Prokofieff—Bartók

Monitor Nov 13

SYMPHONY HALL, Boston — Fifth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Nov. 12 and 13, 1926. The program:

Beethoven—
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84
Prokofieff—
Suite from the Opera, "The Love for Three Oranges"
Bartók.....Dance Suite for Orchestra
Brahms—
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98

Prokofieff's Suite was played for the first time in the United States, Bartók's for the first time in Boston. Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," based on Carlo Gozzi's eighteenth-century comedy, was first performed by the Chicago Opera Company nearly five years ago. This Suite, played a year ago in Paris, is in six divisions, representing severally the "Jesters" of the play, the "Scène Infernale," March, Scherzo, the Prince and the Princess, and the Flight of Fata Morgana. We had previously heard from Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston, Prokofieff's Scythian Suite, his Violin Concerto, his Akkadian Incantation, "Sept, Ils Sont Sept." and his third piano Concerto, and had been duly impressed with the composer's powers.

Why did this Suite make less impression? Was it because Prokofieff is not inspired by the comic muse? There is plenty of contrast, a great deal of noise and considerable melodic loveliness in the Suite, but little effect of originality. The Violin Concerto and the Akkadian Incantation smite the listener with a sense of necessity. This suite gives an effect of cerebration, and also, alas, of familiarity. As a whole it is perhaps in direct descent from Rimsky-Korsakoff's musical fairy tales, but other names, too, are called up in memory. The Flight, for example, is distinctly Straussian. The Prince and the Princess obviously have wandered from the Bois de Boulogne into fairyland within quite recent years. And as for the march—it seems incredible, but it is the work of a Russian Sousa. Nevertheless there are moments of great beauty in those Parisian memories, and a lot of real fun in the Scherzo. And who, not having seen and heard the opera, can say that the score is not admirably wedded to the action?

Probably the principal fault of Prokofieff's Suite is a lack of rhythmic vigor and variety. And it was particularly in that respect that Bartók's Suite shone by comparison. Bartók, strangely enough, was new to the programs of this orchestra, and he had been known previously in Boston only by his short piano pieces and his first String Quartet. It was time his orchestral work was introduced. The Dance Suite, played last year in Cincinnati and Chicago, starts under a handicap of suspicion, since it is "occasional" music, composed for a celebration of the fiftieth anniversary in 1923 of the union of the cities of Buda and Pesth. It is significant that the composition overcomes this handicap at once, and bears out in considerable degree the impression of originality given by the previously heard works of the composer.

Bartók, who seems to be a retiring and modest gentleman, has confessed to being influenced by Brahms, Dohnányi, Liszt, Wagner and Strauss. We ought to be glad to have him tell us of this indebtedness, for we should be unlikely to discover it in his work. But most astonishing of all is his statement that after falling under the spell of "Zarathustra" he reverted to Liszt, and presently "acknowledged in him a genius far greater than Wagner's or Strauss's." Certainly a man is "an original" who places Liszt above Wagner. How fortunate it is that his opinions do not affect his work. For nothing could be farther from Liszt than the utterly direct, sincere and straightforward writing of this modern Hungarian. It is mercifully distant from Gypsy tunes, and entirely free from both sentimentality and blatancy.

Like Prokofieff's, Bartók's Suite is divided into six sections, but there the resemblance ends. Bartók's Suite progresses from a Moderato through an Allegro molto to an Allegro vivace; then drops into a Molto tranquillo of exquisitely delicate melodic and harmonic beauty, and slips from a Commodo into a thrilling Finale. A sort of motto serves to connect the sections. Throughout there is material of value, remarkable economy of means in its use, and above all, the vital pulse of vigorous rhythm. There is other music by Bartók for orchestra. Let us hope we shall hear it.

Both these novel pieces were played with great virtuosity by the orchestra, and were received with quite extraordinary calm by the Friday afternoon audience, which much preferred the magnificent distances of Herr Brahms. Why was it that we constantly were thinking, during the Symphony, of "Tannhäuser"? Was it perhaps because the Brahms of 1885 had about caught up with the Wagner of 1850? L. A. S.

MAIL
TORONTO, CAN.
NOV 6 1926

Music in Our Town

If Torontonians have turned their thumbs down and decided that they want no more visits from first rank orchestras, then there is nothing more to be said. Apparently, they have deliberately decided to leave high and dry anybody who brings to the city a costly organization like the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We cannot blame Mr. Norman Withrow if he decides that there are not enough people in the city who care for high class orchestral music to make it possible for him to give us another glorious concert like that which delighted half a house of music lovers, in Massey Hall last Tuesday night. Twice, now, this so-called musical city has failed to support him. Some of us may be hoping that he will take the risk again, but we cannot be at all suprised if he doesn't.

The conclusions that we must draw from the neglect of the good orchestras are not very flattering to ourselves as a music centre. It may be that a great many Torontonians are ignorant of the perfections of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and that they are not aware of the interesting personality of Koussevitzky, their really sensational conductor. If that happens to be the case, it is bad enough. But I am inclined to think we have frozen the four outstanding American orchestras out of Toronto because we have not the necessary enthusiasm for orchestral music. If that be true, there is a great deal of magnificant effort being wasted in Toronto. Musicians are giving their talent and a few enthusiasts are giving their time to the planting of a great deal of seed on rocky soil. Instead of having a really discriminating musical public that would miss anything rather than a high class orchestra concert, we are still at the stage where there is a great deal of spade work to be done. There is no hungry public waiting in this city for an opportunity to hear orchestral music. The real enthusiasts number about two thousand, and that of course is not enough. These comments on the musical taste of Toronto are not intended to discourage the men and women whose labors have made the New Symphony Orchestra possible. Still, they must face facts. Apparently, they have a great deal of educational work to do before Toronto will possess a hungry group of music lovers who will demand at least an annual visit from the Boston, New York, Philharmonic and Philadelphia Orchestras. The task before the New Symphony band is all the more difficult because of that lack of appreciation of orchestral music, and the only possible comfort to them is that the lamentable fact makes their labors all the more valuable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING POST
NOV 13 1926

FOUR works new to New York and a Stravinsky revival will make up the program of the second concert this season by the League of Composers next week. They will be performed under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, who appears by courtesy of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will lend an ensemble of men chosen from that organization. It will be the second time that the conductor appears under any auspices other than those of the Boston Symphony, the first having been the League of Composers' concert led by him last year.

The program includes two works, which will be heard for the first time anywhere, Bela Bartok's "Village Scenes," the latest from his pen, written especially for the league on a commission undertaken two years ago, Louis Gruenberg's "Creation," a set to the poem of that name by Weldon Johnson, which was last year. Bartok's work is for ber orchestra and four female the latter will be interpreted Brahms Vocal Quartet. Gru work is for an instrumental and a singer, who, for this even be Julius Bledsoe, the negro tate of "Deep River."

The fifth work consists of two ments from Hans Krasa's Cha Symphony, a pastorale and ma which were also heard at the Festival, where the ingenious orch vention of the young compose only twenty-nine—won him siderable recognition.

Four Masterpieces and a Novelty in Symphony Programme

Prov. Journal Nov 21

Written for the Sunday Journal
By WARREN STOREY SMITH.

Four acknowledged masterpieces stand on the programme that Mr. Koussevitzky has prepared for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening. Of the fifth, the suite drawn from Albert Roussel's oriental opera-ballet "Padmavati," it may only be said that time has yet to decide the place that this and other works from this singular French composer are to occupy in the world's music. At least Roussel is no stealer of other men's thunder. His voice is his own. He is beyond disputing a master-craftsman, and his long sojourn in the Orient has endowed him with the authority to treat in music of an Eastern subject. This music from "Padmavati" is exotic, but hardly in the conventional exotic manner: not for Roussel are the stock tricks of "oriental colors" that every tyro composer now has at his fingerends. The separate numbers of this suite, not hitherto played in Providence, are the Prelude to Act 1: "Danse guerriere" and "Danse des Femmes Esclaves."

So much for the novelty of the evening. The masterpieces, all familiar music, are Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," last played by the Boston Orchestra in Providence at a concert of the Music League May 23, 1924, but unheard at the regular series of concerts since November, 1917, and that composer's "Eroica" Symphony, last played in Providence just five years ago, in November, 1921, together with Wagner's Preludes to "Lohengrin" and to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," heard here more recently, the former in April, 1925, the latter no longer ago than last March.

Like Wagner's "Ring" and Berlioz's "Frantasitc" Symphony, Beethoven's "Eroica" is one of those scores for which there was no precedent, whose coming no earlier work by the same or any other composer might have foretold. The third of Beethoven's symphonies, the "Eroica" is almost as far removed from its two predecessors as it is from the most important symphonies of Mozart or of Haydn, and as with other compositions of a revolutionary character, the "Eroica" was not understood by its first hearers. More than one commentator expressed the hope that Beethoven would revert to his earlier and simpler style.

Except, however, for its essential vigor and a certain heroic utterance that Beethoven's predecessors hard not commanded, the opening of this "Eroica" could scarcely have surprised that Viennese audience of 1804. Indeed, the chief theme of the first movement bears an almost note-for-note resemblance to a melody in a youthful opera of Mozart's "Bastien and Bastienne," and while somewhat bolder in outline and in harmony, the second and the closing subjects were hardly radical. But once his exposition is behind him and Beethoven is fairly launched upon the development section the boldness, the titanic strength that were a new voice in symphonic music make themselves felt. Mark those loud and clamorous chords that even to-day sound stridently dissonant! And what harmonic audacity is shown in that hushed passage just before the reprise of the first section when, under a violin tremolo A-flat and B-flat a horn intones the E-flat, G, E-flat, B-flat of the chief theme, virtually an instance of polyharmony and as such perhaps the first of its kind.

The "Eroica" was, and is still, a symphony of large dimensions, and the coda to the first movement was of unheard-of length. Nor is the suceeding Funeral March exactly laconic. In so extended a threnody a lesser composer might easily achieve a sort of lugurious monotony. Not so Beethoven. To the mournful yet impressive first section there suceceeds a trio that breathes consolation. The march returns: its themes undergo development and the mood changes from that of lamentation to one of heroic proclamation, almost of exultation. Then by way of coda the funeral march proper is heard once again.

Less significant than the other movements, the Scherzo is nevertheless a fine example of its particular species, and the bold horn fanfares of the trio are still stirring to hear.

Of singular construction is the Finale, a set of variations in which the bass is announced and twice varied before the melody itself appears. These variations are exceedingly free in form. Much use is made of the fugal style of treatment, and toward the end there is a sonorous and uplifting proclamation of the chief melody.

The "Eroica," as is generally known, was originally dedicated to Napoleon, but when his idol had himself crowned emperor, Beethoven in disgust erased the dedication.

Also in heroic vein is the Overture to "Egmont," Goethe's drama of the great patriot of the Netherlands. Here in the introduction we may hear the lamentations of a proud people oppressed by the tyrannous yoke of Spain, while the Allegro may be taken as a portrait of Egmont himself and the coda is a paean of triumphant rejoicing.

It was Beethoven who, through his Overtures to "Egmont," Coriolanus and "Leonore," showed Wagner how to condense a drama into a few moments of instrumental music. Such an epitome is the glorious Prelude to the "Mastersingers." In it we hear first the music of the worthy burghers themselves, then Walther is introduced by the melody of his prize song. There is the conflict of these opposing forces the hostile carping of Beckmesser, symbol for Wagner's own critics, is heralded by a shrill caricature of the mastersinger-motive. In the end comes reconciliation and jubilation.

The beautiful "Lohengrin" Prelude, on the other hand, is simple in design. A single poetic idea dominates it—the descent from heaven to earth and the reascending to the heights of a company of angels bearing the Holy Grail. And thus the music, beginning in the ethereal tones of divided violins, gradually swells to the full-toned voice of the whole orchestra, then diminishes, to end as it began.

WARREN STOREY SMITH.

NEW YORK
EVENING POST
NOV 13 1926

FOR its third concert in Carnegie Hall on Tuesday evening the Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of Leopold Stokowski will play a program composed entirely of compositions by Johann Sebastian Bach. It comprises three Brandenburg concertos, the first, in F, for solo violin, three oboes, bassoon, two horns and strings; the second, also in F, for solo violin, flute, oboe, trumpets and strings; and the third, in G, for three violins, three violas, three 'cellos and double bass; the choral-prelude, "Aus der Tiefe rufe ich," and an orchestral version of the Toccata and Fugue in D minor.

Two scores of Serge Prokofieff will be performed by Serge Koussevitsky at the opening of the New York season of Boston Symphony Concerts, in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 25 and 27. These will be a suite from the ballet "Chout," which is then to be heard for the first time in New York, in full orchestral performance, and a suite from the opera "The Love of Three Oranges."

THIS CLIPPING FROM EXPRESS
PORTLAND, ME.
DEC 16 1926

49

Solo Flutist To Assist At Organ Program

Georges Laurent Of The Boston Symphony In Sunday Recital

"Fullest and richest of all the flute players."

Such is Philip Hale's description of Georges Laurent, solo flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will appear as assisting artist at the municipal concert on Sunday.

Mr. Laurent, first out of state artist to appear on the municipal concert programs this season and the precursor, it is said, of a brilliant group who will make the series of winter concerts memorable, is probably one of the world's greatest flutists, and is considered the most accomplished musician who ever played that instrument in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For two years Mr. Laurent was flutist for Frieda Hempel and Eva Gauthier in this Country, and abroad he has been flutist for such distinguished artists as Melba, Litvinne, Demougeot and Patti.

He has toured Europe as a flute virtuoso and the plaudits which have been accorded him have been many.

Mr. Laurent will present a concertino for flute and piano with Howard W. Clark as accompanist on Sunday, and will also give a group of three flute selections.

Municipal Organist Charles R. Cronham will present a brilliant and delightful program, opening with Procession to the Cathedral from Wagner's Lohengrin.

His featured selections will be Toccata and Fugue in D Minor by Bach and two Christmas selections: March of the Magi Kings by Dubois, and Yon's attractive and colorful picture of Christmas under a warmer sun, Christmas in Sicily.

NEW YORK
BROOKLYN EAGLE
DEC 19

WE hastened to assure this gentleman that few major cities of the United States enjoyed a more comprehensive or satisfactory musical program than that of Brooklyn. There were, we pointed out, the sixteen concerts given by the Philharmonic Society, the Symphony Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We recalled to our questioner the fact that we had heard in a Brooklyn season the conducting of Mengelberg, Toscanini, Furtwaengler, Koussewitsky, Damrosch and Klemperer; that, during the ten performances of opera given at the Academy by the Metropolitan Opera Company, we had heard Mmes. Jeritza, Rethberg, Ponselle, Alda, Talley, Galli-Curci, Larsen-Todsen, Branzell, Matzenauer, Mueller, Easton, Mario and Messrs. Gigli, Martinelli, Lauri-Volpi, Laubenthal, Scotti, Chaliapin, Ruffo Tibbett, Whitehill, Bender, Bohnen, Schorr and many others. We counted off the operas that we could remember having heard at the Academy during the past few seasons—"Die Meistersinger," "Die Walkure," "Lohengrin," "Tannhauser," "Die Zauberfloete," "Falstaff," "Tosca," "Boheme," "Cena delle Beffe," "Boris," "Faust," "Rigoletto," "Aida," "Lucia di Lammermoor," "Dinorah," "Der Rosenkavalier" and many others. Then, there were recitals. Who had played or sung in Brooklyn? Those we mentioned were Geraldine Farrar, Maria Jeritza, Fritz Kreisler, Roland Hayes, Sergi Rachmaninoff, Paderewski, Jascha Heifetz, Josef Hofmann, Efrem Zimbalist, Felix Salmond, Pablo Casals, John McCormack, Reinald Werrenrath, Feodor Chaliapin. Doubtless there were others. We could not be expected to recall without the omission of an event the musical biography of the boro in a brief fifteen minutes of intermission between Kaminski's "Concerto Grosso" and Strauss' "Don Quixote." And that reminded our acquaintance—what did the orchestras play for their Brooklyn public? The usual symphonies, the music of Strauss and Strawinsky, Debussy and Ravel, novelties by Prokofieff, Respighi, Honegger, Copland, De Falla and other of the modernists. It was, we thought, comprehensive enough. Aside perhaps from Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago and one or two other cities, where, away from New York, would it be possible to hear so much good music?

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 13 1926

PROGRAMME FOR SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT CHANGED

Numbers to Include Work of Beethoven, Wagner and Roussel.

A change in the programme originally planned for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the E. F. Albee Theatre, on Tuesday evening, Nov. 23, has just been announced by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.

As revised, the programme will be divided between the music of Beethoven, Wagner and Roussel. Beethoven's "Eroica," Symphony No. 3, one of the mightiest of the immortal nine, will be the principal score and will be introduced by the same composer's overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont."

The second portion of the concert will include a notable novelty, the suite from "Padmavati," the opera ballet by Roussel, the noted French composer, besides two Wagnerian excerpts. These will be the prelude to "Lohengrin," considered one of Koussevitsky's most admirable interpretations, and, for a brilliant finale, the prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg."

A critical discussion of this programme will appear in the Providence Journal next Wednesday.

NEW YORK WORLD
DEC 261926

Notes Of Three Orchestras

Before Walter Damrosch lays down his baton to be taken up, as per schedule, by Otto Klemperer, and Willem Mengelberg, on Jan. 9, gives way to Arturo Toscanini, some caviar in the line of symphonies and orchestral suites will be served patrons of the respective orchestras over which these gentlemen officiate. Moreover, Serge Koussevitzky, with his Boston organization, is to add to our busy musical midst characterisaic programs of his own a week hence.

Jan Sibelius, Finnish composer, is the lion of two of these ensembles. Also, as a musical morsel of highly delectable flavor, Dusolina Giannini, now happily among us, will display her voice and presence in solo sumptuousness Thursday with Walter Damrosch at Carnegie Hall.

The new Sibelius work Mr. Damrosch will present this afternoon at Mecca Temple is "Tapiola," title of his new tone poem. It was especially composed on invitation of the Symphony Society and is written to a program for which this, according to Dr. Damrosch, is the motto:

"Widespread they stand, the
Northland's dusky forests,
Ancient, mysterious, brooding
savage dreams;
Within them dwells the Forest's
mighty God,
And wood-sprites in the gloom
weave magic secrets."

Before and after this premier, George Gershwin will play his own "Concerto in F" and the orchestra, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The Sibelius poem will be repeated Thursday afternoon at Carnegie Hall by the Symphony Society when Miss Giannini will appear as soloist, singing Elizabeth's air from "Tannhauser" and an aria from Tchaikowsky's "Jeanne d'Arc." Brahms's Symphony No. 2 in D and Straus's "Emperor" waltz complete the musicale.

Willem Mengelberg, in the last two weeks of his appearances this season is conductor of the Philharmonic

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
DEC 31 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky's Paris concerts are reported the principal musical events of the season of the French metropolis. The first of the annual spring series of Concerts Koussevitzky takes place in the Paris opera house. Serge Koussevitzky conducts his own orchestra which he assembled every summer and which he directs in the interval at the conclusion of his seasons with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

A feature of the first Paris concert was the introduction of Aaron Copeland's "Music for the Theater," which Koussevitzky gave its first American performances last season. The young Brooklyn composer was called to the stage and warmly applauded by the audience, which filled to overflowing the historic auditorium. The program likewise included a Concerto of Vivaldi in E minor, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegal," Roussel's "Padmavati" and Raspighi's "Pines of Rome."

The program for the Hartford concert has been announced and appears to be the most attractive program ever played in Hartford. The seat sale is now in progress at McCoy's and it is advisable to make early reservations by callings Frank Sedgwick, telephone 2-6147.

Beethoven programs.

Alfred Cortot will be the soloist on Thursday and Friday, playing the First Piano Concerto of Beethoven. The program will open with the "Leonore" Overture No. 2 and end with the Third ("Eroica") Symphony.

Leonid Kreutzer, Russian pianist, will make his American debut at the Students' Concert on Saturday night. Mr. Kreutzer, who is well known abroad as a Brahms and Beethoven interpreter and who toured Europe some years ago in two-piano recitals with Ossip Gabrilowitsch, will play the Third Piano Concerto of Beethoven. The Second "Leonore" Overture will open this program too, and it will close with the Fifth Symphony.

This afternoon's program at Carnegie Hall has been changed. Instead of the Mahler Fifth Symphony, Mr. Mengelberg will conduct the Brahms Third Symphony. The rest of the program remains the same: Glinka's Overture to "Ruslan and Ludmilla" and the Glasounow Violin Concerto with Efrem Zimbalist as soloist.

SUNDAY AMERICAN
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEC 261926

Rosita Renard, Chilean Pianist, in Concert Here

ROSITA RENARD, the Chilean pianist, who will be heard in recital on Monday evening, January 3, in the solarium of the Hotel Sagamore, is one of the artists whom the Tuesday Musicale had selected for the coming season.

Miss Renard made her American debut in Aeolian Hall in October, 1917, winning enthusiastic praise from critical New York. After her debut in New York, Miss Renard was soloist with the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic, the Chicago and St. Louis Orchestras, and just before returning to Germany made a transcontinental tour in concert with Geraldine Farrar.

Her program for the Rochester recital includes the Bach Busoni "Chaconne;" Mendelssohn Prelude; Paganini-Liszt studies; a group of Chopin mazurkas, waltzes and nocturnes; Liszt's

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 2 - 1927

At this writing, the program of the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Auditorium next Sunday has not come to hand. The annual visit of the orchestra is expected to attract a capacity audience, and those not having tickets for early admission are advised to get them. The orchestra is being highly praised by critics in the metropolitan centers where it has appeared this season as being the best ensemble that has been heard since the days of Muck. The program will no doubt be a well balanced one, as Mr Koussevitzky knows well how to construct programs. The program by the Musicians' club tonight furnishes the only important musical event of the week, the Symphony concert being the next on the "must" calendar for local music lovers. The program tonight at the Musicians' club described at length in another column promises to be one of the finest ever given by this organization, and will be novel as well as interesting.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
DEC 8 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY

There are a number of interesting episodes in the career of Serge Koussevitzky, the famous Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. But probably there is no incident so entirely out of the ordinary, as the musical world goes, as his three trips down the Volga. There might have been more, but as extra-musical disturbances would have it, his tour in the spring of 1914 was his last.

Some legends have arisen about these Volga tours. One is that the concerts were free. They were not. Koussevitzky never patronized these most unusual of symphony publics. They paid the regular theater prices, listened to the concerts in their own town theaters; and were served with regular symphony programes.

Even with box-office receipts, Koussevitzky's Volga tours involved an appalling deficit. It is no simple matter to hire a hundred fine musicians, charter a steamer with accommodations for two hundred (counting musicians' wives, crew and friends) and sail for 2,500 miles, stopping at towns of all sorts along the way. Eeach tour lasted about four weeks.

Such an excursion was of course a chance for a Russian to study his people, and it is not surprising that Stanislavsky of the Russian Art theater was the guest of one of these tours. Scriabin also made the journey and had the unique experience of observing his symphonies suddenly thrust upon an absolutely untutored and incredibly receptive people. Edward Risler went along, and played in Beethoven's two standard piano concertos.

The seat sale for this concert is now in progress at McCoy's Music store, No. 50 Asylum street. Tickets may also be obtained by calling Frank A. Sedgwick, 2-6147, who is bringing the Boston symphony to Hartford February 6.

NEWS
DETROIT, MICH.
DEC 26 1926

Critics' Strife Stirred By Detroit Orchestra

Mr. Downes and Mme. Samaroff in Combat With Odds on Former, Says This Referee.

By W. K. KELSEY.

AS THE result of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra's appearance in the East, strife has broken out among the critics. Olin Downes, after reflection, set down his opinion in a column of the New York Times. Olga Samaroff disagreed with him in three columns of the New York Evening Post. Without reference to this dispute, Henry T. Parker gave an interesting analysis in a column and a half of the Boston Evening Transcript.

Said Mr. Downes:

"The orchestra has some excellent material in it, and some of second-rate quality. It has not quite the number of players that most of the great orchestras of this country now boast, although the orchestra is adequate to the demands of the modern as well as the classic repertory. Mr. Gabrilowitsch has, therefore, his special problems to meet. He has been meeting them now for eight years, and the results already manifest indicate a quality of orchestral performance in the making which is becoming unfortunately rare today.

"The correspondence between Mr. Gabrilowitsch's characteristics as a pianist and the expression of the same tendencies in his conducting is striking. As a pianist he has been rarely distinguished by the balance, beauty and poetic feeling in his art. He combines a classic continence of style with romantic impulse, and, on occasion, virtuoso fire. Perhaps he turns his face away from certain contemporaneous tendenciees in music, feeling that these particular tendencies, such as hyper-emotionalism, sensational effects, distorted proportions, are contrary to the spirit of great music. In so doing he may ignore developments that work toward a richer musical language and a more intensive expression of certain phases of feeling, but he retain what is being so generally [illegible] sanity, breadth and nobility of manner which characterized so much of the older musical art, and the fineness of proportion, the clearness of color, of other days. .... His ideals promise exceptionally well for the future of his orchestra.

INEVITABLE ROUGHNESSES

"In that orchestra there are today inevitable roughnesses, and, as is usual in young symphonic orchestras, the prevailing quality of the string choir is superior, collectively speaking, to that of the choirs of wood and brass. But the orchestral tone is already assuming a quality that reminds one distantly of the glories of the old Boston Symphony during the period, say, from the year 1900 to the arrival of Karl Muck."

Mr. Downes then praises the Boston Orchestra under Wilhelm Gericke at some length, and says that the Detroit Orchestra under Mr. Gabrilowitsch "appears to be working toward the same euphonious ideals. His colors are cooler, his balances more scrupulous and less preponderant of brass, percussion, or the shriller effects of the wood, than those of almost any contemporary conductor. .... It is an older ideal of orchestral music, and a very fine and high one, that Mr. Gabrilowitsch projects. His ultimate standard for his orchestra is far ahead of him."

Is there anything in this with which to quarrel? If you think not, you do not know Mme. Samaroff. The "roughnesses" to which Mr. Downes referred, escaped her. She does not believe that the youth of an orchestra counts for anything. "In general," she says, "It is quality, not age, which determines the real caliber of an orchestra at all times of its existence, and that caliber depends on funds, the availability of first-class material and the initiative and acumen of the conductor in engaging or replacing his musicians. Mr. Gabrilowitsch is well-known in the orchestral world as possessing in a high degree the qualities necessary for this procedure."

Mme. Samaroff continues: "It has been said, 'There are no great orchestras, there are only great conductors.' I do not go as far as that, but I am entirely convinced from a purely musical standpoint that if a collection of first-class orchestra players are assembled under the leadership of a great artist, results can be obtained in a relatively short time that could never take place through any process of time if either the orchestra or the conductor were of lesser caliber."

DOWNES' EARS OPEN.

If I were umpiring this debate, I should side with Mr. Downes, who went to the concert with his ears open, rather than Mme. Samaroff, who adopts certain premises and deduces therefrom a conclusion. It certainly is not true that Mr. Gabrilowitsch has gone into the world with full pockets and drawn the best players to Detroit. The best players are not always available. Even if they were, some of them could not be tempted to Detroit for any amount of money for the simple reason that like a good many other [illegible] they prefer to live elsewhere. Gabrilowitsch has made a folk [illegible] improvement in the [illegible] orchestra since wonder[illegible] personnel [illegible] he took [illegible] obtained [illegible] means. [illegible] things w[illegible] been for[illegible] but th[illegible] [illegible] ould get th[illegible] better orchestr[illegible] Mme. Samaroff[illegible] age, and I believ[illegible] magine, if you ca[illegible] hich all the violi[illegible] lers, all the cellists were Casals; what, do you suppose, would the string ensemble sound like at the first program? Heaven preserve us from having to listen to it! There is such a thing as ensemble playing, and it can be acquired only by experience, by playing together many and many times. The strings in a great orchestra have a certain vibrant quality, a feeling of pulsing life, which is immediately distinguishable. The strings of the Detroit Orchestra have that quality, but they have not had it long. It has been perfected only within the last two or three years. Yet the personnel has not changed greatly in that time. Nor has the orchestra long had that balance which Mr. Downes appreciates. These are qualities with which age and experience have much to do, and the indiscriminate expenditure of millions for star performers would not bring them.

Now for Mr. Parker, who says: "The strings....are schooled above all else to incisiveness. Accent is the goal and their bows bite the catgut. Give them the unison measures at the beginning of Bossi's 'Intermezzi Goldoniana' or the first frenzies of rejoicing in the third 'Leonore' overture, and this sharpness of tone pierces home. Overstressed the bows begin to scratch; while mellow depths and sensuous warmths come not at such call. Seemingly Mr. Gabrilowitsch would have keen-edged and glinting strings—and lets them go at that."

THE BOSTON CONCERT.

I did not hear the Boston concert, but I should be surprised if these things were true of the orchestra's performance there. They are not true of its playing in Detroit, for we have heard this season and in the past "mellow depths" and "sensuous warmths." Accent is one of their goals, it is true, and it is a highly important goal; but it is not the only one. Brilliance, suavity, unity, clarity are others, and the Detroit string section has them, beyond question.

"His wood-winds," continues Mr. Parker, "are of kindred voice, bright, shallow, rather lacking individual timbre. The first flute catches the ear; the others pass and re-pass as ensemble. The horns hardly temper sturdiness with suavity; while the other brass is German and orotund rather than French and piercing.

"The sum of all these parts is driving tone, sharp-cut rhythms, square-toed progress.....Nowhere is it instrument for the finer euphonies and shadings; while its sonorities are muscular rather than plangent. As an ensemble Mr. Gabrilowitsch holds it in the hollow of his hand, balancing it as he must, mellowing it as it may. He deserves, however, an orchestra of more distinctive individual talents, of wider plasticity and finer sensibitity. Detroit, the rich, may well afford it."

What an awful concert the orchestra must have played in Boston. There have been concertts after which I should have been glad to argee with Mr. Parker about the wood-winds; there have been others when I would take it all back. One can never tell how the wood-wind section will perform, but certainly it is better this year than it has ever been, due, I believe, to the return of Mr. Wummer as first flute (he was with the orchestra last year also) and the acquisition of Mr. Sand as first clarinet. The horns must have an off day when they played for Mr. Parker; and if the brass is orotund rather than piercing (ye gods!) give me orotundity if there is such a word, in preference.

WHAT DID HE MEAN.

I do not know what Mr. Parker means by "driving" tone; if the rhythms are sharp-cut, that is as they should be; and if by "square-toed progress" the Boston critic means honest plodding rather than novel and startling performance, is that not a compliment? But I am not sure what Mr. Parker means. A lack of poetic feeling? Then he differs with Mr. Downes, and with me. Want of brilliance? Oh, the orchestra must have fallen badly below its level in Boston! But the audience, and the rest of the critics, seem to have been satisfied. I do not comprehend Mr. Parker; I disargee with Mme. Samaroff; and as for Mr. Downes, I consider his, on the evidence of his critique, the best pair of ears in the country.

The Week's Music

TODAY.

Handel's "The Messiah," with soloists, chorus and orchestra; Orchestra Hall, 8:30 p. m.

WEDNESDAY.

Subscription concert by Detroit Symphony Orchestra with Luella Melius, coloratura soprano, as soloist; Orchestra Hall, 8:30 p. m.

THURSDAY.

Wednesday's program repeated by Detroit Symphony Orchestra; Orchestra Hall, 8:30 p. m.

SUNDAY.

Matinee concert by Detroit Symphony Orchestra; Orchestra Hall, 3:30 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Syracuse, N. Y. Herald
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
DEC 271926

Financial Wizard Dies

Galen L. Stone, 64, Started as Newspaper Cub

Brookline, Mass., Dec. 27 (AP).—Galen L. Stone, 64, who rose from reportorial obscurity to financial heights, is dead here today.

Mr. Stone was a member and founder of one of Boston's greatest investment houses, Hayden, Stone and Company, which he established more than 30 years ago with Charles Hayden, like, himself, a subordinate in a brokerage house.

Stone had been a cub reporter for the old Commercial Bulletin, but it was not long before he became financial editor of the Boston Advertiser, and a recognized expert.

Then he decided to learn the investment situation, first hand and he took a job with the brokerage where he met Hayden, a graduate of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, who had started work the year previous as a ticker boy at $3 a week.

Soon they were partners. The greatest group of copper producing companies in the world owed its existence to their financing, it was said, and later they turned to steamships, railroads and other enterprises. Mr. Stone was at one time or another a director of more than 20 large companies.

He retired in 1923 to give his time to interests philanthropic, artistic and musical which had always concerned him.

In 1924 he presented a group of valuable Chinese paintings to the Fogg Art Museum of Harvard, and last year $75,000 to the cause of Negro education. He was a trustee of Wellesley College and had been a vice-president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Stone was born in Leominster in 1862.

JOURNAL OF COMMERCE
CHICAGO, ILL.
DEC 28 1926

GALEN STONE, BOSTON FINANCIER, IS DEAD

With Charles Hayden, He Founded Firm of Hayden, Stone and Company 30 Years Ago.

BROOKLINE, Mass., Dec. 27.—Galen L. Stone, member of the Boston financial firm of Hayden, Stone and Company, which he helped to found thirty years ago, died here last night in his sixty-ninth year.

Stone rose from a cub reporter on the Commercial Bulletin to be a national financial figure. After becoming editor of the Boston Advertiser he decided to enter the investment and brokerage business. While he was employed as a financial clerk he met Charles Hayden, a graduate of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. They became partners.

Much of the early success of the Hayden-Stone concern was due to the underwriting of stock and bond issues for copper companies. At one

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
JAN 2 1927

Notes of Four Orchestras

A concerted drive by four major orchestras and an increasing number of individual salon recitalists scheduled combine this week for the most vigorous musical gesture of the season. The heightened activity makes authentic prophecies of musicians this is to be New York's biggest year in music.

Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony come to Carnegie Hall Thursday night and Saturday afternoon and at that matinee the bostonians will play Jan Sibelius's latest score, his Symphony N. 7. Other items on the Bostonians' Thursday program are Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," De Falla's Concerto for harpsichord, wind and string instruments, with Wanda Landowska as soloist (first time); a rondo of Mozart's and Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps."

NEW YORK WORLD
DEC 261926

Notes Of Three Orchestras

Before Walter Damrosch lays down his baton to be taken up, as per schedule, by Otto Klemperer, and Willem Mengelberg, on Jan. 9, gives way to Arturo Toscanini, some caviar in the line of symphonies and orchestral suites will be served patrons of the respective orchestras over which these gentlemen officiate. Moreover, Serge Koussevitzky, with his Boston organization, is to add to our busy musical midst characterisaic programs of his own a week hence.

Jan Sibelius, Finnish composer, is the lion of two of these ensembles. Also, as a musical morsel of highly delectable flavor, Dusolina Giannini, now happily among us, will display her voice and presence in solo sumptuousness Thursday with Walter Damrosch at Carnegie Hall.

The new Sibelius work Mr. Damrosch will present this afternoon at Mecca Temple is "Tapiola," title of his new tone poem. It was especially composed on invitation of the Symphony Society and is written to a program for which this, according to Dr. Damrosch, is the motto:

"Widespread they stand, the
Northland's dusky forests,
Ancient, mysterious, brooding
savage dreams;
Within them dwells the Forest's
mighty God,
And wood-sprites in the gloom
weave magic secrets."

Before and after this premier, George Gershwin will play his own "Concerto in F" and the orchestra, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The Sibelius poem will be repeated Thursday afternoon at Carnegie Hall by the Symphony Society when Miss Giannini will appear as soloist, singing Elizabeth's air from "Tannhauser" and an aria from Tchaikowsky's "Jeanne d'Arc." Brahms's Symphony No. 2 in D and Straus's "Emperor" waltz complete the musicale.

Willem Mengelberg, in the last two weeks of his appearances this season as conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra, will mark his farewell concerts of the Thursday evening, Friday afternoon and Students' series at Carnegie Hall this coming week with all-Beethoven programs.

Alfred Cortot will be the soloist on Thursday and Friday, playing the First Piano Concerto of Beethoven. The program will open with the "Leonore" Overture No. 2 and end with the Third ("Eroica") Symphony.

Leonid Kreutzer, Russian pianist, will make his American debut at the Students' Concert on Saturday night. Mr. Kreutzer, who is well known abroad as a Brahms and Beethoven interpreter and who toured Europe some years ago in two-piano recitals with Ossip Gabrilowitsch, will play the Third Piano Concerto of Beethoven. The Second "Leonore" Overture will open this program too, and it will close with the Fifth Symphony.

This afternoon's program at Carnegie Hall has been changed. Instead of the Mahler Fifth Symphony, Mr. Mengelberg will conduct the Brahms Third Symphony. The rest of the program remains the same: Glinka's Overture to "Ruslan and Ludmilla" and the Glasounow Violin Concerto with Efrem Zimbalist as soloist.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
DEC 31 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky's Paris concerts are reported the principal musical events of the season of the French metropolis. The first of the annual spring series of Concerts Koussevitzky takes place in the Paris opera house. Serge Koussevitzky conducts his own orchestra which he assembled every summer and which he directs in the interval at the conclusion of his seasons with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

A feature of the first [illegible] was the [illegible] of perhaps billions of dollars.

[illegible] that their properties would be allowed [illegible] to other individuals or companies willing to accept the laws.

No accurate statistics are available as to the extent and value of all the properties affected by the laws, but it is believed that they total many thousands of acres with a potential value of perhaps billions of dollars.

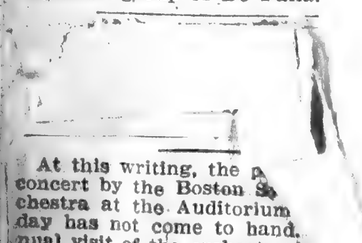
SUNDAY AMERICAN
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEC 261926

Rosita Renard, Chilean Pianist, in Concert Here

ROSITA RENARD, the Chilean pianist, who will be heard in recital on Monday evening, January 3, in the solarium of the Hotel Sagamore, is one of the artists whom the Tuesday Musicale had selected for the coming season.

Miss Renard made her American debut in Aeolian Hall in October, 1917, winning enthusiastic praise from critical New York. After her debut in New York, Miss Renard was soloist with the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic, the Chicago and St. Louis Orchestras, and just before returning to Germany made a transcontinental tour in concert with Geraldine Farrar.

Her program for the Rochester recital includes the Bach Busoni "Chaconne;" Mendelssohn Prelude; Paganini-Liszt studies; a group of Chopin mazurkas, waltzes and nocturnes; Liszt's "Dance of the Gnomes," and Balakerow's "Islamay," and a Spanish group of De Falla.



At this writing, the [illegible] concert by the Boston S[illegible] chestra at the Auditorium [illegible] day has not come to hand. [illegible] nual visit of the orchestra is [illegible] to attract a capacity audienc[illegible] those not having tickets for ea[illegible] mission are advised to get them. The orchestra is being highly praised by critics in the metropolitan centers where it has appeared this season as being the best ensemble that has been heard since the days of Muck. The program will no doubt be a well balanced one, as Mr Koussevitzky knows well how to construct programs. The program by the Musicians' club tonight furnishes the only important musical event of the week, the Symphony concert being the next on the "must" calendar for local music lovers. The program tonight at the Musicians' club described at length in another column promises to be one of the finest ever given by this organization, and will be novel as well as interesting.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
DEC 8 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY

There are a number of interesting episodes in the career of Serge Koussevitzky, the famous Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. But probably there is no incident so entirely out of the ordinary, as the musical world goes, as his three trips down the Volga. There might have been more, but as extra-musical disturbances would have it, his tour in the spring of 1914 was his last.

Some legends have arisen about these Volga tours. One is that the concerts were free. They were not. Koussevitzky never patronized these most unusual of symphony publics. They paid the regular theater prices, listened to the concerts in their own town theaters; and were served with regular symphony programes.

Even with box-office receipts, Koussevitzky's Volga tours involved an appalling deficit. It is no simple matter to hire a hundred fine musicians, charter a steamer with accommodations for two hundred (counting musicians' wives, crew and friends) and sail for 2,500 miles, stopping at towns of all sorts along the way. Eeach tour lasted about four weeks.

Such an excursion was of course a chance for a Russian to study his people, and it is not surprising that Stanislavsky of the Russian Art theater was the guest of one of these tours. Scriabin also made the journey and had the unique experience of observing his symphonies suddenly thrust upon an absolutely untutored and incredibly receptive people. Edward Risler went along, and played in Beethoven's two standard piano concertos.

The seat sale for this concert is now in progress at McCoy's Music store, No. 89 Asylum street. Tickets may also be obtained by calling Frank A. Sedgwick, 2-6147, who is bringing the Boston Symphony to Hartford February 6.

NEWS
DETROIT, MICH.
DEC 26 1926

Critics' Strife Stirred By Detroit Orchestra

Mr. Downes and Mme. Samaroff in Combat With Odds on Former, Says This Referee.

By W. K. KELSEY.

AS THE result of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra's appearance in the East, strife has broken out among the critics. Olin Downes, after reflection, set down his opinion in a column of the New York Times. Olga Samaroff disagreed with him in three columns of the New York Evening Post. Without reference to this dispute, Henry T. Parker gave an interesting analysis in a column and a half of the Boston Evening Transcript.

Said Mr. Downes:

"The orchestra has some excellent material in it, and some of second-rate quality. It has not quite the number of players that most of the great orchestras of this country now boast, although the orchestra is adequate to the demands of the modern as well as the classic repertory. Mr. Gabrilowitsch has, therefore, his special problems to meet. He has been meeting them now for eight years, and the results already manifest indicate a quality of orchestral performance in the making which is becoming unfortunately rare today.

"The correspondence between Mr. Gabrilowitsch's characteristics as a pianist and the expression of the same tendencies in his conducting is striking. As a pianist he has been rarely distinguished by the balance, beauty and poetic feeling in his art. He combines a classic continence of style with romantic impulse, and, on occasion, virtuoso fire. Perhaps he turns his face away from certain contemporaneous tendenciees in music, feeling that these particular tendencies, such as hyper-emotionalism, sensational effects, distorted proportions, are contrary to the spirit of great music. In so doing he may ignore developments that work toward a richer musical language and a more intensive expression of certain phases of feeling, but he retain[illegible] what is being so generally [illegible] sanity, breadth and nobility of manner which characterized so much of the older musical art, and the fineness of proportion, the clearness of color, of other days. .... His ideals promise exceptionally well for the future of his orchestra.

INEVITABLE ROUGHNESSES

"In that orchestra there are today inevitable roughnesses, and, as is usual in young symphonic orchestras, the prevailing quality of the string choir is superior, collectively speaking, to that of the choirs of wood and brass. But the orchestral tone is already assuming a quality that reminds one distantly of the glories of the old Boston Symphony during the period, say, from the year 1900 to the arrival of Karl Muck."

Mr. Downes then praises the Boston Orchestra under Wilhelm Gericke at some length, and says that the Detroit Orchestra under Mr. Gabrilowitsch "appears to be working toward the same euphonious ideals. His colors are cooler, his balances more scrupulous and less preponderant of brass, percussion, or the shriller effects of the wood, than those of almost any contemporary conductor. .... It is an older ideal of orchestral music, and a very fine and high one, that Mr. Gabrilowitsch projects. His ultimate standard for his orchestra is far ahead of him."

Is there anything in this with which to quarrel? If you think not, you do not know Mme. Samaroff. The "roughnesses" to which Mr. Downes referred, escaped her. She does not believe that the youth of an orchestra counts for anything. "In general," she says, "It is quality, not age, which determines the real caliber of an orchestra at all times of its existence, and that caliber depends on funds, the availability of first-class material and the initiative and acumen of the conductor in engaging or replacing his musicians. Mr. Gabrilowitsch is well-known in the orchestral world as possessing in a high degree the qualities necessary for this procedure."

Mme. Samaroff continues: "It has been said, 'There are no great orchestras, there are only great conductors.' I do not go as far as that, but I am entirely convinced from a purely musical standpoint that if a collection of first-class orchestra players are assembled under the leadership of a great artist, results can be obtained in a relatively short time that could never take place through any process of time if either the orchestra or the conductor were of lesser caliber."

DOWNES' EARS OPEN.

If I were umpiring this debate, I should side with Mr. Downes, who went to the concert with his ears open, rather than Mme. Samaroff, who adopts certain premises and deduces therefrom a conclusion. It certainly is not true that Mr. Gabrilowitsch has gone into the world with full pockets and drawn the best players to Detroit. The best players are not always available. Even if they were, some of them could not be tempted to Detroit for any amount of money for the simple reason that like a good many other [illegible] they prefer to live elsewhe[illegible] Gabrilowitsch has made a [illegible] improvement in the [illegible] orchestra since wonder[illegible] personnel [illegible] he took [illegible] obtained [illegible] means. [illegible] things w[illegible] been for[illegible] but there a[illegible] could get th[illegible] better orchestr[illegible] Mme. Samaroff [illegible] age, and I believ[illegible] imagine, if you ca[illegible] which all the violi[illegible]

The Week's Music

TODAY.

Handel's "The Messiah," with soloists, chorus and orchestra; Orchestra Hall, 8:30 p. m.

WEDNESDAY.

Subscription concert by Detroit Symphony Orchestra with Luella Melius, coloratura soprano, as soloist; Orchestra Hall, 8:30 p. m.

THURSDAY.

Wednesday's program repeated by Detroit Symphony Orchestra; Orchestra Hall, 8:30 p. m.

SUNDAY.

Matinee concert by Detroit Symphony Orchestra; Orchestra Hall, 3:30 p. m.

lers, all the cellists were Casals; what, do you suppose, would the string ensemble sound like at the first program? Heaven preserve us from having to listen to it! There is such a thing as ensemble playing, and it can be acquired only by experience, by playing together many and many times. The strings in a great orchestra have a certain vibrant quality, a feeling of pulsing life, which is immediately distinguishable. The strings of the Detroit Orchestra have that quality, but they have not had it long. It has been perfected only within the last two or three years. Yet the personnel has not changed greatly in that time. Nor has the orchestra long had that balance which Mr. Downes appreciates. These are qualities with which age and experience have much to do, and the indiscriminate expenditure of millions for star performers would not bring them.

Now for Mr. Parker, who says: "The strings....are schooled above all else to incisiveness. Accent is the goal and their bows bite the catgut. Give them the unison measures at the beginning of Bossi's 'Intermezzi Goldoniana' or the first frenzies of rejoicing in the third 'Leonore' overture, and this sharpness of tone pierces home. Overstressed the bows begin to scratch; while mellow depths and sensuous warmths come not at such call. Seemingly Mr. Gabrilowitsch would have keen-edged and glinting strings—and lets them go at that."

THE BOSTON CONCERT.

I did not hear the Boston concert, but I should be surprised if these things were true of the orchestra's performance there. They are not true of its playing in Detroit, for we have heard this season and in the past "mellow depths" and "sensuous warmths." Accent is one of their goals, it is true, and it is a highly important goal; but it is not the only one. Brilliance, suavity, unity, clarity are others, and the Detroit string section has them, beyond question.

"His wood-winds," continues Mr. Parker, "are of kindred voice, bright, shallow, rather lacking individual timbre. The first flute catches the ear; the others pass and re-pass as ensemble. The horns hardly temper sturdiness with suavity; while the other brass is German and orotund rather than French and piercing.

"The sum of all these parts is driving tone, sharp-cut rhythms, square-toed progress.....Nowhere is it instrument for the finer euphonies and shadings; while its sonorities are muscular rather than plangent. As an ensemble Mr. Gabrilowitsch holds it in the hollow of his hand, balancing it as he must, mellowing it as it may. He deserves, however, an orchestra of more distinctive individual talents, of wider plasticity and finer sensibitity. Detroit, the rich, may well afford it."

What an awful concert the orchestra must have played in Boston. There have been concertts after which I should have been glad to argee with Mr. Parker about the wood-winds; there have been others when I would take it all back. One can never tell how the wood-wind section will perform, but certainly it is better this year than it has ever been, due, I believe, to the return of Mr. Wummer as first flute (he was with the orchestra last year also) and the acquisition of Mr. Sand as first clarinet. The horns must have an off day when they played for Mr. Parker; and if the brass is orotund rather than piercing (ye gods!) give me orotundity if there is such a word, in preference.

WHAT DID HE MEAN.

I do not know what Mr. Parker means by "driving" tone; if the rhythms are sharp-cut, that is as they should be; and if by "square-toed progress" the Boston critic means honest plodding rather than novel and startling performance, is that not a compliment? But I am not sure what Mr. Parker means. A lack of poetic feeling? Then he differs with Mr. Downes, and with me. Want of brilliance? Oh, the orchestra must have fallen badly below its level in Boston! But the audience, and the rest of the critics seem to have been satisfied. I do not comprehend Mr. Parker; I disargee with Mme. Samaroff; and as for Mr. Downes, I consider his, on the evidence of his critique, the best pair of ears in the country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Syracuse, N. Y. Herald
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
DEC 271926

Financial Wizard Dies

Galen L. Stone, 64, Started as Newspaper Cub

Brookline, Mass., Dec. 27 (AP).—Galen L. Stone, 64, who rose from reportorial obscurity to financial heights, is dead here today.

Mr. Stone was a member and founder of one of Boston's greatest investment houses, Hayden, Stone and Company, which he established more than 30 years ago with Charles Hayden, like, himself, a subordinate in a brokerage house.

Stone had been a cub reporter for the old Commercial Bulletin, but it was not long before he became financial editor of the Boston Advertiser, and a recognized expert.

Then he decided to learn the investment situation, first hand and he took a job with the brokerage where he met Hayden, a graduate of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, who had started work the year previous as a ticker boy at $3 a week.

Soon they were partners. The greatest group of copper producing companies in the world owed its existence to their financing, it was said, and later they turned to steamships, railroads and other enterprises. Mr. Stone was at one time or another a director of more than 20 large companies.

He retired in 1923 to give his time to interests philanthropic, artistic and musical which had always concerned him.

In 1924 he presented a group of valuable Chinese paintings to the Fogg Art Museum of Harvard, and last year $75,000 to the cause of Negro education. He was a trustee of Wellesley College and had been a vice-president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Stone was born in Leominster in 1862.

JOURNAL OF COMMERCE
CHICAGO, ILL.
DEC 28 1926

GALEN STONE, BOSTON FINANCIER, IS DEAD

With Charles Hayden, He Founded Firm of Hayden, Stone and Company 30 Years Ago.

BROOKLINE, Mass., Dec. 27.—Galen L. Stone, member of the Boston financial firm of Hayden, Stone and Company, which he helped to found thirty years ago, died here last night in his sixty-ninth year.

Stone rose from a cub reporter on the Commercial Bulletin to be a national financial figure. After becoming editor of the Boston Advertiser he decided to enter the investment and brokerage business. While he was employed as a financial clerk he met Charles Hayden, a graduate of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. They became partners.

Much of the early success of the Hayden-Stone concern was due to the underwriting of stock and bond issues for copper companies. At one time Mr. Stone was on the boards of directors of more than twenty-five companies.

Mr. Stone once was vice-president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and at the time of his death was a trustee of Wellesley College.

Syr[illegible]
Thur[illegible] Saturday afternoon [illegible] at that matinee the bostonians will play Jan Sibelius's latest score, his Symphony N. 7. Other items on the Bostonians' Thursday program are Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," De Falla's Concerto for harpsichord, wind and string instruments, with Wanda Landowska as soloist (first time); a rendo of Mozart's and stravinsky's "Sacre du Pintemps."

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
DEC 27 1926

GALEN L. STONE, FINANCIER, DIES

Brookline, Mass. (AP)—Galen L. Stone, 64, who rose from reportorial obscurity to financial heights, is dead here today.

Mr. Stone was a member and founder of one of Boston's greatest investment houses, Hayden, Stone & Co., which he established more than thirty years ago, with Charles Hayden, like himself, a subordinate in a brokerage house.

Stone had been a cub reporter for the old Commercial Bulletin, but it was not long before he became financial editor of the Boston Advertiser, and a recognized expert.

Then he decided to learn the investment situation, first hand, and he took a job with the brokerage firm where he met Hayden, a graduate of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, who had started work the year previous as a ticker boy at $3 a week.

Soon they were partners. The greatest group of copper producing companies in the world owed its existence to their financing, it was said, and later they turned to steamships, railroads and other enterprises. Mr. Stone was at one time or another a director of more than twenty large companies.

He retired in 1923 to give his time to interests, philanthropic, artistic and musical, which had always concerned him.

In 1924, he presented a group of valuable Chinese paintings to the Fogg Art Museum of Harvard, and last year, $75,000 to the cause of negro education. He was a trustee of Wellesley college and had been a vice-president of the Boston symphony orchestra.

EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
DEC 11 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS "FIREBIRD"

Led by Serge Koussevitsky, Orchestra Presents Suite by Stravinsky

TONIGHT AT 8:15 O'CLOCK

The outstanding selection to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky, in its broadcast through Stations WJZ, WBZ, WRC and WGY at 8:15 this evening, will be the suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" (The Firebird), by Stravinsky.

This is a dance legend, divided into five parts, and will fill the entire half of the concert which follows the intermission.

Prof. Thomas Marshall, who has done such meritorious work in these concerts in the past, will continue to give the radio audience interesting facts on the lives of the composers whose works will be played in this concert and also sidelights upon the composi-

BROOKLYN TIMES
JAN 2 _ 1927

Wagner Program Chosen by Boston Society for Boro

Koussevitsky Orchestra Visits Academy on Friday—Philharmonic Here Today.

Excerpts from four Wagnerian operas will be presented by the Boston Symphony Society on Friday night at the Academy of Music when Sergei Koussevitsky's musicians make their second visit of the season to this borough.

The prelude to "Lohengrin," the funeral music from "Goetterdamerung" the forest scene from "Siegfried," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" are included on the program.

The conductor will present for the first time in this borough the No. 7 of Sibelius and the D Major concerto of Philip Emmanuel Bach ar-

NEW YORK TELEGRAPH
JAN 2 _ 1927

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second trip of the season to New York to play in Carnegie Hall, next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, January 6 and 8.

At the Thursday concert, the soloist will be Wanda Landowska, the specialist in music of the harpsichord, who has lately arrived from Europe. She will then perform for the first time in this country a concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and violoncello by De Falla, which has been written especially for her by the noted Spanish composer, and a Rondo by Mozart. The other numbers will be Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rite of Spring").

The Saturday program will consist of a concerto of Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been arranged for string orchestra, and a small group of wood wind instruments, especially for Mr. Koussevitzky, by Maximilian Steinberg. The Seventh Symphony of Sibelius will have its first New York performance at this concert. The symphony is in one movement and is the latest of the Finish composer. The other numbers will be a suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird," and Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse."

RECORD
DEC 30 1926

Murphy and Raymond McKee.

Boston Symphony's Big Hartford Concert Feb. 6

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be in Hartford at the Capitol theater February 6 and there has been such interest and curiosity to know what the program is to be that Mr. Sedgwick has decided to publish the numbers at this time, so that music lovers may familiarize themselves with them before the concert, inasmuch as a concert by the Boston Symphony is most highly considered along educational lines.

The music supervisors of the public schools, as well as the music schools and private schools, and music teachers in general wish to lecture and analyze the program, playing excerpts from the compositions, so as to familiarize the pupils with the number, increasing the pupils' knowledge and making the concert more enjoyable.

Mr. Koussevitzky could hardly have arranged a more attractive program for Hartford music lovers. It follows: Beethoven Eroica Symphony, No. 3, in C flat major; Prokokief Suite from the Opera "The Love of Three Oranges"; DeBussy Nocturne "Fetes" (Festivals); Wagner Prelude to (Lohengrin); Sibeilus Finlandia "Symphonic Poem Op. 26 No. 7.

Seat sale at McCoy's music store, 87 Asylum street, or telephone for reservations at 2-6147 Hartford.—Adv.

THIS CLIPPING FROM GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.
NOV 1 - 1926

... leaders, prices, etc.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TOMORROW.

Absolutely the biggest musical event of the year is the concert by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Massey Hall tomorrow night. This great orchestra, under the baton of the renowned Serge Koussevitzky, is conceded to be the finest and best in all the world, and the people of Toronto and vicinity are offered a musical opportunity that other less fortunate cities are clamoring for. Right in Boston it is necessary to subscribe for 45 concerts in order to hear this orchestra, and only then at much higher prices than those charged here. There are some good seat locations still available.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SENTINAL
NOV 1 - 1926

FINE COLLECTION OF OLD INSTRUMENTS PRESENTED

Boston, Oct. 29, (AP)—A collection of 144 ancient instruments, said to be one of the finest in existence

THIS CLIPPING FROM MAIL
TORONTO, CAN.
NOV 2 - 1926

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYED GORGEOUSLY

Serge Koussevitzky Supreme Conductor of Tchaikovsky Music.

SPLENDID CONCERT

Emotional Reading of Fourth Symphony Climax of the Evening.

One of the great concerts of the season was given in Massey Hall last night, and if you happen to be a member of the not inconsiderable group of people who regard orchestral music as the highest form of that art, then it was for you the event of the year. That is the fact because the Boston Symphony is the only orchestra of the first rank that is likely to be heard here in the Winter months of 1926-27. Mr. Serge Koussevitzky understands the psychology of the average audience, and his program was constructed for the purpose of sending people home at the height of their pleasure and excitement. He led them first into a quiet, old-fashioned garden, where everything was trim and suave and pleasing. Then they followed him at random along the highway, where strange and unexpected sights were seen, some curious and some beautiful. And the journey ended in a mountain where amidst the grandeur, tremendously dramatic things happened that left one awed and deeply stirred. In other words, the program opened with a Mozart Serenade, continued with Debussy and Stravinsky, and climaxed in Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

The orchestra which Mr. Koussevitsky conducts, possesses all the characteristics that we have learned in recent years to associate with the Bostonians. Their tone is dark and the string section seems to have more than the usual amount of substance, but it never seems unduly heavy. In fact, the vitality is quite amazing. In the presentation of Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik", there was so much tonal body to the playing of the graceful compositions that no one who heard it can ever say again that string orchestras, even at their best, leave the impression of being aenemic. The two Debussy Nocturnes that followed were vivid tone pictures. In the nebulous melting and movement of "Clouds", the orchestra somehow conjured before the eyes the colors and shapes of dissolving cloud masses. In that work and "Festivals" which followed it, Mr. Koussevitzky showed what a strong sense his possesses of the pictorial in sound. The approach of the procession in "Festivals", a strange procession of wierd and picturesque figures, was extraordinarily graphic. One felt that Mr. Koussevitzky was not quite at his best in the orchestral suite from the ballet "Petrouchka". Stravinsky has wedded dissonance and melody so that they tell his barbaric tale with startling garishness and uncouthness, and yet it is most stimulating music. It is so full of happenings, scrappy themes and impressions created by tone. One felt that Mr. Koussevitzky put more emphasis on the drama than on the delicately bizarre bits.

It is as an interpreter of Tchaikovsky that Serge Koussevitzky rises to the heights. After all, it is for his surge of emotion that Tchaikovsky is beloved by so many, and also, one must add, blown upon with the disapproval of those who prefer music that is more cerebral and rigidly academic. When Koussevitzky plays the works of Tschaikovsky, he gives you the feeling of a volcano of emotion, barely held within bounds by a dominating but intense will. The opening movement of the Fourth Symphony last night was in itself a gorgeously dramatic tone poem of a turbulent life, called, checked, thwarted by the stern trumpet note of duty. The abandon of the climaxes could only be secured by a man who enters fully into the introspective Slavic temperament of the composer. One never expects to hear anything much more thrilling in a concert hall than the moment in the final movement when the conductor retarded the time ever so slightly for the re-entry of the theme of the horns. The melting suavity of the strings was heard again in the haunting melody of the second movement, and the jolly pizzicato of the Scherzo was exquisitely done. Then in the furious rush of the finale, the conductor swept his audience away. They gave him an ovation when it was finished that only mildly expressed the emotional experience through which they had passed. If Serge Koussevitzky ever brings his band to Toronto again, we hope he will do another Tschaikovsky Symphony. We can think of no other conductor who enters so completely into the Tchaikovsky spirit.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GAZETTE
NOV 2 - 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY INTERPRETED NEW AND OLDER MUSIC

Distinguished Audience at Forum Applauded Serge Koussevitzky

ECCENTRIC COMPOSITIONS

Prokofieff's Suite From "Chout" and Respighi's Latest Work Introduce Astonishing Orchestral Effects

New music and old sharply divided the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, played before a very large audience last night in the Forum. The new part comprised the ballet suite from Prokofieff's "Chout" ("Buffoon"), and Respighi's symphonic poem "The Pines of Rome," neither of which had been publicly played in this city. Cesar Franck, Wagner and Berlioz compositions made up the other part.

It was an interesting programme, carried out in a manner to be expected of the famous orchestra under its celebrated leader. Also it was long, and of a nature to heavily tax the artists, but, in spite of obstinate demands for an encore, a demand which culminated in vociferous bravos, M. Koussevitzky declined.

It was Selma Lagerlof, who spoke of music as "the road between heaven and earth." During the playing of Franck's towering symphony in D minor, a glorious and noble dream of perfect music, this could be realized last night. Had there been nothing else on the programme, it would have more than sufficed to prove that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has earned the great reputation it enjoys. To greater heights it would, indeed, be difficult to aspire. The gigantic composition was brought out, so to speak, in all its delicate poetry, in all its overwhelming force, by this ensemble of artists, who are doing so much towards making the city of Boston famous.

The Vorspiel to "Lohengrin," which becomes nothing at all without that enormous feat of orchestral ability to bring out almost constantly the pianissimo-lyrico of what the great composer was inspired to do, was faultlessly played. Wholly without effects of the musical or of melody; but a peculiarly delicate, ethereal tone poem, it is somewhat like the 'Rheingold" motive, only far less accentuated. For playing this prelude properly, without making of it just a reading of orchestrated notes, great praise is due M. Koussevitzky and his orchestra.

Berlioz' "Carnaval Romain" overture, the first on the programme, was played with great distinction, and this exhausts the "old" part of the concert.

CONTRAST TO FRANCK.

The Prokofieff suite, divided into four parts, was played after the intermission. It would be hard to find a greater contrast than the Cesar Franck symphony and the music from "Buffoon." The very titles of the four parts were highly novel; "Dance of the Buffoon's Daughters," "In the Tradesman's Bedroom," "The Young Woman is Transformed into a Goat" and "Final Dance."

An impression of "Chout," or rather that part of it which was interpreted last night, is that it was intensely clever and amusing; startling in sudden orchestration contrasts; wierd, yet not without a good deal of harmony. It was a triumph of individual and ensemble work to play this futuristic, fantastic and capricious series of ballet compositions. The first part—"The Dance of the Buffoon's Daughters"—was the least hyper-modern. Into it comes a staccato sort of spasm which provoked the serious-faced M. Koussevitzky himself into laughter. "In the Tradesman's Bedroom," surely the oddest descriptive title to music, was not as odd as it might have been, and was the least interesting of the set of four.

But, "The Young Woman is Transformed into a Goat." Without seeking material from innermost Africa, or from recent American jazz offerings, the man who is responsible for "Buffoon" has succeeded in these days of originality-seeking in finding something original. Music-lovers of the old school undoubtedly sneer at this sort of music; still there is this to be said for it, that it is astounding without being vulgar, funny without being idiotic. The orchestral effects are amazing, and the marvelous blare which forms the last concrete note is a study in what can be ... modern orchestra.

The final dance, whimsical, cataleptic-like, and brimful of bizarre changes from string to wood to brass to tympani and back again to all combined, was amusing—but it was impressive viewed as an orchestral feat.

"Pini di Roma," Respighi's latest "Remarkable novelty," as the programme had it, is remarkable, it must be admitted. This symphonic poem, also, is divided into four parts—"The Pines of the Villa Borghese," "The Pines near a Catacomb," "The Pines of the Janiculum" and "The Pines of the Appian Way."

GRAMOPHONE EMPLOYED.

The introduction of a gramophone, to convey the song of the nightingale, has created some hot discussion among the critics musical. The composer, so reports have it, was not content with wood-wind trills, and insisted upon the revolutionary idea of introducing "canned music" into a symphony orchestra. It seemed to work well last night; though apart from the purely descriptive idea of having birdsong from Roman pines, the composition was not improved.

Not that "The Pines of Rome" is not toneful. It is remarkably beautiful in parts, and highly impressive in descriptive melody. Beginning with a cascade effect, which reminds one of his earlier composition Respighi goes on with a sort of canto funebre, to evoke tall trees by catacombs. The mournful and dirge-like effect was exceedingly well brought out by the orchestra. "The Pines of Janiculum" was less tangible, and chiefly remarkable for the nightingale bit. The finale, however, was magnificent. It conjures forth an unmistakable idea of legions of Fascists, Mussolini-inspired, or Roman warriors marching on to the eternal city.

It was, indeed, a tone-poem worthy of some interesting discussion and also a great deal of praise.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
NOV 4 1926

Wonderful Collection Of Old Instruments

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has come into permanent possession of a collection of ancient instruments which are named as one of the finest in existence. The collection was given by a group of citizens of Boston, in memory of Henry Lee Higginson.

These rare instruments were assembled by Henri Casadesus, the French musician who has devoted his life to early instruments and their music. Mr. Koussevitzky, whose double bass is a 17th century instrument, has long shared the enthusiasms of M. Cassadesus. Years ago the two musicians gave recitals in Moscow, performing early double concertos for double bass and viola d'amour. M. Cassadesus visited the United States with his "Societe des Instruments Anciens" in 1918, giving recitals upon a quartet of viols. It was on Mr. Koussevitzky's recommendation that this collection was acquired last spring.

The collection contains some fine specimens of the earliest of string instruments such as the hurdy gurdy, monochord, marine trumpet, some beautiful pearl-inlaid lutes and zithers, some grotesque serpents, richly carved. There is a department of Oriental instruments, some drums with ornamentation beautifully wrought. The viols are among the finest in existence.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NOV 4 - 1926

GETS OLD COLLECTION

Boston Library Given 145 Rare Musical Instruments

Philadelphia Public Ledger

A valuable collection of ancient musical instruments has just been presented to the Boston Public library in memory of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, founder and many years chief supporter of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

These 145 instruments, forming what is known as the Casadesus collection, were assembled by the founder of Society of Ancient Instruments and were purchased by friends of Major Higginson. It includes specimens of the viole d'amour, viol de gamba, many zithers and mandolins, kettle drums to be played on horseback, the "flute de Pan," horns, bagpipes and numerous Oriental instruments.

Herald
Y.
26

d Dies

4, Started r Cub

ec. 27 (AP).—
o rose from to financial today.
member and ston's greates, Hayden, which he 30 years ago like, himself, brokerage ub reporter al Bulletin, fore he be-the Boston gnized ex-

arn the int hand and brokerage a graduate nstitute of arted work ticker boy ners. The r producing owed its ng, it was turned to nd other vas at one r of more give his ropic, ar-had al-

group of s to the yard, and cause of a trusand had Boston

Leomin-

TIMES-UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
DEC 27 1926

GALEN L. STONE, FINANCIER, DIES

Brookline, Mass. (AP)—Galen L. Stone, 64, who rose from reportorial obscurity to financial heights, is dead here today.

Mr. Stone was a member and founder of one of Boston's greatest investment houses, Hayden, Stone & Co., which he established more than thirty years ago, with Charles Hayden, like himself, a subordinate in a brokerage house.

Stone had been a cub reporter for the old Commercial Bulletin, but it was not long before he became financial editor of the Boston Advertiser, and a recognized expert.

Then he decided to learn the investment situation, first hand, and he took a job with the brokerage firm where he met Hayden, a graduate of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, who had started work the year previous as a ticker boy at $3 a week.

Soon they were partners. The greatest group of copper producing companies in the world owed its existence to their financing, it was said, and later they turned to steamships, railroads and other enterprises. Mr. Stone was at one time or another a director of more than twenty large companies.

He retired in 1923 to give his time to interests, philanthropic, artistic and musical, which had always concerned him.

In 1924, he presented a group of valuable Chinese paintings to the Fogg Art Museum of Harvard, and last year, $75,000 to the cause of negro education. He was a trustee of Wellesley college and had been a vice-president of the Boston symphony orchestra.

EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
DEC 11 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS "FIREBIRD"

Led by Serge Koussevitsky, Orchestra Presents Suite by Stravinsky

TONIGHT AT 8:15 O'CLOCK

The outstanding selection to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky, in its broadcast through stations WJZ, WBZ, WRC and WGY at 8:15 this evening, will be the suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" (The Firebird), by Stravinsky.

This is a dance legend, divided into five parts, and will fill the entire half of the concert which follows the intermission.

Prof. Thomas Marshall, who has done such meritorious work in these concerts in the past, will continue to give the radio audience interesting facts on the lives of the composers whose works will be played in this concert and also sidelights upon the compositions and how they were composed.

The complete program for this concert follows:

Overture—"Cockaigne" ..... Elgar
Symphony No. 7 ..... Sibelius
Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" (The Firebird) ..... Stravinsky
1. Introduction: Kastchei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Firebird.
2. Supplications of the Firebird.
3. The Princesses Play With the Golden Apples
3. (a)Berceuse.
4. Dance of the Princess
5. Infernal Dance of All the Subjects of Kaschei.

DO YOUR RADIO CHRISTMAS SHOPPING EARLY!

Sergei Koussevitsky's musicians make their second visit of the season to this borough.

The prelude to "Lohengrin," the funeral music from "Goetterdamerung" the forest scene from "Siegfried," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" are included on the program.

The conductor will present for the first time in this borough the No. 5 of Sibelius and the D Major concerto of [illegible] Emanuel Bach ar-

NEW YORK TELEGRAPH
JAN 2 - 1927

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second trip of the season to New York to play in Carnegie Hall, next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, January 6 and 8.

At the Thursday concert, the soloist will be Wanda Landowska, the specialist in music of the harpsichord, who has lately arrived from Europe. She will then perform for the first time in this country a concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and violoncello by De Falla, which has been written especially for her by the noted Spanish composer, and a Rondo by Mozart. The other numbers will be Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rite of Spring").

The Saturday program will consist of a concerto of Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been arranged for string orchestra, and a small group of wood wind instruments, especially for Mr. Koussevitzky, by Maximilian Steinberg. The Seventh Symphony of Sibelius will have its first New York performance at this concert. The symphony is in one movement and is the latest of the Finish composer. The other numbers will be a suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird," and Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse."

RECORD

Meridan Ca

DEC 30 1926

Murphy and Raymond Mckee.

Boston Symphony's Big Hartford Concert Feb. 6

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be in Hartford at the Capitol theater February 6 and there has been such interest and curiosity to know what the program is to be that Mr. Sedgwick has decided to publish the numbers at this time, so that music lovers may familiarize themselves with them before the concert, inasmuch as a concert by the Boston Symphony is most highly considered along educational lines.

The music supervisors of the public schools, as well as the music schools and private schools, and music teachers in general wish to lecture and analyze the program, playing excerpts from the compositions, so as to familiarize the pupils with the number, increasing the pupils' knowledge and making the concert more enjoyable.

Mr. Koussevitzky could hardly have arranged a more attractive program for Hartford music lovers. It follows: Beethoven Eroica Symphony, No. 3, in C flat major; Prokokief Suite from the Opera "The Love of Three Oranges"; DeBussy Nocturne "Fetes" (Festivals); Wagner Prelude to (Lohengrin); Sibeilus Finlandia "Symphonic Poem Op. 26 No. 7.

Seat sale at McCoy's music store, 87 Asylum street, or telephone for reservations at 2-6147 Hartford.—Adv.

THIS CLIPPING FROM GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.

NOV 1 - 1926

... leaders, prices, etc.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TOMORROW.

Absolutely the biggest musical event of the year is the concert by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Massey Hall tomorrow night. This great orchestra, under the baton of the renowned Serge Koussevitzky, is conceded to be the finest and best in all the world, and the people of Toronto and vicinity are offered a musical opportunity that other less fortunate cities are clamoring for. Right in Boston it is necessary to subscribe for 45 concerts in order to hear this orchestra, and only then at much higher prices than those charged here. There are some good seat locations still available.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SENTINAL

April 11th

NOV 1 - 1926

FINE COLLECTION OF OLD INSTRUMENTS PRESENTED

Boston, Oct. 29, (AP)—A collection of 144 ancient instruments, said to be one of the finest in existence today was presented to the Boston symphony orchestra in memory of Major Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the orchestra, by N. Penrose Hallowell representing a group of anonymous donors.

The collection was made by Henri Casadesus, who in 1918 came from France for a series of concerts with his Society of Ancient Instruments. Serge Koussevitsky, present leader of the orchestra of the Boston symphony, has played the double bass in concertos in which M. Casadesus played his rare viola d'amore. The instruments have been mounted by experts of the Boston museum of fine art in the balcony corridor of Symphony hall.

GLAMOUR OF FLASK

Attorney - General Price Outlines Advantages of Government Control.

UF THE FLUVIVUL

...ll opened with a Mozart Serenade, continued with Debussy and Stravinsky, and climaxed in Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

The orchestra which Mr. Koussevitsky conducts, possesses all the characteristics that we have learned in recent years to associate with the Bostonians. Their tone is dark and the string section seems to have more than the usual amount of substance, but it never seems unduly heavy. In fact, the vitality is quite amazing. In the presentation of Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik", there was so much tonal body to the playing of the graceful compositions that no one who heard it can ever say again that string orchestras, even at their best, leave the impression of being aenemic. The two Debussy Nocturnes that followed were vivid tone pictures. In the nebulous melting and movement of "Clouds", the orchestra somehow conjured before the eyes the colors and shapes of dissolving cloud masses. In that work and "Festivals" which followed it, Mr. Koussevitzky showed what a strong sense his possesses of the pictorial in sound. The approach of the procession in "Festivals", a strange procession of wierd and picturesque figures, was extraordinarily graphic. One felt that Mr. Koussevitzky was not quite at his best in the orchestral suite from the ballet "Petrouchka". Stravinsky has wedded dissonance and melody so that they tell his barbaric tale with startling garishness and uncouthness, and yet it is most stimulating music. It is so full of happenings, scrappy themes and impressions created by tone. One felt that Mr. Koussevitzky put more emphasis on the drama than on the delicately bizarre bits.

It is as an interpreter of Tchaikovsky that Serge Koussevitzky rises to the heights. After all, it is for his surge of emotion that Tchaikovsky is beloved by so many, and also, one must add, blown upon with the disapproval of those who prefer music that is more cerebral and rigidly academic. When Koussevitzky plays the works of Tschaikovsky, he gives you the feeling of a volcano of emotion, barely held within bounds by a dominating but intense will. The opening movement of the Fourth Symphony last night was in itself a gorgeously dramatic tone poem of a turbulent life, called, checked, thwarted by the stern trumpet note of duty. The abandon of the climaxes could only be secured by a man who enters fully into the introspective Slavic temperament of the composer. One never expects to hear anything much more thrilling in a concert hall than the moment in the final movement when the conductor retarded the time ever so slightly for the re-entry of the theme of the horns. The melting suavity of the strings was heard again in the haunting melody of the second movement, and the jolly pizzicato of the Scherzo was exquisitely done. Then in the furious rush of the finale, the conductor swept his audience away. They gave him an ovation when it was finished that only mildly expressed the emotional experience through which they had passed. If Serge Koussevitzky ever brings his band to Toronto again, we hope he will do another Tschaikovsky Symphony. We can think of no other conductor who enters so completely into the Tchaikovsky spirit.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GAZETTE
57
NOV 2 - 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY INTERPRETED NEW AND OLDER MUSIC

Distinguished Audience at Forum Applauded Serge Koussevitzky

ECCENTRIC COMPOSITIONS

Prokofieff's Suite From "Chout" and Respighi's Latest Work Introduce Astonishing Orchestral Effects

New music and old sharply divided the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, played before a very large audience last night in the Forum. The new part comprised the ballet suite from Prokofieff's "Chout" ("Buffoon"), and Respighi's symphonic poem "The Pines of Rome," neither of which had been publicly played in this city. Cesar Franck, Wagner and Berlioz compositions made up the other part.

It was an interesting programme, carried out in a manner to be expected of the famous orchestra under its celebrated leader. Also it was long, and of a nature to heavily tax the artists, but, in spite of obstinate demands for an encore, a demand which culminated in vociferous bravos, M. Koussevitzky declined.

It was Selma Lagerlof, who spoke of music as "the road between heaven and earth." During the playing of Franck's towering symphony in D minor, a glorious and noble dream of perfect music, this could be realized last night. Had there been nothing else on the programme, it would have more than sufficed to prove that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has earned the great reputation it enjoys. To greater heights it would, indeed, be difficult to aspire. The gigantic composition was brought out, so to speak, in all its delicate poetry, in all its overwhelming force, by this ensemble of artists, who are doing so much towards making the city of Boston famous.

The Vorspiel to "Lohengrin," which becomes nothing at all without that enormous feat of orchestral ability to bring out almost constantly the pianissimo-lyrico of what the great composer was inspired to do, was faultlessly played. Wholly without effects of the musical or of melody; but a peculiarly delicate, ethereal tone poem, it is somewhat like the "Rheingold" motive, only far less accentuated. For playing this prelude properly, without making of it just a reading of orchestrated notes, great praise is due M. Koussevitzky and his orchestra.

Berlioz' "Carnaval Romain" overture, the first on the programme, was played with great distinction, and this exhausts the "old" part of the concert.

CONTRAST TO FRANCK.

The Prokofieff suite, divided into four parts, was played after the intermission. It would be hard to find a greater contrast than the Cesar Franck symphony and the music from "Buffoon." The very titles of the four parts were highly novel; "Dance of the Buffoon's Daughters," "In the Tradesman's Bedroom," "The Young Woman is Transformed into a Goat" and "Final Dance."

An impression of "Chout," or rather that part of it which was interpreted last night, is that it was intensely clever and amusing; startling in sudden orchestration contrasts; wierd, yet not without a good deal of harmony. It was a triumph of individual and ensemble work to play this futuristic, fantastic and capricious series of ballet compositions. The first part—"The Dance of the Buffoon's Daughters"—was the least hyper-modern. Into it comes a staccato sort of spasm which provoked the serious-faced M. Koussevitzky himself into laughter. "In the Tradesman's Bedroom," surely the oddest descriptive title to music, was not as odd as it might have been, and was the least interesting of the set of four.

But, "The Young Woman is Transformed into a Goat." Without seeking material from innermost Africa, or from recent American jazz offerings, the man who is responsible for "Buffoon" has succeeded in these days of originality-seeking in finding something original. Music-lovers of the old school undoubtedly sneer at this sort of music; still there is this to be said for it, that it is astounding without being vulgar, funny without being idiotic. The orchestral effects are amazing, and the marvelous blare which forms the last con[illegible] note is a study in what can be [illegible] modern orchestra.

The final dance, whimsical, cataleptic-like, and brimful of bizarre changes from string to wood to brass to tympani and back again to all combined, was amusing—but it was impressive viewed as an orchestral feat.

"Pini di Roma," Respighi's latest "Remarkable novelty," as the programme had it, is remarkable, it must be admitted. This symphonic poem, also, is divided into four parts—"The Pines of the Villa Borghese," "The Pines near a Catacomb," "The Pines of the Janiculum" and "The Pines of the Appian Way."

GRAMOPHONE EMPLOYED.

The introduction of a gramophone, to convey the song of the nightingale, has created some hot discussion among the critics musical. The composer, so reports have it, was not content with wood-wind trills, and insisted upon the revolutionary idea of introducing "canned music" into a symphony orchestra. It seemed to work well last night; though apart from the purely descriptive idea of having birdsong from Roman pines, the composition was not improved.

Not that "The Pines of Rome" is not toneful. It is remarkably beautiful in parts, and highly impressive in descriptive melody. Beginning with a cascade effect, which reminds one of his earlier composition Respighi goes on with a sort of canto funebre, to evoke tall trees by catacombs. The mournful and dirge-like effect was exceedingly well brought out by the orchestra. "The Pines of Janiculum" was less tangible, and chiefly remarkable for the nightingale bit. The finale, however, was magnificent. It conjured forth an unmistakable idea of legions of Fascists, Mussolini-inspired, or Roman warriors marching on to the eternal city.

It was, indeed, a tone-poem worthy of some interesting discussion and also a great deal of praise.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN

NOV 4 1926

Wonderful Collection Of Old Instruments

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has come into permanent possession of a collection of ancient instruments which are named as one of the finest in existence. The collection was given by a group of citizens of Boston, in memory of Henry Lee Higginson.

These rare instruments were assembled by Henri Casadesus, the French musician who has devoted his life to early instruments and their music. Mr. Koussevitzky, whose double bass is a 17th century instrument, has long shared the enthusiasms of M. Casadesus. Years ago the two musicians gave recitals in Moscow, performing early double concertos for double bass and viola d'amour. M. Casadesus visited the United States with his "Societe des Instruments Anciens" in 1918, giving recitals upon a quartet of viols. It was on Mr. Koussevitzky's recommendation that this collection was acquired last spring.

The collection contains some fine specimens of the earliest of string instruments such as the hurdy gurdy, monochord, marine trumpet, some beautiful pearl-inlaid lutes and zithers, some grotesque serpents, richly carved. There is a department of Oriental instruments, some drums with ornamentation beautifully wrought. The viols are among the finest in existence.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NOV 4 - 1926

GETS OLD COLLECTION

Boston Library Given 145 Rare Musical Instruments

Philadelphia Public Ledger

A valuable collection of ancient musical instruments has just been presented to the Boston Public library in memory of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, founder and many years chief supporter of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

These 145 instruments, forming what is known as the Casadesus collection, were assembled by the founder of Society of Ancient Instruments and were purchased by friends of Major Higginson. It includes specimens of the viole d'amour, viol de gamba, many zithers and mandolins, kettle drums to be played on horseback, the "flute de Pan," horns, bagpipes and numerous Oriental instruments.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 14 1926

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, came back to Rochester Nov. 4, after an absence of four years and played its second concert in the Eastman Theatre before a huge audience that filled every seat in the house and most of the available standing room. A. J. Warner wrote in the Rochester Times-Union: "Given the combination of one of the four greatest orchestras in the country and a conductor of intensely dynamic musicianship, whose occasionally erratic temperament was in its best form, and something thrilling in the way of an orchestral fiesta was inevitable — especially with 3,500 eager listeners contributing the tremendous stimulus of their collective spontaneous enthusiasm. The result of these felicific circumstances was an electrifying evening which culminated, at the concert's close, in an ovation for Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians."

THIS CLIPPING FROM EXPRESS
EASTON, PA.

NOV 18 19[illegible]

GOOD MUSIC ON THE AIR

Sir Thomas Beecham, regarded as the foremost English composer and conductor, is reported in a cable dispatch from London to be in a fine state of peevishness. Invited to be guest conductor at a concert of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, Sir Thomas declares that he will clear out of England as quickly as possible to settle in the United States.

Sir Thomas complains that there is no opera in London now and no subsidized orchestra. However, the reason for his greatest dissatisfaction with English music conditions is that musical programs are broadcast. Music over the radio he denounces as "gibbering and whining of goblins and devils."

The United States welcomes and has room for more good musicians, but Sir Thomas should not come with the mistaken idea that in this country musical programs are not broadcast. They are—many of the best of them. The Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra programs are broadcast regularly and those of other orchestras occasionally. Grand opera is broadcast frequently and every evening there is "on the air" much music of good quality and some not so good.

Further, the broadcasting of the best music in this country has only begun. There are good reasons why it should continue and increase. It makes the best music available to millions of persons who, without the radio, would not hear it. And their enjoyment of the music does not interfere in any way with the thousands who are privileged to hear it in opera house or recital hall.

That is not all. The broadcasting of good music increases the number of lovers of good music and distinctly tends to increase the [illegible] concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
BUFFALO, N. Y.

NOV 19 1926

To Hear His Music Though Across Sea

NEW YORK, Nov. 19.—A young musician will listen while a great American orchestra, 3,000 miles distant, plays his composition next Saturday night. The composer is Alexander Tansman, who will wait in the Eiffel Tower in Paris while the big French government station, FL, tries to pick up the radio broadcast of the "Dance of the Sorceress," being presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in America.

The composition was chosen by the famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzy, as the opening number on his symphony program Saturday night. The young composer has arranged with the French station, located in the great steel tower, to try to pick up the broadcast as sent out by one of four powerful stations linked up for the concert—WBZ, WJZ, WGY or WRC.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

NOV 19 1926

PARIS ARRANGES TO PICK UP BOSTON SYMPHONY TOMORROW

Russian Composer Will Also Get Message in Native Tongue Before His Work Receives First Presentation in America

The French government radio station FL, located in the Eiffel tower in Paris, will endeavor to pick up the sixth of the series of Saturday night concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra broadcast by WBZ and its associated stations and Alexandre Tansman, noted symphony composer, will be one of the most interested listeners of the radio audience when the program goes on the air at 8.10 tomorrow evening.

Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress" from the ballet, "The Garden of Paradise," has been selected as the opening number on Saturday's symphony program. The young Russian composer has made arrangements with the French government for station FL to pick up the signals of the Westinghouse station or WJZ, WGY and WRC in the Eiffel tower, where he will be stationed so that he may hear the first presentation in America of his composition by the celebrated orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

After Midnight There

In accordance with the cabled arrangements between Tansman and the symphony management, Nicolai Slonimsky, noted pianist and secretary to Serge Koussevitzky, will take Prof Marshall's place at the microphone to tell the radio audiences something of Tansman's work. He will also play a part of the composition on the piano and extend greetings to Tansman in Russian. It is anticipated that success will attend the transmission with WBZ, WJZ and WGY, three of the most powerful stations in America, and that Tansman will receive the message in Paris about 1.10 a. m.

The other three selections appearing on the program before Beethoven's Fifth Symphony are all examples of modern schools and those interested in the most recent phases of musical development will revel in this part of the program. Between the various numbers Prof Marshall will tell his listeners something about each of the composers. He will devote the entire intermission to a talk on Beethoven's style and an analysis of the Fifth Symphony. Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will assist Prof Marshal in his musical illustrations.

The Program

The complete program is as follows

Tansman....."The Dance of the Sorceress" (From the ballet "The Garden of Paradise" Krasa .....Symphon;
a. March
b. Pastorale
Webern.....Five pieces for orchestra
Walton.....Overture, "Portsmouth Point"
Beethoven..Symphony No 5 in C Minor Op 6
1. Allegro con brio
2. Andante con moto
3. Allegro, Trio
4. Allegro

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE HAVERHILL
MASS.

ISSUE OF

NOV 19 1926

TUESDAY AFTERNOON SYMPHONY SERIES

Boston Organization Plans Special Concerts

A series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians, in Symphony hall, Boston, under its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

This series will be given on five Tuesday afternoons beginning Nov. 30. Since the concerts begin at 3:15 promptly and never last later than 5, they have a large patronage from the subscribers of outlying towns of Boston.

This Tuesday series is the one remaining opportunity for those who wish to become Symphony subscribers, since the other four series of 62 concerts in greater Boston are subscribed by the season to the last seat. To initiates the Tuesday series will offer an especially interesting introduction to symphonic music while being replete with interest, as well, to regular Symphony patrons.

Mr. Koussevitzky is dividing the five programs according to the various important national schools of music. The first program on Nov. 30 will be of German music and will include Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3 Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Strauss' Till Eulenspiegal's Merry Pranks," and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms. There will be a French program including Berlioz' Roman Carnaval Overture; Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," Ravel's "La Valse," and Franck's Symphony in D minor. The Russian program will include the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," numbers from Stravinsky's "Fire Bird," a Suite from Prokofieff's "The Love for Three Oranges," and the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky. The remaining two programs are still to be announced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 20 1926

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to play here in February, recently gave its first concert in four years at Rochester, N. Y., under the direction of Sergei Koussevitsky. More than 3,500 persons were present at the concert, which was given in the huge Eastman theater.

* * *

Eiffel Tower To Listen To Hub Tonight

Syracuse-Niagara Game From WFBL Station This Afternoon

By RAY LAYO.

The French government's station, FL, located in the Eiffel Tower, Paris, will try to pick up the sixth of the series of Saturday night concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra through WBZ, WJZ and WGY at 8:10 o'clock tonight.

Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress," from the ballet, "The Garden of Paradise," has been selected as the opening number. The young Russian composer in Paris has asked the French station to listen for the concert so that he may hear the first presentation in America of his composition.

Beethoven's fifth symphony will conclude the program. The New York Symphony Orchestra, directed by Walter Damrosch, will be heard through the WEAF chain at 9 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS TRIBUNE
DULUTH, MINN.

NOV 21 1926

Me," Junior Male quartet.

Jacques Hoffmann, the violinist and pedagogue of Boston, and for many years a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has resigned from that body after 6 years of service. As solo violinist, leader of the Hoffmann string quartet, ensemble player and coach of two local orchestras—that of the Lincoln House association—he has contributed importantly to the musical life of his city. Mr. Hoffmann will continue to teach and to pursue other musical activities.

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

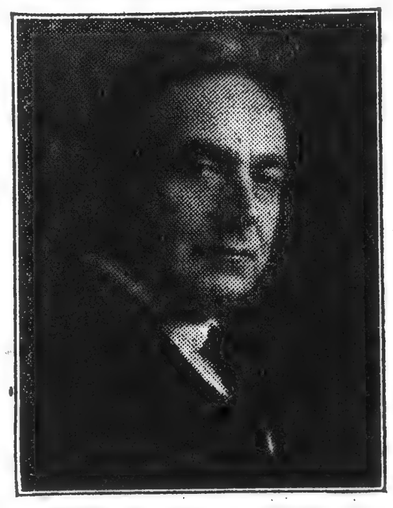
NOV 20 1926

TUESDAY AFTERNOON SERIES ANNOUNCED

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give Five Concerts Beginning Nov. 30.

Attention is called to the new series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians, in Symphony hall, Boston, as a convenient and splendid chance for out-of-town subscribers to enjoy the Boston Symphony orchestra under its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

This series, instituted last year, will be given on five Tuesday afternoons, beginning Nov. 30. Since the concerts begin at 3.15 promptly and never last later than 5 o'clock, they have a very large patronage from the subscribers of outlying towns of Boston.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor

This Tuesday series is the one remaining opportunity for those who wish to become Symphony subscribers, since the other four series of 62 concerts in greater Boston are subscribed by the season to the last seat. To initiates the Tuesday series will offer an especially interesting introduction to symphonic music, while being replete with interest, as well, to regular Symphony patrons.

Mr. Koussevitzky is dividing the five programs according to the various important national schools of music. The first program, on Nov. 30, will be of German music and will include Beethoven's Overture to [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES

NOV 20 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE FRIDAY NIGHT

Third Symphony By Beethoven to Be Presented.

Serge Koussevitzky will open his season of Boston Symphony concerts in Brooklyn, next Friday night in the Academy of Music.

The program will have as its principal number the Third Symphony of Beethhoven, "Eroica." A novelty, which is causing considerable interest when performed elsewhere under the Russian conductor's direction, is the Suite of Prokofieff's Opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." The opera was given by the Chicago Opera company in Chicago and New York.

The closing number will be Respighi's Symphonic Poem, "Pines of Rome." This work describes four historical spots of the eternal city which are set off by ancient pines.

MUSIC NOTES.

Beatrice Herford, who has charmed both American and European audiences for several seasons opened her winter tour last night in the Music Hall of the Academy of Music, Lafayette ave. and St. Felix st.

Miss Herford preceded Ruth Draper with her uncomparable wit and finesse and proved to her large audience last night that she had lost none of her brilliant witticism and talent. In her program last night, Miss Herford presented some entirely new as well as her old favorite monologues, including At the Optician's, The Cook, The Man With a Cold, The English Party, In the Flower Shop, Train Friends and The Telegram.

Her performance last night won for her many new admirers and friends, in addition to the many she has already made in her previous appearances in Brooklyn.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram

NOV 20 1926

Another Bill by the Boston Symphonists

Foremost Instrumentalists Under Direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

ONCE again stations WJZ, WRC and WGY will broadcast the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 8:10 o'clock tonight. For the last three weeks the Saturday night symphony concerts have been furnished by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra playing its Students' Concert Series in Carnegie Hall, New York city.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony in Symphony Hall, Boston, where the radio pick-up will be made by the technical staff of station WBZ.

One of the features of the Boston Symphony Concerts is the notes on the selections to be played, which are given to the radio audience by Professor John P. Marshall, head of the music departments of Boston University and Holy Cross College. For five minutes preceding the first selection and again during the fifteen minute intermission Professor Marshall will give instructive information and comment corresponding to the notes in the programs used by the audience in Symphony Hall. Realizing that the majority of the vast radio audience reside in localities where symphony orchestras and symphonic music are seldom heard, he will make his remarks in nontechnical language.

Professor Marshall was organist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1909 to 1918. During the World War he served as musical aid to the Commanding General of the Northwestern and Western Departments and was appointed assistant musical director of camp music for the entire army. With such an excellent musical background Professor Marshall is well qualified for the task of interpreting the symphony programs for the radio listeners, and his comments are certain to make the symphony programs more valuable and appreciated by the listeners.

NEWS
NEWARK, N. J.

NOV 20 1926

Boston Symphony in Montclair

The scene of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's ministrations will be the assembly hall in the Montclair High School and the date is next Wednesday night. The coming concert will be the fourth employing it in the mountain town. Its first and second concerts there were directed by Pierre Monteux, the French conductor, who did so much to reestablish its status as one of the leading organizations of its kind in the country after it had suffered in its personnel and clientele by the enforced withdrawal of its then director, Dr. Karl Muck, shortly after America entered the World War.

Under Serge Koussevitzky, who succeeded Mr. Monteux and will direct the performances Wednesday night, it has fully regained its former prestige. Such is the interest in its concerts in New York this season that seats for them cannot be had now, a fact that speaks eloquently of its drawing power. The reappearance of the talented Russian, who made his Montclair debut two years ago, will be heartily greeted. His extraordinary ability as revealed on that visit aroused enthusiasm.

The program to be presented follows:

Symphony No. 3 in E flat major
"Eroica" .....Beethoven
Allegro con brio, Marcia Funebre, Scherzo, trio and finale.
Suite from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges".....Prokofieff
Les Ridicules, Scene Infernale, Marche, Scherzo, Trio and Finale.
"La Fruite."
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .....Wagner

* * *

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 14 1926

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, came back to Rochester Nov. 4, after an absence of four years and played its second concert in the Eastman Theatre before a huge audience that filled every seat in the house and most of the available standing room. A. J. Warner wrote in the Rochester Times-Union: "Given the combination of one of the four greatest orchestras in the country and a conductor of intensely dynamic musicianship, whose occasionally erratic temperament was in its best form, and something thrilling in the way of an orchestral fiesta was inevitable—especially with 3,500 eager listeners contributing the tremendous stimulus of their collective spontaneous enthusiasm. The result of these felicific circumstances was an electrifying evening which culminated, at the concert's close, in an ovation for Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians."

THIS CLIPPING FROM EXPRESS
EASTON, PA.

Nov 18 19[illegible]

GOOD MUSIC ON THE AIR

Sir Thomas Beecham, regarded as the foremost English composer and conductor, is reported in a cable dispatch from London to be in a fine state of peevishness. Invited to be guest conductor at a concert of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, Sir Thomas declares that he will clear out of England as quickly as possible to settle in the United States.

Sir Thomas complains that there is no opera in London now and no subsidized orchestra. However, the reason for his greatest dissatisfaction with English music conditions is that musical programs are broadcast. Music over the radio he denounces as "gibbering and whining of goblins and devils."

The United States welcomes and has room for more good musicians, but Sir Thomas should not come with the mistaken idea that in this country musical programs are not broadcast. They are—many of the best of them. The Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra programs are broadcast regularly and those of other orchestras occasionally. Grand opera is broadcast frequently and every evening there is "on the air" much music of good quality and some not so good.

Further, the broadcasting of the best music in this country has only begun. There are good reasons why it should continue and increase. It makes the best music available to millions of persons who, without the radio, would not hear it. And their enjoyment of the music does not interfere in any way with the thousands who are privileged to hear it in opera house or recital hall.

That is not all. The broadcasting of good music increases the number of lovers of good music and distinctly tends to increase the audiences at concerts and operatic performances [illegible] should

Nov

To Hear His Music Though Across Sea

NEW YORK, Nov. 19.—A young musician will listen while a great American orchestra, 3,000 miles distant, plays his composition next Saturday night. The composer is Alexander Tansman, who will wait in the Eiffel Tower in Paris while the big French government station, FL, tries to pick up the radio broadcast of the "Dance of the Sorceress," being presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in America.

The composition was chosen by the famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzy, as the opening number on his symphony program Saturday night. The young composer has arranged with the French station, located in the great steel tower, to try to pick up the broadcast as sent out by one of four powerful stations linked up for the concert—WBZ, WJZ, WGY or WRC.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

NOV 19 1926

PARIS ARRANGES TO PICK UP BOSTON SYMPHONY TOMORROW

Russian Composer Will Also Get Message in Native Tongue Before His Work Receives First Presentation in America

The French government radio station FL, located in the Eiffel tower in Paris, will endeavor to pick up the sixth of the series of Saturday night concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra broadcast by WBZ and its associated stations and Alexandre Tansman, noted symphony composer, will be one of the most interested listeners of the radio audience when the program goes on the air at 8.10 tomorrow evening.

Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress" from the ballet, "The Garden of Paradise," has been selected as the opening number on Saturday's symphony program. The young Russian composer has made arrangements with the French government for station FL to pick up the signals of the Westinghouse station or WJZ, WGY and WRC in the Eiffel tower, where he will be stationed so that he may hear the first presentation in America of his composition by the celebrated orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

After Midnight There

In accordance with the cabled arrangements between Tansman and the symphony management, Nicolai Slonimsky, noted pianist and secretary to Serge Koussevitzky, will take Prof Marshall's place at the microphone to tell the radio audiences something of Tansman's work. He will also play a part of the composition on the piano and extend greetings to Tansman in Russian. It is anticipated that success will attend the transmission with WBZ, WJZ and WGY, three of the most powerful stations in America, and that Tansman will receive the message in Paris about 1.10 a. m.

The other three selections appearing on the program before Beethoven's Fifth Symphony are all examples of modern schools and those interested in the most recent phases of musical development will revel in this part of the program. Between the various numbers Prof Marshall will tell his listeners something about each of the composers. He will devote the entire intermission to a talk on Beethoven's style and an analysis of the Fifth Symphony. Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will assist Prof Marshall in his musical illustrations.

The Program

The complete program is as follows

Tansman....."The Dance of the Sorceress"
(From the ballet "The Garden of Paradise" Krasa .....Symphony
a. March
b. Pastorale
Webern.....Five pieces for orchestra
Walton.....Overture, "Portsmouth Point"
Beethoven..Symphony No 5 in C Minor Op 6
1. Allegro con brio
2. Andante con moto
3. Allegro, Trio
4. Allegro

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE HAVERHILL
MASS.

ISSUE OF

NOV 19 1926

TUESDAY AFTERNOON SYMPHONY SERIES

Boston Organization Plans Special Concerts

A series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians, in Symphony hall, Boston, under its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

This series will be given on five Tuesday afternoons beginning Nov. 30. Since the concerts begin at 3:15 promptly and never last later than 5, they have a large patronage from the subscribers of outlying towns of Boston.

This Tuesday series is the one remaining opportunity for those who wish to become Symphony subscribers, since the other four series of 62 concerts in greater Boston are subscribed by the season to the last seat. To initiates the Tuesday series will offer an especially interesting introduction to symphonic music while being replete with interest, as well, to regular Symphony patrons.

Mr. Koussevitzky is dividing the five programs according to the various important national schools of music. The first program on Nov. 30 will be of German music and will include Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegal's Merry Pranks," and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms. There will be a French program including Berlioz' Roman Carnaval Overture; Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," Ravel's "La Valse," and Franck's Symphony in D minor. The Russian program will include the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," numbers from Stravinsky's "Fire Bird," a Suite from Prokofieff's "The Love for Three Oranges," and the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky. The remaining two programs are still to be announced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 20 1926

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to play here in February, recently gave its first concert in four years at Rochester, N. Y., under the direction of Sergei Koussevitsky. More than 3,500 persons were present at the concert, which was given in the huge Eastman theater.

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

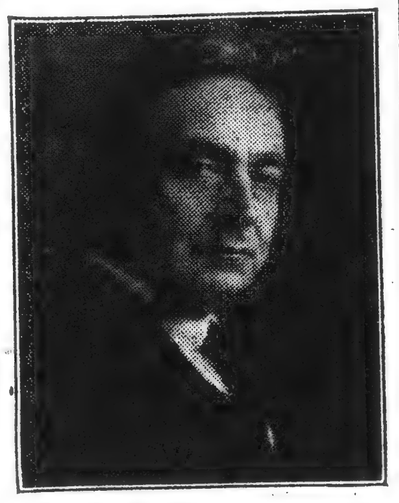
NOV 20 1926

TUESDAY AFTERNOON SERIES ANNOUNCED

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give Five Concerts Beginning Nov. 30.

Attention is called to the new series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians, in Symphony hall, Boston, as a convenient and splendid chance for out-of-town subscribers to enjoy the Boston Symphony orchestra under its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

This series, instituted last year, will be given on five Tuesday afternoons, beginning Nov. 30. Since the concerts begin at 3.15 promptly and never last later than 5 o'clock, they have a very large patronage from the subscribers of outlying towns of Boston.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor

This Tuesday series is the one remaining opportunity for those who wish to become Symphony subscribers, since the other four series of 62 concerts in greater Boston are subscribed by the season to the last seat. To initiates the Tuesday series will offer an especially interesting introduction to symphonic music, while being replete with interest, as well, to regular Symphony patrons.

Mr. Koussevitzky is dividing the five programs according to the various important national schools of music. The first program, on Nov. 30, will be of German music and will include Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the Fouth Symmony of Brahms.

Season tickets at the popular prices of $4, $6 and $9 for the series, are available at Symphony hall, or may be secured by mail order.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

NOV 20 1926

Eiffel Tower To Listen To Hub Tonight

Syracuse-Niagara Game From WFBL Station This Afternoon

By RAY LAYO.

The French government's station, FL, located in the Eiffed Tower, Paris, will try to pick up the sixth of the series of Saturday night concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra through WBZ, WJZ and WGY at 8:10 o'clock tonight.

Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress," from the ballet, "The Garden of Paradise," has been selected as the opening number. The young Russian composer in Paris has asked the French station to listen for the concert so that he may hear the first presentation in America of his composition.

Beethoven's fifth symphony will conclude the program. The New York Symphony Orchestra, directed by Walter Damrosch, will be heard through the WEAF chain at 9 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS TRIBUNE
DULUTH, MINN.

NOV 21 1926

Me," Junior Male quartet.

Jacques Hoffmann, the violinist and pedagogue of Boston, and for many years a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has resigned from that body after 6 years of service. As solo violinist, leader of the Hoffmann string quartet, ensemble player and coach of two local orchestras—that of the Lincoln House association—he has contributed importantly to the musical life of his city. Mr. Hoffmann will continue to teach and to pursue other musical activities.

Spigia's Symph[illegible]
Rome." This work describes four historical spots of the eternal city which are set off by ancient pines.

MUSIC NOTES.

Beatrice Herford, who has charmed both American and European audiences for several seasons opened her winter tour last night in the Music Hall of the Academy of Music, Lafayette ave. and St. Felix st.

Miss Herford preceded Ruth Draper with her uncomparable wit and finesse and proved to her large audience last night that she had lost none of her brilliant witticism and talent. In her program last night, Miss Herford presented some entirely new as well as her old favorite monologues, including At the Optician's, The Cook, The Man With a Cold, The English Party, In the Flower Shop, Train Friends and The Telegram.

Her performance last night won for her many new admirers and friends, in addition to the many she has already made in her previous appearances in Brooklyn.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram

NOV 20 1926

Another Bill by the Boston Symphonists

Foremost Instrumentalists Under Direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

ONCE again stations WJZ, WRC and WGY will broadcast the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 8:10 o'clock tonight. For the last three weeks the Saturday night symphony concerts have been furnished by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, playing its Students' Concert Series in Carnegie Hall, New York city.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony in Symphony Hall, Boston, where the radio pick-up will be made by the technical staff of station WEZ.

One of the features of the Boston Symphony Concerts is the notes on the selections to be played, which are given to the radio audience by Professor John P. Marshall, head of the music departments of Boston University and Holy Cross College. For five minutes preceding the first selection and again during the fifteen minute intermission Professor Marshall will give instructive information and comment corresponding to the notes in the programs used by the audience in Symphony Hall. Realizing that the majority of the vast radio audience reside in localities where symphony orchestras and symphonic music are seldom heard, he will make his remarks in nontechnical language.

Professor Marshall was organist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1909 to 1918. During the World War he served as musical aid to the Commanding General of the Northwestern and Western Departments and was appointed assistant musical director of camp music for the entire army. With such an excellent musical background Professor Marshall is well qualified for the task of interpreting the symphony programs for the radio listeners, and his comments are certain to make the symphony programs more valuable and appreciated by the listeners.

NEWS
NEWARK, N. J.

NOV 20 1926

Boston Symphony in Montclair

The scene of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's ministrations will be the assembly hall in the Montclair High School and the date is next Wednesday night. The coming concert will be the fourth employing it in the mountain town. Its first and second concerts there were directed by Pierre Monteux, the French conductor, who did so much to reestablish its status as one of the leading organizations of its kind in the country after it had suffered in its personnel and clientele by the enforced withdrawal of its then director, Dr. Karl Muck, shortly after America entered the World War.

Under Serge Koussevitzky, who succeeded Mr. Monteux and will direct the performances Wednesday night, it has fully regained its former prestige. Such is the interest in its concerts in New York this season that seats for them cannot be had now, a fact that speaks eloquently of its drawing power. The reappearance of the talented Russian, who made his Montclair debut two years ago, will be heartily greeted. His extraordinary ability as revealed on that visit aroused enthusiasm.

The program to be presented follows:

Symphony No. 3 in E flat major
"Eroica" .....Beethoven
Allegro con brio, Marcia Funebre, Scherzo, trio and finale.
Suite from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges".....Prokofieff
Les Ridicules, Scene Infernale, Marche, Scherzo, Trio and Finale.
"La Fruite."
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .....Wagner

53

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVENING POST
NOV 20 1926

TWO suites from scores of Serge Prokofieff are to have their first performances in New York, in this form, at the opening Boston Symphony concerts of the season here, in Carnegie Hall next week. Serge Koussevitzky will present music from the opera "The Love for Three Oranges" at the Thursday evening performance, and the suite from the ballet "Chout" ("Buffoon") on Saturday afternoon. "The Love for Three Oranges" was produced by the Chicago Opera Company in Chicago on December 30, 1921, and at the Manhattan Opera House in New York on February 14, 1922. The suite is made up of five numbers which have been edited by Albert Spalding. They include "Les Ridicules," "March," "Scherzo," "The Prince and the Princess," and "The Flight."

"Chout," which is numbered opus 21, was originally a ballet in six scenes on a bizarre story on the doings of buffoons. It was produced by Diaghilev's Russian ballet in Paris and in London in 1921. The ballet suite was performed for the first time at Brussels in 1924. This will not be, strictly speaking, the first New York performance of this music, since it was presented at the Neighborhood Playhouse on March 6, 1924. The scenes of the suite include Dance of the Buffoon's Daughters, In the Merchant's Bedroom, the Young Woman Is Turned Into a Goat, and Final Dance. This suite had its first Boston performance at the opening of Koussevitzky's season there on last October 8. Other Thursday numbers will be Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and "Egmont" overture and Respighi's "Pines of Rome." The rest of the Saturday program will be Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Mozarth's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Roussel's "Opera Ballet Suite."

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 21 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Second Providence Concert of Season Tuesday Night.—Church Choirs Sing Special Music Today.—McCormick Coming

Perhaps lacking in quantity but possessing all that could be asked in quality are this week's musical events in Providence, crowded into two days, today and Tuesday. The big event, naturally, is the second concert here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which takes place Tuesday evening at 8:15 at the Albee Theatre. Serge Koussevitzky will wield the baton and the programme will include a suite from Roussel's opera-ballet, "Padmavati," which was introduced to American audiences for the first time this fall.

The Symphony's programme, as finally announced, will not only include the newly introduced Roussel composition, which comes in the second half, but will devote the entire first section to two Beethoven works, his overture to Goethe's "Egmont" and the third symphony in E-flat, "Eroica," including all four movements. The final numbers will be Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," and his prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

From Providence, the orchestra goes to New York for its first metropolitan concert of the season in Carnegie Hall. There is will also present Beethoven's "Eroica." Respighi's "Pines of Rome" and Prokofieff's suite from "The Love for Three Oranges" will be added.

The next big musical event for Providence will be the recital of John McCormick Sunday afternoon, Dec. 5, at the Majestic Theatre.

To-day's local musical events will begin with a piano recital by James Gray at 3:30, at the Providence Plantа-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
NOV 21 1926

Koussevitsky Premiere

Bostonians Open Series in Borough on Friday—Other Academy Events

The first concert in the series of six by the Boston Symphony Society will be given at the Academy on Friday night. In accordance with the Beethoven memorial observance this year, Serge Koussevitsky has selected the "Eroica" as the opening number on his first program. Excerpts from Prokofieff's "Love of Three Oranges" will also be given as will Respighi's "Pines of Rome," the first time here by this orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OBSERVER DISPATCH
UTICA, N. Y.
NOV 20 1926

FAMED BOSTON SYMPHONY ON AIR TONIGHT

Eifel Tower Will Try to Pick Up Broadcasts of Sixth Concert of Series from WBZ and Other Stations.

The French government radio station, FL, located at the Eifel Tower in Paris will endeavor to pick up the sixth of the series of Saturday night concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast by WBZ and its associatd stations and Alexandre Tansman, noted symphony composer, will be one of the most interested listeners of the radio audience when the program goes on the air at 8:10 o'clock tonight.

Tansman's "Dance of the Socceress" from the ballet, "The Garden of Paradise," has been selected as the opening number on this evening's program. The young Russian composer has made arrangements with the French government for Station FL to pick up the signals of the Westinghouse stations WJZ, WGY or WRC in the Eifel Tower where he will be stationed so that he may hear the first presentation in America of his composition by the celebrated orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

In accordance with the cabled arrangements between Tansman and the symphony management, Nicola Slonimsky, noted pianist and secretary to Serge Koussevitzky, wil take Professor Marshall's place a the microphone to tell the radic audiences something of Tansman's work. He will also play a part o the composition on the piano and extend greetings to Tansman in Russian. It is anticipated that success will attend the transmissior and that Tansman will receive the message in Paris about 1:10 a. m.

The other three selections appearing on the program before Beethoven's Fifth Symphony are al examples of moden schools and those interested in the most recent phases of musical development will revel in this part of the program. Between the various numbers, Professor Marshall will tell his listeners something about each of the composers. He will devote the entire intermission to a talk on Beethoven's style and an analysis of the Fifth Symphony.

Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will assist Professor Marshall in his musical illustrations.

The program will come to listeners through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago. The complete program is as follows:

"The Dance of the Sorceress" from the ballet "The Garden of Paradise" .....Tansman
Symphony .....Krasa
a. March
b. Pastorale
Five pieces for orchestra .....Webern
Overture, "Portsmouth Point" .....Walton
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 67 .....Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio
II. Andante con moto
III. Allegro: Trio.
IV. Allegro

JOURNAL
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
NOV 20 1926

QUINBY MUSIC ATTRACTION TONIGHT

The French Government radio station FL, located at the Eifel Tower in Paris, will endeavor to pick up the sixth of the series of Saturday night concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast by WBZ and its associated stations and Alexandre Tansman, noted symphony composer, will be one of the most interested listeners of the radio audience when the program goes on the air at 8:10 o'clock tonight.

Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress" from the ballet, "The Garden of Paradise," has been selected as the opening number on this evening's program. The young Russian composer has made arrangements with the French Government for Station FL to pick up the signals of the Westinghouse station or WJZ, WGY or WRC in the Eifel Tower where he will be stationed so that he may hear the first presentation in America of his composition by the celebrated orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

In accordance with the cabled arrangements between Tansman and the Symphony management, Nicolai Slonimsky, noted pianist and secretary to Serge Koussevitzky, will take Professor Marshall's place at the microphone to tell the radio audiences something of Tansman's work. He will also play a part of the composition on the piano and extend greetings to Tansman in Russian. It is anticipated that success will attend the transmission and that Tansman will receive the message in Paris about 1:10 a. m.

The other three selections appearing on the program before Beethoven's Fifth Symphony are all examples of modern schools and those interested in the most recent phases of musical development will revel in this part of the program. Between the various numbers, Professor Marshall will tell his listeners something about each of the composers. He will devote the entire intermission to a talk on Beethoven's style and an analysis of the Fifth Symphony.

Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will assist Professor Marshall in his musical illustrations.

The program will come to listener sthrough the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago. The complete program is as follows:

"The Dance of the Sorceress" from the ballet "The Garden of Paradise" .....Tansman
Symphony .....Krasa
a. March.
b. Pastorale.
Five pieces for orchestra .....Webern
Overture, "Portsmouth Point" .....Walton
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 67 .....Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Allegro: Trio.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
NOV 24 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Nothing, save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, than the circumstances of his career. He first conducted as a boy of twelve, when he led the local theater orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in northern Russia. Attending the conservatory at Moscow, he was required to study an instrument. He chose the doublebass, and the noted master, Ramboussec, was his teacher. His proficiency upon this unusual instrument became so extraordinary that he toured all of Europe and became famous before he was even known as a conductor. Koussevitsky's abilities, indeed, were not of the sort to be so confined to a limited field, and from 1909 he devoted all his energies to conducting. He organized his own symphony orchestra in Moscow, which soon came to be considered the finest in Russia. In Moscow and Petrograd he conducted the classics, gave Beethoven, Bach, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, and other festivals each season, and championed works by young composers then unknown but since accepted.

The advance sale is now in progress for the Hartford concert, February 6, at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Reservations can be made by phone 2-6147. Frank A. Sedgwick's direction. It is advisable to secure good locations of seats at this time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 21 1926

Four Masterpieces and a Novelty in Symphony Programme

Written for the Sunday Journal
By WARREN STOREY SMITH.

Four acknowledged masterpieces stand on the programme that Mr. Koussevitzky has prepared for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening. Of the fifth, the suite drawn from Albert Roussel's oriental opera-ballet "Padmavati," it may only be said that time has yet to decide the place that this and other works from this singular French composer are to occupy in the world's music. At least Roussel is no stealer of other men's thunder. His voice is his own. He is beyond disputing a master-craftsman, and his long sojourn in the Orient has endowed him with the authority to treat in music of an Eastern subject. This music from "Padmavati" is exotic, but hardly in the conventional exotic manner: not for Roussel are the stock tricks of "oriental colors" that every tyro composer now has at his fingerends. The separate numbers of this suite, not hitherto played in Providence, are the Prelude to Act 1: "Danse guerriere" and "Danse des Femmes Esclaves."

So much for the novelty of the evening. The masterpieces, all familiar music, are Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," last played by the Boston Orchestra in Providence at a concert of the Music League May 23, 1924, but unheard at the regular series of concerts since November, 1917, and that composer's "Eroica" Symphony, last played in Providence just five years ago, in November, 1921, together with Wagner's Preludes to "Lohengrin" and to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," heard here more recently, the former in April, 1925, the latter no longer ago than last March.

Like Wagner's "Ring" and Berlioz's "Frantasitc" Symphony, Beethoven's "Eroica" is one of those scores for which there was no precedent, whose coming no earlier work by the same or any other composer might have foretold. The third of Beethoven's symphonies, the "Eroica" is almost as far removed from its two predecessors as it is from the most important symphonies of Mozart or of Haydn, and as with other compositions of a revolutionary character, the "Eroica" was not understood by its first hearers. More than one commentator expressed the hope that Beethoven would revert to his earlier and simpler style.

Except, however, for its essential vigor and a certain heroic utterance that Beethoven's predecessors hard not commanded, the opening of this "Eroica" could scarcely have surprised that Viennese audience of 1804. Indeed, the chief theme of the first movement bears an almost note-for-note resemblance to a melody in a youthful opera of Mozart's "Bastien and Bastienne," and while somewhat bolder in outline and in harmony, the second and the closing subjects were hardly radical. But once his exposition is behind him and Beethoven is fairly launched upon the development section the boldness, the titanic strength that were a new voice in symphonic music make themselves felt. Mark those loud and clamorous chords that even to-day sound stridently dissonant! And what harmonic audacity is shown in that hushed passage just before the reprise of the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVENING WORLD
NOV 27 1926

FOUR ORCHESTRAS

With the Boston Symphony Orchestra's two concerts at Carnegie Hall this week, New York has renewed its acquaintance with the four orchestras which present regular seasons of concerts in this city. Grading them according to merit, on the showing made thus far, is a task of singular facility. Almost automatically they fall into this order—Philadelphia, Philharmonic, Boston and New York Symphony. Their leaders rank in the same order—Stokowski, Mengelberg, Koussevitsky and Damrosch. The reason why the first pair neighbors the second so closely in print is simply that there are not more orchestras.

One of the causes for the supremacy of Mr. Stokowski's organization is his consciousness that an orchestra is an instrument and not a dinmaking apparatus. At the most dramatic crises, he keeps the tone within the realm of musical sound. He accomplishes this feat by a means so obvious that it is a wonder other conductors do not discover it.

He is well aware that volume is a relative thing. So, by starting his gamut of dynamics at a pianissimo, he obtains with mere forte climaxes which another director, beginning with a mezzo-piano, can obtain only with a fortissimo. The result is that, acoustically speaking, the Philadelphia Orchestra is preternaturally well-bred. It can speak with resonant vigor, but it never brawls.

heard-of length. Nor is the suceeding Funeral March exactly laconic. In so extended a threnody a lesser composer might easily achieve a sort of lugurious monotony. Not so Beethoven. To the mournful yet impressive first section there suceceeds a trio that breathes consolation. The march returns: its themes undergo development and the mood changes from that of lamentation to one of heroic proclamation, almost of exultation. Then by way of coda the funeral march proper is heard once again.

Less significant than the other movements the Scherzo is nevertheless a fine example of its particular species, and the bold horn fanfares of the trio are still stirring to hear.

Of singular construction is the Finale, a set of variations in which the bass is announced and twice varied before the melody itself appears. These variations are exceedingly free in form. Much use is made of the fugal style of treatment, and toward the end there is a sonorous and uplifting proclamation of the chief melody.

The "Eroica," as is generally known, was originally dedicated to Napoleon, but when his idol had himself crowned emperor, Beethoven in disgust erased the dedication.

Also in heroic vein is the Overture to "Egmont," Goethe's drama of the great patriot of the Netherlands. Here in the introduction we may hear the lamentations of a proud people oppressed by the tyrannous yoke of Spain, while the Allegro may be taken as a portrait of Egmont himself and the coda is a paean of triumphant rejoicing.

It was Beethoven who, through his Overtures to "Egmont," Coriolanus and "Leonore," showed Wagner how to condense a drama into a few momenis of instrumental music. Such an epitome is the glorious Prelude to the "Mastersingers." In it we hear first the music of the worthy burghers themselves, then Walther is introduced by the melody of his prize song. There is the conflict of these opposing forces the hostile carping of Beckmesser, symbol for Wagner's own critics, is heralded by a shrill caricature of the mastersinger-motive. In the end comes reconciliation and jubilation.

The beautiful "Lohengrin" Prelude, on the other hand, is simple in design. A single poetic idea dominates it—the descent from heaven to earth and the reascending to the heights of a company of angels bearing the Holy Grail. And thus the music, beginning in the ethereal tones of divided violins, gradually swells to the full-toned voice of the whole orchestra, then diminishes, to end as it began.

WARREN STOREY SMITH.

NEW YORK
BROOKLYN EAGLE
NOV 21 1926

Boston Orchestra And Opera for Brooklyn Week

SERGE KOUSSEWITSKY will conduct the first of his concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening of this week. The program is purely orchestral, calling for the aid of neither vocal not instrumental soloist. Two works by Beethoven precede the intermission: the "Egmont" Overture and the "Eroica" Symphony. Later in the evening Mr. Koussewitsky will make another of his efforts to popularize the music of Prokofieff by presenting an orchestral suite derived from that composer's opera, "The Love of Three Oranges." The last number on the program will be Respighi's symphonic poem, "The Pines of Rome," first performed in America last season under the direction of Arturo Toscanini.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVENING POST
NOV 20 1926

TWO suites from scores of Serge Prokofieff are to have their first performances in New York, in this form, at the opening Boston Symphony concerts of the season here, in Carnegie Hall next week. Serge Koussevitzky will present music from the opera "The Love for Three Oranges" at the Thursday evening performance, and the suite from the ballet "Chout" ("Buffoon") on Saturday afternoon. "The Love for Three Oranges" was produced by the Chicago Opera Company in Chicago on December 30, 1921, and at the Manhattan Opera House in New York on February 14, 1922. The suite is made up of five numbers which have been edited by Albert Spalding. They include "Les Ridicules," "March," "Scherzo," "The Prince and the Princess," and "The Flight."

"Chout," which is numbered opus 21, was originally a ballet in six scenes on a bizarre story on the doings of buffoons. It was produced by Diaghilev's Russian ballet in Paris and in London in 1921. The ballet suite was performed for the first time at Brussels in 1924. This will not be, strictly speaking, the first New York performance of this music, since it was presented at the Neighborhood Playhouse on March 6, 1924. The scenes of the suite include Dance of the Buffoon's Daughters, In the Merchant's Bedroom, the Young Woman Is Turned Into a Goat, and Final Dance. This suite had its first Boston performance at the opening of Koussevitzky's season there on last October 8. Other Thursday numbers will be Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and "Egmont" overture and Respighi's "Pines of Rome." The rest of the Saturday program will be Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Mozarth's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Roussel's "Opera Ballet Suite."

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 21 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Second Providence Concert of Season Tuesday Night.—Church Choirs Sing Special Music To-day.—McCormick Coming

Perhaps lacking in quantity but possessing all that could be asked in quality are this week's musical events in Providence, crowded into two days, today and Tuesday. The big event, naturally, is the second concert here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which takes place Tuesday evening at 8:15 at the Albee Theatre. Serge Koussevitzky will wield the baton and the programme will include a suite from Roussel's opera-ballet, "Padmavati," which was introduced to American audiences for the first time this fall.

The Symphony's programme, as finally announced, will not only include the newly introduced Roussel composition, which comes in the second half, but will devote the entire first section to two Beethoven works, his overture to Goethe's "Egmont" and the third symphony in E-flat, "Eroica," including all four movements. The final numbers will be Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," and his prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

From Providence, the orchestra goes to New York for its first metropolitan concert of the season in Carnegie Hall. There is will also present Beethoven's "Eroica." Respighi's "Pines of Rome" and Prokofieff's suite from "The Love for Three Oranges" will be added.

The next big musical event for Providence will be the recital of John McCormick Sunday afternoon, Dec. 5, at the Majestic Theatre.

To-day's local musical events will begin with a piano recital by James Gray at 3:30, at the Providence Plantat... choir of the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
NOV 21 1926

Koussevitsky Premiere

Bostonians Open Series in Borough on Friday—Other Academy Events

The first concert in the series of six by the Boston Symphony Society will be given at the Academy on Friday night. In accordance with the Beethoven memorial observance this year, Serge Koussevitsky has selected the "Eroica" as the opening number on his first program. Excerpts from Prokofieff's "Love of Three Oranges" will also be given as will Respighi's "Pines of Rome," the first time here by this orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OBSERVER DISPATCH
UTICA, N. Y.
NOV 20 1926

FAMED BOSTON SYMPHONY ON AIR TONIGHT

Eifel Tower Will Try to Pick Up Broadcasts of Sixth Concert of Series from WBZ and Other Stations.

The French government radio station, FL, located at the Eifel Tower in Paris will endeavor to pick up the sixth of the series of Saturday night concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast by WBZ and its associatd stations and Alexandre Tansman, noted symphony composer, will be one of the most interested listeners of the radio audience when the program goes on the air at 8:10 o'clock tonight.

Tansman's "Dance of the Socceress" from the ballet, "The Garden of Paradise," has been selected as the opening number on this evening's program. The young Russian composer has made arrangements with the French government for Station FL to pick up the signals of the Westinghouse stations WJZ, WGY or WRC in the Eifel Tower where he will be stationed so that he may hear the first presentation in America of his composition by the celebrated orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

In accordance with the cabled arrangements between Tansman and the symphony management, Nicola Slonimsky, noted pianist and secretary to Serge Koussevitzky, wil take Professor Marshall's place a the microphone to tell the radi audiences something of Tansman's work. He will also play a part o the composition on the piano and extend greetings to Tansman ir Russian. It is anticipated that success will attend the transmissior and that Tansman will receive the message in Paris about 1:10 a. m.

The other three selections appearing on the program before Beethoven's Fifth Symphony are al examples of moden schools and those interested in the most recent phases of musical development will revel in this part of the program. Between the various numbers, Professor Marshall will tell his listeners something about each of the composers. He will devote the entire intermission to a talk on Beethoven's style and an analysis of the Fifth Symphony.

Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will assist Professor Marshall in his musical illustrations.

The program will come to listeners through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago. The complete program is as follows:

"The Dance of the Sorceress" from the ballet "The Garden of Paradise" ..... Tansman
Symphony ..... Krasa
a. March.
b. Pastorale.
Five pieces for orchestra .... Webern
Overture, "Portsmouth Point" Walton
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 67 ..... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Allegro; Trio.
IV. Allegro

JOURNAL
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
NOV 20 1926

QUINBY MUSIC ATTRACTION TONIGHT

The French Government radio station FL, located at the Eifel Tower in Paris, will endeavor to pick up the sixth of the series of Saturday night concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast by WBZ and its associated stations and Alexandre Tansman, noted symphony composer, will be one of the most interested listeners of the radio audience when the program goes on the air at 8:10 o'clock tonight.

Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress" from the ballet, "The Garden of Paradise," has been selected as the opening number on this evening's program. The young Russian composer has made arrangements with the French Government for Station FL to pick up the signals of the Westinghouse station or WJZ, WGY or WRC in the Eifel Tower where he will be stationed so that he may hear the first presentation in America of his composition by the celebrated orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

In accordance with the cabled arrangements between Tansman and the Symphony management, Nicolai Slonimsky, noted pianist and secretary to Serge Koussevitzky, will take Professor Marshall's place at the microphone to tell the radio audiences something of Tansman's work. He will also play a part of the composition on the piano and extend greetings to Tansman in Russian. It is anticipated that success will attend the transmission and that Tansman will receive the message in Paris about 1:10 a. m.

The other three selections appearing on the program before Beethoven's Fifth Symphony are all examples of modern schools and those interested in the most recent phases of musical development will revel in this part of the program. Between the various numbers, Professor Marshall will tell his listeners something about each of the composers. He will devote the entire intermission to a talk on Beethoven's style and an analysis of the Fifth Symphony.

Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will assist Professor Marshall in his musical illustrations.

The program will come to listener sthrough the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago. The complete program is as follows:

"The Dance of the Sorceress" from the ballet "The Garden of Paradise" ..... Tansman
Symphony ..... Krasa
a. March.
b. Pastorale.
Five pieces for orchestra .... Webern
Overture, "Portsmouth Point" Walton
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 67 ..... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Allegro; Trio.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
NOV 24 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Nothing, save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, than the circumstances of his career. He first conducted as a boy of twelve, when he led the local theater orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in northern Russia. Attending the conservatory at Moscow, he was required to study an instrument. He chose the doublebass, and the noted master, Ramboussec, was his teacher. His proficiency upon this unusual instrument became so extraordinary that he toured all of Europe and becamo famous before he was even known as a conductor. Koussevitsky's abilities, indeed, were not of the sort to be so confined to a limited field, and from 1909 he devoted all his energies to conducting. He organized his own symphony orchestra in Moscow, which soon came to be considered the finest in Russia. In Moscow and Petrograd he conducted the classics, gave Beethoven, Bach, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, and other festivals each season, and championed works by young composers then unknown but since accepted.

The advance sale is now in progress for the Hartford concert, February 6, at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Reservations can be made by phone 2-6147. Frank A. Sedgwick's direction. It is advisable to secure good locations of seats at this time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 21 1926

53

Four Masterpieces and a Novelty in Symphony Programme

Written for the Sunday Journal
By WARREN STOREY SMITH.

Four acknowledged masterpieces stand on the programme that Mr. Koussevitzky has prepared for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening. Of the fifth, the suite drawn from Albert Roussel's oriental opera-ballet "Padmavati," it may only be said that time has yet to decide the place that this and other works from this singular French composer are to occupy in the world's music. At least Roussel is no stealer of other men's thunder. His voice is his own. He is beyond disputing a master-craftsman, and his long sojourn in the Orient has endowed him with the authority to treat in music of an Eastern subject. This music from "Padmavati" is exotic, but hardly in the conventional exotic manner: not for Roussel are the stock tricks of "oriental colors" that every tyro composer now has at his fingerends. The separate numbers of this suite, not hitherto played in Providence, are the Prelude to Act 1: "Danse guerriere" and "Danse des Femmes Esclaves."

So much for the novelty of the evening. The masterpieces, all familiar music, are Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," last played by the Boston Orchestra in Providence at a concert of the Music League May 23, 1924, but unheard at the regular series of concerts since November, 1917, and that composer's "Eroica" Symphony, last played in Providence just five years ago, in November, 1921, together with Wagner's Preludes to "Lohengrin" and to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," heard here more recently, the former in April, 1925, the latter no longer ago than last March.

Like Wagner's "Ring" and Berlioz's "Frantasitc" Symphony, Beethoven's "Eroica" is one of those scores for which there was no precedent, whose coming no earlier work by the same or any other composer might have foretold. The third of Beethoven's symphonies, the "Eroica" is almost as far removed from its two predecessors as it is from the most important symphonies of Mozart or of Haydn, and as with other compositions of a revolutionary character, the "Eroica" was not understood by its first hearers. More than one commentator expressed the hope that Beethoven would revert to his earlier and simpler style.

Except, however, for its essential vigor and a certain heroic utterance that Beethoven's predecessors hard not commanded, the opening of this "Eroica" could scarcely have surprised that Viennese audience of 1804. Indeed, the chief theme of the first movement bears an almost note-for-note resemblance to a melody in a youthful opera of Mozart's "Bastien and Bastienne," and while somewhat bolder in outline and in harmony, the second and the closing subjects were hardly radical. But once his exposition is behind him and Beethoven is fairly launched upon the development section the boldness, the titanic strength that were a new voice in symphonic music make themselves felt. Mark those loud and clamorous chords that even to-day sound stridently dissonant! And what harmonic audacity is shown in that hushed passage just before the repriso of the [illegible] lin[illegible] int[illegible] the[illegible] of [illegible] the[illegible] T[illegible] sym[illegible] cod[illegible] heard-of length. Nor is the suceeding Funeral March exactly laconic. In so extended a threnody a lesser composer might easily achieve a sort of lugurious monotony. Not so Beethoven. To the mournful yet impressive first section there succeeds a trio that breathes consolation. The march returns: its themes undergo development and the mood changes from that of lamentation to one of heroic proclamation, almost of exultation. Then by way of coda the funeral march proper is heard once again.

Less significant than the other movements ,the Scherzo is nevertheless a fine example of its particular species, and the bold horn fanfares of the trio are still stirring to hear.

Of singular construction is the Finale, a set of variations in which the bass is announced and twice varied before the melody itself appears. These variations are exceedingly free in form. Much use is made of the fugal style of treatment, and toward the end there is a sonorous and uplifting proclamation of the chief melody.

The "Eroica," as is generally known, was originally dedicated to Napoleon, but when his idol had himself crowned emperor, Beethoven in disgust erased the dedication.

Also in heroic vein is the Overture to "Egmont," Goethe's drama of the great patriot of the Netherlands. Here in the introduction we may hear the lamentations of a proud people oppressed by the tyrannous yoke of Spain, while the Allegro may be taken as a portrait of Egmont himself and the coda is a paean of triumphant rejoicing.

It was Beethoven who, through his Overtures to "Egmont," Coriolanus and "Leonore," showed Wagner how to condense a drama into a few momenis of instrumental music. Such an epitome is the glorious Prelude to the "Mastersingers." In it we hear first the music of the worthy burghers themselves. then Walther is introduced by the melody of his prize song. There is the conflict of these opposing forces the hostile carping of Beckmesser, symbol for Wagner's own critics, is heralded by a shrill caricature of the mastersinger-motive. In the end comes reconciliation and jubilation.

The beautiful "Lohengrin" Prelude, on the other hand, is simple in design. A single poetic idea dominates it—the descent from heaven to earth and the reascending to the heights of a company of angels bearing the Holy Grail. And thus the music, beginning in the ethereal tones of divided violins, gradually swells to the full-toned voice of the whole orchestra, then diminishes, to end as it began.

WARREN STOREY SMITH.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVENING WORLD
NOV 27 1926

FOUR ORCHESTRAS

With the Boston Symphony Orchestra's two concerts at Carnegie Hall this week, New York has renewed its acquaintance with the four orchestras which present regular seasons of concerts in this city. Grading them according to merit, on the showing made thus far, is a task of singular facility. Almost automatically they fall into this order—Philadelphia, Philharmonic, Boston and New York Symphony. Their leaders rank in the same order—Stokowski, Mengelberg, Koussevitsky and Damrosch. The reason why the first pair neighbors the second so closely in print is simply that there are not more orchestras.

One of the causes for the supremacy of Mr. Stokowski's organization is his consciousness that an orchestra is an instrument and not a din-making apparatus. At the most dramatic crises, he keeps the tone within the realm of musical sound. He accomplishes this feat by a means so obvious that it is a wonder other conductors do not discover it.

He is well aware that volume is a relative thing. So, by starting his gamut of dynamics at a pianissimo, he obtains with mere forte climaxes which another director, beginning with a mezzo-piano, can obtain only with a fortissimo. The result is that, acoustically speaking, the Philadelphia Orchestra is preternaturally well-bred. It can speak with resonant vigor, but it never brawls.

NEW YORK
BROOKLYN EAGLE
NOV 21 1926

Boston Orchestra And Opera for Brooklyn Week

SERGE KOUSSEWITSKY will conduct the first of his concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening of this week. The program is purely orchestral, calling for the aid of neither vocal not instrumental soloist. Two works by Beethoven precede the intermission: the "Egmont" Overture and the "Eroica" Symphony. Later in the evening Mr. Koussewitsky will make another of his efforts to popularize the music of Prokofieff by presenting an orchestral suite derived from that composer's opera, "The Love of Three Oranges." The last number on the program will be Respighi's symphonic poem, "The Pines of Rome," first performed in America last season under the direction of Arturo Toscanini.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK EVENING POST
NOV 20 1926

TWO suites from scores of Serge Prokofieff are to have their first performances in New York, in this form, at the opening Boston Symphony concerts of the season here, in Carnegie Hall next week. Serge Koussevitzky will present music from the opera "The Love for Three Oranges" at the Thursday evening performance, and the suite from the ballet "Chout" ("Buffoon") on Saturday afternoon. "The Love for Three Oranges" was produced by the Chicago Opera Company in Chicago on December 30, 1921, and at the Manhattan Opera House in New York on February 14, 1922. The suite is made up of five numbers which have been edited by Albert Spalding. They include "Les Ridicules," "March," "Scherzo," "The Prince and the Princess," and "The Flight."

"Chout," which is numbered opus 21, was originally a ballet in six scenes on a bizarre story on the doings of buffoons. It was produced by Diaghilev's Russian ballet in Paris and in London in 1921. The ballet suite was performed for the first time at Brussels in 1924. This will not be, strictly speaking, the first New York performance of this music, since it was presented at the Neighborhood Playhouse on March 6, 1924. The scenes of the suite include Dance of the Buffoon's Daughters, In the Merchant's Bedroom, the Young Woman Is Turned Into a Goat, and Final Dance. This suite had its first Boston performance at the opening of Koussevitzky's season there on last October 8. Other Thursday numbers will be Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and "Egmont" overture and Respighi's "Pines of Rome." The rest of the Saturday program will be Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Mozarth's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Roussel's "Opera Ballet Suite."

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 21 1926

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Second Providence Concert of Season Tuesday Night.—Church Choirs Sing Special Music Today.—McCormick Coming

Perhaps lacking in quantity but possessing all that could be asked in quality are this week's musical events in Providence, crowded into two days, today and Tuesday. The big event, naturally, is the second concert here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which takes place Tuesday evening at 8:15 at the Albee Theatre. Serge Koussevitzky will wield the baton and the programme will include a suite from Roussel's opera-ballet, "Padmavati," which was introduced to American audiences for the first time this fall.

The Symphony's programme, as finally announced, will not only include the newly introduced Roussel composition, which comes in the second half, but will devote the entire first section to two Beethoven works, his overture to Goethe's "Egmont" and the third symphony in E-flat, "Eroica," including all four movements. The final numbers will be Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," and his prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

From Providence, the orchestra goes to New York for its first metropolitan concert of the season in Carnegie Hall. There is will also present Beethoven's "Eroica." Respighi's "Pines of Rome" and Prokofieff's suite from "The Love for Three Oranges" will be added.

The next big musical event for Providence will be the recital of John McCormick Sunday afternoon, Dec. 5, at the Majestic Theatre.

To-day's local musical events will begin with a piano recital by James Gray at 3:30, at the Providence Plantations Club. At 4:30 the choir of the Central Congregational Church will sing excerpts from Gaul's "Holy City." Miss Helen Hogan will direct and the soloists will be Dorothy Stevens, soprano; Julia S. Gould, contralto; Willard C. Amison, tenor, and Harry A. Hughes, bass. Van Veachton Rogers, harpist, will assist.

six by the Boston Symphony Society will be given at the Academy on Friday night. In accordance with the Beethoven memorial observance this year, Serge Koussevitsky has selected the "Eroica" as the opening number on his first program. Excerpts from Prokofieff's "Love of Three Oranges" will also be given as will Respighi's "Pines of Rome," the first time here by this orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OBSERVER DISPATCH
UTICA, N. Y.
NOV 20 1926

FAMED BOSTON SYMPHONY ON AIR TONIGHT

Eifel Tower Will Try to Pick Up Broadcasts of Sixth Concert of Series from WBZ and Other Stations.

The French government radio station, FL, located at the Eifel Tower in Paris will endeavor to pick up the sixth of the series of Saturday night concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast by WBZ and its associatd stations and Alexandre Tansman, noted symphony composer, will be one of the most interested listeners of the radio audience when the program goes on the air at 8:10 o'clock tonight.

Tansman's "Dance of the Socceress" from the ballet, "The Garden of Paradise," has been selected as the opening number on this evening's program. The young Russian composer has made arrangements with the French government for Station FL to pick up the signals of the Westinghouse stations WJZ, WGY or WRC in the Eifel Tower where he will be stationed so that he may hear the first presentation in America of his composition by the celebrated orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

In accordance with the cabled arrangements between Tansman and the symphony management, Nicola Slonimsky, noted pianist and secretary to Serge Koussevitzky, will take Professor Marshall's place at the microphone to tell the radio audiences something of Tansman's work. He will also play a part of the composition on the piano and extend greetings to Tansman in Russian. It is anticipated that success will attend the transmission and that Tansman will receive the message in Paris about 1:10 a. m.

The other three selections appearing on the program before Beethoven's Fifth Symphony are all examples of moden schools and those interested in the most recent phases of musical development will revel in this part of the program. Between the various numbers, Professor Marshall will tell his listeners something about each of the composers. He will devote the entire intermission to a talk on Beethoven's style and an analysis of the Fifth Symphony.

Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will assist Professor Marshall in his musical illustrations.

The program will come to listeners through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago. The complete program is as follows:

"The Dance of the Socceress" from the ballet "The Garden of Paradise" ..... Tansman Symphony ..... Krasa
a. March
b. Pastorale
Five pieces for orchestra ..... Webern
Overture—"Portsmouth Point" ..... Walton
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 67 ..... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio
II. Andante con moto
III. Allegro: Trio
IV. Allegro

JOURNAL
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
NOV 20 1926

QUINBY MUSIC ATTRACTION TONIGHT

The French Government radio station FL, located at the Eifel Tower in Paris, will endeavor to pick up the sixth of the series of Saturday night concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast by WBZ and its associated stations and Alexandre Tansman, noted symphony composer, will be one of the most interested listeners of the radio audience when the program goes on the air at 8:10 o'clock tonight.

Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress" from the ballet, "The Garden of Paradise," has been selected as the opening number on this evening's program. The young Russian composer has made arrangements with the French Government for Station FL to pick up the signals of the Westinghouse station or WJZ, WGY or WRC in the Eifel Tower where he will be stationed so that he may hear the first presentation in America of his composition by the celebrated orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

In accordance with the cabled arrangements between Tansman and the Symphony management, Nicolai Slonimsky, noted pianist and secretary to Serge Koussevitzky, will take Professor Marshall's place at the microphone to tell the radio audiences something of Tansman's work. He will also play a part of the composition on the piano and extend greetings to Tansman in Russian. It is anticipated that success will attend the transmission and that Tansman will receive the message in Paris about 1:10 a. m.

The other three selections appearing on the program before Beethoven's Fifth Symphony are all examples of modern schools and those interested in the most recent phases of musical development will revel in this part of the program. Between the various numbers, Professor Marshall will tell his listeners something about each of the composers. He will devote the entire intermission to a talk on Beethoven's style and an analysis of the Fifth Symphony.

Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will assist Professor Marshall in his musical illustrations.

The program will come to listener sthrough the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago. The complete program is as follows:

"The Dance of the Sorceress" from the ballet "The Garden of Paradise" ..... Tansman
Symphony ..... Krasa
a. March.
b. Pastorale.
Five pieces for orchestra .... Webern
Overture, "Portsmouth Point" Walton
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 67 ..... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Allegro: Trio.
IV. Allegro.

vitsky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, than the circumstances of his career. He first conducted as a boy of twelve, when he led the local theater orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in northern Russia. Attending the conservatory at Moscow, he was required to study an instrument. He chose the doublebass, and the noted master, Ramboussec, was his teacher. His proficiency upon this unusual instrument became so extraordinary that he toured all of Europe and becamo famous before he was even known as a conductor. Koussevitsky's abilities, indeed, were not of the sort to be so confined to a limited field, and from 1909 he devoted all his energies to conducting. He organized his own symphony orchestra in Moscow, which soon came to be considered the finest in Russia. In Moscow and Petrograd he conducted the classics, gave Beethoven, Bach, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, and other festivals each season, and championed works by young composers then unknown but since accepted.

The advance sale is now in progress for the Hartford concert, February 6, at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Reservations can be made by phone 2-6147. Frank A. Sedgwick's direction. It is advisable to secure good locations of seats at this time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 21 1926

53

Four Masterpieces and a Novelty in Symphony Programme

Written for the Sunday Journal
By WARREN STOREY SMITH.

Four acknowledged masterpieces stand on the programme that Mr. Koussevitzky has prepared for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening. Of the fifth, the suite drawn from Albert Roussel's oriental opera-ballet "Padmavati," it may only be said that time has yet to decide the place that this and other works from this singular French composer are to occupy in the world's music. At least Roussel is no stealer of other men's thunder. His voice is his own. He is beyond disputing a master-craftsman, and his long sojourn in the Orient has endowed him with the authority to treat in music of an Eastern subject. This music from "Padmavati" is exotic, but hardly in the conventional exotic manner: not for Roussel are the stock tricks of "oriental colors" that every tyro composer now has at his fingerends. The separate numbers of this suite, not hitherto played in Providence, are the Prelude to Act 1: "Danse guerriere" and "Danse des Femmes Esclaves."

So much for the novelty of the evening. The masterpieces, all familiar music, are Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," last played by the Boston Orchestra in Providence at a concert of the Music League May 23, 1924, but unheard at the regular series of concerts since November, 1917, and that composer's "Eroica" Symphony, last played in Providence just five years ago, in November, 1921, together with Wagner's Preludes to "Lohengrin" and to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," heard here more recently, the former in April, 1925, the latter no longer ago than last March.

Like Wagner's "Ring" and Berlioz's "Frantasitc" Symphony, Beethoven's "Eroica" is one of those scores for which there was no precedent, whose coming no earlier work by the same or any other composer might have foretold. The third of Beethoven's symphonies, the "Eroica" is almost as far removed from its two predecessors as it is from the most important symphonies of Mozart or of Haydn, and as with other compositions of a revolutionary character, the "Eroica" was not understood by its first hearers. More than one commentator expressed the hope that Beethoven would revert to his earlier and simpler style.

Except, however, for its essential vigor and a certain heroic utterance that Beethoven's predecessors hard not commanded, the opening of this "Eroica" could scarcely have surprised that Viennese audience of 1804. Indeed, the chief theme of the first movement bears an almost note-for-note resemblance to a melody in a youthful opera of Mozart's "Bastien and Bastienne," and while somewhat bolder in outline and in harmony, the second and the closing subjects were hardly radical. But once his exposition is behind him and Beethoven is fairly launched upon the development section the boldness, the titanic strength that were a new voice in symphonic music make themselves felt. Mark those loud and clamorous chords that even to-day sound stridently dissonant! And what harmonic audacity is shown in that hushed passage just before the reprise of the first section when, under a violin tremolo A-flat and B-flat a horn intones the E-flat, G, E-flat, B-flat of the chief theme, virtually an instance of polyharmony and as such perhaps the first of its kind.

The "Eroica" was, and is still, a symphony of large dimensions, and the coda to the first movement was of unheard-of length. Nor is the suceeding Funeral March exactly laconic. In so extended a threnody a lesser composer might easily achieve a sort of lugurious monotony. Not so Beethoven. To the mournful yet impressive first section there suceceeds a trio that breathes consolation. The march returns: its themes undergo development and the mood changes from that of lamentation to one of heroic proclamation, almost of exultation. Then by way of coda the funeral march proper is heard once again.

Less significant than the other movements ,the Scherzo is nevertheless a fine example of its particular species, and the bold horn fanfares of the trio are still stirring to hear.

Of singular construction is the Finale, a set of variations in which the bass is announced and twice varied before the melody itself appears. These variations are exceedingly free in form. Much use is made of the fugal style of treatment, and toward the end there is a sonorous and uplifting proclamation of the chief melody.

The "Eroica," as is generally known, was originally dedicated to Napoleon, but when his idol had himself crowned emperor, Beethoven in disgust erased the dedication.

Also in heroic vein is the Overture to "Egmont," Goethe's drama of the great patriot of the Netherlands. Here in the introduction we may hear the lamentations of a proud people oppressed by the tyrannous yoke of Spain, while the Allegro may be taken as a portrait of Egmont himself and the coda is a paean of triumphant rejoicing.

It was Beethoven who, through his Overtures to "Egmont," Coriolanus and "Leonore," showed Wagner how to condense a drama into a few moments of instrumental music. Such an epitome is the glorious Prelude to the "Mastersingers." In it we hear first the music of the worthy burghers themselves, then Walther is introduced by the melody of his prize song. There is the conflict of these opposing forces the hostile carping of Beckmesser, symbol for Wagner's own critics, is heralded by a shrill caricature of the mastersinger-motive. In the end comes reconciliation and jubilation.

The beautiful "Lohengrin" Prelude, on the other hand, is simple in design. A single poetic idea dominates it—the descent from heaven to earth and the reascending to the heights of a company of angels bearing the Holy Grail. And thus the music, beginning in the ethereal tones of divided violins, gradually swells to the full-toned voice of the whole orchestra, then diminishes, to end as it began.

WARREN STOREY SMITH.

NEW YORK
BROOKLYN EAGLE
NOV 21 1926

Boston Orchestra And Opera for Brooklyn Week

SERGE KOUSSEWITSKY will conduct the first of his concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening of this week. The program is purely orchestral, calling for the aid of neither vocal not instrumental soloist. Two works by Beethoven precede the intermission: the "Egmont" Overture and the "Eroica" Symphony. Later in the evening Mr. Koussewitsky will make another of his efforts to popularize the music of Prokofieff by presenting an orchestral suite derived from that composer's opera, "The Love of Three Oranges." The last number on the program will be Respighi's symphonic poem, "The Pines of Rome," first performed in America last season under the direction of Arturo Toscanini.

NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 21 1926

Boston Symphony Opens New York Season Thursday

Koussevitzky Will Present 2 Prokofieff Numbers; Week's Programs of the New York Orchestras

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its third season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will begin its usual series of five Thursday nights and five Saturday afternoons in Carnegie Hall, and five Friday nights at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, this week. Thursday and Friday nights Mr. Koussevitzky's programs will include Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and music from Serge Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." Another Prokofieff novelty will be offered Saturday afternoon, a suite from the ballet "Chout" (Buffoon).

Both Prokofieff works are new here in this form, though the Chicago Opera, during its last New York visit, on February 14, 1922, gave "The Love for Three Oranges," and "Chout" began a run at the Neighborhood Playhouse, Howard Barlow conducting, on March 6, 1924. The suite from "The Love for Three Oranges" is made up of five numbers edited by Albert Spalding.

The Philharmonic Orchestra, which played in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore last week, plays in Carnegie Hall this afternoon, when Willem Mengelberg's program includes the first American performance of the Dutch composer Johan Wagenaar's overture to "The Taming of the Shrew." Wagenaar is director of the Royal Conservatory of Music at The Hague; his overture to "Cyrano" was played here in 1921 by the National Symphony under Mr. Mengelberg's direction.

As usual in Thanksgiving week, the mid-week evening Carnegie Hall concert will be given on Wednesday instead of Thursday, the repetition remaining on Friday afternoon. For these concerts the Philharmonic will play a Tchaikovsky program, including the Rococo Variations, with Hans Kindler as solo cellist, and the Pathetic Symphony. The program for the fourth popular-priced Students' concert Saturday night will be the same as this afternoon.

Next Sunday afternoon, November 28, the Philharmonic will give its second Brooklyn concert of the season at the Academy of Music under Mr. Mengelberg's direction, with Lauritz Melchior, Danish tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as soloist, singing the Forging Song from Wagner's "Siegfried." Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture, Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" Suite and Brahms's Third Symphony complete the program.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch conducting, will repeat this afternoon at Mecca Temple the concert performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walküre," given last Thursday in Carnegie Hall. Elsa Alsen, soprano; Rudolf Laubenthal, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Frederick Patton, barytone, will be soloists. Mr. Damrosch will begin the performance with explanatory comments at the piano; the orchestra will play two other excerpts from "Die Walküre."

Friday night at Carnegie Hall, and next Sunday afternoon in Mecca Auditorium, Lewis Richards, harpsichordist, will be soloist in Haydn's D major Concerto; Mr. Damrosch's other numbers will be Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony and a ballet suite from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis."

In the Symphony's Children's Concert next Saturday morning in Carnegie Hall Joseph Knitzer, a thirteen-year-old violinist taught and sponsored by Leopold Auer, will make his debut, playing the second and third movements of the Mendelssohn concerto. Knitzer, who comes from Detroit, has been a pupil of Auer for the last three years and is said by him to have great talent and promise.

54

Transcript
Wed. Nov. 24th

Incidents and Prospects

When the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra mistakenly permitted the radio to intrude into its concerts, they fondly believed that broadcasting would not lessen audiences. Now, after only six months, the sale of tickets for the series of Tuesday afternoons lags; while conspicuously and rather pathetically, the management announces in a circular: "These programs will not be broadcast." Possibly hard necessity is bringing wisdom back to Symphony Hall.

Mr. Toscanini has devised a new grouping of Beethoven's Symphonies into four concerts, which Mr. Koussevitzky might reasonably consider when, next spring, he arranges his centenary rites. Upon his first program Mr. Toscanini puts the first, second and fifth; next, the third and fourth; then, the sixth and seventh; finally, the eighth and ninth.

Strauss's "Alpine Symphony" is still remembered from the four performances at Symphony Hall last winter. London has lately heard it under Strauss himself. The music led the reviewer of The Telegraph to a fresh point of view:

When Strauss comes to nature he seems unable to understand her deeper moods. He is longing for the town and the strifes of the town. The great silences enhanced rather than broken by stirring leaves and whispering brooks are meaningless to him, nor does the immense solitude of the summit move him to deep thought. He is the townsman born and bred; carrying wherever he goes his habits, his attitude of mind, who finds some zest and stimulus if dipping now and again in the pages of some minor romantic poem, and feels a thrill at the sound of real cow bells. German romanticism relished all that in her nature is mysterious and terrible. Strauss, as the child of our own time, has lost that feeling in the fancied security of our civilization. His picture of the waterfall is pretty, but in the style of the photographer; his storm is devastating, but in keeping with the report of a meteorologist.

Nov. 24

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

NOV 24 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT FINE

One of Most Satisfactory Programs Ever Given in City Of Providence

One of the most satisfactory programs ever given in Providence was provided by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, M. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, at the E. F. Albee Theatre last night. One might raise the objection that the Roussel suite, with its churnings and its tootings, was out of place alongside Beethoven and Wagner, but in such cases, if one's background of standards has no room for Roussel, it is well to remember that on April 7, 1805, at the Theatre an der Wein, somebody shouted from the gallery during the first performance of the Eroica: "I'd give another kreutzer if they would stop."

A conductor cannot go wrong, except in the ultra-ultra-modern circles, with Beethoven and Wagner. They satisfy every musical taste; they satisfy those who are looking for power, dignity and nobility; and they satisfy those who like their music lush, even treacly.

So much has been said about the Eroica, or Third Symphony, of Beethoven, that it is entirely superfluous to plie a Pelion of rhetoric upon the Ossa already constructed to challenge the gods when Beethoven has long since been accepted in the musical heaven. Let us quote a man who never breaks into the program notes as a critic but, nevertheless, always has something to say. H. L. Mencken says of the Third: "The older I grow the more I am convinced that the most portentous phenomenon in the whole history of music was the first public performance of the Eroica on April 7, 1805. What makes it worth discussing to-day and forever, is the fact that on its very first page Beethoven threw his hat into the ring and laid his claim to immortality. No compromise! No easy bridge from the past! The Second Symphony is already miles behind. A new order of music has been born. It must have been a great night in Vienna. But perhaps not for the actual Viennese. They went to hear 'a new grand symphony in D-sharp' (sic!). What they found in the Theatre an der Wein was a revolution."

In short, the people who heard the Eroica last night heard music that was not meant for death, that will be stirring people when this generation has become a footnote in history.

As for the rest, there was Beethoven's Overture to Egmont; there was Wagner's Prelude to Lohengrin and his Prelude to the Mastersingers; and Roussel's Suite from the opera ballet 'Padmavati."

M. Koussevitsky, as is his wont, conducted magnificently.

THIS CLIPPING FROM REGISTER
WHEELING, W. VA.

NOV 28 1926

Station FL to Attempt Concert Broadcast

The French radio station FL, located in the Eiffel Tower, Paris, on Saturday night will endeavor to pick up the Boston Symphony orchestra broadcast through WBZ and associate stations.

Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress," from the ballet "The Garden of Paradise," has been selected as the opening number on Saturday's symphony program. The young Russian composer, Alexander Tansman, has made arrangements with station FL to pick up the signals of either WBZ, WJZ or WGY in the Eiffel Tower, where he will be stationed so that he may hear the first presentation in America of his composition by the orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

CITIZEN
BROOKLYN

NOV 21 1926

Boston Symphony Opens Season Here On Friday Evening

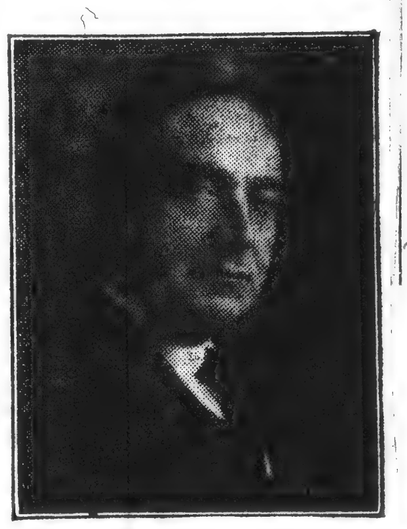
Beethoven's Third Symphony, "Eroica," in commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of the master's death, will fittingly open the season of Boston Symphony concerts here, when Serge Koussevitzky's Orchestra performs in the Academy of Music Friday evening, at 8:15, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute. This is the heroic score which bore a dedication to Napolean Bonaparte, Beethoven's contemporary, until the composer, disillusioned by the emperor's excesses, destroyed the title page of the manuscript.

A modern Russian score which has caused considerable interest at recent performances by this orchestra elsewhere, is a Suite from Prokofieff's Opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." The opera is remembered from its production by the Chicago Opera Company in hicago and New York. The excerpts which comprise this suite are "Les Ridicules," March, Scherzo, The Prince and the Princess, and The Flight. The closing number will be Respighi's Symphonic Poem, "Pines of Rome." This master work of the Italian composer describes four historical spots of the eternal city which are set off by ancient pines. The first movement, "Pines of the Villa Borghese," describes in riotous fashion the antics and games of Italian children. "The Pines near a atacomb," is a sort of nocturne in which a beautiful trumpet solo is played off stage. "The Pines of the Janiculum" ends with the introduction of the song of an actual nightingale as recorded and reproduced on a phonograph. "The Pines of the Appian Way," describe the gradual approach of the ancient Roman legions to the gates of the city. The piece with measured tread gradually accumulates sound as the cohorts draw nearer. The ancient buccinae are introduced in the form of an extra section of tenor tubas. The imposing music rises to a climax which is looked upon as one of the most notable in modern music.

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE
NOV 23 1926

PLAN NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY SERIES

Many Out-of-Town Subscribers For Tuesday Afternoon Concerts.



SERGE KOUSSOVITZKY.
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The new series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians, in Symphony Hall, Boston, offer a good chance for out-of-town subscribers to enjoy the Boston Symphony orchestra under its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

This series, instituted last year will be given on five Tuesday afternoons beginning Nov. 30. Since the concerts begin at 3:15 promptly and never last later than 5 o'clock, they have a large patronage from the subscribers of the outlying towns of Boston.

This Tuesday series is the one remaining opportunity for those who wish to become Symphony subscribers, since the other four series of 62 concerts in greater Boston are subscribed by the season to the last seat. To initiates the Tuesday series will offer an especially interesting introduction to symphonic music, while being replete with interest, as well, to regular Symphony patrons.

Mr. Koussevitzky is dividing the five programmes according to the various important national schools of music.

MUSIC OVERSEAS
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 24 1926

NOV 24 1926

-:- MUSIC -:-

Not since M. Koussevitsky began to come to Providence with the Boston Symphony Orchestra has he given us a program finer than that we listened to at the Albee Theatre last night. Nor at any time has he conducted with a nobler sense of spiritual as well as of tonal values. Playing Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, the "Eroica" symphony and Wagner's "Prelude to Lohengrin" and the "Prelude to The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Koussevitsky was called on to show every resource of his muscianship and his intellect. He swept through them like the master he is. The other number on a program that was, if anything, too full of riches was Roussel's "Padmavati," a suite which we had not heard before and which we would not travel very far to hear again.

There are times when Koussevitsky is anything but satisfying in his interpretations of Wagner and Beethoven, times when the Slav in him seems altogether alien to the Teutonic masters. That was not so last night. The flesh and spirit of Lohengrin were at the Russian's command; there was a passion for human freedom in the "Egmont" and there was an intriguing sense of irony in the high comedy of the Mastersingers.

Great praise should be given to the Albee Theatre management for the pains it took to reconstruct the stage so that the audience might get the full benefit of M. Koussevitzky's greatness. We can hardly imagine a pleasanter environment than last night's for a genius to disport himself in. And Koussevitzky enjoyed himself to the full. There was

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

NOV 22 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY TWO BEETHOVEN NUMBERS

Composer's 100th Anniversary to be Observed in Concert Here To-morrew.

Two numbers by Beethoven, in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the great composer's death, will open the programme of the second concert here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given to-morrow night in the Albee Theatre at 8:15 o'clock. These numbers will be the overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont," and the "Eroica" Symphony No. 3, in E-flat.

This mighty symphony was considered truly revolutionary in its day. The composer was inspired by the exploits of his contemporary, Napoleon Bonaparte, through whom Beethoven foresaw the realization of his republican ideals. When he found that the Corsican General was abusing his power and ambitious for military aggrandizement, he destroyed the dedication upon the title page of his manuscript in a moment of disillusion and anger.

The novelty of the performance will be a suite from the opera-ballet, "Padmavati," by the French composer, Roussel. This score, introduced to America by Koussevitzky last season, had an outstanding success. Padmavati, in the story, is the wife of a Mongolian Sultan. Her beauty involves her people in warfare. The programme will close with two Wagnerian excerpts, the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

NOV 23 1926

League of Composers Opens Season Saturday Night

The opportunity to hear an old-time negro "folk sermon," as embodied in James Weldon Johnson's poem "The Creation," which Louis Gruenberg has set to music for voice and instrumental ensemble, will be supplied by the League of Composers next Saturday night, in Town Hall, Manhattan, with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, at the league's first concert of the season. Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce a programme of four modern works (all new to New York), by Bartok, Webern, Krass and Gruenberg. In order to meet the demand frequently raised by new music, repetitions of two numbers, Webern's "Five Orchestral Pieces" and Bartok's "Village Scenes," will be included.

Mr. Koussevitzky will lead a group of men from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and voice parts are to be sung by Julius Bledsoe, baritone, and the Brahms Vocal Quartet.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 26 1926

Boston Symphony

Music lovers of Hartford and surrounding towns are again to have the privilege of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky February 6 at the Capitol Theater.

Under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky, whom critics have agreed upon as among the foremost conductors in the world, the Boston Symphony is delighting more auditors than ever before. In Hartford, as in Boston, there is always a waiting list for tickets to the orchestra's concerts and from the advance sale of tickets, now in progress at McCoy's music store, No. 89 Asylum street, it appears that the capacity of the Capitol Theater on the date of the concert will be taxed. Reservations may be made now by telephoning 2-3147 or by mail to Frank A. Sedgwick, who is responsible for bringing the orchestra to this city.

NEW YORK WORLD

NOV 26 1926

FOLK-SERMON TO MUSIC

James Weldon Johnson's Negro folk-sermon, "Creation," with music by Louis Gruenberg, will be presented tomorrow night at Town Hall. Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony will conduct, and Julius Bledsoe, Negro baritone, will have the principal role. "Creation" contains the spirit and rhythm of the old-fashioned Negro sermon.

NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 21 1926

Boston Symphony Opens New York Season Thursday

Koussevitzky Will Present 2 Prokofieff Numbers; Week's Programs of the New York Orchestras

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its third season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will begin its usual series of five Thursday nights and five Saturday afternoons in Carnegie Hall, and five Friday nights at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, this week. Thursday and Friday nights Mr. Koussevitzky's programs will include Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and music from Serge Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." Another Prokofieff novelty will be offered Saturday afternoon, a suite from the ballet "Chout" (Buffoon).

Both Prokofieff works are new here in this form, though the Chicago Opera, during its last New York visit, on February 14, 1922, gave "The Love for Three Oranges," and "Chout" began a run at the Neighborhood Playhouse, Howard Barlow conducting, on March 6, 1924. The suite from "The Love for Three Oranges" is made up of five numbers edited by Albert Spalding.

The Philharmonic Orchestra, which played in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore last week, plays in Carnegie Hall this afternoon, when Willem Mengelberg's program includes the first American performance of the Dutch composer Johan Wagenaar's overture to "The Taming of the Shrew." Wagenaar is director of the Royal Conservatory of Music at The Hague; his overture to "Cyrano" was played here in 1921 by the National Symphony under Mr. Mengelberg's direction.

As usual in Thanksgiving week, the mid-week evening Carnegie Hall concert will be given on Wednesday instead of Thursday, the repetition remaining on Friday afternoon. For these concerts the Philharmonic will play a Tchaikovsky program, including the Rococo Variations, with Hans Kindler as solo cellist, and the Pathetic Symphony. The program for the fourth popular-priced Students' concert Saturday night will be the same as this afternoon.

Next Sunday afternoon, November 28, the Philharmonic will give its second Brooklyn concert of the season at the Academy of Music under Mr. Mengelberg's direction, with Lauritz Melchior, Danish tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as soloist, singing the Forging Song from Wagner's "Siegfried." Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture, Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" Suite and Brahms's Third Symphony complete the program.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch conducting, will repeat this afternoon at Mecca Temple the concert performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walküre," given last Thursday in Carnegie Hall. Elsa Alsen, soprano; Rudolf Laubenthal, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Frederick Patton, barytone, will be soloists. Mr. Damrosch will begin the performance with explanatory comments at the piano; the orchestra will play two other excerpts from "Die Walküre."

Friday night at Carnegie Hall, and next Sunday afternoon in Mecca Auditorium, Lewis Richards, harpsichordist, will be soloist in Haydn's D major Concerto; Mr. Damrosch's other numbers will be Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony and a ballet suite from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis."

In the Symphony's Children's Concert next Saturday morning in Carnegie Hall Joseph Knitzer, a thirteen-year-old violinist taught and sponsored by Leopold Auer, will make his debut, playing the second and third movements of the Mendelssohn concerto. Knitzer, who comes from Detroit, has been a pupil of Auer for the last three years and is said by him to have great talent and promise.

54

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

NOV 22 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY TWO BEETHOVEN NUMBERS

Composer's 100th Anniversary to be Observed in Concert Here To-morrew.

Two numbers by Beethoven, in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the great composer's death, will open the programme of the second concert here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given to-morrow night in the Albee Theatre at 8:15 o'clock. These numbers will be the overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont," and the "Eroica" Symphony No. 3, in E-flat.

This mighty symphony was considered truly revolutionary in its day. The composer was inspired by the exploits of his contemporary, Napoleon Bonaparte, through whom Beethoven foresaw the realization of his republican ideals. When he found that the Corsican General was abusing his power and ambitious for military aggrandizement, he destroyed the dedication upon the title page of his manuscript in a moment of disillusion and anger.

The novelty of the performance will be a suite from the opera-ballet, "Padmavati," by the French composer, Roussel. This score, introduced to America by Koussevitzky last season, had an outstanding success. Padmavati, in the story, is the wife of a Mongolian Sultan. Her beauty involves her people in warfare. The programme will close with two Wagnerian excerpts, the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

CITIZEN
BROOKLYN

NOV 21 1926

Boston Symphony Opens Season Here On Friday Evening

Beethoven's Third Symphony, "Eroica," in commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of the master's death, will fittingly open the season of Boston Symphony concerts here, when Serge Koussevitzky's Orchestra performs in the Academy of Music Friday evening, at 8:15, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute. This is the heroic score which bore a dedication to Napolean Bonaparte, Beethoven's contemporary, until the composer, disillusioned by the emperor's excesses, destroyed the title page of the manuscript.

A modern Russian score which has caused considerable interest at recent performances by this orchestra elsewhere, is a Suite from Prokofieff's Opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." The opera is remembered from its production by the Chicago Opera Company in hicago and New York. The excerpts which comprise this suite are "Les Ridicules," March, Scherzo, The Prince and the Princess, and The Flight. The closing number will be Respighi's Symphonic Poem, "Pines of Rome." This master work of the Italian composer describes four historical spots of the eternal city which are set off by ancient pines. The first movement, "Pines of the Villa Borghese," describes in riotous fashion the antics and games of Italian children. "The Pines near a atacomb," is a sort of nocturne in which a beautiful trumpet solo is played off stage. "The Pines of the Janiculum" ends with the introduction of the song of an actual nightingale as recorded and reproduced on a phonograph. "The Pines of the Appian Way," describe the gradual approach of the ancient Roman legions to the gates of the city. The piece with measured tread gradually accumulates sound as the cohorts draw nearer. The ancient buccinae are introduced in the form of an extra section of tenor tubas. The imposing music rises to a climax which is looked upon as one of the most notable in modern music.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

NOV 23 1926

League of Composers Opens Season Saturday Night

The opportunity to hear an old-time negro "folk sermon," as embodied in James Weldon Johnson's poem "The Creation," which Louis Gruenberg has set to music for voice and instrumental ensemble, will be supplied by the League of Composers next Saturday night, in Town Hall, Manhattan, with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, at the league's first concert of the season. Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce a programme of four modern works (all new to New York), by Bartok, Webern, Krass and Gruenberg. In order to meet the demand frequently raised by new music, repetitions of two numbers, Webern's "Five Orchestral Pieces" and Bartok's "Village Scenes," will be included.

Mr. Koussevitzky will lead a group of men from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and voice parts are to be sung by Julius Bledsoe, baritone, and the Brahms Vocal Quartet.

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

NOV 23 1926

PLAN NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY SERIES

Many Out-of-Town Subscribers For Tuesday Afternoon Concerts.

SERGE KOUSSOVITZKY.
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The new series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians, in Symphony Hall, Boston, offer a good chance for out-of-town subscribers to enjoy the Boston Symphony orchestra under its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

This series, instituted last year will be given on five Tuesday afternoons beginning Nov. 30. Since the concerts begin at 3:15 promptly and never last later than 5 o'clock, they have a large patronage from the subscribers of the outlying towns of Boston.

This Tuesday series is the one remaining opportunity for those who wish to become Symphony subscribers, since the other four series of 62 concerts in greater Boston are subscribed by the season to the last seat. To initiates the Tuesday series will offer an especially interesting introduction to symphonic music, while being replete with interest, as well, to regular Symphony patrons.

Mr. Koussevitzky is dividing the five programmes according to the various important national schools of music.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

NOV 26 1926

Boston Symphony

Music lovers of Hartford and surrounding towns are again to have the privilege of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky February 6 at the Capitol Theater.

Under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky, whom critics have agreed upon as among the foremost conductors in the world, the Boston Symphony is delighting more auditors than ever before. In Hartford, as in Boston, there is always a waiting list for tickets to the orchestra's concerts and from the advance sale of tickets, now in progress at McCoy's music store, No. 89 Asylum street, it appears that the capacity of the Capitol Theater on the date of the concert will be taxed. Reservations may be made now by telephoning 2-3147 or by mail to Frank A. Sedgwick, who is responsible for bringing the orchestra to this city.

Transcript
Wed. Nov. 24th

Incidents and Prospects

When the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra mistakenly permitted the radio to intrude into its concerts, they fondly believed that broadcasting would not lessen audiences. Now, after only six months, the sale of tickets for the series of Tuesday afternoons lags; while conspicuously and rather pathetically, the management announces in a circular: "These programs will not be broadcast." Possibly hard necessity is bringing wisdom back to Symphony Hall.

Mr. Toscanini has devised a new grouping of Beethoven's Symphonies into four concerts, which Mr. Koussevitzky might reasonably consider when, next spring, he arranges his centenary rites. Upon his first program Mr. Toscanini puts the first, second and fifth; next, the third and fourth; then, the sixth and seventh; finally, the eighth and ninth.

Strauss's "Alpine Symphony" is still remembered from the four performances at Symphony Hall last winter. London has lately heard it under Strauss himself. The music led the reviewer of The Telegraph to a fresh point of view:

When Strauss comes to nature he seems unable to understand her deeper moods. He is longing for the town and the strifes of the town. The great silences enhanced rather than broken by stirring leaves and whispering brooks are meaningless to him, nor does the immense solitude of the summit move him to deep thought. He is the townsman born and bred; carrying wherever he goes his habits, his attitude of mind, who finds some zest and stimulus if dipping now and again in the pages of some minor romantic poem, and feels a thrill at the sound of real cow bells. German romanticism relished all that in her nature is mysterious and terrible. Strauss, as the child of our own time, has lost that feeling in the fancied security of our civilization. His picture of the waterfall is pretty, but in the style of the photographer; his storm is devastating, but in keeping with the report of a meteorologist.

MUSIC OVERSEAS NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

NOV 24 1926

NOV 24 1926

-:- MUSIC -:-

Not since M. Koussevitsky began to come to Providence with the Boston Symphony Orchestra has he given us a program finer than that we listened to at the Albee Theatre last night. Nor at any time has he conducted with a nobler sense of spiritual as well as of tonal values. Playing Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, the "Eroica" symphony and Wagner's "Prelude to Lohengrin" and the "Prelude to The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Koussevitsky was called on to show every resource of his muscianship and his intellect. He swept through them like the master he is. The other number on a program that was, if anything, too full of riches was Roussel's "Padmavati," a suite which we had not heard before and which we would not travel very far to hear again.

There are times when Koussevitsky is anything but satisfying in his interpretations of Wagner and Beethoven, times when the Slav in him seems altogether alien to the Teutonic masters. That was not so last night. The flesh and spirit of Lohengrin were at the Russian's command; there was a passion for human freedom in the "Egmont" and there was an intriguing sense of irony in the high comedy of the Mastersingers.

Great praise should be given to the Albee Theatre management for the pains it took to reconstruct the stage so that the audience might get the full benefit of M. Koussevitzky's greatness. We can hardly imagine a pleasanter environment than last night's for a genius to disport himself in. And Koussevitzky enjoyed himself to the full. There was not [illegible]

NEW YORK WORLD

NOV 26 1926

FOLK-SERMON TO MUSIC

James Weldon Johnson's Negro folk-sermon, "Creation," with music by Louis Gruenberg, will be presented tomorrow night at Town Hall. Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony will conduct, and Julius Bledsoe, Negro baritone, will have the principal role. "Creation" contains the spirit and rhythm of the old-fashioned Negro sermon.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

NOV 24 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT FINE

One of Most Satisfactory Programs Ever Given in City Of Providence

One of the most satisfactory programs ever given in Providence was provided by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, M. Serge Koussevitsky conducting, at the E. F. Albee Theatre last night. One might raise the objection that the Roussel suite, with its churnings and its tootings, was out of place alongside Beethoven and Wagner, but in such cases, if one's background of standards has no room for Roussel, it is well to remember that on April 7, 1805, at the Theatre an der Wein, somebody shouted from the gallery during the first performance of the Eroica: "I'd give another kreutzer if they would stop."

A conductor cannot go wrong, except in the ultra-ultra-modern circles, with Beethoven and Wagner. They satisfy every musical taste; they satisfy those who are looking for power, dignity and nobility; and they satisfy those who like their music lush, even treacly.

So much has been said about the Eroica, or Third Symphony, of Beethoven, that it is entirely superfluous to plie a Pelion of rhetoric upon the Ossa already constructed to challenge the gods when Beethoven has long since been accepted in the musical heaven. Let us quote a man who never breaks into the program notes as a critic but, nevertheless, always has something to say. H. L. Mencken says of the Third: "The older I grow the more I am convinced that the most portentous phenomenon in the whole history of music was the first public performance of the Eroica on April 7, 1805. What makes it worth discussing to-day and forever, is the fact that on its very first page Beethoven threw his hat into the ring and laid his claim to immortality. No compromise! No easy bridge from the past! The Second Symphony is already miles behind. A new order of music has been born. It must have been a great night in Vienna. But perhaps not for the actual Viennese. They went to hear 'a new grand symphony in D-sharp' (sic!). What they found in the Theatre an der Wein was a revolution."

In short, the people who heard the Eroica last night heard music that was not meant for death, that will be stirring people when this generation has become a footnote in history.

As for the rest, there was Beethoven's Overture to Egmont; there was Wagner's Prelude to Lohengrin and his Prelude to the Mastersingers; and Roussel's Suite from the opera ballet 'Padmavati.'"

M. Koussevitsky, as is his wont, conducted magnificently.

THIS CLIPPING FROM REGISTER
WHEELING, W. VA.

NOV 28 1926

Station FL to Attempt Concert Broadcast

The French radio station FL, located in the Eiffel Tower, Paris, on Saturday night will endeavor to pick up the Boston Symphony orchestra broadcast through WBZ and associate stations.

Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress," from the ballet "The Garden of Paradise," has been selected as the opening number on Saturday's symphony program. The young Russian composer, Alexander Tansman, has made arrangements with station FL to pick up the signals of either WBZ, WJZ or WGY in the Eiffel Tower, where he will be stationed so that he may hear the first presentation in America of his composition by the orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE
NOV 21 1926

Boston Symphony Opens New York Season Thursday

Koussevitzky Will Present 2 Prokofieff Numbers; Week's Programs of the New York Orchestras

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its third season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will begin its usual series of five Thursday nights and five Saturday afternoons in Carnegie Hall, and five Friday nights at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, this week. Thursday and Friday nights Mr. Koussevitzky's programs will include Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and music from Serge Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." Another Prokofieff novelty will be offered Saturday afternoon, a suite from the ballet "Chout" (Buffoon).

Both Prokofieff works are new here in this form, though the Chicago Opera, during its last New York visit, on February 14, 1922, gave "The Love for Three Oranges," and "Chout" began a run at the Neighborhood Playhouse, Howard Barlow conducting, on March 6, 1924. The suite from "The Love for Three Oranges" is made up of five numbers edited by Albert Spalding.

The Philharmonic Orchestra, which played in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore last week, plays in Carnegie Hall this afternoon, when Willem Mengelberg's program includes the first American performance of the Dutch composer Johan Wagenaar's overture to "The Taming of the Shrew." Wagenaar is director of the Royal Conservatory of Music at The Hague; his overture to "Cyrano" was played here in 1921 by the National Symphony under Mr. Mengelberg's direction.

As usual in Thanksgiving week, the mid-week evening Carnegie Hall concert will be given on Wednesday instead of Thursday, the repetition remaining on Friday afternoon. For these concerts the Philharmonic will play a Tchaikovsky program, including the Rococo Variations, with Hans Kindler as solo cellist, and the Pathetic Symphony. The program for the fourth popular-priced Students' concert Saturday night will be the same as this afternoon.

Next Sunday afternoon, November 28, the Philharmonic will give its second Brooklyn concert of the season at the Academy of Music under Mr. Mengelberg's direction, with Lauritz Melchior, Danish tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as soloist, singing the Forging Song from Wagner's "Siegfried." Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture, Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" Suite and Brahms's Third Symphony complete the program.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conducting, will repeat this afternoon at Mecca Temple the concert performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walküre," given last Thursday in Carnegie Hall. Elsa Alsen, soprano; Rudolf Laubenthal, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Frederick Patton, barytone, will be soloists. Mr. Damrosch will begin the performance with explanatory comments at the piano; the orchestra will play two other excerpts from "Die Walküre."

Friday night at Carnegie Hall, and next Sunday afternoon in Mecca Auditorium, Lewis Richards, harpsichordist, will be soloist in Haydn's D major Concerto; Mr. Damrosch's other numbers will be Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony and a ballet suite from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis."

In the Symphony's Children's Concert next Saturday morning in Carnegie Hall Joseph Knitzer, a thirteen-year-old violinist taught and sponsored by Leopold Auer, will make his debut, playing the second and third movements of the Mendelssohn concerto. Knitzer, who comes from Detroit, has been a pupil of Auer for the last three years and is said by him to have great talent and promise.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 22 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY TWO BEETHOVEN NUMBERS

Composer's 100th Anniversary to be Observed in Concert Here To-morrew.

Two numbers by Beethoven, in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the great composer's death, will open the programme of the second concert here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given to-morrow night in the Albee Theatre at 8:15 o'clock. These numbers will be the overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont," and the "Eroica" Symphony No. 3, in E-flat.

This mighty symphony was considered truly revolutionary in its day. The composer was inspired by the exploits of his contemporary, Napoleon Bonaparte, through whom Beethoven foresaw the realization of his republican ideals. When he found that the Corsican General was abusing his power and ambitious for military aggrandizement, he destroyed the dedication upon the title page of his manuscript in a moment of disillusion and anger.

The novelty of the performance will be a suite from the opera-ballet, "Padmavati," by the French composer, Roussel. This score, introduced to America by Koussevitzky last season, had an outstanding success. Padmavati, in the story, is the wife of a Mongolian Sultan. Her beauty involves her people in warfare. The programme will close with two Wagnerian excerpts, the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
NOV 21 1926

Boston Symphony Opens Season Here On Friday Evening

Beethoven's Third Symphony, "Eroica," in commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of the master's death, will fittingly open the season of Boston Symphony concerts here, when Serge Koussevitzky's Orchestra performs in the Academy of Music Friday evening, at 8:15, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute. This is the heroic score which bore a dedication to Napolean Bonaparte, Beethoven's contemporary, until the composer, disillusioned by the emperor's excesses, destroyed the title page of the manuscript.

A modern Russian score which has caused considerable interest at recent performances by this orchestra elsewhere, is a Suite from Prokofieff's Opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." The opera is remembered from its production by the Chicago Opera Company in hicago and New York. The excerpts which comprise this suite are "Les Ridicules," March, Scherzo, The Prince and the Princess, and The Flight. The closing number will be Respighi's Symphonic Poem, "Pines of Rome." This master work of the Italian composer describes four historical spots of the eternal city which are set off by ancient pines. The first movement, "Pines of the Villa Borghese," describes in riotous fashion the antics and games of Italian children. "The Pines near a catacomb," is a sort of nocturne in which a beautiful trumpet solo is played off stage. "The Pines of the Janiculum" ends with the introduction of the song of an actual nightingale as recorded and reproduced on a phonograph. "The Pines of the Appian Way," describe the gradual approach of the ancient Roman legions to the gates of the city. The piece with measured tread gradually accumulates sound as the cohorts draw nearer. The ancient buccinae are introduced in the form of an extra section of tenor tubas. The imposing music rises to a climax which is looked upon as one of the most notable in modern music.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
NOV 23 1926

League of Composers Opens Season Saturday Night

The opportunity to hear an old-time negro "folk sermon," as embodied in James Weldon Johnson's poem "The Creation," which Louis Gruenberg has set to music for voice and instrumental ensemble, will be supplied by the League of Composers next Saturday night, in Town Hall, Manhattan, with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, at the league's first concert of the season. Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce a programme of four modern works (all new to New York), by Bartok, Webern, Krass and Gruenberg. In order to meet the demand frequently raised by new music, repetitions of two numbers, Webern's "Five Orchestral Pieces" and Bartok's "Village Scenes," will be included.

Mr. Koussevitzky will lead a group of men from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and voice parts are to be sung by Julius Bledsoe, baritone, and the Brahms Vocal Quartet.

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE
NOV 23 1926

PLAN NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY SERIES

Many Out-of-Town Subscribers For Tuesday Afternoon Concerts.

SERGE KOUSSOVITZKY.
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The new series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians, in Symphony Hall, Boston, offer a good chance for out-of-town subscribers to enjoy the Boston Symphony orchestra under its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

This series, instituted last year will be given on five Tuesday afternoons beginning Nov. 30. Since the concerts begin at 3:15 promptly and never last later than 5 o'clock, they have a large patronage from the subscribers of the outlying towns of Boston.

This Tuesday series is the one remaining opportunity for those who wish to become Symphony subscribers, since the other four series of 62 concerts in greater Boston are subscribed by the season to the last seat. To initiates the Tuesday series will offer an especially interesting introduction to symphonic music, while being replete with interest, as well, to regular Symphony patrons.

Mr. Koussevitzky is dividing the five programmes according to the various important national schools of music.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
NOV 26 1926

Boston Symphony

Music lovers of Hartford and surrounding towns are again to have the privilege of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky February 6 at the Capitol Theater.

Under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky, whom critics have agreed upon as among the foremost conductors in the world, the Boston Symphony is delighting more auditors than ever before. In Hartford, as in Boston, there is always a waiting list for tickets to the orchestra's concerts and from the advance sale of tickets, now in progress at McCoy's music store, No. 89 Asylum street, it appears that the capacity of the Capitol Theater on the date of the concert will be taxed. Reservations may be made now by telephoning 2-3147 or by mail to Frank A. Sedgwick, who is responsible for bringing the orchestra to this city.

Transcript
Wed. Nov. 24th

Incidents and Prospects

When the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra mistakenly permitted the radio to intrude into its concerts, they fondly believed that broadcasting would not lessen audiences. Now, after only six months, the sale of tickets for the series of Tuesday afternoons lags; while conspicuously and rather pathetically, the management announces in a circular: "These programs will not be broadcast." Possibly hard necessity is bringing wisdom back to Symphony Hall.

Mr. Toscanini has devised a new grouping of Beethoven's Symphonies into four concerts, which Mr. Koussevitzky might reasonably consider when, next spring, he arranges his centenary rites. Upon his first program Mr. Toscanini puts the first, second and fifth; next, the third and fourth; then, the sixth and seventh; finally, the eighth and ninth.

Strauss's "Alpine Symphony" is still remembered from the four performances at Symphony Hall last winter. London has lately heard it under Strauss himself. The music led the reviewer of The Telegraph to a fresh point of view:

> When Strauss comes to nature he seems unable to understand her deeper moods. He is longing for the town and the strifes of the town. The great silences enhanced rather than broken by stirring leaves and whispering brooks are meaningless to him, nor does the immense solitude of the summit move him to deep thought. He is the townsman born and bred; carrying wherever he goes his habits, his attitude of mind, who finds some zest and stimulus if dipping now and again in the pages of some minor romantic poem, and feels a thrill at the sound of real cow bells. German romanticism relished all that in her nature is mysterious and terrible. Strauss, as the child of our own time, has lost that feeling in the fancied security of our civilization. His picture of the waterfall is pretty, but in the style of the photographer; his storm is devastating, but in keeping with the report of a meteorologist.

Nov. 24

Trans. Nov. 24

MUSIC OVERSEAS NEWS

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 24 1926
NOV 24 1926

-:- MUSIC -:-

Not since M. Koussevitsky began to come to Providence with the Boston Symphony Orchestra has he given us a program finer than that we listened to at the Albee Theatre last night. Nor at any time has he conducted with a nobler sense of spiritual as well as of tonal values. Playing Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, the "Eroica" symphony and Wagner's "Prelude to Lohengrin" and the "Prelude to The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Koussevitsky was called on to show every resource of his muscianship and his intellect. He swept through them like the master he is. The other number on a program that was, if anything, too full of riches was Roussel's "Padmavati," a suite which we had not heard before and which we would not travel very far to hear again.

There are times when Koussevitsky is anything but satisfying in his interpretations of Wagner and Beethoven, times when the Slav in him seems altogether alien to the Teutonic masters. That was not so last night. The flesh and spirit of Lohengrin were at the Russian's command; there was a passion for human freedom in the "Egmont" and there was an intriguing sense of irony in the high comedy of the Mastersingers.

Great praise should be given to the Albee Theatre management for the pains it took to reconstruct the stage so that the audience might get the full benefit of M. Koussevitzky's greatness. We can hardly imagine a pleasanter environment than last night's for a genius to disport himself in. And Koussevitzky enjoyed himself to the full. There was not a moment when angels were not dancing on the tip of his baton, drawing out secrets from the instruments that they would never give up to a less magical wand.

R. de A. J.

will conduct ... baritone, will have the ... "Creation" contains the spirit and rhythm of the old-fashioned Negro sermon.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
NOV 24 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT FINE

One of Most Satisfactory Programs Ever Given in City Of Providence

One of the most satisfactory programs ever given in Providence was provided by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, M. Serge Koussevitsky conducting, at the E. F. Albee Theatre last night. One might raise the objection that the Roussel suite, with its churnings and its tootings, was out of place alongside Beethoven and Wagner, but in such cases, if one's background of standards has no room for Roussel, it is well to remember that on April 7, 1805, at the Theatre an der Wein, somebody shouted from the gallery during the first performance of the Eroica: "I'd give another kreutzer if they would stop."

A conductor cannot go wrong, except in the ultra-ultra-modern circles, with Beethoven and Wagner. They satisfy every musical taste; they satisfy those who are looking for power, dignity and nobility; and they satisfy those who like their music lush, even treacly.

So much has been said about the Eroica, or Third Symphony, of Beethoven, that it is entirely superfluous to plie a Pelion of rhetoric upon the Ossa already constructed to challenge the gods when Beethoven has long since been accepted in the musical heaven. Let us quote a man who never breaks into the program notes as a critic but, nevertheless, always has something to say. H. L. Mencken says of the Third: "The older I grow the more I am convinced that the most portentous phenomenon in the whole history of music was the first public performance of the Eroica on April 7, 1805. What makes it worth discussing to-day and forever, is the fact that on its very first page Beethoven threw his hat into the ring and laid his claim to immortality. No compromise! No easy bridge from the past! The Second Symphony is already miles behind. A new order of music has been born. It must have been a great night in Vienna. But perhaps not for the actual Viennese. They went to hear 'a new grand symphony in D-sharp' (sic!). What they found in the Theatre an der Wein was a revolution."

In short, the people who heard the Eroica last night heard music that was not meant for death, that will be stirring people when this generation has become a footnote in history.

As for the rest, there was Beethoven's Overture to Egmont; there was Wagner's Prelude to Lohengrin and his Prelude to the Mastersingers; and Roussel's Suite from the opera ballet 'Padmavati."

M. Koussevitsky, as is his wont, conducted magnificently.

THIS CLIPPING FROM REGISTER
WHEELING, W. VA.
NOV 28 1926

Station FL to Attempt Concert Broadcast

The French radio station FL, located in the Eiffel Tower, Paris, on Saturday night will endeavor to pick up the Boston Symphony orchestra broadcast through WBZ and associate stations.

Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress," from the ballet "The Garden of Paradise," has been selected as the opening number on Saturday's symphony program. The young Russian composer, Alexander Tansman, has made arrangements with station FL to pick up the signals of either WBZ, WJZ or WGY in the Eiffel Tower, where he will be stationed so that he may hear the first presentation in America of his composition by the orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

IDENCE, R. I.
IBUNE

NOV 24 1926

N SYMPHONY CONCERT FINE

ost Satisfactory Pro- ver Given in City Providence

most satisfactory pro- iven in Providence was he Boston Symphony Or- Serge Koussevitsky con- he E. F. Albee Theatre e might raise the objec- Roussel suite, with its its tootings, was out of le Beethoven and Wag- uch cases, if one's back ndards has no room for well to remember that on at the Theatre an der dy shouted from the gal- he first performance of 'd give another kreutzer stop."

cannot go wrong, ex- tra-ultra-modern circles, and Wagner. They sat- sical taste; they satisfy looking for power, dig- lity; and they satisfy their music lush, even s been said about the rd Symphony, of Bee- is entirely superfluous n of rhetoric upon the nstructed to challenge

Beethoven has long pted in the musical uote a man who never program notes as a rtheless, always has y. H. L. Mencken says "The older I grow the nvinced that the most omenon in the whole was the first public he Eroica on April 7, s it worth discussing er, is the fact that on e Beethoven threw his and laid his claim to compromise! No easy past! The Second Sym- miles behind. A new as been born. It must eat night in Vienna. for the actual Vien- to hear 'a new grand sharp' (sic!). What Theatre an der Wein " eople who heard the heard music that r death, that will be hen this generation note in history. there was Beetho- Egmont; there was to Lohengrin and Mastersingers; and m the opera ballet as is his wont, ently.

CLIPPING FROM GISTER
LING, W. VA.

NOV 28 1926

to Attempt cert Broadcast

adio station FL, lo- ffel Tower, Paris, on will endeavor to oston Symphony or- cast through WBZ tations.

Dance of the Sorcer- ballet "The Garden as been selected as mber on Saturday's gram. The young ser, Alexander Tans- arrangements with pick up the signals WJZ or WGY in the here he will be sta- e may hear the first America of his com- orchestra under the ge Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 26 1926

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts.

There has been much talk of Serge Koussevitzky's way with the classics. Before he came to America as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it was predicted that while he might serve well as an exponent of modern music he would be likely to disappoint when he performed the classic repertory. But the interpretations of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and "Eroica" symphony given last night in Carnegie Hall were exceptionally eloquent presentations of familiar master-works. Mr. Koussevitzky has never been the slavish follower of tradition; it may be admitted that on more than one occasion he has displayed singular ideas of familiar compositions. Last night he was far from the purely objective or academic but it is not often that overture and symphony have been given performance of such virility, such Beethovenish force and emotional power.

Mr. Toscanini's "Eroica" last Winter was a marvelously finished and eloquent interpretation, but it was Beethoven somewhat Italianized — somewhat, if one may coin the term, renaissanced. The "Eroica" symphony last night lost not a whit of its mighty architecture and the romantic, dynamic quality which the composer undoubtedly intended, in a score which may yet appear as the greatest of the nine symphonies. The tempo of the first movement was a little faster than customary—if one is interested in this detail of the matter—as the introduction of the Egmont overture was a little slow. But in neither case was there the thought of a forced or affected conception. The very opening measures established greatness of mood; the musical thought and emotional development went hand in hand, building up, step by the step, to climaxes of superb breadth and effectiveness. The close of the overture was as the wild rejoicing of a liberated people, and it was more—it was Beethoven shouting to the skies of the emancipation of human kind from the fate that had overhung it.

The four movements of the symphony were read with a sincerity and understanding that had cumulative effect. One seeks in vain, in fact, among recent performances of the "Eroica" in this city for such stirring and dramatic treatment of the variations that make the finale. Here, as in all the other movements, and as in Beethoven's music, masterly balance and self-control were united with a thrilling emotional intensity. Mr. Koussevitzky—let us be thrice thankful for it—used only three and not six horns in the poetic and mysterious scherzo. If the ear is not deceived, he doubled the brass in one of the variations, when the proclamation of the theme is given to these wind instruments. The effect was admirable, and the deliverance from the popular vice of modern conductors, in regard to the six-horn imposture in the trio of the scherzo, was a delight and a relief from the excesses that even celebrated conductors have been willing to indulge in, to the injury of an immortal master and certain of his works.

Nor should the technique and the tonal effects of the orchestra be forgotten. Every year the Boston orchestra develops by leaps and bounds. Not only has it regained the resiliency and the glow of the old tone, but it is more flexible and expressive under Mr. Koussevitzky's hand than it has been under any conductor since the days of Karl Muck. The various performances last night were of virtuoso quality from the first note to the last. When Nikisch came to conduct the Boston orchestra he remarked on the splendid drilling it had received from Wilhelm Gericke, then added that he had only to "sensitize" the band. Mr. Koussevitzky, with the aid of Pierre Monteux before him, is rapidly restoring to the Boston Symphony its long and honorable heritage, and is "sensitizing" it. The concert last night served impressive notice of the fact. An audience which had filled the hall to the utmost capacity before the concert began testified to its pleasure. Mr. Koussevitzky has seldom appeared here in so great a light as an interpreter.

No doubt the thought of the centenary of Beethoven's death had to do with the selection of the overture and symphony for the first part of the program. For the second half Mr. Koussevitzky presented the orchestral excerpts from Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges" and the now familiar "Pines of Rome" of Ottorino Respighi. "The Love for Three Oranges" was performed in New York by that operatic organization, the Chicago Opera Company, which is curious and interested in new music as some other organizations are not, in 1922. The orchestra excerpts are "Les Ridicules," "Marche," "Scherzo," "Le Prince et la Princesse," and "La Fuite." They are all short and most of them in amusingly grotesque or satirical vein. The Prince and the Princess discourse with more sentiment, but Prokofieff is a post-war composer in his absence of romanticism of moonshine in his music, and his terse, dynamic manner of expressing himself.

The suite was obviously much enjoyed and applauded with enthusiasm —this music of Beethoven—a young composer, as Alexander Siloti once remarked, with a future before him. One applauds these short pieces of Prokofieff and enjoys them up to a certain point. Then they give the impression of what is cerebral, perhaps also cynical, and a musician who is more of an eclectic and student of scores than he is original and creative. Whether Prokofieff is the hope of modern Russia, as some believe, is a matter that no doubt will be hotly debated. It was evident, at any rate, that the audience enjoyed him. The applause was long and continuous, though the orchestra richly merited the company's approval. This concert showed Mr. Koussevitzky at the heighth of his power as an interpreter, and it also bore impressive testimony to the present magnificent capacities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

N. Y. EVENING SUN

NOV 26 1926

Boston Symphony in Concert

Orchestra Opens Its Season Here With Works of Beethoven, Prokofieff and Respighi.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Beethoven centenary was not forgotten in the program of the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening in Carnegie Hall. The first part of the entertainment consisted of the "Egmont" overture and the "Eroica" symphony. The second half comprised a suite from Serge Prokofieff's memorable opera "The Love for Three Oranges" and Respighi's symphonic poem "The Pines of Rome." This was a program of considerable substance to place before an audience which presumably had observed the day by the usual feast.

The records inform us that Prokofieff's work was revealed to New York at the Manhattan Opera House on February 14, 1922. We should also remember that the story was created by Gozzi, who originated that of "Turandot." Prokofieff's opera is satirical, sardonically humorous, clever and possessing much of that superficial originality which in these barren days must be accepted in lieu of fecund imagination. The suite contains some of representative ideas of the operatic score and has been skillfully arranged by Albert Spalding.

Mr. Philip Hale declared not longer ago than November 13 that this music was not in need of the venerable defense that it would sound better in the theater than when transplanted from its native soil. What Mr. Hale said was so admirable that it is hard to resist the temptation to quote it. What he did not say was that this suite contains all the good musical thoughts in the opera and that they are at no disadvantage when presented as absolute music because the titles of the movements provide them with sufficient indications of the composer's conceptions.

Furthermore, the suite was not needed in last evening's arrangement. The concert was just that much too long and a scheme which might have been symmetrical was unbalanced by its presence. The music is pretty enough and petty enough. No one should find it difficult to hear, and most music lovers will probably find it too trifling to occupy their attention.

Mr. Koussevitzky's readings of the "Eroica" and the overture were virile and highly colored, but not at the expense of the Beethoven spirit. The first movement of the symphony went briskly, but the interpretation had force and logical development. The metronome mark had no terrors for the conductor, but he did not depart from it greatly. His feeling for the pace of the movement justified itself in the effect. The tonal opulence of the Boston Orchestra was in all its fullness last night. It was a good concert, but would have been much better had the tenuous suite been left at home.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BANNER
NASHVILLE, TEN.
NOV 28 1926

Boston Symphony On WJZ Hookup Saturday Night

Another of the programs by the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will be broadcast by Stations WJZ, WDZ and WGY and 7:10 Saturday night. These symphony broadcasts are proving one of the stellar radio attractions of the season and are attracting a legion of listeners aggregating millions.

During the broadcast, which will come to the listeners direct from Symphony Hall, Boston, Prof. John P. Marshall will give to the radio audience instructive information and comment corresponding to the notes on the program used by the audience at Symphony Hall. His broadcasts will include interesting facts regarding the composition played and information regarding the composer and his particular style of composition. His remarks will be made in nontechnical language so that even the most recent addict to symphony orchestras and symphonic music may understand him without fear of being "swamped" with highly technical musical terms.

NEWS
NEWARK, N. J.
NOV 26 1926

55

Montclair Enthuses Over Boston Symphony Program

Of the 105 musicians in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at least ten were excused from taking part in the concert given by it under the auspices of the Unity Course in the assembly hall of the Montclair High School Wednesday night because the stage temporarily enlarged by extending it over the first row of seats, was not spacious enough to accommodate all the members. The size of the band and the volume of tone produced by it in forte passages under the compelling will of Conductor Koussevitzky were such, however, as to make some of the performances thrilling experiences for the audience crowding the hall.

For the first time in this reporter's attendance at symphonic concerts in this neighborhood, the unusual spectacle of an audience bursting into laughter over something it heard was witnessed. It had cause for its merriment. The provocation was Serge Prokofieff's suite from his opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," first performed in this country by the Chicago Opera Company nearly five years ago. Edited by Albert Spalding, America's foremost native violinist, the suite comprises six movements, labeled "Las Ridicules," "Scene Infernale," "March," Scherzo, "The Prince and the Princess" and "The Flight." Save to those in the audience, who satisfy their musical needs in Manhattan, the young Russian one of

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN

NOV 26 1926

ive erle-his en a-xt n" dc brought against him before he had his genius and conquered his enemies.

By his vigorous treatment of the work, Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to prefer grandeur of effect to refinements and subtleties in interpretation. He got what he aimed at, though sometimes at the expense of slightly obscuring the charm in the "Prize" song as lyrical as anything to be found in operatic literature. But the rush, sweep and sonority in the playing of the march almost took the audience off its feet. To their feet again came the musicians in response to long continued applause.

As for the "Eroica" symphony inspired by Beethoven's admiration of Napoleon when the Corsican was merely Consul of France, an adulation that turned into disgust after he had assumed the imperial crown, it is one of the milestones along the path of musical progress. The freshness of invention, fecundity of ideas, and the composer's constant development in mastering technical means to his artistic requirements are as noticeable in this as in his later and more popular fifth and the great ninth of his creations in symphonic form.

Any work, which Mr. Koussevitzky directs, cannot escape his individual touch, his informing spirit. His is no academic and dry reading of Beethoven. He takes no offending liberties with the letter of the score; but he makes his men infuse their performance with a feeling and warmth that causes it to glow.

Nov 29th

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Koussevitzky has discarded the program announced a week ago for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday. The chosen pieces now are: the third "Leonora" Overture of Beethoven in which the conductor has yet to be heard in Boston; the "Emperor Concerto" of Beethoven in which Mr. Cortot will play the piano-part; the orchestral version by Ravel of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" first disclosed at Symphony Hall two years ago. By these signs Mr. Cortot is ambitious of Beethoven.

HERALD Nov 28

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

The opening program is announced for the series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, in Symphony hall next Tuesday, at 3:15. This program, devoted to the German school of music, will include Beethoven's Leonora Overture No. 3, the Perelude and Love Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, E minor.

The five programs are to be divided according to the various national schools of music. They should be among the most interesting of the season. Desirable seats for the season are still available.

N.Y. Post November 26

Music

By Olga Samaroff

Serge Koussewitzky Leads Beethoven and Moderns in First Concert of Boston Symphony

THE program of the Boston Symphony concert last night at Carnegie Hall seemed to me to throw a light on Serge Koussewitzky's artistic make-up which could scarcely have been more revealing. My impression was a crystallization of former instinctive feelings — namely, that Mr. Koussewitzky as an interpreter follows the tendencies of the modern composers in that they are most in sympathy with pre-Beethoven and post-Debussy music. When I say "in sympathy" I do not mean it in the sense of a prejudice, a parti pris. I mean that the sincere modernist really feels that way.

Olga Samaroff

Last night Mr. Koussewitzky conducted Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and "Eroica" symphony in the first part of the programs, and a suite from Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," and Respighi's "Pini di Roma" in the second part. It seemed to me like a program conducted by two different men.

IN the first half there was an earnest, dignified musician conducting familiar masterpieces with care, precision and respect for the composer. In the second half there was an ardent artist striking fire from the orchestra. His brain functioned in the first half. His feeling only joined it in the second.

Like everything I write, this must be taken only as the opinion and impression of an individual, not a pronouncement which I seek to impose as a fact on any reader. This feeling also has nothing whatever to do with nationality. The idea that nobody but a German can conduct Beethoven or that a German cannot understand Latin music, etc., seems to me one of the most puerile of prejudices. Nationality affects the lowest stratum of interpreters—those who have to depend solely on instinct. A Hungarian cafe band will play Hungarian music best; the negro will sing negro songs best.

But when we come to the region of highly developed artistic talent such strictures disappear more and more until we find a Casals playing Bach and Haydn with the utmost perfection, Toscanini giving a performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, which is unsurpassed, and such artists as Kreisler, Gabrilowitsch, Stokowski, Hofmann and many others interpreting music of all nations in a way which, in my opinion, would make it impossible for a blindfolded observer, unaware of their identity, to do more than guess at their nationality.

THE impression I received last night had only to do with music and Mr. Koussewitzky's response to it. And from an analytical standpoint—for one should scarcely base critical opinions on instinctive feelings alone—I should say that the somewhat matter of fact too fast and inflexible tempo. The layman would be amazed if it could be demonstrated to him what transformations can be caused by very slight degrees of difference in tempo. A conductor will necessarily get near the right tempo, that is, the one desired by the composer, through tradition in the case of familiar masterpieces, but no two conductors will be apt to take an identical one. There will be infinitesimal differences; for the interpreter's feeling must be his guide in the last instance, and that infinitesimal degree will make an extraordinary difference in the performance.

Wagner lays great stress on this in his treatise "Ueber das Dirigieren." Mr. Koussewitzky's tempo was animated and active, but, it seemed to me, it led him to pass over or through beauties which did not gain their full significance. Obviously he could use no other tempo. It was the way he felt the work, but in my opinion it is the most tangible musical reason which can be given for the impression I received.

Prokofieff's Suite contains delightful music and it was superbly performed.

There was pulsing life and color in the "Marche," a strange haunting beauty in "Le Prince et la Princesse," and at least, very remarkable orchestral playing in "La Fuite." Mr. Koussewitzky seemed in his element in this music. His enthusiasm was contagious —his understanding complete.

NEWS
DETROIT, MICH.

NOV 28 19

SEASON OPENED BY BOSTONIANS

Koussevitzky, as Before, Leads Orchestra Through Brilliant, Novel Program.

By ELSPETH WILSON.
(Staff Correspondent The Detroit News.)

NEW YORK, Nov. 27.—Among orchestral doings of recent Gotham interest was the opening of the 1926-'27 Boston Symphonic season Thursday evening. Serge Koussevitsky was in possession of the baton, as he has been for the last two years. The occasion was marked by its share of novelty—this season seems to be pre-eminently one of new orchestral presentations—music from Serge Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," being the outstanding offering of the day. This particular piece is composed of five numbers, edited by Albert Spalding, and is new to this city in orchestral form. For the rest Mr. Koussevitsky gave Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony in this the first regular Thursday night series of five New York concerts by the Boston organization. This afternoon (Saturday) the regular matinee series, also of five concerts, will open, a suite from the Prokofieff ballet "Chout" (Buffoon), also new in this form, being included on the program.

IDENCE, R. I.
IBUNE

NOV 24 1926

N SYMPHONY CONCERT FINE

ost Satisfactory Pro- ver Given in City Providence

most satisfactory pro- riven in Providence was he Boston Symphony Or- Serge Koussevitzky con- he E. F. Albee Theatre e might raise the objec- Roussel suite, with its its tootings, was out of de Beethoven and Wag- uch cases, if one's back ndards has no room for well to remember that on at the Theatre an der dy shouted from the gal- he first performance of 'd give another kreutzer stop."

cannot go wrong, ex- tra-ultra-modern circles, n and Wagner. They sat- sical taste; they satisfy looking for power, dig- lity; and they satisfy their music lush, even

s been said about the rd Symphony, of Bee- is entirely superfluous n of rhetoric upon the onstructed to challenge

Beethoven has long epted in the musical uote a man who never program notes as a rtheless, always has y. H. L. Mencken says The older I grow the nvinced that the most omenon in the whole was the first public he Eroica on April 7, es it worth discussing er, is the fact that on e Beethoven threw his and laid his claim to compromise! No easy past! The Second Sym- y miles behind. A new as been born. It must eat night in Vienna. for the actual Vien- to hear 'a new grand -sharp' (sic!). What Theatre an der Wein ," eople who heard the heard music that r death, that will be hen this generation note in history. there was Beetho- Egmont; there was to Lohengrin and Mastersingers; and m the opera ballet

, as is his wont, ently.

CLIPPING FROM GISTER
LING, W. VA.

NOV 28 1926

to Attempt cert Broadcast

adio station FL, lo- fel Tower, Paris, on will endeavor to oston Symphony or- cast through WBZ tations.

Dance of the Sorcer- ballet "The Garden as been selected as mber on Saturday's ogram. The young ser, Alexander Tans- arrangements with pick up the signals WJZ or WGY in the here he will be sta- e may hear the first America of his com- orchestra under the ge Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 26 1926

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts.

There has been much talk of Serge Koussevitzky's way with the classics. Before he came to America as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it was predicted that while he might serve well as an exponent of modern music he would be likely to disappoint when he performed the classic repertory. But the interpretations of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and "Eroica" symphony given last night in Carnegie Hall were exceptionally eloquent presentations of familiar master-works. Mr. Koussevitzky has never been the slavish follower of tradition; it may be admitted that on more than one occasion he has displayed singular ideas of familiar compositions. Last night he was far from the purely objective or academic but it is not often that overture and symphony have been given performance of such virility, such Beethovenish force and emotional power.

Mr. Toscanini's "Eroica" last Winter was a marvelously finished and eloquent interpretation, but it was Beethoven somewhat Italianized—somewhat, if one may coin the term, renaissanced. The "Eroica" symphony last night lost not a whit of its mighty architecture and the romantic, dynamic quality which the composer undoubtedly intended, in a score which may yet appear as the greatest of the nine symphonies. The tempo of the first movement was a little faster than customary—if one is interested in this detail of the matter—as the introduction of the Egmont overture was a little slow. But in neither case was there the thought of a forced or affected conception. The very opening measures established greatness of mood; the musical thought and emotional development went hand in hand, building up, step by the step, to climaxes of superb breadth and effectiveness. The close of the overture was as the wild rejoicing of a liberated people, and it was more—it was Beethoven shouting to the skies of the emancipation of human kind from the fate that had overhung it.

The four movements of the symphony were read with a sincerity and understanding that had cumulative effect. One seeks in vain, in fact, among recent performances of the "Eroica" in this city for such stirring and dramatic treatment of the variations that make the finale. Here, as in all the other movements, and as in Beethoven's music, masterly balance and self-control were united with a thrilling emotional intensity. Mr. Koussevitzky—let us be thrice thankful for it—used only three and not six horns in the poetic and mysterious scherzo. If the ear is not deceived, he doubled the brass in one of the variations, when the proclamation of the theme is given to these wind instruments. The effect was admirable, and the deliverance from the popular vice of modern conductors, in regard to the six-horn imposture in the trio of the scherzo, was a delight and a relief from the excesses that even celebrated conductors have been willing to indulge in, to the injury of an immortal master and certain of his works.

Nor should the technique and the tonal effects of the orchestra be forgotten. Every year the Boston orchestra develops by leaps and bounds. It only has it regained the resiliency the glow of the old tone, but it is more flexible and expressive under Koussevitzky's hand than it has under any conductor since the days Karl Muck. The various performances last night were of virtuoso quality from the first note to the last. When Nikisch came to conduct the Boston orchestra he remarked on the splendid drilling it had received from Wilhelm Gericke, then added that he had only to "sensitize" the band. Mr. Koussevitzky, with the aid of Pierre Monteux before him, is rapidly restoring to the Boston Symphony its long and honorable heritage, and is "sensitizing" it. The concert last night served impressive notice of the fact. An audience which had filled the hall to the utmost capacity before the concert began testified to its pleasure. Mr. Koussevitzky has seldom appeared here in so great a light as an interpreter.

No doubt the thought of the centenary of Beethoven's death had to do with the selection of the overture and symphony for the first part of the program. For the second half Mr. Koussevitzky presented the orchestral excerpts from Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges" and the now familiar "Pines of Rome" of Ottorino Respighi. "The Love for Three Oranges" was performed in New York by that operatic organization, the Chicago Opera Company, which is curious and interested in new music as some other organizations are not, in 1922. The orchestra excerpts are "Les Ridicules," "Marche," "Scherzo," "Le Prince et la Princesse," and "La Fuite." They are all short and most of them in amusingly grotesque or satirical vein. The Prince and the Princess discourse with more sentiment, but Prokofieff is a post-war composer in his absence of romanticism of moonshine in his music, and his terse, dynamic manner of expressing himself.

The suite was obviously much enjoyed and applauded with enthusiasm—this music of Beethoven—a young composer, as Alexander Siloti once remarked, with a future before him. One applauds these short pieces of Prokofieff and enjoys them up to a certain point. Then they give the impression of what is cerebral, perhaps also cynical, and a musician who is more of an eclectic and student of scores than he is original and creative. Whether Prokofieff is the hope of modern Russia, as some believe, is a matter that no doubt will be hotly debated. It was evident, at any rate, that the audience enjoyed him. The applause was long and continuous, though the orchestra richly merited the company's approval. This concert showed Mr. Koussevitzky at the heighth of his power as an interpreter, and it also bore impressive testimony to the present magnificent capacities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEWS
NEWARK, N. J.

NOV 26 1926

55

Montclair Enthuses Over Boston Symphony Program

Of the 105 musicians in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at least ten were excused from taking part in the concert given by it under the auspices of the Unity Course in the assembly hall of the Montclair High School Wednesday night because the stage temporarily enlarged by extending it over the first row of seats, was not spacious enough to accommodate all the members. The size of the band and the volume of tone produced by it in forte passages under the compelling will of Conductor Koussevitzky were such, however, as to make some of the performances thrilling experiences for the audience crowding the hall.

For the first time in this reporter's attendance at symphonic concerts in this neighborhood, the unusual spectacle of an audience bursting into laughter over something it heard was witnessed. It had cause for its merriment. The provocation was Serge Prokofieff's suite from his opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," first performed in this country by the Chicago Opera Company nearly five years ago. Edited by Albert Spalding, America's foremost native violinist, the suite comprises six movements, labeled "Las Ridicules," "Scene Infernale," "March," Scherzo, "The Prince and the Princess" and "The Flight." Save to those in the audience, who satisfy their musical needs in Manhattan, the young Russian, one of the most advanced of the creative musicians today was unknown, perhaps even by reputation. If they desire further acquaintance with his qualities as a composer let them hasten to the concert employing the Philadelphia Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Tuesday night when his "Scythian" suite will be performed.

It was the strangeness, the fantastic character, the free use of dissonances, the cross play of tonalities and, in Walt Whitman's phrase, the "barbaric yawps" in much of the music that startled the audience out of its decorum, caused it to smile at first and then explode into good natured laughter, accompanied by no little applause. Amid all the instrumental musical flamboyancy, rasps and ructions there are passages of real beauty and charm, particularly in "The Prince and the Princess" section, which indicate that Prokofieff has the melodic gift and can use it effectively when inclined to simplicity in musical speech.

Fifty years hence the musical world may have progressed so far that the works of the ultra-modernists of today may seem as mellifluous to those hearing them and enjoy as wide popularity as now do the creations of Richard Wagner, despised and rejected by so many of his contemporaries when he was struggling for recognition midway in the nineteenth century. Under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction the suite was performed in probably as flawless a manner as can be heard. It was wonderfully vital, flamingly expressive in the more tempestuous moments of the composer's ideas and intentions and was a triumph of virtuosity in meeting technical difficulties.

As if to show how far the modernists have advanced beyond Wagner in bizarre conceptions and queer instrumentation, Mr. Koussevitzky followed the suite with the Prelude to "Lohengrin." In the lofty ideas, dignity and romanticism of that, is easily flowing and beguiling harmonies and finely woven texture, glorified by a performance in which the different voices in the orchestra were made to sing with all the color they could impart, the audience found such comfort and joy after Prokofieff's lacerating outbursts as moved it to such plaudits as induced the players to rise in recognition of the compliment.

Wagner also was represented on the program by the Prelude to his "Die Meistersinger," that sublimation of comic opera in the grand form. Again did the Master of Bayreuth work his customary spell and again did the conductor and orchestra stir enthusiasm by their vitalizing energy and dynamic power, well nigh overwhelming in a hall so limited in size. While hearing the march of the apprentices and Walter's "Prize" song as interwoven in this combination of themes and mosaic of tones, no one could think of Wagner as being unmelodic, the charge so often brought against him before he had his genius and conquered his enemies.

By his vigorous treatment of the work, Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to prefer grandeur of effect to refinements and subleties in interpretation. He got what he aimed at, though sometimes at the expense of slightly obscuring the charm in the "Prize" song as lyrical as anything to be found in operatic literature. But the rush, sweep and sonority in the playing of the march almost took the audience off its feet. To their feet again came the musicians in response to long continued applause.

As for the "Eroica" symphony inspired by Beethoven's admiration of Napoleon when the Corsican was merely Consul of France, an adulation that turned into disgust after he had assumed the imperial crown, it is one of the milestones along the path of musical progress. The freshness of invention, fecundity of ideas, and the composer's constant development in mastering technical means to his artistic requirements are as noticeable in this as in his later and more popular fifth and the great ninth of his creations in symphonic form.

Any work, which Mr. Koussevitzky directs, cannot escape his individual touch, his informing spirit. His is no academic and dry reading of Beethoven. He takes no offending liberties with the letter of the score; but he makes his men infuse their performance with a feeling and warmth that causes it to glow.

Nov 29th

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Koussevitzky has discarded the program announced a week ago for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday. The chosen pieces now are: the third "Leonora" Overture of Beethoven in which the conductor has yet to be heard in Boston; the "Emperor Concerto" of Beethoven in which Mr. Cortot will play the piano-part; the orchestral version by Ravel of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" first disclosed at Symphony Hall two years ago. By these signs Mr. Cortot is ambitious of Beethoven.

HERALD Nov 28

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

The opening program is announced for the series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, in Symphony hall next Tuesday, at 3:15. This program, devoted to the German school of music, will include Beethoven's Leonora Overture No. 3, the Perelude and Love-Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, E minor.

The five programs are to be divided according to the various national schools of music. They should be among the most interesting of the season. Desirable seats for the season are still available.

Colonial 4 Poster Beds

Dressler FURNITURE SHOPS

Selling Out

THIS CLIPPING FROM BANNER
NASHVILLE, TEN.

NOV 28 1926

Boston Symphony On WJZ Hookup Saturday Night

Another of the programs by the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will be broadcast by Stations WJZ, WDZ and WGY and 7:10 Saturday night. These symphony broadcasts are proving one of the stellar radio attractions of the season and are attracting a legion of listeners aggregating millions.

During the broadcast, which will come to the listeners direct from Symphony Hall, Boston, Prof. John P. Marshall will give to the radio audience instructive information and comment corresponding to the notes on the program used by the audience at Symphony Hall. His broadcasts will include interesting facts regarding the composition played and information regarding the composer and his particular style of composition. His remarks will be made in nontechnical language so that even the most recent addict to symphony orchestras and symphonic music may understand him without fear of being "swamped" with highly technical musical terms.

N.Y. Post November 26

Music

By Olga Samaroff

Serge Koussewitzky Leads Beethoven and Moderns in First Concert of Boston Symphony

THE program of the Boston Symphony concert last night at Carnegie Hall seemed to me to throw a light on Serge Koussewitzky's artistic make-up which could scarcely have been more revealing. My impression was a crystallization of former instinctive feelings — namely, that Mr. Koussewitzky as an interpreter follows the tendencies of the modern composers in that they are most in sympathy with pre-Beethoven and post-Debussy music. When I say "in sympathy" I do not mean it in the sense of a prejudice, a parti pris. I mean that the sincere modernist really feels that way.

Olga Samaroff

Last night Mr. Koussewitzky conducted Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and "Eroica" symphony in the first part of the programs, and a suite from Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," and Respighi's "Pini di Roma" in the second part. It seemed to me like a program conducted by two different men.

IN the first half there was an earnest, dignified musician conducting familiar masterpieces with care, precision and respect for the composer. In the second half there was an ardent artist striking fire from the orchestra. His brain functioned in the first half. His feeling only joined it in the second.

Like everything I write, this must be taken only as the opinion and impression of an individual, not a pronouncement which I seek to impose as a fact on any reader. This feeling also has nothing whatever to do with nationality. The idea that nobody but a German can conduct Beethoven or that a German cannot understand Latin music, etc., seems to me one of the most puerile of prejudices. Nationality affects the lowest stratum of interpreters—those who have to depend solely on instinct. A Hungarian cafe band will play Hungarian music best; the negro will sing negro songs best.

But when we come to the region of highly developed artistic talent such strictures disappear more and more until we find a Casals playing Bach and Haydn with the utmost perfection, Toscanini giving a performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, which is unsurpassed, and such artists as Kreisler, Gabrilowitsch, Stokowski, Hofmann and many others interpreting music of all nations in a way which, in my opinion, would make it impossible for a blindfolded observer, unaware of their identity, to do more than guess at their nationality.

THE impression I received last night had only to do with music and Mr. Koussewitzky's response to it. And from an analytical standpoint—for one should scarcely base critical opinions on instinctive feelings alone—I should say that the somewhat matter of fact too fast and inflexible tempo. The layman would be amazed if it could be demonstrated to him what transformations can be caused by very slight degrees of difference in tempo. A conductor will necessarily get near the right tempo, that is, the one desired by the composer, through tradition in the case of familiar masterpieces, but no two conductors will be apt to take an identical one. There will be infinitesimal differences; for the interpreter's feeling must be his guide in the last instance, and that infinitesimal degree will make an extraordinary difference in the performance.

Wagner lays great stress on this in his treatise "Ueber das Dirigieren." Mr. Koussewitzky's tempo was animated and active, but, it seemed to me, it led him to pass over or through beauties which did not gain their full significance. Obviously he could use no other tempo. It was the way he felt the work, but in my opinion it is the most tangible musical reason which can be given for the impression I received.

Prokofieff's Suite contains delightful music and it was superbly performed. There was pulsing life and color in the "Marche," a strange haunting beauty in "Le Prince et la Princesse," and at least, very remarkable orchestral playing in "La Fuite." Mr. Koussewitzky seemed in his element in this music. His enthusiasm was contagious—his understanding complete.

NEWS
DETROIT, MICH.

NOV 28 19

SEASON OPENED BY BOSTONIANS

Koussevitzky, as Before, Leads Orchestra Through Brilliant, Novel Program.

By ELSPETH WILSON.

(Staff Correspondent The Detroit News.)

NEW YORK, Nov. 27.—Among orchestral doings of recent Gotham interest was the opening of the 1926-'27 Boston Symphonic season Thursday evening. Serge Koussevitsky was in possession of the baton, as he has been for the last two years. The occasion was marked by its share of novelty—this season seems to be pre-eminently one of new orchestral presentations—music from Serge Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," being the outstanding offering of the day. This particular piece is composed of five numbers, edited by Albert Spalding, and is new to this city in orchestral form. For the rest Mr. Koussevitsky gave Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony in this the first regular Thursday night series of five New York concerts by the Boston organization. This afternoon (Saturday) the regular matinee series, also of five concerts, will open, a suite from the Prokofieff ballet "Chout" (Buffoon), also new in this form, being included on the program.

IDENCE, R. I.
IBUNE

NOV 24 1926

N SYMPHONY CONCERT FINE

ost Satisfactory Pro- ver Given in City Providence

most satisfactory pro- given in Providence was he Boston Symphony Or- Serge Koussevitsky con- he E. F. Albee Theatre e might raise the objec- Roussel suite, with its its tootings, was out of le Beethoven and Wag- uch cases, if one's back ndards has no room for well to remember that on at the Theatre an der dy shouted from the gal- he first performance of 'd give another kreutzer stop."

cannot go wrong, ex- tra-ultra-modern circles, n and Wagner. They sat- sical taste; they satisfy looking for power, dig- lity; and they satisfy their music lush, even

s been said about the rd Symphony, of Bee- is entirely superfluous n of rhetoric upon the onstructed to challenge

Beethoven has long epted in the musical quote a man who never program notes as a rtheless, always has y. H. L. Mencken says The older I grow the nvinced that the most omenon in the whole was the first public the Eroica on April 7, es it worth discussing er, is the fact that on e Beethoven threw his and laid his claim to compromise! No easy past! The Second Sym- y miles behind. A new has been born. It must eat night in Vienna. for the actual Vien- to hear 'a new grand -sharp' (sic!). What Theatre an der Wein ."

eople who heard the heard music that r death, that will be hen this generation note in history. there was Beetho- Egmont; there was to Lohengrin and Mastersingers; and m the opera ballet

, as is his wont, ently.

CLIPPING FROM EGISTER
LING, W. VA.

NOV 28 1926

to Attempt cert Broadcast

adio station FL, lo- ffel Tower, Paris, on will endeavor to oston Symphony or- cast through WBZ tations.

Dance of the Sorcer- ballet "The Garden has been selected as mber on Saturday's ogram. The young ser, Alexander Tans- e arrangements with pick up the signals WJZ or WGY in the here he will be sta- e may hear the first America of his com- orchestra under the ge Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 26 1926

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts.

There has been much talk of Serge Koussevitzky's way with the classics. Before he came to America as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it was predicted that while he might serve well as an exponent of modern music he would be likely to disappoint when he performed the classic repertory. But the interpretations of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and "Eroica" symphony given last night in Carnegie Hall were exceptionally eloquent presentations of familiar master-works. Mr. Koussevitzky has never been the slavish follower of tradition; it may be admitted that on more than one occasion he has displayed singular ideas of familiar compositions. Last night he was far from the purely objective or academic but it is not often that overture and symphony have been given performance of such virility, such Beethovenian force and emotional power.

Mr. Toscanini's "Eroica" last Winter was a marvelously finished and eloquent interpretation, but it was Beethoven somewhat Italianized — somewhat, if one may coin the term, renaissanced. The "Eroica" symphony last night lost not a whit of its mighty architecture and the romantic, dynamic quality which the composer undoubtedly intended, in a score which may yet appear as the greatest of the nine symphonies. The tempo of the first movement was a little faster than customary—if one is interested in this detail of the matter—as the introduction of the Egmont overture was a little slow. But in neither case was there the thought of a forced or affected conception. The very opening measures established greatness of mood; the musical thought and emotional development went hand in hand, building up, step by the step, to climaxes of superb breadth and effectiveness. The close of the overture was as the wild rejoicing of a liberated people, and it was more—it was Beethoven shouting to the skies of the emancipation of human kind from the fate that had overhung it.

The four movements of the symphony were read with a sincerity and understanding that had cumulative effect. One seeks in vain, in fact, among recent performances of the "Eroica" in this city for such stirring and dramatic treatment of the variations that make the finale. Here, as in all the other movements, and as in Beethoven's music, masterly balance and self-control were united with a thrilling emotional intensity. Mr. Koussevitzky—let us be thrice thankful for it—used only three and not six horns in the poetic and mysterious scherzo. If the ear is not deceived, he doubled the brass in one of the variations, when the proclamation of the theme is given to these wind instruments. The effect was admirable, and the deliverance from the popular vice of modern conductors, in regard to the six-horn imposture in the trio of the scherzo, was a delight and a relief from the excesses that even celebrated conductors have been willing to indulge in, to the injury of an immortal master and certain of his works.

Nor should the technique and the tonal effects of the orchestra be forgotten. Every year the Boston orchestra develops by leaps and bounds. It only has it regained the resiliency the glow of the old tone, but it is more flexible and expressive under Koussevitzky's hand than it has under any conductor since the days of Karl Muck. The various performances last night were of virtuoso quality from the first note to the last. When Nikisch came to conduct the Boston orchestra he remarked on the splendid drilling it had received from Wilhelm Gericke, then added that he had only to "sensitize" the band. Mr. Koussevitzky, with the aid of Pierre Monteux before him, is rapidly restoring to the Boston Symphony its long and honorable heritage, and is "sensitizing" it. The concert last night served impressive notice of the fact. An audience which had filled the hall to the utmost capacity before the concert began testified to its pleasure. Mr. Koussevitzky has seldom appeared here in so great a light as an interpreter.

No doubt the thought of the centenary of Beethoven's death had to do with the selection of the overture and symphony for the first part of the program. For the second half Mr. Koussevitzky presented the orchestral excerpts from Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges" and the now familiar "Pines of Rome" of Ottorino Respighi. "The Love for Three Oranges" was performed in New York by that operatic organization, the Chicago Opera Company, which is curious and interested in new music as some other organizations are not, in 1922. The orchestra excerpts are "Les Ridicules," "Marche," "Scherzo," "Le Prince et la Princesse," and "La Fuite." They are all short and most of them in amusingly grotesque or satirical vein. The Prince and the Princess discourse with more sentiment, but Prokofieff is a post-war composer in his absence of romanticism of moonshine in his music, and his terse, dynamic manner of expressing himself.

The suite was obviously much enjoyed and applauded with enthusiasm —this music of Beethoven—a young composer, as Alexander Siloti once remarked, with a future before him. One applauds these short pieces of Prokofieff and enjoys them up to a certain point. Then they give the impression of what is cerebral, perhaps also cynical, and a musician who is more of an eclectic and student of scores than he is original and creative. Whether Prokofieff is the hope of modern Russia, as some believe, is a matter that no doubt will be hotly debated. It was evident, at any rate, that the audience enjoyed him. The applause was long and continuous, though the orchestra richly merited the company's approval. This concert showed Mr. Koussevitzky at the heighth of his power as an interpreter, and it also bore impressive testimony to the present magnificent capacities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEWS
NEWARK, N. J.

NOV 26 1926

55

Montclair Enthuses Over Boston Symphony Program

Of the 105 musicians in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at least ten were excused from taking part in the concert given by it under the auspices of the Unity Course in the assembly hall of the Montclair High School Wednesday night because the stage temporarily enlarged by extending it over the first row of seats, was not spacious enough to accommodate all the members. The size of the band and the volume of tone produced by it in forte passages under the compelling will of Conductor Koussevitzky were such, however, as to make some of the performances thrilling experiences for the audience crowding the hall.

For the first time in this reporter's attendance at symphonic concerts in this neighborhood, the unusual spectacle of an audience bursting into laughter over something it heard was witnessed. It had cause for its merriment. The provocation was Serge Prokofieff's suite from his opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," first performed in this country by the Chicago Opera Company nearly five years ago. Edited by Albert Spalding, America's foremost native violinist, the suite comprises six movements, labeled "Las Ridicules," "Scene Infernale," "March," Scherzo, "The Prince and the Princess" and "The Flight." Save to those in the audience, who satisfy their musical needs in Manhattan, the young Russian, one of the most advanced of the creative musicians today was unknown, perhaps even by reputation. If they desire further acquaintance with his qualities as a composer let them hasten to the concert employing the Philadelphia Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Tuesday night when his "Scythian" suite will be performed.

It was the strangeness, the fantastic character, the free use of dissonances, the cross play of tonalities and, in Walt Whitman's phrase, the "barbaric yawps" in much of the music that startled the audience out of its decorum, caused it to smile at first and then explode into good natured laughter, accompanied by no little applause. Amid all the instrumental musical flamboyancy, rasps and ructions there are passages of real beauty and charm, particularly in "The Prince and the Princess" section, which indicate that Prokofieff has the melodic gift and can use it effectively when inclined to simplicity in musical speech.

Fifty years hence the musical world may have progressed so far that the works of the ultra-modernists of today may seem as mellifluous to those hearing them and enjoy as wide popularity as now do the creations of Richard Wagner, despised and rejected by so many of his contemporaries when he was struggling for recognition midway in the nineteenth century. Under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction the suite was performed in probably as flawless a manner as can be heard. It was wonderfully vital, flamingly expressive in the more tempestuous moments of the composer's ideas and intentions and was a triumph of virtuosity in meeting technical difficulties.

As if to show how far the modernists have advanced beyond Wagner in bizarre conceptions and queer instrumentation, Mr. Koussevitzky followed the suite with the Prelude to "Lohengrin." In the lofty ideas, dignity and romanticism of that, is easily flowing and beguiling harmonies and finely woven texture, glorified by a performance in which the different voices in the orchestra were made to sing with all the color they could impart, the audience found such comfort and joy after Prokofieff's lacerating outbursts as moved it to such plaudits as induced the players to rise in recognition of the compliment.

Wagner also was represented on the program by the Prelude to his "Die Meistersinger," that sublimation of comic opera in the grand form. Again did the Master of Bayreuth work his customary spell and again did the conductor and orchestra stir enthusiasm by their vitalizing energy and dynamic power, well nigh overwhelming in a hall so limited in size. While hearing the march of the apprentices and Walter's "Prize" song as interwoven in this combination of themes and mosaic of tones, no one could think of Wagner as being unmelodic, the charge so often brought against him before he had his genius and conquered his enemies.

By his vigorous treatment of the work, Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to prefer grandeur of effect to refinements and subleties in interpretation. He got what he aimed at, though sometimes at the expense of slightly obscuring the charm in the "Prize" song as lyrical as anything to be found in operatic literature. But the rush, sweep and sonority in the playing of the march almost took the audience off its feet. To their feet again came the musicians in response to long continued applause.

As for the "Eroica" symphony inspired by Beethoven's admiration of Napoleon when the Corsican was merely Consul of France, an adulation that turned into disgust after he had assumed the imperial crown, it is one of the milestones along the path of musical progress. The freshness of invention, fecundity of ideas, and the composer's constant development in mastering technical means to his artistic requirements are as noticeable in this as in his later and more popular fifth and the great ninth of his creations in symphonic form.

Any work, which Mr. Koussevitzky directs, cannot escape his individual touch, his informing spirit. His is no academic and dry reading of Beethoven. He takes no offending liberties with the letter of the score; but he makes his men infuse their performance with a feeling and warmth that causes it to glow.

Chessik FURNITURE SHOPS
Selling Out
(Colonial 4 Poster Beds)
4 Poster Beds

THIS CLIPPING FROM BANNER
NASHVILLE, TEN.

NOV 28 1926

Boston Symphony On WJZ Hookup Saturday Night

Another of the programs by the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will be broadcast by Stations WJZ, WDZ and WGY and 7:10 Saturday night. These symphony broadcasts are proving one of the stellar radio attractions of the season and are attracting a legion of listeners aggregating millions.

During the broadcast, which will come to the listeners direct from Symphony Hall, Boston, Prof. John P. Marshall will give to the radio audience instructive information and comment corresponding to the notes on the program used by the audience at Symphony Hall. His broadcasts will include interesting facts regarding the composition played and information regarding the composer and his particular style of composition. His remarks will be made in nontechnical language so that even the most recent addict to symphony orchestras and symphonic music may understand him without fear of being "swamped" with highly technical musical terms.

Nov 29th

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Koussevitzky has discarded the program announced a week ago for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday. The chosen pieces now are: the third "Leonora" Overture of Beethoven in which the conductor has yet to be heard in Boston; the "Emperor Concerto" of Beethoven in which Mr. Cortot will play the piano-part; the orchestral version by Ravel of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" first dsclosed at Symphony Hall two years ago. By these signs Mr. Cortot is ambitious of Beethoven.

HERALD Nov 28

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

The opening program is announced for the series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, in Symphony hall next Tuesday, at 3:15. This program, devoted to the German school of music, will include Beethoven's Leonora Overture No. 3, the Perelude and Love Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, E minor.

The five programs are to be divided according to the various national schools of music. They should be among the most interesting of the season. Desirable seats for the season are still available.

N.Y. Post November 26

Music

By Olga Samaroff

Serge Koussewitzky Leads Beethoven and Moderns in First Concert of Boston Symphony

THE program of the Boston Symphony concert last night at Carnegie Hall seemed to me to throw a light on Serge Koussewitzky's artistic make-up which could scarcely have been more revealing. My impression was a crystallization of former instinctive feelings — namely, that Mr. Koussewitzky as an interpreter follows the tendencies of the modern composers in that they are most in sympathy with pre-Beethoven and post-Debussy music. When I say "in sympathy" I do not mean it in the sense of a prejudice, a parti pris. I mean that the sincere modernist really feels that way.

Olga Samaroff

Last night Mr. Koussewitzky conducted Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and "Eroica" symphony in the first part of the programs, and a suite from Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," and Respighi's "Pini di Roma" in the second part. It seemed to me like a program conducted by two different men.

IN the first half there was an earnest, dignified musician conducting familiar masterpieces with care, precision and respect for the composer. In the second half there was an ardent artist striking fire from the orchestra. His brain functioned in the first half. His feeling only joined it in the second.

Like everything I write, this must be taken only as the opinion and impression of an individual, not a pronouncement which I seek to impose as a fact on any reader. This feeling also has nothing whatever to do with nationality. The idea that nobody but a German can conduct Beethoven or that a German cannot understand Latin music, etc., seems to me one of the most puerile of prejudices. Nationality affects the lowest stratum of interpreters—those who have to depend solely on instinct. A Hungarian cafe band will play Hungarian music best; the negro will sing negro songs best.

But when we come to the region of highly developed artistic talent such strictures disappear more and more until we find a Casals playing Bach and Haydn with the utmost perfection, Toscanini giving a performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, which is unsurpassed, and such artists as Kreisler, Gabrilowitsch, Stokowski, Hofmann and many others interpreting music of all nations in a way which, in my opinion, would make it impossible for a blindfolded observer, unaware of their identity, to do more than guess at their nationality.

THE impression I received last night had only to do with music and Mr. Koussewitzky's response to it. And from an analytical standpoint—for one should scarcely base critical opinions on instinctive feelings alone—I should say that the somewhat matter of fact too fast and inflexible tempo. The layman would be amazed if it could be demonstrated to him what transformations can be caused by very slight degrees of difference in tempo. A conductor will necessarily get near the right tempo, that is, the one desired by the composer, through tradition in the case of familiar masterpieces, but no two conductors will be apt to take an identical one. There will be infinitesimal differences; for the interpreter's feeling must be his guide in the last instance, and that infinitesimal degree will make an extraordinary difference in the performance.

Wagner lays great stress on this in his treatise "Ueber das Dirigieren." Mr. Koussewitzky's tempo was animated and active, but, it seemed to me, it led him to pass over or through beauties which did not gain their full significance. Obviously he could use no other tempo. It was the way he felt the work, but in my opinion it is the most tangible musical reason which can be given for the impression I received.

Prokofieff's Suite contains delightful music and it was superbly performed.

There was pulsing life and color in the "Marche," a strange haunting beauty in "Le Prince et la Princesse," and at least, very remarkable orchestral playing in "La Fuite." Mr. Koussewitzky seemed in his element in this music. His enthusiasm was contagious —his understanding complete.

The same is true of Respighi's "Pini di Roma," which stands repetition so well that it will probably take a real place in our orchestral repertory.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra itself—and credit for this must be largely given to Mr. Koussewitzky—is very nearly if not entirely on the level of its pre-war greatness. A remarkable beauty of tone, splendid artistic quality at the solo desks and evident discipline of a high order, combine to make it once more one of the world's finest orchestras.

...novelty—
...season seems to be pre-eminently one of new orchestral presentations—music from Serge Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," being the outstanding offering of the day. This particular piece is composed of five numbers, edited by Albert Spalding, and is new to this city in orchestral form. For the rest Mr. Koussevitsky gave Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony in this the first regular Thursday night series of five New York concerts by the Boston organization. This afternoon (Saturday) the regular matinee series, also of five concerts, will open, a suite from the Prokofieff ballet "Chout" (Buffoon), also new in this form, being included on the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN

NOV 26 1926

'Eroica' Boston Orchestra Thanksgiving Fare Here

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

THE visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra took its Thanksgiving holiday in a serious spirit. Its annual Carmegie Hall series last evening opened with Beethoven's overture depicting the proud and militant spirit of Goethe's hero, Egmont; and following came Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, wherein that composer started out to symbolize in tone the Napoleon who fought for Republican ideals.

As everyone ought to know by this time when Napoleon turned imperialistic Beethovan scatched off his dedication page the name of the usurping Emperor.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Bostonian band, evidently had the story of the symphony in mind, for he brought out of it much more than a mere array of formal musical movements. He gave what is termed professionally a "reading," which means that he sought by deviations from the cut and dried interpretations to fasten the attention of the listeners upon this or that episode of especially elaborated detail; of emphasized eloquence; of arresting accent; of striking contrasts in tonal gradations.

The "reading" was that of a musician and artist of balanced taste, however, and if it startled the conservatives here and there, it moved the bulk of the hearers to unusual enthusiasm.

Seldom have the funeral march and the concluding variations of the "Eroica" been done in this town with more beauty and thrilling effect. The orchestra was in superb fettle, and challenged comparison with the days when it ranked as the best in our land.

Prokofieff's suite, from his opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," is not much, as music, when separated from its affiliated pictorial and costumed background. Respiglio's symphonic poem, "The Pines of Rome," first introduced here by Toscanini last Winter, again interested with its brilliant and sometimes clangorous orchestration, and its attractive harmonic and melodic lines. It is not a great composition, but one is thankful for lesser favors in these phonograph, but employs the voice and delicate orchestration to sound the songs of the prima donna of Birdland. To sophisticated music sharps the Stravinsky score is full of biting pungency and cerebral suggestion. To plain lovers of melody the same composition is a tuneless and barren desert.

Marion Talley, with silvery, unsensuous tones, trilled the measures of the Nightingale. Some others concerned creditably were Ina Bourskaya, Adamo Didur, Louis D'Angelo, Alfio Tedesco and James Wolfe. Tullio Serafin conducted. The scenic trappings delighted the eye.

The other half of the double bill was "Madam Butterfly," with Florence Easton, Marion Telva, Antonio Scotti, Giovanni Martinelli and Vincenzo Bellezza (conductor).

NEW YORK TIMES
NOV 28 1926

Alexander Tansman's "Dance of the Sorceress" and Hans Krasa's "March and Pastorale" were played for the first time in Boston, while Webern's "Five Pieces for Orchestra" and William T. Walton's overture "Portsmouth Point" were played for the first time in America at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston, Nov. 19 and 20. Philip Hale of The Boston Herald summed up his impressions of these compositions as follows:

"Walton's overture was meaty and spontaneous—the hearty guffaw of an Englishman seeing an amusing yet stirring scene. Tansman, Krasa and Webern were as men condemned to hard labor and working out their punishment."

Mr. Hale thus referred to Mr. Koussevitzky's programs:

"Whether it was prudent to put the four new works in succession on one program is a subject for academic discussion. As for ourselves, we believe that one unfamiliar piece is enough for one concert; we also believe that if the music is of any worth there should be a repetition of it at the following concert. Mr. Koussevitzky did well, however, in allowing us to hear this new music; in letting us know what composers of various countries are doing; in driving from a rut good Bostonians who have complacently stood in it, suspicious of the present-day workers in the musical vineyard, confident that the wine coming from it would be muddy, or too heavy, or even poisonous. As a disturber of our fossilized smugness, Mr. Koussevitzky, a true musical benefactor, has worked a miracle. That some are shocked, and perhaps especially disturbed because he has given genuine interest to music by Beethoven and Brahms which had long been performed here in a perfunctory, dry-as-dust, taken-for-granted manner—this works for musical righteousness. Let them rave! The great public hears Mr. Koussevitzky gladly."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

NOV 28 1926

"Eroica" Symphony Superbly Played by Boston Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, opened its annual season of five Brooklyn concerts at the Academy of Music Friday night. The programme was:

Symphony, "Eroica" (Beethoven); suite from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges" (Prokofieff); symphonic poem, "Pini di Roma" (Respighi).

It was Beethoven's opinion that since his "Eroica" symphony was longer than the average symphony, it should be played at the beginning of a concert before the audience had become more or less charged with other music and possibly wearied (as would have been the case at Friday night's concert had Mr. Koussevitzky reversed the order of his programme).

The principal (Bonaparte) theme of the symphony's opening movement is undoubtedly of military character. Especially does it so impress one, when taken up by the brass, the trumpets answering the horns, handing the theme one to the other. There can be no doubt that the master had Napoleon in mind as his "hero" when he composed this monumental work.

Mr. Koussevitzky's superb reading of the funeral march is one that will linger long in memory as a high water mark of conducting achievement.

In the scherzo, the players showed a brand of virtuosity attained by very few of the world's greatest musical organizations. Wet weather, to be sure, had gotten into the strings and somewhat dampened their color, but in the main the tonal quality was superb, if not brilliant. The fugue and variations of the last movement were given an exposition the equal of which has not often been heard in our concert halls. Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the "Eroica" raises him to a foremost place among the small group of transcendent living orchestra chiefs.

Following the meaty contrapuntal solidity of Beethoven, the Prokofieff suite sounded empty and puerile. The arrangement embraces five movements by title: "Les Ridicules," "Marches," "Scherzo," "Le Prince et la Princesse," "La Fuite." After one has conducted the newer harmonic combinations and listened to a much larger variety of instruments, the pertinent question remains—what does the music tell us? What is its message? There is little that we can take away that is of lasting or of permanent value.

Respighi's "Pines of Rome" was given a reading of distinction, but Mr. Koussevitzky did not raise it to new heights or paint the picture in all of its varied colors. The composition as a whole requires a much keener mastication and a more powerful digestion by both orchestra and conductor. The triumphial march on the Appian Way was played effectively and with much intensity and elan.

The Boston Orchestra's next Brooklyn concert will be on Friday evening, Jan. 7.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

NOV 26 1926

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY
CARNEGIE HALL

"Egmont" ..... Beethoven
"Eroica" Symphony ..... Beethoven
Suite from "The Love for Three Oranges," ..... Prokofieff
"Pines of Rome" ..... Respighi

The Bostonians Play

Mr. Koussevitsky did his bit in the current Beethoven celebrations by offering the "Egmont" overture and the "Erioca" symphony at the Boston Symphony's opening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last night.

Celebrating Beethoven's birth or death is getting to be more difficult as time goes on for the simple reason that his works are the backbone of any symphony season and there is no way to distinguish the ordinary presentation of his music from the special commemorative events unless it be by the performance of some seldom heard piece, like the Mass in D, given by the Friends of Music at the Metropolitan a couple of Sundays ago.

But with few exceptions a composer's little known music generally deserves the neglect it gets, especially in these days days when the most unimportant scrap of paper bearing the handwriting of a great name is immediately brought before the public.

This "Egmont" overture, written to order with other incidental music to Goethe's drama, is a good illustration of the extent to which music can achieve independence even when it is inspired by an extraneous idea. Many learned commentators have linked up almost every phrase of the overture with some incident in the drama, and Beethoven himself probably thought he was embodying its essentials in his music. But listening to it last night one forgot the program entirely. It might have been an overture to "Julius Caesar," or "Broadway," for that matter. Any peg would do, provided that it contained a conflict and an ultimate triumph, which is, at bottom, the principle upon which Beethoven based most of his music.

This is true of all his symphonies, though the triumph in each one is of a different quality. It's a ticklish business to impute intellectual motives to creative musicians, but one might safely say that the music of Beethoven symbolizes the growth of a philosophic idea. On no other basis can one explain the "Eroica" symphony, which is generally held to be a musical narrative of the career of Napoleon. If this were really so, how would you account for the pastoral scherzo, with its hunting horns, which follows on the heels of the funeral march, and the last movement, with its decisive theme and exuberant variations?

The "Eroica" is exactly what its name implies, but it is no more about Napoleon than it is about Washington. As far as one can draw implications from music, the symphony might be said to represent rather the idea of heroism in conflict, death, in submission to nature and life. The last is the particular triumph which Beethoven celebrates in his sturdy, unemotional theme and the satisfying, beautifully healthy variations which that theme evolves.

The other matters on last night's program call for less comment. The Prokofieff Suite from his opera "The Love for Three Oranges" heard for the first time in New York, though the complete opera is not unknown here, has little interest except that of novelty. Mr. Prokofieff is only a lame duck trying to imitate the imaginative flights of his master Rimsky-Korsakoff but all his orchestral facility fails to hide the poverty of his musical ideas.

The "Pines of Rome," first played here last year by Toscanini and now a favorite with conductors, came last on the program and gave Mr. Koussevitzky, as it does every one who attempts it, a chance in the last movement to be the major-domo of a crashing army of old Roman legions. In this the Boston conductor was more successful than in the Beethoven Symphony which had little repose and nobility and much noise.

A large Thanksgiving audience attended and seemed properly grateful in accordance with the sentiment of the holiday.

NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

NOV 26 1926

REALM OF MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

FOR one price of admission a large audience at Carnegie Hall last night heard two conductors and two orchestras. First there were Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing Beethoven in a style which can be described with truth only as crass, uninspired and mistaken. Then there were the same Mr. Koussevitzky and the identical Boston Symphony Orchestra performing Prokofieff and Respighi in a manner which may be denoted with equal truth as finished, eloquent and infallible. It was the organization's first New York appearance of the season.

Almost too much for human nerves to endure were the unlovely clamors attending Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. It was enough to justify an edict banishing trumpets and kettledrums summarily from the roster of orchestral instruments. The conductor varied his dynamics, but was chary with shadings of tempo. He affected a harsh and rigid beat which was reflected faithfully in the sharp fragments of sound slashed out by the instruments.

The same clangors, and the same monotony of beat persisted in the "Eroica" symphony. Never was a funeral march less dolorous. The Scherzo was played with a heavy hand, and at the same time with a pace so swift that the ideas were often blurred. Mr. Koussevitzky poetized slightly in the softer episodes, and at such times the tone of strings and woodwind was commendable. But if the concert had ended at the intermission one would have concluded that not the least of the crimes of the World War was the fall of the Boston Orchestra from its eminent estate under Dr. Karl Muck.

But with a change from classic to modern music, the rather bewildered band was transformed in a trice into a virtuoso orchestra. Having fumbled Beethoven's music, Mr. Koussevitzky held that of Serge Prokofieff and Ottorino Respighi in the firmest of grasps. Their scores he interpreted exultantly and victoriously.

The former was represented by a suite from his opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," and the latter by his well-known symphonic poem, "Pini di Roma." The suite, edited by Albert Spalding, was presented as such for the first time in New York, but the principal material was heard at a performance of "The Love for Three Oranges" at the Manhattan Opera House in 1922. Of five swift, piquant and vivid movements, the most successful were those entitled "March" and "The Prince and the Princess."

Respighi's "Pines of Rome" have turned out to be far other than evergreens, but the introduction of a gramophone record of an actual nightingale's song still aroused curiosity, and the fourth section, in which is visioned a march of Roman legions upon the Appian Way, brought the program to a dramatic conclusion and won an ovation from the audience.

Program notes, bearing the placeline, "Carnegie Hall, New York," had been prepared by the august Mr. Philip Hale. Not the least exasperating feature of the evening was that the pamphlets had to be bootlegged in, owing to the fact that some one or other has a monopoly on the program concession at Carnegie Hall. Subscribers received the booklets by mail in advance. Others were distributed on the sidewalk.

N. Y. EVENING SUN

NOV 29 1926

To the stream of contemporaneous music the Boston Orchestra added its moderate outpour at the matinee of Saturday in Carnegie Hall. Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik" having been gently disposed of at the beginning, the players devoted their energies to the publication of the first suite from Roussel's opera ballet "Padmavati" and Prokofieff's ballet suite "Chout." When these disturbances had been allayed Beethoven's fifth symphony brought the concert to a peaceful conclusion.

Doubtless there is more in the Roussel suite than a casual observer would imagine, since the opera produced in 1923 holds its place in the repertory of the great Parisian institution dedicated to lyric drama. Mr. Prokofieff's music seemed to this casual observer to have more virility than the Frenchman's and the final dance, thundering out one of those merciless rhythms for which the composer is noted, promised an exhilarating effect in the theater. It sounded well even in the concert hall. And both of the suites were well performed. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to be more congenially occupied when directing these works than when skimming through the simplicities of Mozart.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
NOV 28 1926

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conductor, displayed its virtuosity and its admirable tonal qualities yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall in several different ways, but in none more significant than the opening performance, "Eine Kliene Nachtmusik," by Mozart. Passages from Albert Roussel's opera-ballet, "Padmavati," and some stupendous grotesquerie from Prokofieff's ballet-suite, "Chout," displayed the orchestra more brilliantly, but none of these compositions made a greater demand upon the sheerly beautiful qualities of the band, and the sensitiveness, as well as brilliancy, which it now attains, than Mozart's gay, charming and infinitely delicate music. This music tested the soloists and the different choirs of the orchestra, as well as the control and the taste of the conductor, and found them all more than adequate to the situation.

There was a clarity and fineness of line particularly required, and seldom granted in such measure, in this divertissement. In rapid passages, pianissimo, the whole division of first violins played as softly and unanimously as if they had been a single instrument, and the loveliness of coloring throughout was worthy of the best traditions of the orchestra. Again, as on the previous Thursday evening, Mr. Koussevitsky, rather unexpectedly, triumped as an interpreter of classics, and the triumph of yesterday afternoon, if more modest in the tonal and emotional dimensions than that of the previous concerts, was not less pronounced or less conducive to the glory of himself and his players.

There is always a reason for everything in this world, and therefore there is a reason, presumably a logical one, why Albert Roussel's opera ballet, "Padmavati," should have been given a sumptuous production by the Paris Opera in 1923. But it is hard to discover this reason by listening to the performance of fragments of the score. The sections heard yesterday are forced, uninspired, ugly, and one hears the drums of Stravinsky's finale of "Sacre du Printemps," and the bassoon that chants the lullaby in the same composer's music to "Oiseau de feu." It is empty and striving music from a composer who has done better.

The feature of this concert, from the standpoint of the modernist, was certainly the suite from Prokofieff's "Chout." This ballet was performed at the Grand Street Theatre—we believe for the first time in America—two seasons ago. The action was difficult for the uninformed to decipher. There was a small orchestra and little opportunity to get a real impression of the music. The story of the ballet is ironic and madly nonsensical, and space will not be taken to narrate it here. Enough to remark that the spirit of the story has been captured by the composer, who is wantonly farcical, whose laughter is impudent and side-splitting. One Rabelaisianism after another, and ever and again chords which stick the finger to the nose at an astonished audience. You hear Profofieff say, with a ler, "Once upon a time," but not as you heard Strauss say it in the tender introduction of his "Eulenspiege." Far from it! Here is the grimace, the mockery, but also the whole-hearted laughter, the torrential vitality of the enfant terrible of modern Russian music.

These pieces are written with a mastery just as clear, just as pronounced and certain of itself, as the complete recklessness of mood conveyed. Anything could happen in a waggish, Gargantuan world, and many of these things do happen in Prokofieff's orchestra. For us this music, from a composer who writes almost too quickly and abundantly, is considerably superior in distinction and force of execution to the excerpts from "The Love for Three Oranges," heard on Thursday from the same conductor and orchestra. The "Chout" music seems to us more truly Prokofieff and less—Rimsky-Korsakoff. Yesterday's orchestral performance was as joyous and extravagant a display of virtuosity as we remember for some time back, and the music found much favor with the audience.

Mr. Koussevitsky concluded with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN

NOV 26 1926

'Eroica' Boston Orchestra Thanksgiving Fare Here

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

THE visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra took its Thanksgiving holiday in a serious spirit. Its annual Carmegie Hall series last evening opened with Beethoven's overture depicting the proud and militant spirit of Goethe's hero, Egmont; and following came Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, wherein that composer started out to symbolize in tone the Napoleon who fought for Republican ideals.

As everyone ought to know by this time when Napoleon turned imperialistic Beethovan scatched off his dedication page the name of the usurping Emperor.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Kostonian band, evidently had the story of the symphony in mind, for he brought out of it much more than a mere array of formal musical movements. He gave what is termed professionally a "reading," which means that he sought by deviations from the cut and dried interpretations to fasten the attention of the listeners upon this or that episode of especially elaborated detail; of emphasized eloquence; of arresting accent; of striking contrasts in tonal gradations.

The "reading" was that of a musician and artist of balanced taste, however, and if it startled the conservatives here and there, it moved the bulk of the hearers to unusual enthusiasm.

Seldom have the funeral march and the concluding variations of the "Eroica" been done in this town with more beauty and thrilling effect. The orchestra was in superb fettle, and challenged comparison with the days when it ranked as the best in our land.

Prokofieff's suite, from his opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," is not much, as music, when separated from its affiliated pictorial and costumed background. Respiglio's symphonic poem, "The Pines of Rome," first introduced here by Toscanini last Winter, again interested with its brilliant and sometimes clangorous orchestration, and its attractive harmonic and melodic lines. It is not a great composition, but one is thankful for lesser favors in these days of near-great composers.

The nightingale's voice recorded by a phonograph, is a part of the structure of this work.

In the afternoon, Stravinsky's "Le Rossignol" (The Nightingale) was presented at the Metropolitan. The Russian composer uses no phonograph, but employs the voice and delicate orchestration to sound the songs of the prima donna of Birdland. To sophisticated music sharps the Stravinsky score is full of biting pungency and cerebral suggestion. To plain lovers of melody the same composition is a tuneless and barren desert.

Marion Talley, with silvery, unsensuous tones, trilled the measures of the Nightingale. Some others concerned creditably were Ina Bourskaya, Adamo Didur, Louis D'Angelo, Alfio Tedesco and James Wolfe. Tullio Serafin conducted. The scenic trappings delighted the eye.

The other half of the double bill was "Madam Butterfly," with Florence Easton, Marion Telva, Antonio Scotti, Giovanni Martinelli and Vincenzo Bellezza (conductor).

sevitzky's programs:

"Whether it was prudent to put the four new works in succession on one program is a subject for academic discussion. As for ourselves, we believe that one unfamiliar piece is enough for one concert; we also believe that if the music is of any worth there should be a repetition of it at the following concert. Mr. Koussevitzky did well, however, in allowing us to hear this new music; in letting us know what composers of various countries are doing; in driving from a rut good Bostonians who have complacently stood in it, suspicious of the present-day workers in the musical vineyard, confident that the wine coming from it would be muddy, or too heavy, or even poisonous. As a disturber of our fossilized smugness, Mr. Koussevitzky, a true musical benefactor, has worked a miracle. That some are shocked, and perhaps especially disturbed because he has given genuine interest to music by Beethoven and Brahms which had long been performed here in a perfunctory, dry-as-dust, taken-for-granted manner—this works for musical righteousness. Let them rave! The great public hears Mr. Koussevitzky gladly."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

NOV 28 1926

"Eroica" Symphony Superbly Played by Boston Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, opened its annual season of five Brooklyn concerts at the Academy of Music Friday night. The programme was:

Symphony, "Eroica" (Beethoven); suite from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges" (Prokofieff); symphonic poem, "Pini di Roma" (Respighi).

It was Beethoven's opinion that since his "Eroica" symphony was longer than the average symphony, it should be played at the beginning of a concert before the audience has become more or less charged with other music and possibly wearied (as would have been the case at Friday night's concert had Mr. Koussevitzky reversed the order of his programme).

The principal (Bonaparte) theme of the symphony's opening movement is undoubtedly of military character. Especially does it so impress one, when taken up by the brass, the trumpets answering the horns, handing the theme one to the other. There can be no doubt that the master had Napoleon in mind as his "hero" when he composed this monumental work.

Mr. Koussevitzky's superb reading of the funeral march is one that will linger long in memory as a high water mark of conducting achievement.

In the scherzo, the players showed a brand of virtuosity attained by very few of the world's greatest musical organizations. Wet weather, to be sure, had gotten into the strings and somewhat dampened their color, but in the main the tonal quality was superb, if not brilliant. The furue and variations of the last movement were given an exposition the equal of which has not often been heard in our concert halls. Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the "Eroica" raises him to a foremost place among the small group of transcendent living orchestra chiefs.

Following the meaty contrapuntal solidity of Beethoven, the Prokofieff suite sounded empty and puerile. The arrangement embraces five movements by title: "Les Ridicules," "Marches," "Scherzo," "Le Prince et la Princesse," "La Fuite." After one has conducted the newer harmonic combinations and listened to a much larger variety of instruments, the pertinent question remains—what does the music tell us? What is its message? There is little that we can take away that is of lasting or of permanent value.

Respighi's "Pines of Rome" was given a reading of distinction, but Mr. Koussevitzky did not raise it to new heights or paint the picture in all of its varied colors. The composition as a whole requires a much keener mastication and a more powerful digestion by both orchestra and conductor. The triumphial march on the Appian Way was played effectively and with much intensity and elan.

The Boston Orchestra's next Brooklyn concert will be on Friday evening, Jan. 7.

NEW YORK WORLD

NOV 26 1926

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY
CARNEGIE HALL

"Egmont"	Beethoven
"Eroica" Symphony	Beethoven
Suite from "The Love for Three Oranges,"	Prokofieff
"Pines of Rome"	Respighi

The Bostonians Play

Mr. Koussevitsky did his bit in the current Beethoven celebrations by offering the "Egmont" overture and the "Erioca" symphony at the Boston Symphony's opening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last night.

Celebrating Beethoven's birth or death is getting to be more difficult as time goes on for the simple reason that his works are the backbone of any symphony season and there is no way to distinguish the ordinary presentation of his music from the special commemorative events unless it be by the performance of some seldom heard piece, like the Mass in D, given by the Friends of Music at the Metropolitan a couple of Sundays ago.

But with few exceptions a composer's little known music generally deserves the neglect it gets, especially in these days days when the most unimportant scrap of paper bearing the handwriting of a great name is immediately brought before the public.

This "Egmont" overture, written to order with other incidental music to Goethe's drama, is a good illustration of the extent to which music can achieve independence even when it is inspired by an extraneous idea. Many learned commentators have linked up almost every phrase of the overture with some incident in the drama, and Beethoven himself probably thought he was embodying its essentials in his music. But listening to it last night one forgot the program entirely. It might have been an overture to "Julius Caesar," or "Broadway," for that matter. Any peg would do, provided that it contained a conflict and an ultimate triumph, which is, at bottom, the principle upon which Beethoven based most of his music.

This is true of all his symphonies, though the triumph in each one is of different quality. It's a ticklish business to impute intellectual motives to creative musicians, but one might safely say that the music of Beethoven symbolizes the growth of a philosophic idea. On no other basis can one explain the "Eroica" symphony, which is generally held to be a musical narrative of the career of Napoleon. If this were really so, how would you account for the pastoral scherzo, with its hunting horns, which follows on the heels of the funeral march, and the last movement, with its decisive theme and exuberant variations?

The "Eroica" is exactly what its name implies, but it is no more about Napoleon than it is about Washington. As far as one can draw implications from music, the symphony might be said to represent rather the idea of heroism in conflict, death, in submission to nature and life. The last is the particular triumph which Beethoven celebrates in his sturdy, unemotional theme and the satisfying, beautifully healthy variations which that theme evolves.

The other matters on last night's program call for less comment. The Prokofieff Suite from his opera "The Love for Three Oranges" heard for the first time in New York, though the complete opera is not unknown here, has little interest except that of novelty. Mr. Prokofieff is only a lame duck trying to imitate the imaginative flights of his master Rimsky-Korsakoff but all his orchestral facility fails to hide the poverty of his musical ideas.

The "Pines of Rome," first played here last year by Toscanini and now a favorite with conductors, came last on the program and gave Mr. Koussevitzky, as it does every one who attempts it, a chance in the last movement to be the major-domo of a crashing army of old Roman legions. In this the Boston conductor was more successful than in the Beethoven Symphony which had little repose and nobility and much noise.

A large Thanksgiving audience attended and seemed properly grateful in accordance with the sentiment of the holiday.

NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

NOV 26 1926

REALM OF MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

FOR one price of admission a large audience at Carnegie Hall last night heard two conductors and two orchestras. First there were Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing Beethoven in a style which can be described with truth only as crass, uninspired and mistaken. Then there were the same Mr. Koussevitzky and the identical Boston Symphony Orchestra performing Prokofieff and Respighi in a manner which may be denoted with equal truth as finished, eloquent and infallible. It was the organization's first New York appearance of the season.

Almost too much for human nerves to endure were the unlovely clamors attending Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. It was enough to justify an edict banishing trumpets and kettledrums summarily from the roster of orchestral instruments. The conductor varied his dynamics, but was chary with shadings of tempo. He affected a harsh and rigid beat which was reflected faithfully in the sharp fragments of sound slashed out by the instruments.

The same clangors, and the same monotony of beat persisted in the "Eroica" symphony. Never was a funeral march less dolorous. The Scherzo was played with a heavy hand, and at the same time with a pace so swift that the ideas were often blurred. Mr. Koussevitzky poetized slightly in the softer episodes, and at such times the tone of strings and woodwind was commendable. But if the concert had ended at the intermission one would have concluded that not the least of the crimes of the World War was the fall of the Boston Orchestra from its eminent estate under Dr. Karl Muck.

But with a change from classic to modern music, the rather bewildered band was transformed in a trice into a virtuoso orchestra. Having fumbled Beethoven's music, Mr. Koussevitzky held that of Serge Prokofieff and Ottorino Respighi in the firmest of grasps. Their scores he interpreted exultantly and victoriously.

The former was represented by a suite from his opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," and the latter by his well-known symphonic poem, "Pini di Roma." The suite, edited by Albert Spalding, was presented as such for the first time in New York, but the principal material was heard at a performance of "The Love for Three Oranges" at the Manhattan Opera House in 1922. Of five swift, piquant and vivid movements, the most successful were those entitled "March" and "The Prince and the Princess."

Respighi's "Pines of Rome" have turned out to be far other than evergreens, but the introduction of a gramophone record of an actual nightingale's song still aroused curiosity, and the fourth section, in which is visioned a march of Roman legions upon the Appian Way, brought the program to a dramatic conclusion and won an ovation from the audience.

Program notes, bearing the placeline, "Carnegie Hall, New York," had been prepared by the august Mr. Philip Hale. Not the least exasperating feature of the evening was that the pamphlets had to be bootlegged in, owing to the fact that some one or other has a monopoly on the program concession at Carnegie Hall. Subscribers received the booklets by mail in advance. Others were distributed on the sidewalk.

N. Y. EVENING SUN

NOV 29 1926

To the stream of contemporaneous music the Boston Orchestra added its moderate outpour at the matinee of Saturday in Carnegie Hall. Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik" having been gently disposed of at the beginning, the players devoted their energies to the publication of the first suite from Roussel's opera ballet "Padmavati" and Prokofieff's ballet suite "Chout." When these disturbances had been allayed Beethoven's fifth symphony brought the concert to a peaceful conclusion.

Doubtless there is more in the Roussel suite than a casual observer would imagine, since the opera produced in 1923 holds its place in the repertory of the great Parisian institution dedicated to lyric drama. Mr. Prokofieff's music seemed to this casual observer to have more virility than the Frenchman's and the final dance, thundering out one of those merciless rhythms for which the composer is noted, promised an exhilarating effect in the theater. It sounded well even in the concert hall. And both of the suites were well performed. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to be more congenially occupied when directing these works than when skimming through the simplicities of Mozart.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
NOV 28 1926

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conductor, displayed its virtuosity and its admirable tonal qualities yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall in several different ways, but in none more significant than the opening performance, "Eine Kliene Nachtmusik," by Mozart. Passages from Albert Roussel's opera-ballet, "Padmavati," and some stupendous grotesquerie from Prokofieff's ballet-suite, "Chout," displayed the orchestra more brilliantly, but none of these compositions made a greater demand upon the sheerly beautiful qualities of the band, and the sensitiveness, as well as brilliancy, which it now attains, than Mozart's gay, charming and infinitely delicate music. This music tested the soloists and the different choirs of the orchestra, as well as the control and the taste of the conductor, and found them all more than adequate to the situation.

There was a clarity and fineness of line particularly required, and seldom granted in such measure, in this divertissement. In rapid passages, pianissimo, the whole division of first violins played as softly and unanimously as if they had been a single instrument, and the loveliness of coloring throughout was worthy of the best traditions of the orchestra. Again, as on the previous Thursday evening, Mr. Koussevitsky, rather unexpectedly, triumped as an interpreter of classics, and the triumph of yesterday afternoon, if more modest in the tonal and emotional dimensions than that of the previous concerts, was not less pronounced or less conducive to the glory of himself and his players.

There is always a reason for everything in this world, and therefore there is a reason, presumably a logical one, why Albert Roussel's opera ballet, "Padmavati," should have been given a sumptuous production by the Paris Opera in 1923. But it is hard to discover this reason by listening to the performance of fragments of the score. The sections heard yesterday are forced, uninspired, ugly, and one hears the drums of Stravinsky's finale of "Sacre du Printemps," and the bassoon that chants the lullaby in the same composer's music to "Oiseau de feu." It is empty and striving music from a composer who has done better.

The feature of this concert, from the standpoint of the modernist, was certainly the suite from Prokofieff's "Chout." This ballet was performed at the Grand Street Theatre—we believe for the first time in America—two seasons ago. The action was difficult for the uninformed to decipher. There was a small orchestra and little opportunity to get a real impression of the music. The story of the ballet is ironic and madly nonsensical, and space will not be taken to narrate it here. Enough to remark that the spirit of the story has been captured by the composer, who is wantonly farcical, whose laughter is impudent and side-splitting. One Rabelaisianism after another, and ever and again chords which stick the finger to the nose at an astonished audience. You hear Profofieff say, with a ler, "Once upon a time," but not as you heard Strauss say it in the tender introduction of his "Eulenspiege." Far from it! Here is the grimace, the mockery, but also the whole-hearted laughter, the torrential vitality of the enfant terrible of modern Russian music.

These pieces are written with a mastery just as clear, just as pronounced and certain of itself, as the complete recklessness of mood conveyed. Anything could happen in a waggish, Gargantuan world, and many of these things do happen in Prokofieff's orchestra. For us this music, from a composer who writes almost too quickly and abundantly, is considerably superior in distinction and force of execution to the excerpts from "The Love for Three Oranges," heard on Thursday from the same conductor and orchestra. The "Chout" music seems to us more truly Prokofieff and less—Rimsky-Korsakoff. Yesterday's orchestral performance was as joyous and extravagant a display of virtuosity as we remember for some time back, and the music found much favor with the audience.

Mr. Koussevitsky concluded with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram

NOV 26 19..

Thanks Be to Boston.

Famous Symphony Orchestra Visits Carnegie Hall—Other Musical Events.

By Pitts Sanborn.

Nothing is sacred to Boston, unless it be the bean and the cod. Its famous symphony orchestra swept into our little island yesterday, to the marked discomfiture of our national bird and its hungering votaries, and gave the first local concert of its new season at Carnegie Hall last evening. And in spite of a rudely violated Thanksgiving and the perils incident to too much turkey and mince pie, a capacity audience gathered for the event.

Evidently Serge Koussevitzky, the Bostonians' Russian conductor, feels bound to pay his centenary tribute to Beethoven here as elsewhere, and believes the earlier it is paid the better for all concerned. So he treated his Thanksgiving night public to the "Egmont" overture as an appetizer, and immediately followed that considerable hors d'oeuvre with the "Eroica" symphony. Tomorrow afternoon he plans to regale his customers with the symphony in C minor.

There is nothing humdrum or perfunctory about the Bostonian Beethoven a la russe. It is enormously alive and it sounds—as music should. It would be easy to object to this or that in the reading of the symphony—easy without incurring blame as purist or pedant. And yet the performance was so vivid, so vital, so stimulating, so engrossing that, in spite of innovations and exaggerations, very few would want to raise an objection. The orchestra played magnificently, and the sheer quality of its playing, combined with the spell that Mr. Koussevitzky knows so well how to impose, fetched an ovation from the audience, which, of course, spurred the leader to bring his men up standing.

Whatever may be said against the methods of this Russian conductor, he is always imaginative and unexpected. He can fire his hearers at the flame of his own inspiration, and sometimes he illumines a page of music with a light that never shone on it before. No one will charge him with being safe and sane, but there are occasions in art when those very words may spell reproach. It's all very well to jog along behind old Dobbin, but there's vastly more thrill to be had from a high power racing car. There's no exaggeration in declaring that Mr. Koussevitzky's "Eroica" last evening was a thrilling adventure.

The rest of the program consisted of a suite from Prokofieff's opera "The Love for Three Oranges" and Respighi's symphonic poem "The Pines of Rome." The Prokofieff suite recalled the admirable production here of his opera by the visiting Chicago company. If New York were really as artistic as some New Yorkers pretend, that production would have enjoyed more than a single showing.

There seems to be no earthly reason for it[illegible] movie musicianly[illegible] which[illegible] hardly[illegible] which[illegible]

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

TRANSCRIPT — Nov 29

Calm After Storm

No disturbances of the peace threaten the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Bach's fourth Brandenberg Concerto, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra, begins the program. Debussy's "Iberia" ends it. Between Mr. Cortot, the familiar and well-liked Parisian pianist, will play the solo-part in a Concerto of Mozart in E-flat and Franck's "Symphonic Variations."

As innocuous is the program for the first of the Tuesday matinées. Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture, in which Mr. Koussevitzky has not yet been heard in Boston; the Prelude and Finale from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde"; Strauss's tone-poem of "Till Eulenspiegel"; the Fourth Symphony of Brahms. In sum, the German list for a series of "national" programs. It is also composed of ready repertory pieces.

On Thursday evening, the Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky will play in Sanders Theater at Cambridge through a program of pieces from their Boston repertory.

TIMES PICAYUNE
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
DEC 1 1926

TIMING THE LITTLE SPEECHES

"How do you know just what the numbers will be and just how long they will take?" we asked the broadcast announcer for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Each Friday afternoon the orchestra plays the same program they do Saturday night," was the answer. "We avail ourselves of this opportunity to get a line up on the program. Every minute from the time the orchestra starts until it finishes is accounted for. The program of Saturday is a duplicate, almost to seconds of the one on Friday."

"This accounts then for the perfect timing of your little speeches between each number?"

"That's it exactly."—Walter Gordon in Springfield Republican.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
NOV 30 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Carnegie Hall overflowed at the opening New York concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Thanksgiving night. The occasion was one of the sort which is long remembered—even in this city of much music. The performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony by the great orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky called forth the following comment:

Lawrence Gilman (New York Herald "Eroica," Symphony, to judge by his that Mr. Koussevitzky plays Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, to judge by his performance of it last night, with an intensity and a dramatic sweep, and concentration that make its longueurs seem imaginary and heighten extra-ordinarily its tragic poignancy and its gigantic, elementary power. He caused us, indeed, to ask ourselves last evening if this is not, after all, Beethoven at his most superb; if this symphony is not the greatest of the nine. The supreme Beethoven, to be sure—Beethoven the seer and the prophet, the mystic with the fathomless gaze—is not in the symphonies at all, but in the quartets and certain of the sonatas. Yet the Beethoven who could best ride the world and shoulder the heavens and affright the stars, this figure half granite and half flame, this Titan who laments and laughs and exults with a hugeness more than human—this Beethoven, heartbreaking and terrible and jocund, speaks out of the "Eroica," and last night Mr. Koussevitzky was his instrument and his eloquent tongue."

The ticket sale for the Hartford concert is now in progress at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street, or reservations can be made with Frank A. Sedgwick, 2-6147.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
NOV 28 1926

Boston Orchestra Plays Modern Music At Matinee Concert

Symphony, Under Koussevitzky's Baton, Also Offers Beethoven to Large Audience in Carnegie Hall

Beethoven and Prokofieff provided the chief features of yesterday's Boston Symphony matinée at Carnegie Hall, as they did at the Thursday evening concert of that now flourishing organization. Yesterday the German's C minor Symphony and the Russian's ballet suite, "Chout," were companioned by Mozart ("Eine Kleine Nachtmusik") and a suite derived from the opera-ballet, "Padmavati," by that contemporary Frenchman, Albert Roussel, who voyaged to the Orient as a naval officer in his youth and has never forgotten the experience.

Monsieur Roussel's "Padmavati" excerpts were heard for the first time in New York, although the program modestly refrained from mentioning this fact. "Padmavati" is based on an Indian subject, contrived for the stage by that accomplished Orientalist, Louis Laloy. The work was produced at the Paris Opera in June, 1923; but Roussel had composed the music some time before—he had begun it, in fact, as early as 1913, was interrupted by the war, and finished it in 1918.

This score shows its age. Monsieur Roussel has since written music of pith and pungency—as his impressive B-flat Symphony. But the excerpts from "Padmavati" played yesterday have little character. They are already faded, out of date; for it is characteristic of the music of the last decade that it ages with horrifying rapidity, unless it happens to be the product of a genuinely creative mind. And there are not many genuinely creative minds operating in the world of music today. Monsieur Roussel's tepid Orientalism is pretty enough, but much of it is tame and dull; and the snatches from Wagner and Debussy and Ravel do not help it greatly.

Prokofieff's "Chout" was given at the Neighborhood Playhouse, New York, in the spring of 1924. It was produced in Paris by the Ballet Russe three years before that. The music played yesterday was new in its form as a concert suite. This music, too, has faded. It owes much to Stravinsky—the Stravinsky of "Petrouchka"; and one listened to Prokofieff yesterday with a new respect for his fellow countryman. Stravinsky is rather a wilted pansy these days, and his stupendous vogue is a thing of the past; nevertheless, he is still able to make most of his contemporaries look like very distant approximations of the real thing.

Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was easily the high point of the concert. He read it, as he did the "Eroica" Thursday evening, with an intensity of personal conviction that made one, for the moment, quite willing to believe that this was the authentic Beethoven—if there is any such animal. He played the slow movement with especial beauty, and with enough of that "touching grace" which Berlioz found in the music to make it seem less smug than it sometimes does at the hands of conductors not so vitalizing as Mr. Koussevitzky.

There was a crowded and applausive house.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will open its series of Tuesday afternoon concerts next Tuesday, in Symphony hall, at 3:15, and give the seventh regular pair of concerts in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. The second concert of the Monday evening series will take place on Dec. 13. The annual winter Pension Fund concert by this orchestra will take place the day after Christmas, Dec. 26, at 3:30.

Next Tuesday's program will be of German music, according to the division of this series between the national schools of music, and will be as follows: Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3; prelude and love-death to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde"; Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the fourth symphony of Brahms.

The Friday and Saturday concerts will have the following program: Concerto by Mozart in E-flat, and Cesar Franck's symphonic variations, in which Alfred Cortot, the French pianist, will appear as soloist with the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky will open the program with Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major for violin solo, with two flutes and string orchestra, and close it with Debussy's "Iberia," Three "Images" for orchestra.

The Monday evening program will include Berlioz's Roman Carnival Overture, Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in A major, with Nadia Reisenberg as soloist, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor.

NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
56
NOV 26 1926

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

The Boston Symphony Celebrates Thanksgiving in New York

First New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. At Carnegie Hall

PROGRAM

1. Overture to Egmont.....Beethoven
2. Symphony No. 3 (Eroica)....Beethoven
3. Suite from "The Love for Three Oranges" .....Prokofieff (First time in New York)
4. "Pines of Rome".....Respighi

LAST night, for the third time, Mr. Koussevitzky chose to make Thanksgiving more memorable for concert-going New Yorkers than even giblet sauce and six kinds of pie and the last of that ineffable pre-war Case could make it. For whatever you may choose to think or say of Mr. Koussevitzky, his concerts are not easy to forget.

* * *

You can hardly deny to this conductor the quality of Eventfulness. Some conductors have it—not many. It is not a quality that you can define. It is not even a quality that invariably calls forth praise in the observer. It may provoke exasperation and hot dislike. What it conspicuously does not provoke is boredom. Mr. Koussevitzky can be as irritating as a foreign body in the eye, as disappointing as Wall Street, as infuriating as the arrogance of what Whitman called "elected persons." He can be amazingly, extravagantly wrong—indeed, no conductor can be so wrong as Mr. Koussevitsky at his worst. But boring, tepid, Laodicean, he never is. He has the undecipherable gift.

The thing is beyond acquisition. No course of lessons under Mr. Stokowski or Mr. Mengelberg or Mr. Koussevitzky himself would impart it to you—willing as those masters might be to tell you all they know. As Mr. Dirk Foch once succinctly observed about conducting, "Either you can it, or you can it not." There is nothing more to be said.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky can it. He may have given drab and flaccid and impersonalized performances; but if he has, we were elsewhere at the time, and are prepared to disbelieve any reports to that effect. There are those who call him a sensationalist. Their legend would paint him as a sort of embodied "Surprise" Symphony, with no higher purpose than to startle the somnolent.

We do not believe it. Mr. Koussevitzky, as we perceive him, exudes sincerity. He strikes us as almost agonizingly genuine—a simple man, passionately and undissuadably convinced that Beethoven meant this and that by his "Eroica," that Schubert meant the "Unfinished" to go so and so, that Wagner (believe it or not) was more Russian than Rimsky-Korsakoff. We happen to think that Mr. Koussevitzky sometimes misconceives Wagner and maltreats Schubert. We also happen to think that he plays Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, to judge by his performance of it last night, with an intensity and a dramatic sweep and concentration that make its longueurs seem imaginary and heighten extraordinarily its tragic poignancy and its gigantic, elemental power.

He caused us, indeed, to ask ourselves last evening if this is not, after all, Beethoven at his most superb: if this Symphony is not the greatest of the Nine.

* * *

The supreme Beethoven, to be sure—Beethoven the seer and the prophet, the mystic with the fathomless gaze—is not in the symphonies at all, but in the quartets and certain of the sonatas. Yet the Beethoven who could bestride the world and shoulder the heavens and affright the stars, this figure half granite and half flame, this Titan who laments and laughs and exults with a hugeness more than human—this Beethoven, heartbreaking and terrible and jocund, speaks out of the "Eroica"; and last night Mr. Koussevitzky was his instrument and his eloquent tongue.

* * *

The suite of numbers extracted from Prokofieff's "Love for Three Oranges" recalled the production of the entertaining opera after Gozzi's fable which the Chicago Opera Company achieved here in 1922. We thought the work delightful then, an exhilarating blend of wit and fantasy and riant charm. Last night the music sounded empty and undistinguished, only mildly entertaining, even sentimental in the lyric number entitled "Le Prince et la Princesse," which was scarcely more than Mendelssohn à la mode. Thus do we live and learn!

Nor does Respighi's "Pini di Roma" resist any too successfully the gnawing of the temporal tooth. It is younger by four or five years than Prokofieff's opera, but it sounds a decade older. Perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky was weary after his mighty exertions over the "Eroica" (the intermission was interminable); but the four movements of the "Pini" did not come off as they did under Toscanini. The nocturne, so lusciously scored by Respighi, sounded more like an evening in Jamaica Plain than a moonlit night under the pines of the Janiculum; and the thunderous Finale, so overwhelming in its climax under the singular Italian, was quite comfortably tolerable last night.

But Mr. Koussevitzky's Boston Nightingale was easily the most dulcet that has sung in Carnegie Hall at any of the performances of Respighi's gramophonic tone poem.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
BROOKLYN EAGLE
NOV 27 1926

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. Program: Beethoven, Third ("Eroica") Symphony; Prokofieff, Suite from the opera "The Love for Three Oranges"; Respighi, Symphonic Poem, "Pini di Roma." At the Academy of Music, last evening.

* * *

MR. KOUSSEWITSKY comes to us annually from his perch in Boston, an accredited representative of that Paris where, in the words of Mr. Antheil, "experiments are permitted." He comes, with the orchestra over which the majesterial Dr. Muck once flourished his incredible baton, and permits an audience assembled under the auspices of the Institute to applaud his fine figure, his expressive gestures, his indomitable courage; admirable qualities, all of them, for the lack of which men of finer grain and profounder capabilities remain forever in the limbo of public life. But in Mr. Koussewitsky, who has occupied his post as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1924, they sadly enhance a lack of taste and sensibility. Considering Mr. Koussewitsky's recent career in its most international aspects, we are forced to the conclusion that experiments are also permitted in New England. Perhaps the possession of a currently fashionable equivalent for the Ding an sich allows the public-spirited of Boston to regard the decline of their symphonic tradition with complacent pride.

* * *

WE PERCEIVE in Mr. Koussewitsky a virtuoso whose sincerity as an interpreter of music old and new does not at all times appear to be unquestionable. We perceive in him a virtuoso whose rule is novelty, who is at times insolently unresponsive to the inner pulse and content of the music through which he projects the conceptions of an inquisitive and restless temperament. We may, of course, be mistaken in such conclusions, which have at best all the uncertain and illusive qualities of emotional impressions. Mr. Koussewitsky appeals to us as a man whose sense of proportion is deficient; he has, we believe, no conception of style. His comprehension of the essential spirit of much of the music which he must perform is uncertain, alarmingly variable. As an instance, he gave last evening a reading of the "Eroica" Symphony which was, in all externals of sonority, rhythmic incisiveness and dynamic sweep, truly heroic. His orchestra piled up the great tonal monument with force and brilliance, yet the complete structure, weakened by excessive elaboration of detail, lacked solidity.

* * *

THE novelty of the program was a suite edited by Albert Spalding from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," by Serge Prokofieff, of whose music Mr. Koussewitsky is so diligent and resourceful a friend. Its performance was the sort to italicize the color and piquancy of Prokofieff's writing. More than ordinarily facile in the handling of an orchestra, this young Russian employs his talent in the construction of ingenious but pithless music. Even Mr. Koussewitsky's sympathetic projection of the suite failed to reveal in it saliency of idea or imagination.

* * *

RESPIGHI'S "Pini di Roma," that symphonic panorama which Mr. Toscanini first revealed to us last season, brought the concert to an end. Mr. Koussewitsky conducted the piece with remorseless vigor. His audience had perhaps not heard the vulgar and uncostly music ennobled under Mr. Toscanini's direction and found the merely orchestral pomp and plentitude that Koussewitsky released sufficient to its taste. It would be unfair to expect that the illusion of greatness which clung to this poem on its revelation last winter should be perpetuated in readings less inspired than that of the great Italian. Mr. Koussewitsky was applauded with a vehemence quite astonishing when one considers the habitual indifference of Brooklyn audiences.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram

NOV 26 19--

Thanks Be to Boston.

Famous Symphony Orchestra Visits Carnegie Hall—Other Musical Events.

By Pitts Sanborn.

Nothing is sacred to Boston, unless it be the bean and the cod. Its famous symphony orchestra swept into our little island yesterday, to the marked discomfiture of our national bird and its hungering votaries, and gave the first local concert of its new season at Carnegie Hall last evening. And in spite of a rudely violated Thanksgiving and the perils incident to too much turkey and mince pie, a capacity audience gathered for the event.

Evidently Serge Koussevitzky, the Bostonians' Russian conductor, feels bound to pay his centenary tribute to Beethoven here as elsewhere, and believes the earlier it is paid the better for all concerned. So he treated his Thanksgiving night public to the "Egmont" overture as an appetizer, and immediately followed that considerable hors d'oeuvre with the "Eroica" symphony. Tomorrow afternoon he plans to regale his customers with the symphony in C minor.

There is nothing humdrum or perfunctory about the Bostonian Beethoven a la russe. It is enormously alive and it sounds—as music should. It would be easy to object to this or that in the reading of the symphony—easy without incurring blame as purist or pedant. And yet the performance was so vivid, so vital, so stimulating, so engrossing that, in spite of innovations and exaggerations, very few would want to raise an objection. The orchestra played magnificently, and the sheer quality of its playing, combined with the spell that Mr. Koussevitzky knows so well how to impose, fetched an ovation from the audience, which, of course, spurred the leader to bring his men up standing.

Whatever may be said against the methods of this Russian conductor, he is always imaginative and unexpected. He can fire his hearers at the flame of his own inspiration, and sometimes he illumines a page of music with a light that never shone on it before. No one will charge him with being safe and sane, but there are occasions in art when those very words may spell reproach. It's all very well to jog along behind old Dobbin, but there's vastly more thrill to be had from a high power racing car. There's no exaggeration in declaring that Mr. Koussevitzky's "Eroica" last evening was a thrilling adventure.

The rest of the program consisted of a suite from Prokofieff's opera "The Love for Three Oranges" and Respighi's symphonic poem "The Pines of Rome." The Prokofieff suite recalled the admirable production here of his opera by the visiting Chicago company. If New York were really as artistic as some New Yorkers pretend, that production would have enjoyed more than a single showing.

There seems to be no urgent reason for importing Respighi's Roman movie music via the modern Athens. Toscanini expounded it thoroughly for us last winter, and subsequent performances have been numerous, if not exactly noteworthy.

A Russian rite of Beethoven.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

TRANSCRIPT — Nov 27

Calm After Storm

No disturbances of the peace threaten the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Bach's fourth Brandenberg Concerto, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra, begins the program. Debussy's "Iberia" ends it. Between Mr. Cortot, the familiar and well-liked Parisian pianist, will play the solo-part in a Concerto of Mozart in E-flat and Franck's "Symphonic Variations."

As innocuous is the program for the first of the Tuesday matinées. Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture, in which Mr. Koussevitzky has not yet been heard in Boston; the Prelude and Finale from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde"; Strauss's tone-poem of "Till Eulenspiegel"; the Fourth Symphony of Brahms. In sum, the German list for a series of "national" programs. It is also composed of ready repertory pieces.

On Thursday evening, the Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky will play in Sanders Theater at Cambridge through a program of pieces from their Boston repertory.

TIMES PICAYUNE
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
DEC 12 1926

TIMING THE LITTLE SPEECHES

"How do you know just what the numbers will be and just how long they will take?" we asked the broadcast announcer for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Each Friday afternoon the orchestra plays the same program they do Saturday night," was the answer. "We avail ourselves of this opportunity to get a line up on the program. Every minute from the time the orchestra starts until it finishes is accounted for. The program of Saturday is a duplicate, almost to seconds of the one on Friday."

"This accounts then for the perfect timing of your little speeches between each number?"

"That's it exactly."—Walter Gordon in Springfield Republican.

NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

56

NOV 26 1926

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

The Boston Symphony Celebrates Thanksgiving in New York

First New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. At Carnegie Hall

PROGRAM

1. Overture to Egmont.....Beethoven
2. Symphony No. 3 (Eroica)....Beethoven
3. Suite from "The Love for Three Oranges" .....Prokofieff (First time in New York)
4. "Pines of Rome".....Respighi

LAST night, for the third time, Mr. Koussevitzky chose to make Thanksgiving more memorable for concert-going New Yorkers than even giblet sauce and six kinds of pie and the last of that ineffable pre-war Case could make it. For whatever you may choose to think or say of Mr. Koussevitzky, his concerts are not easy to forget.

* * *

You can hardly deny to this conductor the quality of Eventfulness. Some conductors have it—not many. It is not a quality that you can define. It is not even a quality that invariably calls forth praise in the observer. It may provoke exasperation and hot dislike. What it conspicuously does not provoke is boredom. Mr. Koussevitzky can be as irritating as a foreign body in the eye, as disappointing as Wall Street, as infuriating as the arrogance of what Whitman called "elected persons." He can be amazingly, extravagantly wrong—indeed, no conductor can be so wrong as Mr. Koussevitsky at his worst. But boring, tepid, Laodicean, he never is. He has the undecipherable gift.

The thing is beyond acquisition. No course of lessons under Mr. Stokowski or Mr. Mengelberg or Mr. Koussevitzky himself would impart it to you—willing as those masters might be to tell you all they know. As Mr. Dirk Foch once succinctly observed about conducting, "Either you can it, or you can it not." There is nothing more to be said.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky can it. He may have given drab and flaccid and impersonalized performances; but if he has, we were elsewhere at the time, and are prepared to disbelieve any reports to that effect. There are those who call him a sensationalist. Their legend would paint him as a sort of embodied "Surprise" Symphony, with no higher purpose than to startle the somnolent.

We do not believe it. Mr. Koussevitzky, as we perceive him, exudes sincerity. He strikes us as almost agonizingly genuine—a simple man, passionately and undissuadably convinced that Beethoven meant this and that by his "Eroica," that Schubert meant the "Unfinished" to go so and so, that Wagner (believe it or not) was more Russian than Rimsky-Korsakoff. We happen to think that Mr. Koussevitzky sometimes misconceives Wagner and maltreats Schubert. We also happen to think that he plays Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, to judge by his performance of it last night, with an intensity and a dramatic sweep and concentration that make its longueurs seem imaginary and heighten extraordinarily its tragic poignancy and its gigantic, elemental power.

He caused us, indeed, to ask ourselves last evening if this is not, after all, Beethoven at his most superb: if this Symphony is not the greatest of the Nine.

* * *

The supreme Beethoven, to be sure—Beethoven the seer and the prophet, the mystic with the fathomless gaze—is not in the symphonies at all, but in the quartets and certain of the sonatas. Yet the Beethoven who could bestride the world and shoulder the heavens and affright the stars, this figure half granite and half flame, this Titan who laments and laughs and exults with a hugeness more than human—this Beethoven, heartbreaking and terrible and jocund, speaks out of the "Eroica"; and last night Mr. Koussevitzky was his instrument and his eloquent tongue.

* * *

The suite of numbers extracted from Prokofieff's "Love for Three Oranges" recalled the production of the entertaining opera after Gozzi's fable which the Chicago Opera Company achieved here in 1922. We thought the work delightful then, an exhilarating blend of wit and fantasy and riant charm. Last night the music sounded empty and undistinguished, only mildly entertaining, even sentimental in the lyric number entitled "Le Prince et la Princesse," which was scarcely more than Mendelssohn à la mode. Thus do we live and learn!

Nor does Respighi's "Pini di Roma" resist any too successfully the gnawing of the temporal tooth. It is younger by four or five years than Prokofieff's opera, but it sounds a decade older. Perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky was weary after his mighty exertions over the "Eroica" (the intermission was interminable); but the four movements of the "Pini" did not come off as they did under Toscanini. The nocturne, so lusciously scored by Respighi, sounded more like an evening in Jamaica Plain than a moonlit night under the pines of the Janiculum; and the thunderous Finale, so overwhelming in its climax under the singular Italian, was quite comfortably tolerable last night.

But Mr. Koussevitzky's Boston Nightingale was easily the most dulcet that has sung in Carnegie Hall at any of the performances of Respighi's gramophonic tone poem.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
BROOKLYN EAGLE

NOV 27 1926

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. Program: Beethoven, Third ("Eroica") Symphony; Prokofieff, Suite from the opera "The Love for Three Oranges"; Respighi, Symphonic Poem, "Pini di Roma." At the Academy of Music, last evening.

* * *

MR. KOUSSEWITSKY comes to us annually from his perch in Boston, an accredited representative of that Paris where, in the words of Mr. Antheil, "experiments are permitted." He comes, with the orchestra over which the majesterial Dr. Muck once flourished his incredible baton, and permits an audience assembled under the auspices of the Institute to applaud his fine figure, his expressive gestures, his indomitable courage; admirable qualities, all of them, for the lack of which men of finer grain and profounder capabilities remain forever in the limbo of public life. But in Mr. Koussewitsky, who has occupied his post as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1924, they sadly enhance a lack of taste and sensibility. Considering Mr. Koussewitsky's recent career in its most international aspects, we are forced to the conclusion that experiments are also permitted in New England. Perhaps the possession of a currently fashionable equivalent for the Ding an sich allows the public-spirited of Boston to regard the decline of their symphonic tradition with complacent pride.

* * *

WE PERCEIVE in Mr. Koussewitsky a virtuoso whose sincerity as an interpreter of music old and new does not at all times appear to be unquestionable. We perceive in him a virtuoso whose rule is novelty, who is at times insolently unresponsive to the inner pulse and content of the music through which he projects the conceptions of an inquisitive and restless temperament. We may, of course, be mistaken in such conclusions, which have at best all the uncertain and illusive qualities of emotional impressions. Mr. Koussewitsky appeals to us as a man whose sense of proportion is deficient; he has, we believe, no conception of style. His comprehension of the essential spirit of much of the music which he must perform is uncertain, alarmingly variable. As an instance, he gave last evening a reading of the "Eroica" Symphony which was, in all externals of sonority, rhythmic incisiveness and dynamic sweep, truly heroic. His orchestra piled up the great tonal monument with force and brilliance, yet the complete structure, weakened by excessive elaboration of detail, lacked solidity.

* * *

THE novelty of the program was a suite edited by Albert Spalding from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," by Serge Prokofieff, of whose music Mr. Koussewitsky is so diligent and resourceful a friend. Its performance was the sort to italicize the color and piquancy of Prokofieff's writing. More than ordinarily facile in the handling of an orchestra, this young Russian employs his talent in the construction of ingenious but pithless music. Even Mr. Koussewitsky's sympathetic projection of the suite failed to reveal in it saliency of idea or imagination.

* * *

RESPIGHI'S "Pini di Roma," that symphonic panorama which Mr. Toscanini first revealed to us last season, brought the concert to an end. Mr. Koussewitsky conducted the piece with remorseless vigor. His audience had perhaps not heard the vulgar and uncostly music ennobled under Mr. Toscanini's direction and found the merely orchestral pomp and plentitude that Koussewitsky released sufficient to its taste. It would be unfair to expect that the illusion of greatness which clung to this poem on its revelation last winter should be perpetuated in readings less inspired than that of the great Italian. Mr. Koussewitsky was applauded with a vehemence quite astonishing when one considers the habitual indifference of Brooklyn audiences.

Symphony, Under Koussevitzky's Baton, Also Offers Beethoven to Large Audience in Carnegie Hall

Beethoven and Prokofieff provided the chief features of yesterday's Boston Symphony matinée at Carnegie Hall, as they did at the Thursday evening concert of that now flourishing organization. Yesterday the German's C minor Symphony and the Russian's ballet suite, "Chout," were companioned by Mozart ("Eine Kleine Nachtmusik") and a suite derived from the opera-ballet, "Padmavati," by that contemporary Frenchman, Albert Roussel, who voyaged to the Orient as a naval officer in his youth and has never forgotten the experience.

Monsieur Roussel's "Padmavati" excerpts were heard for the first time in New York, although the program modestly refrained from mentioning this fact. "Padmavati" is based on an Indian subject, contrived for the stage by that accomplished Orientalist, Louis Laloy. The work was produced at the Paris Opera in June, 1923; but Roussel had composed the music some time before—he had begun it, in fact, as early as 1913, was interrupted by the war, and finished it in 1918.

This score shows its age. Monsieur Roussel has since written music of pith and pungency—as his impressive E-flat Symphony. But the excerpts from "Padmavati" played yesterday have little character. They are already faded, out of date; for it is characteristic of the music of the last decade that it ages with horrifying rapidity, unless it happens to be the product of a genuinely creative mind. And there are not many genuinely creative minds operating in the world of music today. Monsieur Roussel's tepid Orientalism is pretty enough, but much of it is tame and dull; and the snatches from Wagner and Debussy and Ravel do not help it greatly.

Prokofieff's "Chout" was given at the Neighborhood Playhouse, New York, in the spring of 1924. It was produced in Paris by the Ballet Russe three years before that. The music played yesterday was new in its form as a concert suite. This music, too, has faded. It owes much to Stravinsky—the Stravinsky of "Petrouchka"; and one listened to Prokofieff yesterday with a new respect for his fellow countryman. Stravinsky is rather a wilted pansy these days, and his stupendous vogue is a thing of the past; nevertheless, he is still able to make most of his contemporaries look like very distant approximations of the real thing.

Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was easily the high point of the concert. He read it, as he did the "Eroica" Thursday evening, with an intensity of personal conviction that made one, for the moment, quite willing to believe that this was the authentic Beethoven—if there is any such animal. He played the slow movement with especial beauty, and with enough of that "touching grace" which Berlioz found in the music to make it seem less smug than it sometimes does at the hands of conductors not so vitalizing as Mr. Koussevitzky.

There was a crowded and applausive house.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will open its series of Tuesday afternoon concerts next Tuesday, in Symphony hall, at 3:15, and give the seventh regular pair of concerts in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. The second concert of the Monday evening series will take place on Dec. 13. The annual Musical Pension Fund concert by this orchestra will take place the day after Christmas, Dec. 26, at 3:30.

Next Tuesday's program will be of German music, according to the division of this series between the national schools of music, and will be as follows: Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3; prelude and love-death to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde"; Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the fourth symphony of Brahms.

The Friday and Saturday concerts will have the following program: Concerto by Mozart in E-flat, and Cesar Franck's symphonic variations, in which Alfred Cortot, the French pianist, will appear as soloist with the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky will open the program with Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major for violin solo, with two flutes and string orchestra, and close it with Debussy's "Iberia," Three "Images" for orchestra.

The Monday evening program will include Berlioz's Roman Carnival Overture, Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in A major, with Nadia Reisenberg as soloist, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor.

intense concentration that ... extra-ordinarily its tragic poignancy and its gigantic, elementary power. He caused us, indeed, to ask ourselves last evening if this is not, after all, Beethoven at his most superb; if this symphony is not the greatest of the nine. The supreme Beethoven, to be sure—Beethoven the seer and the prophet, the mystic with the fathomless gaze—is not in the symphonies at all, but in the quartets and certain of the sonatas. Yet the Beethoven who could best ride the world and shoulder the heavens and affright the stars, this figure half granite and half flame, this Titan who laments and laughs and exults with a hugeness more than human—this Beethoven, heartbreaking and terrible and jocund, speaks out of the "Eroica," and last night Mr. Koussevitzky was his instrument and his eloquent tongue."

The ticket sale for the Hartford concert is now in progress at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street, or reservations can be made with Frank A. Sedgwick, 2-6147.

N.Y. Herald

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

The Boston Symphony Celebrates Thanksgiving in New York

First New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. At Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Overture to Egmont.....Beethoven
2. Symphony No. 3 (Eroica).....Beethoven
3. Suite from "The Love for Three Oranges".....Prokofieff (First time in New York)
4. "Pines of Rome".....Respighi

LAST night, for the third time, Mr. Koussevitzky chose to make Thanksgiving more memorable for concert-going New Yorkers than even giblet sauce and six kinds of pie and the last of that ineffable pre-war Case could make it. For whatever you may choose to think or say of Mr. Koussevitzky, his concerts are not easy to forget.

* * *

You can hardly deny to this conductor the quality of Eventfulness. Some conductors have it—not many. It is not a quality that you can define. It is not even a quality that invariably calls forth praise in the observer. It may provoke exasperation and hot dislike. What it conspicuously does not provoke is boredom. Mr. Koussevitzky can be as irritating as a foreign body in the eye, as disappointing as Wall Street, as infuriating as the arrogance of what Whitman called "elected persons." He can be amazingly, extravagantly wrong—indeed, no conductor can be so wrong as Mr. Koussevitsky at his worst. But boring, tepid, Laodicean, he never is. He has the undecipherable gift.

The thing is beyond acquisition. No course of lessons under Mr. Stokowski or Mr. Mengelberg or Mr. Koussevitzky himself would impart it to you—willing as those masters might be to tell you all they know. As Mr. Dirk Foch once succinctly observed about conducting, "Either you can it, or you can it not." There is nothing more to be said.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky can it. He may have given drab and flaccid and impersonalized performances; but if he has, we were elsewhere at the time, and are prepared to disbelieve any reports to that effect. There are those who call him a sensationalist. Their legend would paint him as a sort of embodied "Surprise" Symphony, with no higher purpose than to startle the somnolent.

We do not believe it. Mr. Koussevitzky, as we perceive him, exudes sincerity. He strikes us as almost agonizingly genuine—a simple man, passionately and undissuadably convinced that Beethoven meant this and that by his "Eroica," that Schubert meant the "Unfinished" to go so and so, that Wagner (believe it or not) was more Russian than Rimsky-Korsakoff. We happen to think that Mr. Koussevitzky sometimes misconceives Wagner and maltreats Schubert. We also happen to think that he plays Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, to judge by his performance of it last night, with an intensity and a dramatic sweep and concentration that make its longueurs seem imaginary and heighten extraordinarily its tragic poignancy and its gigantic, elemental power.

He caused us, indeed, to ask ourselves last evening if this is not, after all, Beethoven at his most superb: if this Symphony is not the greatest of the Nine.

* * *

The supreme Beethoven, to be sure—Beethoven the seer and the prophet, the mystic with the fathomless gaze—is not in the symphonies at all, but in the quartets and certain of the sonatas. Yet the Beethoven who could bestride the world and shoulder the heavens and affright the stars, this figure half granite and half flame, this Titan who laments and laughs and exults with a hugeness more than human—this Beethoven, heartbreaking and terrible and jocund, speaks out of the "Eroica"; and last night Mr. Koussevitzky was his instrument and his eloquent tongue.

* * *

The suite of numbers extracted from Prokofieff's "Love for Three Oranges" recalled the production of the entertaining opera after Gozzi's fable which the Chicago Opera Company achieved here in 1922. We thought the work delightful then, an exhilarating blend of wit and fantasy and riant charm. Last night the music sounded empty and undistinguished, only mildly entertaining, even sentimental in the lyric number entitled "Le Prince et la Princesse," which was scarcely more than Mendelssohn à la mode. Thus do we live and learn!

Nor does Respighi's "Pini di Roma" resist any too successfully the gnawing of the temporal tooth. It is younger by four or five years than Prokofieff's opera, but it sounds a decade older. Perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky was weary after his mighty exertions over the "Eroica" (the intermission was interminable); but the four movements of the "Pini" did not come off as they did under Toscanini. The nocturne, so lusciously scored by Respighi, sounded more like an evening in Jamaica Plain than a moonlit night under the pines of the Janiculum; and the thunderous Finale, so overwhelming in its climax under the singular Italian, was quite comfortably tolerable last night.

But Mr. Koussevitzky's Boston Nightingale was easily the most dulcet that has sung in Carnegie Hall at any of the performances of Respighi's gramophonic tone poem.

NEW YORK WORLD

NOV 28 1926

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

The Boston Orchestra Again

Prokofieff's Ballet Suite "Chout," which Mr. Koussevitzky offered to his Saturday matinee audience at Carnegie Hall, has not, I think, the ingredients that make ballet music sufficiently important to survive its severance from the spectacle it was meant to accompany. More than any other musical form the ballet is committed to a definite program, and to offer it up on its own, without the visual accessories, is to elevate it to the plane of pure music. Very few pieces in that category have survived the test of the concert stage, especially among modern compositions. Stravinsky is the only contemporary whose ballets have justified a concert transplanting, and even "Petrouchka" loses something when it is divorced from its touching story.

The tale of Chout, the buffoon, to which Prokofieff wrote his music, is a broadly farcical, bizarre comedy. Chout evolves a scheme to get rich. When the seven buffoons who are coming to call on him arrive, Chout's wife will pretend she is dead. Chout will then slash her with his whip and bring her back to life. The seven buffoons will then offer to buy the miracle-working whip. This situation begets many farcical complications too long to be told here, but there is a comedy finish and Chout and his wife are made rich with the whip money plus a hundred rubles given them as a bribe by some other characters in the plot.

The drawback in this story for Mr. Prokofieff is that it contains no "heart" interest and consequently offers the composer no opportunity for emotional writing. A couple of minutes of tricky farcical music can be amusing, but a suite of it unrelieved by any deeper appeal seems pointless.

The "Chout" is cleverly made and Mr. Koussevitzky did wonders for it yesterday and induced the audience to give it a hand. But I doubt whether it will do more for the composer's reputation than the excerpts from his "Love for Three Oranges," played by the Bostonians last Thursday.

Mr. Roussel's ballet "Padmavati" seemed to me to be made of better stuff. Its idiom is less modern than the Prokofieff suite. It has lyric moments of sincerity, if not of the highest beauty, and leaves the listener with a desire to hear the whole opera.

Mozart's serenade "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Beethoven's C Minor Symphony formed the meat of yesterday's concert, both given notable renditions by the orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky. The conductor is not always sure about his Beethoven, but his performance of the "Fifth" was an imaginative and sincere exposition of the grandeur of that colossal work.

NEW YORK AMERICAN

NOV 28 1926

MODERNISTS IN MUSIC TREAT

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

Yesterday's matinee programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, was a fifty-fifty proposition between the moderns and the classicists.

Mozart's "Night Music" serenade for string orchestra opened the proceedings and Beethoven's fifth Symphony closed them. Between those two good old stand-bys came Roussel's suite from his opera-ballet "Padmavati;" and Prokofieff's suite from his ballet, "Chout" (The Buffoon).

It seems almost needless to state Mozart and Beethoven held their own valiantly (and some thought, conqueringly) with the newer creations of the French and Russian composers on the list.

At that, the modern music of the occasion was singularly tuneful. The Roussell Suite featured a decided strain of lyricism, while Prokofieff disported himself with jolly little dance strains, bits of frankly old-fashioned melody and harmonic twists designedly and successfully humorous.

Of the two, Prokofieff's utterance was more original and significant. He is an outstandingly talented composer in the modernistic camp, which harbors so many inexpressive followers.

Mozart's measures, while naive and slightly inocuous, nevertheless reflected the charm of simple thought and directness of statement. The Bostonians played the composition with appropriate delicacy and sprightliness.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, missed much of the elemental might and savage thrust in the opening movement of the Beethoven symphony, but he recaptured some of it in the final section, which ended the piece in a great burst of brilliance. The lovely slow part, and the eloquent Scherzo—the best that Beethoven ever wrote—must have satisfied every lover of the great German symphonist, for they were atmospheric and appealing in performance, with perfect adherence to style.

Koussevitzky, when all is said and done, seldom lays himself open to criticism when he conducts modernistic music. Perhaps it is because we are not so familiar with those works.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

POST

NOV 29 1926

The Boston Symphony's First Matinee

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY followed the general pattern of his first evening performance of the local season in the program he made for the Boston Symphony's Saturday afternoon concert. He divided the time equally between classical and modern music, so that everybody should have been happy.

There were other reasons, however, for happiness than the variety of the offerings. It was a beautiful concert, with a somewhat eccentric conductor at his best, and his orchestra, which he has brought to a high degree of excellence, playing Mozart and Prokofieff with equal understanding and tone quality.

The Mozart number was the serenade for strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," a dainty and altogether charming piece, with a good deal of Sevres fragility about it. It was admirably conducted, and the response of the strings was so perfect that hours after one was still catching fragmentary echoes of the piece and enjoying them over again.

The moderns had their innings next, with a suite from Roussel's opera-ballet, "Padmavati," first. The program notes furnished the information that this ballet has had a magnificent production in Paris at the opera, but there is little in the bit that Mr. Koussevitzky gave us to justify any excitement about it from the standpoint of music. It echoes Stravinsky in many points and has a pseudo-Oriental and exotic quality about it that is not at all moving.

Several years ago the Neighborhood Playhouse did a curious and amusing ballet by Prokofieff called "Chout" which has lingered in the memory of this reporter. Mr. Koussevitzky played a suite from the same ballet for the first time in New York as his other modern offering. It was a brilliantly conducted and beautifully played composition, often dazzling in its orchestra color and bubbling with mad humor.

After a time spent amid its wild goings on, the Beethoven Fifth was like a return to an old familiar room from an exhibition of modern art—a high-ceilinged room, majestic and concealing great sorrow and great joy, all grown homely through long association. Mr. Koussevitzky dramatizes the classics without taking unpleasant liberties.

There was great enthusiasm over the Roussel and Prokofieff numbers from a large audience.

SUN

BALTIMORE, MD.

DEC 12 1926

OF the two works on Negro themes, Darker America was by far the best musically. It had moments of genuine feeling, which the audience was not slow to appreciate. On the other hand, the poem of Creation was quite moving.

Unfortunately, the words were made indistinguishable between the sounds provided by Louis Gruenberg and the mouthing by the Negro barytone, Julius Bledsoe, who revealed the same trait in Deep River, in which he played the part of the Voodoo king. There is this, however, to be said for the two rival organizations, and that is, neither spared efforts in the presentation of their respective programs.

Serge Koussevitsky, with a chamber orchestra from the Boston Symphony, conducted for the league, while Eugene Goossens conducted a similar ensemble from the New York Symphony. Of the two, Goossens showed the greater musical understanding. He is, indeed, of all the conductors, perhaps the best for this genre of music. But it takes more than good conducting to make combinations and successions of tones sound like music.

SYMPHONY TOMORROW

Tomorrow evening, at 8:15 in Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitsky conductor, will give the second concert of its Monday evening series. The soloist of the occasion will be Nadia Reisenberg, a Russian pianist who, after unusually successful appearances in New York and elsewhere, will make her Boston debut. She will play Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in A major. The orchestral numbers will be Brahms's Symphony No. 4, and Berlioz's Overture, "Roman Carnival."

HERALD TRIBUNE, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1926

Boston Orchestra Plays Modern Music At Matinee Concert

Symphony, Under Koussevitsky's Baton, Also Offers Beethoven to Large Audience in Carnegie Hall

Beethoven and Prokofieff provided the chief features of yesterday's Boston Symphony matinee at Carnegie Hall, as they did at the Thursday evening concert of that now flourishing organization. Yesterday the German's C minor Symphony and the Russian's ballet suite, "Chout," were companioned by Mozart ("Eine Kleine Nachtmusik") and a suite derived from the opera-ballet, "Padmavati," by that contemporary Frenchman, Albert Roussel, who voyaged to the Orient as a naval officer in his youth and has never forgotten the experience.

Monsieur Roussel's "Padmadmavati" excerpts were heard for the first time in New oYrk, although the program modestly refrained from mentioning this fact. "Padmadmavati" is based on an Indian subject, contrived for the stage by that accomplished Orientalist, Louis Laloy. The work was produced at the Paris Opera in June, 1923; but Roussel had composed the music some time before—he had begun it, in fact, as early as 1913, was interrupted by the war, and finished it in 1918.

This score shows its age. Monsieur Roussel has since written music of pith and pungency—as his impressive B-flat Symphony. But the excerpts from "Padmavati" played yesterday have little character. They are already faded, out of date; for it is characteristic of the music of the last decade that it ages with horrifying rapidity, unless it happens to be the product of a genuinely creative mind. And there are not many genuinely creative minds operating in the world of music today. Monsieur Roussel's tepid Orientalism is pretty enough, but much of it is tame and dull; and the snatches from Wagner and Debussy and Ravel do not help it greatly.

Prokofieff's "Chout" was given at the Neighborhood Playhouse, New York, in the spring of 1924. It was produced in Paris by the Ballet Russe three years before that. The music played yesterday was new in its form as a concert suite. This music, too, has faded. It owes much to Stravinsky—the Stravinsky of "Petrouchka"; and one listened to Prokofieff yesterday with a new respect for his fellow countryman. Stravinsky is rather a wilted pansy these days, and his stupendous vogue is a thing of the past; nevertheless, he is still able to make most of his contemporaries look like very distant approximations of the real thing.

Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was easily the high point of the concert. He read it, as he did the "Eroica" Thursday evening, with an intensity of personal conviction that made one, for the moment, quite willing to believe that this was the authentic Beethoven—if there is any such animal. He played the slow movement with especial beauty, and with enough of that "touching grace" which Berlioz found in the music to make it seem less smug than it sometimes does at the hands of conductors not so vitalizing as Mr. Koussevitzky.

There was a crowded and applausive house.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give its eighth regular pair of concerts in Symphony hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 10 and 11; the second concert of the Monday evening series, on Dec. 13, at 8:15 o'clock, and the annual winter pension fund concert on the day after Christmas, Sunday afternoon, Dec. 26.

This week's pair of concerts includes a concerto by Philipp Emanuel Bach, orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg, and the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius. This, the latest score of the finished composer, will then have its first Boston performance. The closing number will be a suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird."

The soloist at the Monday evening concert will be Nadia Reisenberg, the noted Russian pianist, whose career in America in the last five years has placed her as one of the most talented of the younger generation of pianists. Miss Reisenberg will appear with this orchestra in Liszt's Second Concerto in A major. Mr. Koussevitzky will open the program with Berlioz's Roman Carnival Overture, and close it with the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Orchestral

TRANS. Dec 11

AT the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, Mr. Darius Milhaud, Parisian composer of the left wing, will be guest. He will be heard both as composer and pianist—in his fantasia, "Carnival et Aix," drawn from a ballet, "Salad." The music falls into short divisions, each labelled with the name of a personage in the Italian commedia dell' arte. One, however, takes title, "Souvenir de Rio," since Mr. Milhaud is fond of recalling his days in Brazil and the dance-tunes that he heard there. The concerts will begin with the First Symphony of Schumann, in B-flat major—the symphony of the in-coming spring, long unheard at Symphony Hall. The concerts will end with Debussy's "Iberia," first announced a week ago.

The second in the supplementary series of Symphony Concerts falls on Monday evening next in Symphony Hall, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting. He —and the orchestra—will play Brahms's Fourth Symphony in E-minor; Berlioz's Overture, "Roman Carnival"; the Piano-Concerto of Liszt in A-major, with Miss Nadia Reisenberg, a young Russian pianist, taking the solo-part.

The Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard, for a fourth concert in the current series, in Sanders Theater at Cambridge on Thursday evening next. The program traverses: the Concerto in D-major of Emanuel Bach; Borodin's Second Symphony; Sibelius's Seventh—each short; Sibelius's tone-poem, "Finlandia."

PENSION FUND CONCERT PROGRAM

Serge Koussevitzky will be heard in a new medium when he presents a popular program at the Boston Symphony pension fund concert. The program will include Rossini's "William Tell" overture, Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," orchestrated by Berlioz; "Valse Triste," by Sibelius; Johann Strauss' waltz, "Voices of Spring"; Tschai-Rovsky's "Nutcracker Suite," and the same composer's "1812" overture.

MONDAY SYMPHONY

Tomorrow evening the Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give the second concert of the Monday series. The soloist of the occasion will be Nadia Reisenberg, noted Russian pianist, who is to make her Boston debut in Liszt's concerto in A major.

N.Y. HERALD

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

The Boston Symphony Celebrates Thanksgiving in New York

First New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. At Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Overture to Egmont.....Beethoven
2. Symphony No. 3 (Eroica)....Beethoven
3. Suite from "The Love for Three Oranges" .....Prokofieff (First time in New York)
4. "Pines of Rome".....Respighi

LAST night, for the third time, Mr. Koussevitzky chose to make Thanksgiving more memorable for concert-going New Yorkers than even giblet sauce and six kinds of pie and the last of that ineffable pre-war Case could make it. For whatever you may choose to think or say of Mr. Koussevitzky, his concerts are not easy to forget.

* * *

You can hardly deny to this conductor the quality of Eventfulness. Some conductors have it—not many. It is not a quality that you can define. It is not even a quality that invariably calls forth praise in the observer. It may provoke exasperation and hot dislike. What it conspicuously does not provoke is boredom. Mr. Koussevitzky can be as irritating as a foreign body in the eye, as disappointing as Wall Street, as infuriating as the arrogance of what Whitman called "elected persons." He can be amazingly, extravagantly wrong—indeed, no conductor can be so wrong as Mr. Koussevitsky at his worst. But boring, tepid, Laodicean, he never is. He has the undecipherable gift.

The thing is beyond acquisition. No course of lessons under Mr. Stokowski or Mr. Mengelberg or Mr. Koussevitzky himself would impart it to you—willing as those masters might be to tell you all they know. As Mr. Dirk Foch once succinctly observed about conducting, "Either you can it, or you can it not." There is nothing more to be said.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky can it. He may have given drab and flaccid and impersonalized performances; but if he has, we were elsewhere at the time, and are prepared to disbelieve any reports to that effect. There are those who call him a sensationalist. Their legend would paint him as a sort of embodied "Surprise" Symphony, with no higher purpose than to startle the somnolent.

We do not believe it. Mr. Koussevitzky, as we perceive him, exudes sincerity. He strikes us as almost agonizingly genuine—a simple man, passionately and undissuadably convinced that Beethoven meant this and that by his "Eroica," that Schubert meant the "Unfinished" to go so and so, that Wagner (believe it or not) was more Russian than Rimsky-Korsakoff. We happen to think that Mr. Koussevitzky sometimes misconceives Wagner and maltreats Schubert. We are happy to think that he plays Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, to judge by his performance of it last night, with an intensity and a dramatic sweep and concentration that make its longueurs seem imaginary and heighten extraordinarily its tragic poignancy and its gigantic, elemental power.

He caused us, indeed, to ask ourselves last evening if this is not, after all, Beethoven at his most superb: if this Symphony is not the greatest of the Nine.

* * *

The supreme Beethoven, to be sure—Beethoven the seer and the prophet, the mystic with the fathomless gaze—is not in the symphonies at all, but in the quartets and certain of the sonatas. Yet the Beethoven who could bestride the world and shoulder the heavens and affright the stars, this figure half granite and half flame, this Titan who laments and laughs and exults with a hugeness more than human—this Beethoven, heartbreaking and terrible and jocund, speaks out of the "Eroica"; and last night Mr. Koussevitzky was his instrument and his eloquent tongue.

* * *

The suite of numbers extracted from Prokofieff's "Love for Three Oranges" recalled the production of the entertaining opera after Gozzi's fable which the Chicago Opera Company achieved here in 1922. We thought the work delightful then, an exhilarating blend of wit and fantasy and riant charm. Last night the music sounded empty and undistinguished, only mildly entertaining, even sentimental in the lyric number entitled "Le Prince et la Princesse," which was scarcely more than Mendelssohn à la mode. Thus do we live and learn!

Nor does Respighi's "Pini di Roma" resist any too successfully the gnawing of the temporal tooth. It is younger by four or five years than Prokofieff's opera, but it sounds a decade older. Perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky was weary after his mighty exertions over the "Eroica" (the intermission was interminable); but the four movements of the "Pini" did not come off as they did under Toscanini. The nocturne, so lusciously scored by Respighi, sounded more like an evening in Jamaica Plain than a moonlit night under the pines of the Janiculum; and the thunderous Finale, so overwhelming in its climax under the singular Italian, was quite comfortably tolerable last night.

But Mr. Koussevitzky's Boston Nightingale was easily the most dulcet that has sung in Carnegie Hall at any of the performances of Respighi's gramophonic tone poem.

NEW YORK WORLD
NOV 28 1926

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

The Boston Orchestra Again

Prokofieff's Ballet Suite "Chout," which Mr. Koussevitzky offered to his Saturday matinee audience at Carnegie Hall, has not, I think, the ingredients that make ballet music sufficiently important to survive its severance from the spectacle it was meant to accompany. More than any other musical form the ballet is committed to a definite program, and to offer it up on its own, without the visual accessories, is to elevate it to the plane of pure music. Very few pieces in that category have survived the test of the concert stage, especially among modern compositions. Stravinsky is the only contemporary whose ballets have justified a concert transplanting, and even "Petrouchka" loses something when it is divorced from its touching story.

The tale of Chout, the buffoon, to which Prokofieff wrote his music, is a broadly farcical, bizarre comedy. Chout evolves a scheme to get rich. When the seven buffoons who are coming to call on him arrive, Chout's wife will pretend she is dead. Chout will then slash her with his whip and bring her back to life. The seven buffoons will then offer to buy the miracle-working whip. This situation begets many farcical complications too long to be told here, but there is a comedy finish and Chout and his wife are made rich with the whip money plus a hundred rubles given them as a bribe by some other characters in the plot.

The drawback in this story for Mr. Prokofieff is that it contains no "heart" interest and consequently offers the composer no opportunity for emotional writing. A couple of minutes of tricky farcical music can be amusing, but a suite of it unrelieved by any deeper appeal seems pointless.

The "Chout" is cleverly made and Mr. Koussevitzky did wonders for it yesterday and induced the audience to give it a hand. But I doubt whether it will do more for the composer's reputation than the excerpts from his "Love for Three Oranges," played by the Bostonians last Thursday.

Mr. Roussel's ballet "Padmavati" seemed to me to be made of better stuff. Its idiom is less modern than the Prokofieff suite. It has lyric moments of sincerity, if not of the highest beauty, and leaves the listener with a desire to hear the whole opera.

Mozart's serenade "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Beethoven's C Minor Symphony formed the meat of yesterday's concert, both given notable renditions by the orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky. The conductor is not always sure about his Beethoven, but his performance of the "Fifth" was an imaginative and sincere exposition of the grandeur of that colossal work.

NEW YORK AMERICAN

NOV 28 1926

MODERNISTS IN MUSIC TREAT

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

Yesterday's matinee programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, was a fifty-fifty proposition between the moderns and the classicists.

Mozart's "Night Music" serenade for string orchestra opened the proceedings and Beethoven's fifth Symphony closed them. Between those two good old stand-bys came Roussel's suite from his opera-ballet "Padmavati;" and Prokofieff's suite from his ballet, "Chout" (The Buffoon).

It seems almost needless to state Mozart and Beethoven held their own valiantly (and some thought, conqueringly) with the newer creations of the French and Russian composers on the list.

At that, the modern music of the occasion was singularly tuneful. The Roussell Suite featured a decided strain of lyricism, while Prokofieff disported himself with jolly little dance strains, bits of frankly old-fashioned melody and harmonic twists designedly and successfully humorous.

Of the two, Prokofieff's utterance was more original and significant. He is an outstandingly talented composer in the modernistic camp, which harbors so many inexpressive followers.

Mozart's measures, while naive and slightly inocuous, nevertheless reflected the charm of simple thought and directness of statement. The Bostonians played the composition with appropriate delicacy and sprightliness.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, missed much of the elemental might and savage thrust in the opening movement of the Beethoven symphony, but he recaptured some of it in the final section, which ended the piece in a great burst of brilliance. The lovely slow part, and the eloquent Scherzo—the best that Beethoven ever wrote—must have satisfied every lover of the great German symphonist, for they were atmospheric and appealing in performance, with perfect adherence to style.

Koussevitzky, when all is said and done, seldom lays himself open to criticism when he conducts modernistic music. Perhaps it is because we are not so familiar with those works.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POST

NOV 29 1926

The Boston Symphony's First Matinee

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY followed the general pattern of his first evening performance of the local season in the program he made for the Boston Symphony's Saturday afternoon concert. He divided the time equally between classical and modern music, so that everybody should have been happy.

There were other reasons, however, for happiness than the variety of the offerings. It was a beautiful concert, with a somewhat eccentric conductor at his best, and his orchestra, which he has brought to a high degree of excellence, playing Mozart and Prokofieff with equal understanding and tone quality.

The Mozart number was the serenade for strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," a dainty and altogether charming piece, with a good deal of Sevres fragility about it. It was admirably conducted, and the response of the strings was so perfect that hours after one was still catching fragmentary echoes of the piece and enjoying them over again.

The moderns had their innings next, with a suite from Roussel's opera-ballet, "Padmavati," first. The program notes furnished the information that this ballet has had a magnificent production in Paris at the opera, but there is little in the bit that Mr. Koussevitzky gave us to justify any excitement about it from the standpoint of music. It echoes Stravinsky in many points and has a pseudo-Oriental and exotic quality about it that is not at all moving.

Several years ago the Neighborhood Playhouse did a curious and amusing ballet by Prokofieff called "Chout" which has lingered in the memory of this reporter. Mr. Koussevitzky played a suite from the same ballet for the first time in New York as his other modern offering. It was a brilliantly conducted and beautifully played composition, often dazzling in its orchestra color and bubbling with mad humor.

After a time spent amid its wild goings on, the Beethoven Fifth was like a return to an old familiar room from an exhibition of modern art—a high-ceilinged room, majestic and concealing great sorrow and great joy, all grown homely through long association. Mr. Koussevitzky dramatizes the classics without taking unpleasant liberties.

There was great enthusiasm over the Roussel and Prokofieff numbers from a large audience.

SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
DEC 12 1926

OF the two works on Negro themes Darker America was by far the best musically. It had moments of genuine feeling, which the audience was not slow to appreciate. On the other hand, the poem of Creation was quite moving.

Unfortunately, the words were made indistinguishable between the sounds provided by Louis Gruenberg and the mouthing by the Negro barytone, Julius Bledsoe, who revealed the same trait in Deep River, in which he played the part of the Voodoo king. There is this however, to be said for the two rival organizations, and that is, neither spared efforts in the presentation of their respective programs.

Serge Koussevitsky, with a chamber orchestra from the Boston Symphony conducted for the league, while Eugene Goossens conducted a similar ensemble from the New York Symphony. Of the two, Goossens showed the greater musical understanding. He is, indeed, of all the conductors, perhaps the best for this genre of music. But it takes more than good conducting to make combinations and successions of tones sound like music.

SYMPHONY TOMORROW

Tomorrow evening, at 8:15 in Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitsky conductor, will give the second [illegible] of its Monday evening [illegible]. The soloist of the occasion will be Nadia Reisenberg, a Russian pianist who, after unusually successful appearances in New York and elsewhere, will make her Boston debut. She will play Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in A major. The orchestral numbers will be Brahms's Symphony No. 4, and Berlioz's Overture, "Roman Carnival."

HERALD TRIBUNE, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1926

Boston Orchestra Plays Modern Music At Matinee Concert

Symphony, Under Koussevitsky's Baton, Also Offers Beethoven to Large Audience in Carnegie Hall

Beethoven and Prokofieff provided the chief features of yesterday's Boston Symphony matinee at Carnegie Hall, as they did at the Thursday evening concert of that now flourishing organization. Yesterday the German's C minor Symphony and the Russian's ballet suite, "Chout," were companioned by Mozart ("Eine Kleine Nachtmusik") and a suite derived from the opera-ballet, "Padmavati," by that contemporary Frenchman, Albert Roussel, who voyaged to the Orient as a naval officer in his youth and has never forgotten the experience.

Monsieur Roussel's "Padmadmavati" excerpts were heard for the first time in New oYrk, although the program modestly refrained from mentioning this fact. "Padmadmavati" is based on an Indian subject, contrived for the stage by that accomplished Orientalist, Louis Laloy. The work was produced at the Paris Opera in June, 1923; but Roussel had composed the music some time before—he had begun it, in fact, as early as 1913, was interrupted by the war, and finished it in 1918.

This score shows its age. Monsieur Roussel has since written music of pith and pungency—as his impressive B-flat Symphony. But the excerpts from "Padmavati" played yesterday have little character. They are already faded, out of date; for it is characteristic of the music of the last decade that it ages with horrifying rapidity, unless it happens to be the product of a genuinely creative mind. And there are not many genuinely creative minds operating in the world of music today. Monsieur Roussel's tepid Orientalism is pretty enough, but much of it is tame and dull; and the snatches from Wagner and Debussy and Ravel do not help it greatly.

Prokofieff's "Chout" was given at the Neighborhood Playhouse, New York, in the spring of 1924. It was produced in Paris by the Ballet Russe three years before that. The music played yesterday was new in its form as a concert suite. This music, too, has faded. It owes much to Stravinsky—the Stravinsky of "Petrouchka"; and one listened to Prokofieff yesterday with a new respect for his fellow countryman. Stravinsky is rather a wilted pansy these days, and his stupendous vogue is a thing of the past; nevertheless, he is still able to make most of his contemporaries look like very distant approximations of the real thing.

Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was easily the high point of the concert. He read it, as he did the "Eroica" Thursday evening, with an intensity of personal conviction that made one, for the moment, quite willing to believe that this was the authentic Beethoven—if there is any such animal. He played the slow movement with especial beauty, and with enough of that "touching grace" which Berlioz found in the music to make it seem less smug than it sometimes does at the hands of conductors not so vitalizing as Mr. Koussevitzky.

There was a crowded and applausive house.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give its eighth regular pair of concerts in Symphony hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 10 and 11; the second concert of the Monday evening series, on Dec. 13 at 8:15 o'clock, and the annual [illegible] pension fund concert on the day after Christmas, Sunday afternoon, Dec. 26.

This week's pair of concerts includes a concerto of Philip Emanuel Bach, orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg, and the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius. This, the latest score of the finished composer, will then have its first Boston performance. The closing number will be a suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird."

The soloist at the Monday evening concert will be Nadia Reisenberg, the noted Russian pianist, whose career in America in the last five years has placed her as one of the most talented of the younger generation of pianists. Miss Reisenberg will appear with this orchestra in Liszt's Second Concerto in A major. Mr. Koussevitzky will open the program with Berlioz's Roman Carnival Overture, and close it with the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor.

PENSION FUND CONCERT PROGRAM

Serge Koussevitzky will be heard in a new medium when he presents a popular program at the Boston Symphony pension fund concert. The program will include Rossini's "William Tell" overture, Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," orchestrated by Berlioz; "Valse Triste," by Sibelius; Johann Strauss' waltz, "Voices of Spring"; Tschai-Rovsky's "Nutcracker Suite," and the same composer's "1812" overture.

MONDAY SYMPHONY

Tomorrow evening the Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give the second concert of the Monday series. The soloist of the occasion will be Nadia Reisenberg, noted Russian pianist, who is to make her Boston debut in Liszt's concerto in A major.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Orchestral

TRANS. Dec 11

AT the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, Mr. Darius Milhaud, Parisian composer of the left wing, will be guest. He will be heard both as composer and pianist—in his fantasia, "Carnival et Aix," drawn from a ballet, "Salad." The music falls into short divisions, each labelled with the name of a personage in the Italian commedia dell' arte. One, however, takes title, "Souvenir de Rio," since Mr. Milhaud is fond of recalling his days in Brazil and the dance-tunes that he heard there. The concerts will begin with the First Symphony of Schumann, in B-flat major—the symphony of the in-coming spring, long unheard at Symphony Hall. The concerts will end with Debussy's "Iberia," first announced a week ago.

The second in the supplementary series of Symphony Concerts falls on Monday evening next in Symphony Hall, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting. He —and the orchestra—will play Brahms's Fourth Symphony in E-minor; Berlioz's Overture, "Roman Carnival"; the Piano-Concerto of Liszt in A-major, with Miss Nadia Reisenberg, a young Russian pianist, taking the solo-part.

The Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard, for a fourth concert in the current series, in Sanders Theater at Cambridge on Thursday evening next. The program traverses: the Concerto in D-major of Emanuel Bach; Borodin's Second Symphony; Sibelius's Seventh—each short; Sibelius's tone-poem, "Finlandia."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
NOV 29 1926

The League of Composers

Only one thing is missing to make the frequent demonstrations of the League of Composers as interesting shows as the concerts of modernistic music given in Paris—the presence in the audience of an opposition. It is entirely plausible to assume that the music written for these festivals was meant to make a certain number of people uncomfortable. Such music must be understood and cherished only by the smallest minority of the most serious musical thinkers, and to have more than a thousand people assemble to hear it and evince unanimous appreciation proves that there is something radically the matter with it. In Paris, though, they arrange these things better. There you can always count on a proper attendance of persons who hiss. When these hiss the enraged enthusiasts applaud, and on days when things run smoothly the two factions may even come to blows, upon which the police interfere and the concert is voted a complete success.

This pugnacious opposition element was absent at Saturday night's league concert at the Town Hall. It turned out to be a good show anyway, with all the people in town who "do things" milling around in the crowded lobby in the intermissions explaining to each other the profundities of the Bartok village scenes, especially written for the league, the Anton Webern five pieces for chamber orchestra, the Hans Krasa symphony for the same combination with a voice, and the Negro sermon for voice (Mr. Julius Bledsoe) and eight instruments by our own Louis Gruenberg, which made up the league's program for last night. Said a well-known middle-aged millionaire, who had once married and divorced a personable diva to a lady in mannish costume:

"The extraordinary thing about the five pieces of Webern is their integrity. That's what distinguishes the so-called classics from modern music—integrity."

The lady:

"If you have that you have everything, haven't you?"

A charming young woman to a critic:

"Of course I can't say why I like those five pieces, but I like them—as noises, you know. Something about them, you know . . ."

An old lady in a young evening gown, bleached hair and a black ribbon low on her forehead to a seedy young man with a delicate face and disheveled hair:

"Slavs like Stravinsky and Bartok probe to the very essence of marriage, don't they? Bartok gives you marriage in a nutshell—in one sentence—when the quartet sings 'A rose, I am still a rose; when I have a husband I shall no longer be one.' What could be more profound? . . ."

It only remains for me to add that the Bartok village scenes took a long time to perform, while the Webern pieces, on the other hand, took a very short time, each piece varying in length from six to thirty-six measures; the Kras symphony took not an unreasonable interval, but the Gruenberg sermon simply ate up time. I should like to give an idea of all this, but, unfortunately, I couldn't make head or tail of any of them.

Mr. Koussevitzky, fresh from his afternoon labors with the Boston Orchestra, conducted all of the numbers dexterously, and the other participants did their share admirably, I presume. To what end?

* * * *

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Tomorrow evening at Symphony Hall in the second concert of the "Monday series," Mr. Koussevitzky will lead the Boston orchestra in Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, and, with Nadia Reisenberg as soloist, Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in A major.

* * * *

At the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of this week Darius Milhaud, one of the better known members of the now disbanded Parisian "Six," will play the piano-part in a fantasy, "Le Carnaval d'Aix," which he has drawn from his ballet "Salade." Debussy's "Iberia," and the First Symphony of Schumann also stand on the programme.

* * * *

For the Pension Fund Concert at Symphony Hall two weeks from today Mr. Koussevitzky, departing from his Bostonian precedent, will present a genuinely "popular" programme—in effect a winter "Pop" concert although without the accompaniment of food, drink or "smokes." Rossini's Overture to "William Tell;" Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" as orchestrated by Berlioz; the "Valse Triste" of Sibelius; the "Nutcracker" suite of Tchaikovsky; Strauss' waltz, "Voices of Spring;" and, for brilliant conclusion, Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture, with an auxiliary brass band playing off stage, will make this programme.

N. Y. EVENING SUN
NOV 29 1926

Modern Works Given in Concert

International Guild, League of Composers and Boston Orchestra Offer Late Compositions.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The modernists of music stormed the town on Saturday and held the captured citadel yesterday. It all began when Serge Koussevitzky came over from Boston, bringing his orchestra and his recollections of triumphs in Paris where the modernists wax fat. The League of Composers had seized the opportunity to secure him and some of his players for their concert in the Town Hall on Saturday night.

"Village Scenes," composed by Bela Bartok for the league, five pieces for chamber orchestra by Anton von Webern, Hans Krasa's symphony for chamber orchestra and voice and Louis Gruenberg's "The Creation," a negro sermon for voice and eight instruments, the poem by James Weldon Johnson, were the revelations of the evening. The last two numbers were performed twice in order that denser minds might perchance perceive on repetition the mysterious meanings which escaped them at first.

Julius Bledsoe, the negro barytone, furnished the voice for Mr. Gruenberg's music and undoubtedly intensified the dramatic power of a work possessing a considerable measure of intrinsic merit. Weldon Johnson's poem is idiomatic, characteristic and charged with the passionate feeling of the negro. Mr. Gruenberg's music provided a good background. It proved to be well planned in color and instrumentation to reflect the moods set forth in the poem. The performance of this work aroused the audience to demonstrations of enthusiastic approval. Much of the excitement was certainly caused by the methods of Mr. Bledsoe, but after all they were precisely what a proper interpretation required. If such a piece were presented in the familiar concert manner its entire character would evaporate.

The Bartok composition, which enlisted the services of the Brahms Quartet, cannot be said to have brought great glory to the league. It revealed all the self-conscious preparation of mere effect for which most of the modernists are noted. It is seldom, indeed, that anything flows from their pens with apparent freedom of fancy and the joy of creation. Too frequently they do not seem to like what they are doing and their mental horizon is crowded with dark clouds split by angry rays of light. One of the charms of Bartok's early quartet was its spontaneity, but he occasionally depicted the boorishness of his villagers by means of rhythmic and instrumental devices as old as village musicians. Only the harmonies were of recent date and some of them were too sweet to gain the unqualified approval of true iconoclasts.

There is nothing to say about the Webern pieces. They meant nothing except another exhibition of determination to make hearers "sit up." They were very short. The Krasa symphony was too long. All that it said could have been made known in three minutes. Miss Nancy Hitch of the Brahms Quartet, sang the voice part with patient endurance and remarkable devotion to the elusive pitch.

WEEK-END MUSIC; MODERNISTS ANEW; LEGINSKA RESUMES

Transcript Nov 22

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY REPEATS HIS EXCURSION

Tranquil Audience — Confirmed Impressions and, May Be, a Moral—The Philharmonic Orchestra Heard Again—Through Half the Concert to No Purpose, Through the Other in Unexpected Merit—Korngold the Fluent

UNDER Mr. Koussevitzky's fourfold excursion into the modernists, the audience of Saturday at the Symphony Concert sat as tranquil as that of Friday. It seemed rather better disposed toward Mr. Tansman's dancing sorceress, who orchestrally was a witch with a face of brass. Per contra, it received less joyously Mr. Walton's lusty, exuberant overture. Like its predecessor it bore patiently with the linear and convulsive Krasa; next tittered amusedly over Webern's "Five Orchestral Pieces" in almost as many minutes. Of that composer mystical and visionary, solitary and haunted, draining mind and spirit in the quest of ideal musical sound, it gained not a notion. The prolific Tansman is able to stand on his own legs till "success," as it usually does, turns for a while his way. Mr. Walton deserved his day's sport and an honest flush of satisfaction. He also can take care of himself. In turn, Krasa's Pastoral and March may come and go as signs of the times; but those seventy-odd measures of Webern trouble the listening mind, touch the hearing heart, from neither may be soon or easily ousted. In one of Balzac's tales, there is a cracked nobleman who seeks the ineffable beauty of the human voice. Webern pursues a similar beauty—into orchestral tone distilled and concentrated. Our time breeds many sorts of composers; to each his own virtue; but among them is no comparable idealist.

Some of us also, honestly and reasonably deprecating this modernist music, forget that it less signifies in itself than as a reconnoitering of the tonal future. Intrinsically, Bartok's rhythms and sonorities may be as ugly as to many, a week ago, they seemed. If the hearer chooses, Tansman's music may be only sounding brass and hard-smitten cymbals. Or Krasa's stripped and sometimes convulsive line the acme of musical sterility and irritability conjoined. Let Webern pass—again if the hearer will—as futile hunter of the unattainable. No one in his perceptive senses hails these composers as new masters or their work as sealed masterpieces. Yet men of genius are not unknown in the composition of music. As they have risen, so will they rise again. It has also been their custom to fuse, as in a white-hot crucible, much that has gone impotent and ugly in times of experiment and transition. And from those heats, finally, outpours music of imperative power and unquestioned beauty. A generation or two hence these modernists may be only the historians' record—of the forerunners of an acknowledged master. Then in the Elysian Fields, those that neither closed their ears nor stayed their pens may call—with a smile—for wine.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
NOV 29 1926

58

The Gospel of the New.

Preachments Pleasant and Unpleasant Make Busy the Week-End.

By Pitts Sanborn.

Mr. Philip Hale, sage of Boylston street and Arbiter Musicae of the Hub, recently opined in print that "one unfamiliar piece is enough for one concert." Luckily for Mr. Hale he did not spend this week-end in Manhattan concert rooms. Otherwise he would have encountered programs devoted rigorously and exclusively to the unfamiliar.

The visiting Boston Symphony, at its session of Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, offered only two pieces that could be denominated unfamiliar, filling out its program with such well known matter as Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, But th e League of Composers Saturday night, in the Town Hall, and the International Composers' Guild last night in Aeolian Hall hewed sternly to their line of nothing but the new.

The less unfamiliar of the Boston Symphony's non-classic offerings was a suite from Serge Prokofieff's ballet "Chout." Many New Yorkers must have witnessed performances of this work in Europe, and a diminished version of it has been given at the Neighborhood Playhouse. So probably there were in Saturday's audience a number of listeners who found the music familiar. Those who did not, it seems safe to say, will scarcely want to. However, one must not forget that believers in the plenary inspiration of the vivacious Prokofieff do exist even here. The other "unfamiliar" work was an excerpt from the opera-ballet "Padmavati," of Albert Roussel, who, as nearly as any man that ever lived to put down notes on paper, is a sure-fire bore.

The League began its concert with the "Village Scenes" ("Wedding," "Cradle Song," "Peasant Dance") which Bela Bartok, of Hungary, perhaps under the spell of Stravinsky's "Village Wedding," composed expressly for it this year. A chamber orchestra from the Boston Symphony, led by Mr. Koussevitzky, and the Brahms Quartet of ladies performed this composition. There followed "Five Pieces for Chamber Orchestra" (op. 10) by Anton von Webern, Viennese and disciple of the redoubtable Arnold Schoenberg, which Mr. Koussevitzky and his men disposed of unassisted. Then Hans Krasa, of Prague, asked attention for a "Symphony for Chamber Orchestra and Voice" (the voice is used in the third and last movement, which sets a poem by Arthur Rimbaud). Besides the Bostonians, this work enlisted the services of Miss Nancy Hitch, of the Brahms Quartet.

There followed "The Creation," being "A Negro Sermon for Voice and Eight Instruments," op. 23, 1924, by Louis [illegible] based upon words by James

SYMPHONY IN IMPROMPTU PROGRAM

By MOSES SMITH.

The program of this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra carries not one item previously announced. For some reason Mr. Koussevitzky sprang one of his quick-change acts on the audience, but the result was not the less enjoyable.

Alfred Cortot, the French pianist, was the first soloist of the year, playing Beethoven's E-Flat Concerto. The ensemble between solo-instrument and accompanying orchestra was excellent, and indicated a marked improvement in Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting of such pieces since he came here over two years ago. Cortot himself was brilliant as French pianists are generally; and his playing was always clean. A little too clean, perhaps, with not enough of the more melting piano tone.

The performance of the Concerto was given great applause, yet the most interesting part of the concert was Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," which Mr. Koussevitzky introduced here in Ravel's orchestral dress two years ago. On second hearing these pictures sound very much like the creations of a musical genius. Nothing trite, nothing obvious, except for the last item. Needless to say, Ravels orchestration retains the interest for its ingenuity and brilliance.

The performance by the orchestra and conductor was remarkable. In such music Mr. Koussevitzky is in his element. But the men seemed to outdo themselves with the playing of a score by no means simple. There seems no denying that the conductor has a virtuoso orchestra at his disposal. They certainly sounded like virtuosi yesterday.

A performance of Beethoven's Third "Leonore" overture, which was given so dramatically at the Tuesday afternoon concert, opened yesterday's program.

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

N.Y. Times Nov 26

From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.

League of Composers.

The predominating feature of the concert given by the League of Composers last night in Town Hall, and one which resulted in resounding applause and even cheers from an uncommonly brilliant and representative audience, was Louis Gruenberg's setting of "The Creation," a "negro sermon," the verse by the negro poet, James Weldon Johnson, the performance by Julius Bledsoe, the negro baritone of this city, and Serge Koussevitsky, as conductor of a group of players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra. How far the effect of this work would have gone, what impression it would have made, lacking the racial and pictorial quality of the poem, and the dramatic "inspirational" delivery of Mr. Bledsoe, it is not easy to say. At the time, under the circumstances, it is a pleasure to say the work was a sweeping success, and the only one of the concert. It is a pity that it could not be repeated, as were compositions of Webern and Krasa which figured on the same program, but if it had been repeated another baritone would have been required, or Mr. Bledsoe would not have risen to sing again for many a day, since the music is extremely taxing to the voice and of a range greater than lay advantageously for this singer.

For the present let it be enough that Gruenberg, in this setting of "The Creation," has provided an instrumental background which is a decided advantage to the vocal part when it does not overpower it, and at times gives his singer a melodic line which "puts over" the text in effective fashion. But much, very much, depends on the singer. As to the substance of the music, its real material, one is not so sure. More is attempted than, for instance, in Mr. Gruenberg's "Daniel jazz," and something different, too, but there appears to be a good deal of pulling up by the boot-straps when Mr. Bledsoe has slowly retreated from stage while the orchestra plays the postlude, and one goes back mentally over the rather long and tortuous path that has been orally trodden in company with the composer.

There is much pounding of the feet and blackening of the sky in Mr. Gruenberg's orchestra, and there are mellifluous hints of jazz with the verse about the sprouting grass and flowing streams, and there are accumulating rhythms in negroid style toward the end of the piece. But it is a rather long sermon as one considers it in cold blood, and it is very possible that the splendid verse, recited by Mr. Bledsoe, would have been more effective than with the music. As for Mr. Bledsoe himself, he showed exceptional intelligence, and histrionic as well as vocal capacities in his performance. He could not be expected to do beautiful singing throughout, because the scoring and the character of the voice part make that impossible. But he made the composer's meaning clear, and made it felt, with true interpretive power. The composer, had he been present, would surely have thanked him.

The "Village Scenes" of Bela Bartok, for female voices and orchestral ensemble, are the result of a special commission from the League of Composers, and were performed for the first time anywhere. This music obviously is Bartok of the latest vintage. Like other late vintages, it is sharper and far less mellow than older brews. Would the composition have been thought of if Stravinsky's "Les Noces" had not preceded it? There is more than a surface analogy between the two compositions, and we do not find in the Bartok of the "Village Scenes" a composer who nearly equals, in genuineness of speech, feeling, color and spontaneity, the Bartok of the early quartet heard at the league's first concert of the season.

Two novelties, at least for New York, were Anton Webern's "Five Orchestral Pieces," op. 10, a commendably short composition, and Hans Krasa's "Symphony for Chamber Orchestra," which is just as bad, and much longer. The music of Webern is palpably imitation Schönberg, and the effort is to out-Schönberg in conciseness and fewness of penstrokes. At last the strokes become so few that they can have no relation for the listener, and the music loses even its skeleton. Now, if audiences and critics were Cuviers who could reconstruct from a single bone the entire anatomy of an animal, they might be able from this sketch of a sketch to reconstruct the musical architecture that Webern had in mind. As it is, the music is meaningless, labored, anemic, and without an ounce of creative impulse—an example of how curiously an artist can reason himself into anything, any procedure, however fantastic, and completely lose sight of a real objective. Krasa's composition is more elaborate by far; it sounds louder, and somewhat more varied. But if this is living music, then black is yellow; and if this review in turn, is critical shortsightedness, let circumstances to come make the most of it!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
NOV 29 1926

The League of Composers

Only one thing is missing to make the frequent demonstrations of the League of Composers as interesting shows as the concerts of modernistic music given in Paris—the presence in the audience of an opposition. It is entirely plausible to assume that the music written for these festivals was meant to make a certain number of people uncomfortable. Such music must be understood and cherished only by the smallest minority of the most serious musical thinkers, and to have more than a thousand people assemble to hear it and evince unanimous appreciation proves that there is something radically the matter with it. In Paris, though, they arrange these things better. There you can always count on a proper attendance of persons who hiss. When these hiss the enraged enthusiasts applaud, and on days when things run smoothly the two factions may even come to blows, upon which the police interfere and the concert is voted a complete success.

This pugnacious opposition element was absent at Saturday night's league concert at the Town Hall. It turned out to be a good show anyway, with all the people in town who "do things" milling around in the crowded lobby in the intermissions explaining to each other the profundities of the Bartok village scenes, especially written for the league, the Anton Webern five pieces for chamber orchestra, the Hans Krasa symphony for the same combination with a voice, and the Negro sermon for voice (Mr. Julius Bledsoe) and eight instruments by our own Louis Gruenberg, which made up the league's program for last night. Said a well-known middle-aged millionaire, who had once married and divorced a personable diva to a lady in mannish costume:

"The extraordinary thing about the five pieces of Webern is their integrity. That's what distinguishes the so-called classics from modern music—integrity."

The lady:

"If you have that you have everything, haven't you?"

A charming young woman to a critic:

"Of course I can't say why I like those five pieces, but I like them—as noises, you know. Something about them, you know . . ."

An old lady in a young evening gown, bleached hair and a black ribbon low on her forehead to a seedy young man with a delicate face and disheveled hair:

"Slavs like Stravinsky and Bartok probe to the very essence of marriage, don't they? Bartok gives you marriage in a nutshell—in one sentence—when the quartet sings 'A rose, I am still a rose; when I have a husband I shall no longer be one.' What could be more profound? . . ."

It only remains for me to add that the Bartok village scenes took a long time to perform, while the Webern pieces, on the other hand, took a very short time, each piece varying in length from six to thirty-six measures; the Kras symphony took not an unreasonable interval, but the Gruenberg sermon simply ate up time. I should like to give an idea of all this, but, unfortunately, I couldn't make head or tail of any of them.

Mr. Koussevitzky, fresh from his afternoon labors with the Boston Orchestra, conducted all of the numbers dexterously, and the other participants did their share admirably, I presume. To what end?

* * * *

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Tomorrow evening at Symphony Hall, in the second concert of the "Monday series," Mr. Koussevitzky will lead the Boston orchestra in Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, and, with Nadia Reisenberg as soloist, Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in A major.

* * * *

At the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of this week Darius Milhaud, one of the better known members of the now disbanded Parisian "Six," will play the piano-part in a fantasy, "Le Carnaval d'Aix," which he has drawn from his ballet "Salade." Debussy's "Iberia," and the First Symphony of Schumann also stand on the programme.

* * * *

For the Pension Fund Concert at Symphony Hall two weeks from today Mr. Koussevitzky, departing from his Bostonian precedent, will present a genuinely "popular" programme—in effect a winter "Pop" concert although without the accompaniment of food, drink or "smokes." Rossini's Overture to "William Tell;" Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" as orchestrated by Berlioz; the "Valse Triste" of Sibelius; the "Nutcracker" suite of Tchaikovsky; Strauss' waltz, "Voices of Spring;" and, for brilliant conclusion, Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture, with an auxiliary brass band playing off stage, will make this programme.

N. Y. EVENING SUN
NOV 29 1926

Modern Works Given in Concert

International Guild, League of Composers and Boston Orchestra Offer Late Compositions.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The modernists of music stormed the town on Saturday and held the captured citadel yesterday. It all began when Serge Koussevitzky came over from Boston, bringing his orchestra and his recollections of triumphs in Paris where the modernists wax fat. The League of Composers had seized the opportunity to secure him and some of his players for their concert in the Town Hall on Saturday night.

"Village Scenes," composed by Bela Bartok for the league, five pieces for chamber orchestra by Anton von Webern, Hans Krasa's symphony for chamber orchestra and voice and Louis Gruenberg's "The Creation," a negro sermon for voice and eight instruments, the poem by James Weldon Johnson, were the revelations of the evening. The last two numbers were performed twice in order that denser minds might perchance perceive on repetition the mysterious meanings which escaped them at first.

Julius Bledsoe, the negro barytone, furnished the voice for Mr. Gruenberg's music and undoubtedly intensified the dramatic power of a work possessing a considerable measure of intrinsic merit. Weldon Johnson's poem is idiomatic, characteristic and charged with the passionate feeling of the negro. Mr. Gruenberg's music provided a good background. It proved to be well planned in color and instrumentation to reflect the moods set forth in the poem. The performance of this work aroused the audience to demonstrations of enthusiastic approval. Much of the excitement was certainly caused by the methods of Mr. Bledsoe, but after all they were precisely what a proper interpretation required. If such a piece were presented in the familiar concert manner its entire character would evaporate.

The Bartok composition, which enlisted the services of the Brahms Quartet, cannot be said to have brought great glory to the league. It revealed all the self-conscious preparation of mere effect for which most of the modernists are noted. It is seldom, indeed, that anything flows from their pens with apparent freedom of fancy and the joy of creation. Too frequently they do not seem to like what they are doing and their mental horizon is crowded with dark clouds split by angry rays of light. One of the charms of Bartok's early quartet was its spontaneity, but he occasionally depicted the boorishness of his villagers by means of rhythmic and instrumental devices as old as village musicians. Only the harmonies were of recent date and some of them were too sweet to gain the unqualified approval of true iconoclasts.

There is nothing to say about the Webern pieces. They meant nothing except another exhibition of determination to make hearers "sit up." They were very short. The Krasa symphony was too long. All that it said could have been made known in three minutes. Miss Nancy Hitch of the Brahms Quartet, sang the voice part with patient endurance and remarkable devotion to the elusive pitch.

WEEK-END MUSIC; MODERNISTS ANEW; LEGINSKA RESUMES

TRANSCRIPT—NOV 22

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY REPEATS HIS EXCURSION

Tranquil Audience — Confirmed Impressions and, May Be, a Moral—The Philharmonic Orchestra Heard Again—Through Half the Concert to No Purpose, Through the Other in Unexpected Merit—Korngold the Fluent

UNDER Mr. Koussevitzky's fourfold excursion into the modernists, the audience of Saturday at the Symphony Concert sat as tranquil as that of Friday. It seemed rather better disposed toward Mr. Tansman's dancing sorceress, who orchestrally was a witch with a face of brass. Per contra, it received less joyously Mr. Walton's lusty, exuberant overture. Like its predecessor it bore patiently with the linear and convulsive Krasa; next tittered amusedly over Webern's "Five Orchestral Pieces" in almost as many minutes. Of that composer mystical and visionary, solitary and haunted, draining mind and spirit in the quest of ideal musical sound, it gained not a notion. The prolific Tansman is able to stand on his own legs till "success," as it usually does, turns for a while his way. Mr. Walton deserved his day's sport and an honest flush of satisfaction. He also can take care of himself. In turn, Krasa's Pastoral and March may come and go as signs of the times; but those seventy-odd measures of Webern trouble the listening mind, touch the hearing heart, from neither may be soon or easily ousted. In one of Balzac's tales, there is a cracked nobleman who seeks the ineffable beauty of the human voice. Webern pursues a similar beauty—into orchestral tone distilled and concentrated. Our time breeds many sorts of composers; to each his own virtue; but among them is no comparable idealist.

Some of us also, honestly and reasonably deprecating this modernist music, forget that it less signifies in itself than as a reconnoitering of the tonal future. Intrinsically, Bartok's rhythms and sonorities may be as ugly as to many, a week ago, they seemed. If the hearer chooses, Tansman's music may be only sounding brass and hard-smitten cymbals. Or Krasa's stripped and sometimes convulsive line the acme of musical sterility and irritability conjoined. Let Webern pass—again if the hearer will—as futile hunter of the unattainable. No one in his perceptive senses hails these composers as new masters or their work as sealed masterpieces. Yet men of genius are not unknown in the composition of music. As they have risen, so will they rise again. It has also been their custom to fuse, as in a white-hot crucible, much that has gone impotent and ugly in times of experiment and transition. And from those heats, finally, outpours music of imperative power and unquestioned beauty. A generation or two hence these modernists may be only the historians' record—of the forerunners of an acknowledged master. Then in the Elysian Fields, those that neither closed their ears nor stayed their pens may call—with a smile—for wine.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
NOV 29 1926

58

The Gospel of the New.

Preachments Pleasant and Unpleasant Make Busy the Week-End.

By Pitts Sanborn.

Mr. Philip Hale, sage of Boylston street and Arbiter Musicae of the Hub, recently opined in print that "one unfamiliar piece is enough for one concert." Luckily for Mr. Hale he did not spend this week-end in Manhattan concert rooms. Otherwise he would have encountered programs devoted rigorously and exclusively to the unfamiliar.

The visiting Boston Symphony, at its session of Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, offered only two pieces that could be denominated unfamiliar, filling out its program with such well known matter as Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, But th e League of Composers Saturday night, in the Town Hall, and the International Composers' Guild last night in Aeolian Hall hewed sternly to their line of nothing but the new.

The less unfamiliar of the Boston Symphony's non-classic offerings was a suite from Serge Prokofieff's ballet "Chout." Many New Yorkers must have witnessed performances of this work in Europe, and a diminished version of it has been given at the Neighborhood Playhouse. So probably there were in Saturday's audience a number of listeners who found the music familiar. Those who did not, it seems safe to say, will scarcely want to. However, one must not forget that believers in the plenary inspiration of the vivacious Prokofieff do exist even here. The other "unfamiliar" work was an excerpt from the opera-ballet "Padmavati," of Albert Roussel, who, as nearly as any man that ever lived to put down notes on paper, is a sure-fire bore.

The League began its concert with the "Village Scenes" ("Wedding," "Cradle Song," "Peasant Dance") which Bela Bartok, of Hungary, perhaps under the spell of Stravinsky's "Village Wedding," composed expressly for it this year. A chamber orchestra from the Boston Symphony, led by Mr. Koussevitzky, and the Brahms Quartet of ladies performed this composition. There followed "Five Pieces for Chamber Orchestra" (op. 10) by Anton von Webern, Viennese and disciple of the redoubtable Arnold Schoenberg, which Mr. Koussevitzky and his men disposed of unassisted. Then Hans Krasa, of Prague, asked attention for a "Symphony for Chamber Orchestra and Voice" (the voice is used in the third and last movement, which sets a poem by Arthur Rimbaud). Besides the Bostonians, this work enlisted the services of Miss Nancy Hitch, of the Brahms Quartet.

There followed "The Creation," being "A Negro Sermon for Voice and Eight Instruments," op. 23, 1924, by Louis Gruenberg, based upon words by James Weldon Johnson.

SYMPHONY IN IMPROMPTU PROGRAM

By MOSES SMITH.

The program of this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra carries not one item previously announced. For some reason Mr. Koussevitzky sprang one of his quick-change acts on the audience, but the result was not the less enjoyable.

Alfred Cortot, the French pianist, was the first soloist of the year, playing Beethoven's E-Flat Concerto. The ensemble between solo-instrument and accompanying orchestra was excellent, and indicated a marked improvement in Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting of such pieces since he came here over two years ago. Cortot himself was brilliant as French pianists are generally; and his playing was always clean. A little too clean, perhaps, with not enough of the more melting piano tone.

The performance of the Concerto was given great applause, yet the most interesting part of the concert was Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," which Mr. Koussevitzky introduced here in Ravel's orchestral dress two years ago. On second hearing these pictures sound very much like the creations of a musical genius. Nothing trite, nothing obvious, except for the last item. Needless to say, Ravels orchestration retains the interest for its ingenuity and brilliance.

The performance by the orchestra and conductor was remarkable. In such music Mr. Koussevitzky is in his element. But the men seemed to outdo themselves with the playing of a score by no means simple. There seems no denying that the conductor has a virtuoso orchestra at his disposal. They certainly sounded like virtuosi yesterday.

A performance of Beethoven's Third "Leonore" overture, which was given so dramatically at the Tuesday afternoon concert, opened yesterday's program.

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

N.Y. Times Nov 26

From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.

League of Composers.

The predominating feature of the concert given by the League of Composers last night in Town Hall, and one which resulted in resounding applause and even cheers from an uncommonly brilliant and representative audience, was Louis Gruenberg's setting of "The Creation," a "negro sermon," the verse by the negro poet, James Weldon Johnson, the performance by Julius Bledsoe, the negro baritone of this city, and Serge Koussevitsky, as conductor of a group of players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra. How far the effect of this work would have gone, what impression it would have made, lacking the racial and pictorial quality of the poem, and the dramatic "inspirational" delivery of Mr. Bledsoe, it is not easy to say. At the time, under the circumstances, it is a pleasure to say the work was a sweeping success, and the only one of the concert. It is a pity that it could not be repeated, as were compositions of Webern and Krasa which figured on the same program, but if it had been repeated another baritone would have been required, or Mr. Bledsoe would not have risen to sing again for many a day, since the music is extremely taxing to the voice and of a range greater than lay advantageously for this singer.

For the present let it be enough that Gruenberg, in this setting of "The Creation," has provided an instrumental background which is a decided advantage to the vocal part when it does not overpower it, and at times gives his singer a melodic line which "puts over" the text in effective fashion. But much, very much, depends on the singer. As to the substance of the music, its real material, one is not so sure. More is attempted than, for instance, in Mr. Gruenberg's "Daniel jazz," and something different, too, but there appears to be a good deal of pulling up by the boot-straps when Mr. Bledsoe has slowly retreated from stage while the orchestra plays the postlude, and one goes back mentally over the rather long and tortuous path that has been orally trodden in company with the composer.

There is much pounding of the feet and blackening of the sky in Mr. Gruenberg's orchestra, and there are mellifluous hints of jazz with the verse about the sprouting grass and flowing streams, and there are accumulating rhythms in negroid style toward the end of the piece. But it is a rather long sermon as one considers it in cold blood, and it is very possible that the splendid verse, recited by Mr. Bledsoe, would have been more effective than with the music. As for Mr. Bledsoe himself, he showed exceptional intelligence, and histrionic as well as vocal capacities in his performance. He could not be expected to do beautiful singing throughout, because the scoring and the character of the voice part make that impossible. But he made the composer's meaning clear, and made it felt, with true interpretive power. The composer, had he been present, would surely have thanked him.

The "Village Scenes" of Bela Bartok, for female voices and orchestral ensemble, are the result of a special commission from the League of Composers, and were performed for the first time anywhere. This music obviously is Bartok of the latest vintage. Like other late vintages, it is sharper and far less mellow than older brews. Would the composition have been thought of if Stravinsky's "Les Noces" had not preceded it? There is more than a surface analogy between the two compositions, and we do not find in the Bartok of the "Village Scenes" a composer who nearly equals, in genuineness of speech, feeling, color and spontaneity, the Bartok of the early quartet heard at the league's first concert of the season.

Two novelties, at least for New York, were Anton Webern's "Five Orchestral Pieces," op. 10, a commendably short composition, and Hans Krasa's "Symphony for Chamber Orchestra," which is just as bad, and much longer. The music of Webern is palpably imitation Schönberg, and the effort is to out-Schönberg in conciseness and fewness of penstrokes. At last the strokes become so few that they can have no relation for the listener, and the music loses even its skeleton. Now, if audiences and critics were Cuviers who could reconstruct from a single bone the entire anatomy of an animal, they might be able from this sketch of a sketch to reconstruct the musical architecture that Webern had in mind. As it is, the music is meaningless, labored, anemic, and without an ounce of creative impulse—an example of how curiously an artist can reason himself into anything, any procedure, however fantastic, and completely lose sight of a real objective. Krasa's composition is more elaborate by far; it sounds louder, and somewhat more varied. But if this is living music, then black is yellow; and if this review in turn, is critical shortsightedness, let circumstances to come make the most of it!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
NOV 29 1926

The League of Composers

Only one thing is missing to make the frequent demonstrations of the League of Composers as interesting shows as the concerts of modernistic music given in Paris—the presence in the audience of an opposition. It is entirely plausible to assume that the music written for these festivals was meant to make a certain number of people uncomfortable. Such music must be understood and cherished only by the smallest minority of the most serious musical thinkers, and to have more than a thousand people assemble to hear it and evince unanimous appreciation proves that there is something radically the matter with it. In Paris, though, they arrange these things better. There you can always count on a proper attendance of persons who hiss. When these hiss the enraged enthusiasts applaud, and on days when things run smoothly the two factions may even come to blows, upon which the police interfere and the concert is voted a complete success.

This pugnacious opposition element was absent at Saturday night's league concert at the Town Hall. It turned out to be a good show anyway, with all the people in town who "do things" milling around in the crowded lobby in the intermissions explaining to each other the profundities of the Bartok village scenes, especially written for the league, the Anton Webern five pieces for chamber orchestra, the Hans Krasa symphony for the same combination with a voice, and the Negro sermon for voice (Mr. Julius Bledsoe) and eight instruments by our own Louis Gruenberg, which made up the league's program for last night. Said a well-known middle-aged millionaire, who had once married and divorced a personable diva to a lady in mannish costume:

"The extraordinary thing about the five pieces of Webern is their integrity. That's what distinguishes the so-called classics from modern music—integrity."

The lady:

"If you have that you have everything, haven't you?"

A charming young woman to a critic:

"Of course I can't say why I like those five pieces, but I like them—as noises, you know. Something about them, you know . . ."

An old lady in a young evening gown, bleached hair and a black ribbon low on her forehead to a seedy young man with a delicate face and disheveled hair:

"Slavs like Stravinsky and Bartok probe to the very essence of marriage, don't they? Bartok gives you marriage in a nutshell—in one sentence—when the quartet sings 'A rose, I am still a rose; when I have a husband I shall no longer be one.' What could be more profound? . . ."

It only remains for me to add that the Bartok village scenes took a long time to perform, while the Webern pieces, on the other hand, took a very short time, each piece varying in length from six to thirty-six measures; the Kras symphony took not an unreasonable interval, but the Gruenberg sermon simply ate up time. I should like to give an idea of all this, but, unfortunately, I couldn't make head or tail of any of them.

Mr. Koussevitzky, fresh from his afternoon labors with the Boston Orchestra, conducted all of the numbers dexterously, and the other participants did their share admirably, I presume. To what end?

* * * *

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Tomorrow evening at Symphony Hall, in the second concert of the "Monday series," Mr. Koussevitzky will lead the Boston orchestra in Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, and, with Nadia Reisenberg as soloist, Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in A major.

* * * *

At the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of this week Darius Milhaud, one of the better known members of the now disbanded Parisian "Six," will play the piano-part in a fantasy, "Le Carnaval d'Aix," which he has drawn from his ballet "Salade." Debussy's "Iberia," and the First Symphony of Schumann also stand on the programme.

* * * *

For the Pension Fund Concert at Symphony Hall two weeks from today Mr. Koussevitzky, departing from his Bostonian precedent, will present a genuinely "popular" programme—in effect a winter "Pop" concert although without the accompaniment of food, drink or "smokes." Rossini's Overture to "William Tell;" Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" as orchestrated by Berlioz; the "Valse Triste" of Sibelius; the "Nutcracker" suite of Tchaikovsky; Strauss' waltz, "Voices of Spring;" and for brilliant conclusion, Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture, with an auxiliary brass band playing off stage, will make this programme.

N. Y. EVENING SUN
NOV 29 1926

Modern Works Given in Concert

International Guild, League of Composers and Boston Orchestra Offer Late Compositions.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The modernists of music stormed the town on Saturday and held the captured citadel yesterday. It all began when Serge Koussevitzky came over from Boston, bringing his orchestra and his recollections of triumphs in Paris where the modernists wax fat. The League of Composers had seized the opportunity to secure him and some of his players for their concert in the Town Hall on Saturday night.

"Village Scenes," composed by Bela Bartok for the league, five pieces for chamber orchestra by Anton von Webern, Hans Krasa's symphony for chamber orchestra and voice and Louis Gruenberg's "The Creation," a negro sermon for voice and eight instruments, the poem by James Weldon Johnson, were the revelations of the evening. The last two numbers were performed twice in order that denser minds might perchance perceive on repetition the mysterious meanings which escaped them at first.

Julius Bledsoe, the negro barytone, furnished the voice for Mr. Gruenberg's music and undoubtedly intensified the dramatic power of a work possessing a considerable measure of intrinsic merit. Weldon Johnson's poem is idiomatic, characteristic and charged with the passionate feeling of the negro. Mr. Gruenberg's music provided a good background. It proved to be well planned in color and instrumentation to reflect the moods set forth in the poem. The performance of this work aroused the audience to demonstrations of enthusiastic approval. Much of the excitement was certainly caused by the methods of Mr. Bledsoe, but after all they were precisely what a proper interpretation required. If such a piece were presented in the familiar concert manner its entire character would evaporate.

The Bartok composition, which enlisted the services of the Brahms Quartet, cannot be said to have brought great glory to the league. It revealed all the self-conscious preparation of mere effect for which most of the modernists are noted. It is seldom, indeed, that anything flows from their pens with apparent freedom of fancy and the joy of creation. Too frequently they do not seem to like what they are doing and their mental horizon is crowded with dark clouds split by angry rays of light. One of the charms of Bartok's early quartet was its spontaneity, but he occasionally depicted the boorishness of his villagers by means of rhythmic and instrumental devices as old as village musicians. Only the harmonies were of recent date and some of them were too sweet to gain the unqualified approval of true iconoclasts.

There is nothing to say about the Webern pieces. They meant nothing except another exhibition of determination to make hearers "sit up." They were very short. The Krasa symphony was too long. All that it said could have been made known in three minutes. Miss Nancy Hitch of the Brahms Quartet, sang the voice part with patient endurance and remarkable devotion to the elusive pitch.

WEEK-END MUSIC; MODERNISTS ANEW; LEGINSKA RESUMES

TRANSCRIPT—NOV 22

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY REPEATS HIS EXCURSION

Tranquil Audience — Confirmed Impressions and, May Be, a Moral—The Philharmonic Orchestra Heard Again—Through Half the Concert to No Purpose, Through the Other in Unexpected Merit—Korngold the Fluent

UNDER Mr. Koussevitzky's fourfold excursion into the modernists, the audience of Saturday at the Symphony Concert sat as tranquil as that of Friday. It seemed rather better disposed toward Mr. Tansman's dancing sorceress, who orchestrally was a witch with a face of brass. Per contra, it received less joyously Mr. Walton's lusty, exuberant overture. Like its predecessor it bore patiently with the linear and convulsive Krasa; next tittered amusedly over Webern's "Five Orchestral Pieces" in almost as many minutes. Of that composer mystical and visionary, solitary and haunted, draining mind and spirit in the quest of ideal musical sound, it gained not a notion. The prolific Tansman is able to stand on his own legs till "success," as it usually does, turns for a while his way. Mr. Walton deserved his day's sport and an honest flush of satisfaction. He also can take care of himself. In turn, Krasa's Pastoral and March may come and go as signs of the times; but those seventy-odd measures of Webern trouble the listening mind, touch the hearing heart, from neither may be soon or easily ousted. In one of Balzac's tales, there is a cracked nobleman who seeks the ineffable beauty of the human voice. Webern pursues a similar beauty—into orchestral tone distilled and concentrated. Our time breeds many sorts of composers; to each his own virtue; but among them is no comparable idealist.

Some of us also, honestly and reasonably deprecating this modernist music, forget that it less signifies in itself than as a reconnoitering of the tonal future. Intrinsically, Bartok's rhythms and sonorities may be as ugly as to many, a week ago, they seemed. If the hearer chooses, Tansman's music may be only sounding brass and hard-smitten cymbals. Or Krasa's stripped and sometimes convulsive line the acme of musical sterility and irritability conjoined. Let Webern pass—again if the hearer will—as futile hunter of the unattainable. No one in his perceptive senses hails these composers as new masters or their work as sealed masterpieces. Yet men of genius are not unknown in the composition of music. As they have risen, so will they rise again. It has also been their custom to fuse, as in a white-hot crucible, much that has gone impotent and ugly in times of experiment and transition. And from those heats, finally, outpours music of imperative power and unquestioned beauty. A generation or two hence these modernists may be only the historians' record—of the forerunners of an acknowledged master. Then in the Elysian Fields, those that neither closed their ears nor stayed their pens may call —with a smile—for wine.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
NOV 29 1926

58

The Gospel of the New.

Preachments Pleasant and Unpleasant Make Busy the Week-End.

By Pitts Sanborn.

Mr. Philip Hale, sage of Boylston street and Arbiter Musicae of the Hub, recently opined in print that "one unfamiliar piece is enough for one concert." Luckily for Mr. Hale he did not spend this week-end in Manhattan concert rooms. Otherwise he would have encountered programs devoted rigorously and exclusively to the unfamiliar.

The visiting Boston Symphony, at its session of Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, offered only two pieces that could be denominated unfamiliar, filling out its program with such well known matter as Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, But th e League of Composers Saturday night, in the Town Hall, and the International Composers' Guild last night in Aeolian Hall hewed sternly to their line of nothing but the new.

The less unfamiliar of the Boston Symphony's non-classic offerings was a suite from Serge Prokofieff's ballet "Chout." Many New Yorkers must have witnessed performances of this work in Europe, and a diminished version of it has been given at the Neighborhood Playhouse. So probably there were in Saturday's audience a number of listeners who found the music familiar. Those who did not, it seems safe to say, will scarcely want to. However, one must not forget that believers in the plenary inspiration of the vivacious Prokofieff do exist even here. The other "unfamiliar" work was an excerpt from the opera-ballet "Padmavati," of Albert Roussel, who, as nearly as any man that ever lived to put down notes on paper, is a sure-fire bore.

The League began its concert with the "Village Scenes" ("Wedding," "Cradle Song," "Peasant Dance") which Bela Bartok, of Hungary, perhaps under the spell of Stravinsky's "Village Wedding," composed expressly for it this year. A chamber orchestra from the Boston Symphony, led by Mr. Koussevitzky, and the Brahms Quartet of ladies performed this composition. There followed "Five Pieces for Chamber Orchestra" (op. 10) by Anton von Webern, Viennese and disciple of the redoubtable Arnold Schoenberg, which Mr. Koussevitzky and his men disposed of unassisted. Then Hans Krasa, of Prague, asked attention for a "Symphony for Chamber Orchestra and Voice" (the voice is used in the third and last movement, which sets a poem by Arthur Rimbaud). Besides the Bostonians, this work enlisted the services of Miss Nancy Hitch, of the Brahms Quartet.

There followed "The Creation," being "A Negro Sermon for Voice and Eight Instruments," op. 23, 1924, by Louis Gruenberg, based upon words by James Weldon Johnson. The soloist here was Julius Bledsoe, the colored barytone. [illegible] solemnities had been duly [illegible]ch, the program called for [illegible]e Webern and the Bartok

ASKS BETTER PICTURES

"There [illegible] American [illegible] com[illegible]

By [illegible]

The progr[illegible]'s concerts of the [illegible]phony Orchestra carries [illegible]e item previously announced. For some reason Mr. Koussevitzky sprang one of his quick-change acts on the audience, but the result was not the less enjoyable.

Alfred Cortot, the French pianist, was the first soloist of the year, playing Beethoven's E-Flat Concerto. The ensemble between solo-instrument and accompanying orchestra was excellent, and indicated a marked improvement in Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting of such pieces since he came here over two years ago. Cortot himself was brilliant as French pianists are generally; and his playing was always clean. A little too clean, perhaps, with not enough of the more melting piano tone.

The performance of the Concerto was given great applause, yet the most interesting part of the concert was Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," which Mr. Koussevitzky introduced here in Ravel's orchestral dress two years ago. On second hearing these pictures sound very much like the creations of a musical genius. Nothing trite, nothing obvious, except for the last item. Needless to say, Ravels orchestration retains the interest for its ingenuity and brilliance.

The performance by the orchestra and conductor was remarkable. In such music Mr. Koussevitzky is in his element. But the men seemed to outdo themselves with the playing of a score by no means simple. There seems no denying that the conductor has a virtuoso orchestra at his disposal. They certainly sounded like virtuosi yesterday.

A performance of Beethoven's Third "Leonore" overture, which was given so dramatically at the Tuesday afternoon concert, opened yesterday's program.

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

N.Y. Times Nov 26

From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.

League of Composers.

The predominating feature of the concert given by the League of Composers last night in Town Hall, and one which resulted in resounding applause and even cheers from an uncommonly brilliant and representative audience, was Louis Gruenberg's setting of "The Creation," a "negro sermon," the verse by the negro poet, James Weldon Johnson, the performance by Julius Bledsoe, the negro baritone of this city, and Serge Koussevitsky, as conductor of a group of players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra. How far the effect of this work would have gone, what impression it would have made, lacking the racial and pictorial quality of the poem, and the dramatic "inspirational" delivery of Mr. Bledsoe, it is not easy to say. At the time, under the circumstances, it is a pleasure to say the work was a sweeping success, and the only one of the concert. It is a pity that it could not be repeated, as were compositions of Webern and Krasa which figured on the same program, but if it had been repeated another baritone would have been required, or Mr. Bledsoe would not have risen to sing again for many a day, since the music is extremely taxing to the voice and of a range greater than lay advantageously for this singer.

For the present let it be enough that Gruenberg, in this setting of "The Creation," has provided an instrumental background which is a decided advantage to the vocal part when it does not overpower it, and at times gives his singer a melodic line which "puts over" the text in effective fashion. But much, very much, depends on the singer. As to the substance of the music, its real material, one is not so sure. More is attempted than, for instance, in Mr. Gruenberg's "Daniel jazz," and something different, too, but there appears to be a good deal of pulling up by the boot-straps when Mr. Bledsoe has slowly retreated from stage while the orchestra plays the postlude, and one goes back mentally over the rather long and tortuous path that has been orally trodden in company with the composer.

There is much pounding of the feet and blackening of the sky in Mr. Gruenberg's orchestra, and there are mellifluous hints of jazz with the verse about the sprouting grass and flowing streams, and there are accumulating rhythms in negroid style toward the end of the piece. But it is a rather long sermon as one considers it in cold blood, and it is very possible that the splendid verse, recited by Mr. Bledsoe, would have been more effective than with the music. As for Mr. Bledsoe himself, he showed exceptional intelligence, and histrionic as well as vocal capacities in his performance. He could not be expected to do beautiful singing throughout, because the scoring and the character of the voice part make that impossible. But he made the composer's meaning clear, and made it felt, with true interpretive power. The composer, had he been present, would surely have thanked him.

The "Village Scenes" of Bela Bartok, for female voices and orchestral ensemble, are the result of a special commission from the League of Composers, and were performed for the first time anywhere. This music obviously is Bartok of the latest vintage. Like other late vintages, it is sharper and far less mellow than older brews. Would the composition have been thought of if Stravinsky's "Les Noces" had not preceded it? There is more than a surface analogy between the two compositions, and we do not find in the Bartok of the "Village Scenes" a composer who nearly equals, in genuineness of speech, feeling, color and spontaneity, the Bartok of the early quartet heard at the league's first concert of the season.

Two novelties, at least for New York, were Anton Webern's "Five Orchestral Pieces," op. 10, a commendably short composition, and Hans Krasa's "Symphony for Chamber Orchestra," which is just as bad, and much longer. The music of Webern is palpably imitation Schönberg, and the effort is to out-Schönberg in conciseness and fewness of penstrokes. At last the strokes become so few that they can have no relation for the listener, and the music loses even its skeleton. Now, if audiences and critics were Cuviers who could reconstruct from a single bone the entire anatomy of an animal, they might be able from this sketch of a sketch to reconstruct the musical architecture that Webern had in mind. As it is, the music is meaningless, labored, anemic, and without an ounce of creative impulse—an example of how curiously an artist can reason himself into anything, any procedure, however fantastic, and completely lose sight of a real objective. Krasa's composition is more elaborate by far; it sounds louder, and somewhat more varied. But if this is living music, then black is yellow; and if this review in turn, is critical shortsightedness, let circumstances to come make the most of it!

INFORMATION OBSCURED

MORE MODERNISTS: ARDORS OF WALTON, IDEALS OF WEBERN

TANSMAN ROUTINED; KRASA FOR ETCHER

Mr. Koussevitzky Opens the Hamper from Zurich Amid Few Perturbations—The Exuberant Englishry of "Portsmouth Point"—A Visionary's Music Double-Distilled and Subtilized—Terra Firma of Beethoven

TRANSCRIPT — NOV 20

YOU never can tell. Mr. Koussevitzky's second matinée of modernists seemed more formidable than the first. He had distilled it, so to say, from the multifold brew of the most recent Festival of Contemporary Music and there remained four ingredients—Tansman, Krasa, Webern, Walton; whereas the week before he had merely set out the heady wine of Bartok and the spiced liqueur of Prokofiev operatic. The Hungarian drink left dazed most that absorbed it; while the Russian prompted them to gay chortlings and wavings of the glad arm. No such consequences descended yesterday afternoon upon the company at Symphony Hall. "The Dance of the Sorceress" from Tansman's ballet, "The Garden of Paradise" did not differ materially from a dozen other specimens of a familiar kind. Mr. Walton's overture, "Portsmouth Point," stirred enough applause to make it a "repertory piece" for the remainder of the season; while the means were sturdy tunes, lively rhythms and syncopation, full-bodied tonal color, lusty progress, hearty speech, unflagging high spirits — for once in a way unlabored making of twentieth-century music. In turn, Webern was too brief for ennui and too delicate for discomfort. True, Krasa, epitomized in a Pastoral and a March from a Symphony for Small Orchestra, brought trying moments; but what is to be expected from a tone-poet that adds to them a setting of Rimbaud's "Les Chercheuses de Poux?" Fortunately, Mr. Koussevitzky, taking cue from Zurich, omitted this exercise in tone-poetry; while the program-book—"the war being over"—shied at translation. Consequently Krasa escaped lightly, quite forgotten as soon as Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was well under way.

For the youngest of us Tansman's dance was not in the least "devastating" or—to recall the next preceding word—even "intriguing." It began in nervous, skipping rhythms, sharp-set harmonies, warm instrumental colors, a pervading voice of tuneful tumult. An intermezzo hinted through harp and clarinet at a sensuous rather than a baleful witch. The finale returned to the tuneful tumult, variously multiplied it, conducted it to full-throated close. Most of the young lions of the musical hour can do this sort of thing. Tansman neither rises above nor falls below the usual standard. His distinction (if any) in this "Dance of the Sorcerers" is to slip now and again into ancient and orthodox devices like canons. Possibly he dreams of a ballet fabricated from the classical forms. Berg did as much with an opera—the notorious "Wozzeck."

In turn, Mr. Walton, writing his Overture, "Portsmouth Point," is "as English as they make 'em," which virtue once was, and now again is, excellent passport into good musical society. Upon a day, it appears, he looked upon a print of Rowlandson picturing that quayside what time the British were clearing the seas of Napoleon's fleets and French-borne commerce. He beheld bustling departures, exuberant farewells, gusty and lusty pleasures unhidden from the passing eye, rowdy gayeties, onlookers in the taverns, ships at anchorage—all put to paper with Hogarth's candors and Rowlandson's own sense of hearty caricature, an English scene, as some would say in England's palmiest day, before the descent of the Victorian eclipse. Forthwith, Mr. Walton had a mind to music and made it. Full-bodied, full-blooded melodies give it birth, singing by themselves, when the composer so chooses, in outspoken British fashion. They are Mr. Walton's own, but they had Elizabethan forbears. Purcell knew the like when he was "musicking" plays. Mr. George Frideric Handel, there is reason to believe, heard such tunes gladly. Through the eighteenth century, they flooded into ballad-opera.

So armed Mr. Walton keeps his overture in lively ferment. At will and need he crosses and re-crosses rhythms; from sheer exuberance cuts in with syncopations. Off a full palette of primary colors he lays on harmonies; free-handed and full, flings about the instrumental voices missing never a shot, exhilarating even when he makes a trick-play. Spontaneity and surety race along together; rough now and again is the surface thick upon occasion is the voice—what would you after Rowlandson? But there is no mistaking the pervading lustihood. John Bull is not easy to picture as composer; but through "Portsmouth Point," Mr. Walton is working in his image. Expeditiously—to offset the waning "Pini di Roma"—Mr. Koussevitzky has equipped himself with a tour de force of robust gayety.

"Eroica" Symphony to judge by his present performance of it with an intensity and a dramatic sweep and concentration that make its longueurs seem imaginary and heighten extraordinarily its tragic poignancy and its gigantic, elemental power.

The Times was as well-disposed to the orchestra, saying: "Every year the Boston orchestra develops by leaps and bounds. Not only has it regained the resiliency and the glow of the old tone, but it is more flexible and expressive under Mr. Koussevitzky's hand than it has been under any conductor since the days of Karl Muck. The various performances last evening were of virtuoso quality from the first note to the last. When Nikisch came to conduct the Boston Orchestra he remarked on the drilling it had received from Wilhelm Gericke, then added that he had only 'to sensitize' the band. Mr. Koussevitzky, with the aid of Pierre Monteux before him, is rapidly restoring to the Boston Symphony its long and honorable heritage, and is 'sensitizing' it. The concert yesterday served impressive notice of the fact."

H. T. P.

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

TIMES — NOV 28

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conductor, displayed its virtuosity and its admirable tonal qualities yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall in several different ways, but in none more significant than the opening performance, "Eine Kliene Nachtmusik," by Mozart. Passages from Albert Roussel's opera-ballet, "Padmavati," and some stupendous grotesquerie from Prokofieff's ballet-suite, "Chout," displayed the orchestra more brilliantly, but none of these compositions made a greater demand upon the sheerly beautiful qualities of the band, and the sensitiveness, as well as brilliancy, which it now attains, than Mozart's gay, charming and infinitely delicate music. This music tested the soloists and the different choirs of the orchestra, as well as the control and the taste of the conductor, and found them all more than adequate to the situation.

There was a clarity and fineness of line particularly required, and seldom granted in such measure, by this divertissement. In rapid passages, pianissimo, the whole division of first violins played as softly and unanimously as if they had been a single instrument, and the loveliness of coloring throughout was worthy of the best traditions of the orchestra. Again, as on the previous Thursday evening, Mr. Koussevitsky, rather unexpectedly, triumped as an interpreter of classics, and the triumph of yesterday afternoon, if more modest in the tonal and emotional dimensions than that of the previous concerts, was not less pronounced or less conducive to the glory of himself and his players.

There is always a reason for everything in this world, and therefore there is a reason, presumably a logical one, why Albert Roussel's opera ballet, "Padmavati," should have been given a sumptuous production by the Paris Opera in 1923. But it is hard to discover this reason by listening to the performance of fragments of the score. The sections heard yesterday are forced, uninspired, ugly, and one hears the drums of Stravinsky's finale of "Sacre du Printemps," and the bassoon that chants the lullaby in the same composer's music to "Oiseau de feu." It is empty and striving music from a composer who has done better.

The feature of this concert, from the standpoint of the modernist, was certainly the suite from Prokofieff's "Chout." This ballet was performed at the Grand Street Theatre—we believe for the first time in America—two seasons ago. The action was difficult for the uninformed to decipher. There was a small orchestra and little opportunity to get a real impression of the music. The story of the ballet is ironic and madly nonsensical, and space will not be taken to narrate it here. Enough to remark that the spirit of the story has been captured by the composer, who is wantonly farcical, whose laughter is impudent and side-splitting. One Rabelaisianism after another, and at the end a chord which sticks its fingers to its nose at an astounded audience. You hear Prokofieff say, with a leer, "Once upon a time," but not as you heard Strauss say it in the tender introduction of his "Eulenspiegel." Far from it! Here is the grimace, the mockery, but also the whole-hearted laughter, the torrential vitality of the enfant terrible of modern Russian music.

These pieces are written with a mastery just as clear, just as pronounced and certain of itself, as the complete recklessness of mood conveyed. Anything could happen in a waggish, Gargantuan world, and many of these things do happen in Prokofieff's orchestra. For us this music, from a composer who writes almost too quickly and abundantly, is considerably superior in distinction and force of execution to the excerpts from "The Love for Three Oranges," heard on Thursday from the same conductor and orchestra. The "Chout" music seems to us more truly Prokofieff and less Rimsky-Korsakoff. The orchestral performance was as joyous and extravagant a display of virtuosity as we remember for some time back, and the music found much favor with the audience.

Mr. Koussevitsky concluded with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

The Boston Symphony Celebrates Thanksgiving in New York

N.Y. HERALD-TRIBUNE NOV 26

First New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. At Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Overture to Egmont.....Beethoven
2. Symphony No. 3 (Eroica)....Beethoven
3. Suite from "The Love for Three Oranges" .....Prokofieff (First time in New York)
4. "Pines of Rome".....Respighi

LAST night, for the third time, Mr. Koussevitzky chose to make Thanksgiving more memorable for concert-going New Yorkers than even giblet sauce and six kinds of pie and the last of that ineffable pre-war Case could make it. For whatever you may choose to think or say of Mr. Koussevitzky, his concerts are not easy to forget.

* * *

You can hardly deny to this conductor the quality of Eventfulness. Some conductors have it—not many. It is not a quality that you can define. It is not even a quality that invariably calls forth praise in the observer. It may provoke exasperation and hot dislike. What it conspicuously does not provoke is boredom. Mr. Koussevitzky can be as irritating as a foreign body in the eye, as disappointing as Wall Street, as infuriating as the arrogance of what Whitman called "elected persons." He can be amazingly, extravagantly wrong—indeed, no conductor can be so wrong as Mr. Koussevitsky at his worst. But boring, tepid, Laodicean, he never is. He has the undecipherable gift.

The thing is beyond acquisition. No course of lessons under Mr. Stokowski or Mr. Mengelberg or Mr. Koussevitzky himself would impart it to you—willing as those masters might be to tell you all they know. As Mr. Dirk Foch once succinctly observed about conducting, "Either you can it, or you can it not." There is nothing more to be said.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky can it. He may have given drab and flaccid and impersonalized performances; but if he has, we were elsewhere at the time, and are prepared to disbelieve any reports to that effect. There are those who call him a sensationalist. Their legend would paint him as a sort of embodied "Surprise" Symphony, with no higher purpose than to startle the somnolent.

We do not believe it. Mr. Koussevitzky, as we perceive him, exudes sincerity. He strikes us as almost agonizingly genuine—a simple man, passionately and undissuadably convinced that Beethoven meant this and that by his "Eroica," that Schubert meant the "Unfinished" to go so and so, that Wagner (believe it or not) was more Russian than Rimsky-Korsakoff. We happen to think that Mr. Koussevitzky sometimes misconceives Wagner and maltreats Schubert. We also happen to think that he plays Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, to judge by his performance of it last night, with an intensity and a dramatic sweep and concentration that make its longueurs seem imaginary and heighten extraordinarily its tragic poignancy and its gigantic, elemental power.

He caused us, indeed, to ask ourselves last evening if this is not, after all, Beethoven at his most superb: if this Symphony is not the greatest of the Nine.

* * *

The supreme Beethoven, to be sure—Beethoven the seer and the prophet, the mystic with the fathomless gaze—is not in the symphonies at all, but in the quartets and certain of the sonatas. Yet the Beethoven who could bestride the world and shoulder the heavens and affright the stars, this figure half granite and half flame, this Titan who laments and laughs and exults with a hugeness more than human—this Beethoven, heartbreaking and terrible and jocund, speaks out of the "Eroica"; and last night Mr. Koussevitzky was his instrument and his eloquent tongue.

* * *

The suite of numbers extracted from Prokofieff's "Love for Three Oranges" recalled the production of the entertaining opera after Gozzi's fable which the Chicago Opera Company achieved here in 1922. We thought the work delightful then, an exhilarating blend of wit and fantasy and riant charm. Last night the music sounded empty and undistinguished, only mildly entertaining, even sentimental in the lyric number entitled "Le Prince et la Princesse," which was scarcely more than Mendelssohn à la mode. Thus do we live and learn!

Nor does Respighi's "Pini di Roma" resist any too successfully the gnawing of the temporal tooth. It is younger by four or five years than Prokofieff's opera, but it sounds a decade older. Perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky was weary after his mighty exertions over the "Eroica" (the intermission was interminable); but the four movements of the "Pini" did not come off as they did under Toscanini. The nocturne, so lusciously scored by Respighi, sounded more like an evening in Jamaica Plain than a moonlit night under the pines of the Janiculum; and the thunderous Finale, so overwhelming in its climax under the singular Italian, was quite comfortably tolerable last night.

But Mr. Koussevitzky's Boston Nightingale was easily the most dulcet that has sung in Carnegie Hall at any of the performances of Respighi's gramophonic tone poem.

MUSIC

MONITOR — DEC 9

In the Young P...

Debussy..... ....."Little Suite
In a Boat
Procession
Liadov.....Music Box
Chabrier.....Rhapsody "Espana"

The music chosen was all conducive to interest on the part of the youthful listeners. And despite the grownups scattered here and there through the bright groups of youngsters the concert was entirely and completely for the school children who had come from all parts of Greater Boston. Where can any lover of music find a more inspiring sight than the crowds of children pouring through every door of Symphony Hall to hear the splendid orchestra play? Group after group came, some with parents, many with teachers, until every seat was filled with the children who in 10 years will be an important part of the musical public of America.

Nimble-witted children respond actively and quickly to the stimulus of the orchestral music. They follow their programs with eager attentiveness. They scan the instruments of the players curiously. They ask names of this instrument or that. A piece much applauded and finally encored, as was Liadov's delightful "Music Box" yesterday, is recognized with pleasure as the opening measure announces a repetition.

Those who respond more slowly to the musical stimuli are equally important for us. They need more careful guidance. To them, the printed program is not always comprehensible, and they tend to confuse its progress. One wondered yesterday if the placing of a number or a title on the platform at the beginning of each work might not add appreciably to the intelligent pleasure of the children. Admittedly this is a device of the Pops concerts, but there exists so little formality about the young people's concerts that such departure from custom would seem permissible and worthwhile.

SIBELIUS IS PLAYED AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

Jan Sibelius, the lone man of the North, who has been a much-neglected composer at Symphony Hall during the last few years, was featured at yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

The great Finnish composer's Seventh Symphony was played for the first time in Boston. At least this listener was very much disappointed. The symphony lacks the ruggedness, the marked individuality of Sibelius' other works that have been previously heard here. Sibelius has hitherto been noted as a musician who goes his own way, unmindful of the drifts and currents of music about him. Yesterday, however, the music sounded for the most part very much like the futile strivings in which his modernist contemporaries are wont to indulge.

"Finlandia," the well-known symphonic poem of the same composer, was given a brilliant performance by the orchestra. In fact, Mr. Koussevitzky seemed determined to follow the lead of other conductors, who have made of the work a show-piece.

Musically the outstanding feature was the beautiful playing of Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" Suite. Mr. Koussevitzky was a sympathetic and understanding conductor of this music, which grows in beauty as one hears it more. None of the modernists has a surer hand in treatment for orchestra than Stravinsky, as he shows in the marvellous introduction to the suite and the finale. And that he could write music of simple loveliness is indicated by the berceuse.

A concerto for orchestra in D major, by C. P. E. Bach, opened the program. This piece, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, was introduced here two years ago by Mr. Koussevitzky. Yesterday's performance served to display the rich tone of the strings.

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

N.Y. World — Nov 29

The League of Composers

Only one thing is missing to make the frequent demonstrations of the League of Composers as interesting shows as the concerts of modernistic music given in Paris—the presence in the audience of an opposition. It is entirely plausible to assume that the music written for these festivals was meant to make a certain number of people uncomfortable. Such music must be understood and cherished only by the smallest minority of the most serious musical thinkers, and to have more than a thousand people assemble to hear it and evince unanimous appreciation proves that there is something radically the matter with it. In Paris, though, they arrange these things better. There you can always count on a proper attendance of persons who hiss. When these hiss the enraged enthusiasts applaud, and on days when things run smoothly the two factions may even come to blows, upon which the police interfere and the concert is voted a complete success.

This pugnacious opposition element was absent at Saturday night's league concert at the Town Hall. It turned out to be a good show anyway, with all the people in town who "do things" milling around in the crowded lobby in the intermissions explaining to each other the profundities of the Bartok village scenes, especially written for the league, the Anton Webern five pieces for chamber orchestra, the Hans Krasa symphony for the same combination with a voice, and the Negro sermon for voice (Mr. Julius Bledsoe) and eight instruments by our own Louis Gruenberg, which made up the league's program for last night. Said a well-known middle-aged millionaire, who had once married and divorced a personable diva to a lady in mannish costume:

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

(Continued From Eleventh Page)

"The extraordinary thing about the five pieces of Webern is their integrity. That's what distinguishes the so-called classics from modern music—integrity."

The lady:

"If you have that you have everything, haven't you?"

A charming young woman to a critic:

"Of course I can't say why I like those five pieces, but I like them—as noises, you know. Something about them, you know . . ."

An old lady in a young evening gown, bleached hair and a black ribbon low on her forehead to a seedy young man with a delicate face and disheveled hair:

"Slavs like Stravinsky and Bartok probe to the very essence of marriage, don't they? Bartok gives you marriage in a nutshell—in one sentence—when the quartet sings 'A rose, I am still a rose; when I have a husband I shall no longer be one.' What could be more profound? . . ."

It only remains for me to add that the Bartok village scenes took a long time to perform, while the Webern pieces, on the other hand, took a very short time, each piece varying in length from six to thirty-six measures; the Kras symphony took not an unreasonable interval, but the Gruenberg sermon simply ate up time. I should like to give an idea of all this, but, unfortunately, I couldn't make head or tail of any of them.

Mr. Koussevitzky, fresh from his afternoon labors with the Boston Orchestra, conducted all of the numbers dexterously, and the other participants did their share admirably, I presume. To what end?

Seventh Symphony of Sibelius in Boston

MONITOR — DEC 1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the eighth program of the Friday afternoon series of concerts in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program.

Bach, C. P. E.
Concerto for Orchestra in D major (Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg)
Stravinsky..Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu"
Sibelius.....Symphony No. 7
Sibelius..."Finlandia" Symphonic Poem

The symphony by Sibelius which is written in one movement, received its first Boston performance yesterday. Sibelius has not drawn on an orchestra of great size. Neither has

Koussevitzky in New York

CHAMBER-CONCERT; MR. KOUSSEVITZKY; MODERNISTS AGAIN

TRANSCRIPT Nov 20

HIS EVENING WITH THE LEAGUE OF COMPOSERS

Annual Incident in New York—Setting and Audience—Webern Afresh—Krasa Supplemented—New Pieces from Bartok and Mr. Gruenberg—Praises for Conductor and Orchestra in Regular Course at Manhattan

ONCE a year, by present custom, Mr. Koussevitzky conducts in America at a concert outside the schedule of the Boston Orchestra. The League of Composers, one of the brotherhoods in New York for the fostering of modernist music, provides him with the occasion. The Bostonian trustees accord him the necessary permission. From his own forces he assembles a chamber-orchestra; with the League concocts a program of modernity unrelaxed. Sometimes a chosen piece is suitable also to Symphony Hall and may be prepared and tested in Boston. Otherwise, it is made ready in the scanty leisure of the November journey of the orchestra to New York. On Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky and the full band do their usual office at Carnegie Hall. On Saturday evening the conductor and a chosen thirty or forty minister in a smaller concert-room to the League and its public. A year ago these arrangements served the turn. This autumn there was only to renew them.

Town Hall—an amusing name in New York—was the auditorium last Saturday, broad, shallow, ivory-white, well suited to the performance of music "of small dimensions." Upon a sufficient stage, before a pleasing tapestry of Sophonisba and Massinissa sat the orchestra, in one piece no more than twelve or fifteen strong, in another as many as thirty-seven. From the first and the second "desks" of the several Bostonian choirs the players came, clustered loosely about Mr. Koussevitzky, who plainly enjoyed a closer contact than Symphony Hall permits with both orchestra and audience. Evidently conductor and men had the best will in the world; yet as clearly a week of unbroken work had tired them. What the "Five Pieces" of Webern and the Chamber-Symphony of Krasa might have gained under performance in a small concert-room was lost in an impression of assiduous rather than animated effort. With Bartok's "Village Scenes" and Gruenberg's "Creation," both heard for the first time anywhere, comparisons were impossible; but it was within belief that longer rehearsal might have given either piece freer voice and motion. As it was, Stravinsky's "Story of the Soldier" had been put by in lack of time for preparation.

In such matters waifs and strays from Boston might trust their own ears. They were assured, moreover, by obliging Manhattanese that the audience was "brilliant," "representative" and all that sort of thing—encouraging sayings since modernists have rather fallen out of the fashion in New York. Their heyday waned when Stravinsky ceased to be modish. The intelligentsia, after their habit, passed to something else—to Bach, Handel, Mozart, whom it is their present pleasure to acclaim. By the signs of Saturday, however, they are still open-eared to negroid music and Gruenberg's setting of a darkey preacher's sermon—cast into verse by James Weldon Johnson and sung by the colored baritone, Mr. Bledsoe—stirred the listeners not a little. For the rest, they received Bartok's music rather blankly; in one breath, as it were, tittered and clapped over Webern's; regarded Krasa's as an endurance-test mitigated by amusement. The bystanding Bostonian hesitates to venture judgment upon his musical and social betters of the capital; yet with humility suggests that the assembled company seemed overly conscious of itself and warily disposed to stand well in each other's eyes and ears. For there is good form, and also social error, in receptivity to modernist music.

Twice were Webern's "Five Pieces" played in Boston; twice in this concert of Saturday they were repeated in New York. They yielded no new impression and they may now recede into the modernist limbo to which most hearers smilingly consign them. At Town Hall, however, to Krasa's Pastoral and March was appended the final division of his Chamber-Symphony. It sets succinctly as song the verses of Rimbaud which the genteel editor of the program-book in Boston cited only under the French title, "Les Chercheuses de Poux." Yet more genteel, the leaflet of the League of Composers withheld the title, but of necessity printed the poem. Rimbaud assembles the voluptuous sensations (as in his nonage he imagines them) of the removal of "cooties" (to use the war-time euphemism) from the head of a child by two obliging sisters of the hospital, "grandes, charmantes, avec de frêles doigts aux ongles argentins." As it pleased Rimbaud to poetize the scene, so now his verses move Krasa to clothe it in music—for alto voice and orchestra. Within his spareness and directness of tonal means, there are, no doubt, fine shadings of sensation; possibly also half-disclosed ironies. Yet with music as with poetry curiosity at the doing of the thing at all exceeds æsthetic pleasure in the process. There are latitudes and platitudes, not all within Anglo-Saxon meter and bounds—slants in which even the intelligentsia of Manhattan find no amusement. Mr. Koussevitzky did Krasa no disservice and stilled countless tongues when in Boston he cut away this Adam des Poux. The French themselves were blandly shy of it.

Bartok in "Village Scenes," commissioned by the League of Composers, proved the Bartok of anticipation. They are written for small orchestra and a quartet of women's voices. They take title: "Wedding," "Lullaby," "Peasant Dance." They are plainly derived directly from the Hungarian folk-song by which the composer sets store; while through them threads the rueful mood of peasant marryings and givings in marriage that Stravinsky sounded in "Noces." There is dancing, to pounding rhythms, heavy-set and confused. There are orchestral and vocal outcry, shrill and shouting; wild vigor and as sudden brooding; bare and plaintive song; the swift rush of fired feet. Sadness haunts the songful measures—of the life that is gone and ended; of the new life beginning and dreadsome. It is the way of the earth, though men's heels may beat upon it and women's voices speak low in adjuration. Often out of complexity, Bartok gains this rudeness and pungency, this sharpness and simplicity.

To our soil and to no distant Central Europe Mr. Johnson and Mr. Gruenberg are native. The poet once heard a negro-preacher describing the creation of the world, now in homeliness, now in exaltation; here the imagery and the speech of his own people, there the imagery and the speech of the English Bible; the whole in a mounting rhapsody of stilled or shouted fervors. God was lonely in the darkness; made the world; set in the lights of heaven. God looked upon the world and gave it the waters, the beasts, the birds, the flowers, the trees, the hills and valleys. At last, "lonely still" God "made him a man"—and creation was done. In Mr. Gruenberg's music, the voice over-shadows all else. It carries the narrative, taking new body and fresh color from each act of the Divine Will. It bears no less the fervors of the narrator—hushed in awe, alive with expectation, seeing the new world with the wondering eyes of the folk, evoking a Divinity like unto them, quivering with the passion of his faith, fired with the ecstasy of his proclamation. The surface is rough; the rhythms whip; the intervals leap and cut; to a crooning musical speech ensue the frenzies of exultant outcry. Instrument by instrument, the little orchestra slithers in with a flash of color, a dart of accent, longer measures of sustained melody, a motiv reaffirmed, a jangle of aural excitement. The burden is upon the singer—in Mr. Bledsoe become singing actor by twenty racial instincts loosed. Music-making Mr. Gruenberg set the spark; poetizing Mr. Johnson blew the flame; yet out of the singer sprang the consuming fire. By no means is the negroid source-book yet exhausted.

Gathered Laurels

Praise was plenty after the two concerts in New York—in regular course—by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra. On Thursday evening, they were heard in Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony whereupon Mr. Gilman wrote in the Herald-Tribune:

> You can hardly deny to Mr. Koussevitzky the quality of Eventfulness. Some conductors have it—not many. It is not a quality that you can define. It is not even a quality that invariably calls forth praise in the observer. It may provoke exasperation and hot dislike. What it conspicuously does not provoke is boredom. Mr. Koussevitzky can be as irritating as a foreign body in the eye, as disappointing as Wall Street, as infuriating as the arrogance of what Whitman called "elected persons." He can be amazingly, extravagantly wrong—indeed, no conductor can be so wrong as Mr. Koussevitzky at his worst. But boring, tepid, Laodicean, he never is. He has the undecipherable gift.

There are those who call him a sensationalist. Their legend would paint him as a sort of embodied "Surprise" Symphony, with no higher purpose than to startle the somnolent. We do not believe it. Mr. Koussevitzky, as we perceive him, exudes sincerity. He strikes us as almost agonizingly genuine—a simple man, passionately and undissuadably convinced that Beethoven meant this and that by the "Eroica"; that Schubert meant the "Unfinished" to go so and so; that Wagner (believe it or not) was more Russian than Rimsky-Korsakov. We happen to think that Mr. Koussevitzky sometimes misconceives Wagner and maltreats Schubert. We also happen to think that he plays Beethoven

BRAHMS ABOVE ALL

TRANSCRIPT Dec 1

Mr. Koussevitzy Enlarges Him for Apex of a "Tuesday" Concert—Familiar Program, on National Lines—The Conductor as Re-discoverer

THE elevator boy in the big downtown building remarked, "It's our regular Tuesday; it always rains on Tuesdays now." And the official at Symphony Hall shook his head as accompaniment for "This is surely not an auspicious day for a beginning." The beginning in question being that of the second year of the newest of series of Symphony concerts, the "Tuesday afternoon series." But though the day was thus unfavorable, to the roving eye the house seemed virtually sold out: The discoverable empty seats were few. And what the day lacked in pleasantness, the concert itself made up in other ways. The audience of Tuesdays has before this been well favored. It was on a memorable Tuesday concert last year that Mr. Koussevitky reached a high-water mark in his conducting. And yesterday again, a Tuesday, the first of the series, brought an unusual assemblage of unusual perfections. Tuesdays seem to be favored by Mr. Koussevitzky.

There are two kinds of conductors. Both prepare their concerts with meticulous care. But the one works up a particular method of presentation of a given piece of music and then sticks to that as closely as though it were graven upon a phonographic record or some form of pianola roll. The other (within certain well understood limits) allows the inspiration of the moment to dictate many details of performance. The first sets a certain definite standard of performance by which a given piece can be judged once and for all. The other seems to view a piece almost as new every time he plays it. The novelty of fresh performance is continually enfolding it. Such a one is Mr. Koussevitzky. Thus one can say that some certain performance of a given work at his hands was better than his first performance of that work but not so good as a second. Thus one is always at the point of rising to the mountain tops with him—frequently one gets there—while another conductor might be "maintaining his standard." And thus it came about that yesterday's must be classed as another exceptional concert.

The program itself approached the ideal. This year's plan for the coming Tuesdays is to group composers according to nationalities. Yesterday the Germans had their turn. The first half of the afternoon presented three of the giants of all time, in delineative, picturing music, with cumulative effect, in order of historical succession: Beethoven with the Leonore Overture No. 3, Wagner of the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan," Strauss in "Till Eulenspiegel." Never was choice better made or sequence better planned. The second half was given to another giant, one standing in a more isolated position, and yet in as real a way as Wagner a successor of Beethoven—Johannes Brahms with his fourth symphony.

That a high degree of justice was to be done to every last phrase, to every single detail, to every contrast, to every emotional turn, was evident from the performance of Beethoven's overture. High clarity clothed it all. But above such clarity and through it and beneath it, was the fire, the dramatic power, the large sweep, hich is Mr. Koussevitzky's discerning way with all Beethoven. Thus part after part of the intense drama unfolded itself as though presented by the spoken word. And at the same time, never was individual measure or phrase sacrificed for effect of whole. Hand in hand went the dramatic vision of the plot of Beethoven's opera with one of the most carefully planned pieces of detail yet heard from Mr. Koussevitzky. The unfolding of the story gave room for such thoughts as admiration of the virtuosity of Mr. Laurent's flute passages and the just shading of off-stage trumpet calls.

Wagner's music from "Tristan" Mr. Koussevitzky has frequently played here in Greater Boston. As in Beethoven's overture, justice of tempi, clarity of tonal coloring, finesse of phrasing one noted in this music. It is primarily a music of passion. But when one ordinarily thinks of passion, reads of it, sees or hears it presented, it is as passion aflame. A more difficult task Wagner imposes upon those who would play "Tristan." For much of its passion, he directs, shall be passion languishing. How easy to avoid the straight and narrow path—to be either too ardent or too cold to achieve "languishing passion." Mr. Koussevitzky has been both. But yesterday (and probably once before) it seemed that the very heart of Wagner's intentions must have been exposed in this playing of his music.

And so also with "Till Eulenspiegel." The last time Mr. Koussevitzky played it he placed it after a glowing music from Prokofiev, with the result that it sounded worn and faded. It was impossible to

Continued on Following Page

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Mr. Koussevitsky will present a popular program at the annual winter concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, for the benefit of its pension fund. Rossini's overture to "William Tell"; Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," orchestrated by Berlioz; Valse Triste of Sibelius, and Johann Strauss's waltz, "Voices of Spring." The entire "Nutcracker" suite of Tchaikovsky will be played, and to close the same composer's Ouverture Solennell "1812." In the performance of this overture, an auxiliary brass band will play offstage.

Alfred Cortot Soloist With Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the seventh of its Friday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall yesterday, and will repeat it tonight. Alfred Cortot was soloist. The program:

Beethoven—Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.
Beethoven—Concerto for Pianoforte No. 5 in E flat major.
Moussorgsky—"Pictures at an Exhibition" (arranged for orchestra by M. Ravel).

This is the first time Mr. Koussevitzky has presented a soloist at a symphony concert this season. Indeed it is one of the blessings of his administration that assisting artists seldom intrude upon our orchestral comfort, and when they do they must be of particular quality. Thus Mr. Cortot was welcome as an old acquaintance whose exquisitely sensitive (yet also sufficiently imperial) interpretation of the concerto could not fail to give pleasure, even though one would have preferred to hear him in a French composition. Mr. Koussevitzky's accompaniment was admirably discreet.

There is a great deal being done in the way of honoring Beethoven. Let us hope that when the centennial festival comes, next March, we shall not be overtrained. This overture was heard yesterday for the first time from Mr. Koussevitzky at a "regular" subscription concert, though it was presented by him last Tuesday afternoon in another series. That performance had served perhaps as a dress rehearsal, and yesterday's was rather more successful. That is, though the conductor's black and white dynamic scheme persisted there was greater unanimity among the instruments, the climaxes were somewhat more convincingly approached and the trumpet sounded more authoritative.

Moussorgsky's suite orchestrated by Ravel at Mr. Koussevitzky's request, was introduced to the United States by this conductr two years ago. The French composer has done an extraordinarily clever bit of work, using his mastery of the orchestra to sharpen the wit and intensify the color of these little piano pieces, while leaving their distinctively Russian flavor unimpaired. The items, however, are of uneven quality and some of them seem needlessly long—the Polish wagon was an unconscionable time getting out of hearing, and a wagon is less interesting than a Volga barge, anyhow. But the general effect was engagingly Russian. The performance was splendid. Judging by the amount of noise produced, one gathered that one of the composers at least must have attended what is known as a private pre-view of these pictures.

L. A. S.

MUSIC

Monday Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the second concert of its Monday series in Symphony Hall last night, with Nadia Reisenberg as soloist in Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in A major. The other numbers were Brahms' Fourth Symphony and Berlioz's Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," both of which have been played previously this season.

Miss Reisenberg made her first appearance in Boston last night, and she scored an immediate success with the large audience. This young player, who is of Russian origin, is the possessor of an excellent technique, a good tone and not a little musical sensibility, and she gave a commendable performance. Was she well advised in her choice of this concerto? We cannot feel that she was. This music is, if possible, a little more specious than most of Liszt's compositions. (We admit we always feel that way about Liszt, whatever work of his we are hearing.) It requires the bravura style. Miss Reisenberg, with all her accomplishments, is hardly a successor to Liszt as virtuoso. She would have been heard to greater advantage in, for example, Schumann's Concerto.

The German Pathetic Symphony has now been played in three series of symphony concerts in Boston this season. We hope it will be allowed to rest in peace for a few years on the shelves of the Symphony Hall library. Grant everything that has been said in its defense—it seems always to have needed defending. To us it remains a clumsy, tedious piece of music, a sort of musical limburger cheese sandwich two inches thick, to be eaten between dances at a German country fair.

Berlioz's overture, showy, transparent, but full of Gallic vitality and melodic substance, came as a relief after the banalities that had preceded it. It was played, as it had been previously this year, with utmost brilliance. Indeed the orchestral performance throughout the evening was far better than the music in hand deserved.

L. A. S.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Darius Milhaud, the French composer, will be the guest of honor at the ninth regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Milhaud will play the piano part of his "Le Carnaval d'Aix" for piano and orchestra, which he has drawn from his ballet, "Salade." This score has the following movements: Le Corso, Tartaglia, Isabelle, Rosetta, Le Rondet de Manvais Tuteur, Coviello, Le Capitaine Cartuccia, Polichinelle, Polka, Ginzio, Souvenir de Rio, finale.

The Symphony will be Schumann's No. 1 in B flat major. The closing number will be Debussy's "Iberia."

Nadia Reisenberg, pianist, with the Boston Symphony orchestra tomorrow evening.

Koussevitzky in New York

CHAMBER-CONCERT; MR. KOUSSEVITZKY; MODERNISTS AGAIN

TRANSCRIPT Nov 20

HIS EVENING WITH THE LEAGUE OF COMPOSERS

Annual Incident in New York—Setting and Audience—Webern Afresh—Krasa Supplemented—New Pieces from Bartok and Mr. Gruenberg—Praises for Conductor and Orchestra in Regular Course at Manhattan

ONCE a year, by present custom, Mr. Koussevitzky conducts in America at a concert outside the schedule of the Boston Orchestra. The League of Composers, one of the brotherhoods in New York for the fostering of modernist music, provides him with the occasion. The Bostonian trustees accord him the necessary permission. From his own forces he assembles a chamber-orchestra; with the League concocts a program of modernity unrelaxed. Sometimes a chosen piece is suitable also to Symphony Hall and may be prepared and tested in Boston. Otherwise, it is made ready in the scanty leisure of the November journey of the orchestra to New York. On Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky and the full band do their usual office at Carnegie Hall. On Saturday evening the conductor and a chosen thirty or forty minister in a smaller concert-room to the League and its public. A year ago these arrangements served the turn. This autumn there was only to renew them.

Town Hall—an amusing name in New York—was the auditorium last Saturday, broad, shallow, ivory-white, well suited to the performance of music "of small dimensions." Upon a sufficient stage, before a pleasing tapestry of Sophonisba and Massinissa sat the orchestra, in one piece no more than twelve or fifteen strong, in another as many as thirty-seven. From the first and the second "desks" of the several Bostonian choirs the players came, clustered loosely about Mr. Koussevitzky, who plainly enjoyed a closer contact than Symphony Hall permits with both orchestra and audience. Evidently conductor and men had the best will in the world; yet as clearly a week of unbroken work had tired them. What the "Five Pieces" of Webern and the Chamber-Symphony of Krasa might have gained under performance in a small concert-room was lost in an impression of assiduous rather than animated effort. With Bartok's "Village Scenes" and Gruenberg's "Creation," both heard for the first time anywhere, comparisons were impossible; but it was within belief that longer rehearsal might have given either piece freer voice and motion. As it was, Stravinsky's "Story of the Soldier" had been put by in lack of time for preparation.

In such matters waifs and strays from Boston might trust their own ears. They were assured, moreover, by obliging Manhattanese that the audience was "brilliant," "representative" and all that sort of thing—encouraging sayings since modernists have rather fallen out of the fashion in New York. Their heyday waned when Stravinsky ceased to be modish. The intelligentsia, after their habit, passed to something else—to Bach, Handel, Mozart, whom it is their present pleasure to acclaim. By the signs of Saturday, however, they are still open-eared to negroid music and Gruenberg's setting of a darkey preacher's sermon—cast into verse by James Weldon Johnson and sung by the colored baritone, Mr. Bledsoe—stirred the listeners not a little. For the rest, they received Bartok's music rather blankly; in one breath, as it were, tittered and clapped over Webern's; regarded Krasa's as an endurance-test mitigated by amusement. The bystanding Bostonian hesitates to venture judgment upon his musical and social betters of the capital; yet with humility suggests that the assembled company seemed overly conscious of itself and warily disposed to stand well in each other's eyes and ears. For there is good form, and also social error, in receptivity to modernist music.

Twice were Webern's "Five Pieces" played in Boston; twice in this concert of Saturday they were repeated in New York. They yielded no new impression and they may now recede into the modernist limbo to which most hearers smilingly consign them. At Town Hall, however, to Krasa's Pastoral and March was appended the final division of his Chamber-Symphony. It sets succinctly as song the verses of Rimbaud which the genteel editor of the program-book in Boston cited only under the French title, "Les Chercheuses de Poux." Yet more genteel, the leaflet of the League of Composers withheld the title, but of necessity printed the poem. Rimbaud assembles the voluptuous sensations (as in his nonage he imagines them) of the removal of "cooties" (to use the war-time euphemism) from the head of a child by two obliging sisters of the hospital, "grandes, charmantes, avec de frêles doigts aux ongles argentins." As it pleased Rimbaud to poetize the scene, so now his verses move Krasa to clothe it in music—for alto voice and orchestra. Within his spareness and directness of tonal means, there are, no doubt, fine shadings of sensation; possibly also half-disclosed ironies. Yet with music as with poetry curiosity at the doing of the thing at all exceeds æsthetic pleasure in the process. There are latitudes and latitudes, not all within Anglo-Saxon meters and bounds—slants in which even the intelligentsia of Manhattan find no amusement. Mr. Koussevitzky did Krasa no disservice and stilled countless tongues when in Boston he cut away this Adagio des Poux. The French themselves were blandly shy of it.

Bartok in "Village Scenes," commissioned by the League of Composers, proved the Bartok of anticipation. They are written for small orchestra and a quartet of women's voices. They take title: "Wedding," "Lullaby," "Peasant Dance." They are plainly derived directly from the Hungarian folk-song by which the composer sets store; while through them threads the rueful mood of peasant marryings and givings in marriage that Stravinsky sounded in "Noces." There is dancing, to pounding rhythms, heavy-set and confused. There are orchestral and vocal outcry, shrill and shouting; wild vigor and as sudden brooding; bare and plaintive song; the swift rush of fired feet. Sadness haunts the songful measures—of the life that is gone and ended, of the new life beginning and dreadsome. It is the way of the earth, though men's heels may beat upon it and women's voices speak low in adjuration. Often out of complexity, Bartok gains this rudeness and pungency, this sharpness and simplicity.

To our soil and to no distant Central Europe Mr. Johnson and Mr. Gruenberg are native. The poet once heard a negro-preacher describing the creation of the world, now in homeliness, now in exaltation; here the imagery and the speech of his own people, there the imagery and the speech of the English Bible; the whole in a mounting rhapsody of stilled or shouted fervors. God was lonely in the darkness; made the world; set in the lights of heaven. God looked upon the world and gave it the waters, the beasts, the birds, the flowers, the trees, the hills and valleys. At last, "lonely still" God "made him a man"—and creation was done. In Mr. Gruenberg's music, the voice over-shadows all else. It carries the narrative, taking new body and fresh color from each act of the Divine Will. It bears no less the fervors of the narrator—hushed in awe, alive with expectation, seeing the new world with the wondering eyes of the folk, evoking a Divinity like unto them, quivering with the passion of his faith, fired with the ecstasy of his proclamation. The surface is rough; the rhythms whip; the intervals leap and cut; to a crooning musical speech ensue the frenzies of exultant outcry. Instrument by instrument, the little orchestra slithers in with a flash of color, a dart of accent, longer measures of sustained melody, a motiv reaffirmed, a jangle of aural excitement. The burden is upon the singer—in Mr. Bledsoe become singing actor by twenty racial instincts loosed. Music-making Mr. Gruenberg set the spark; poetizing Mr. Johnson blew the flame; yet out of the singer sprang the consuming fire. By no means is the negroid source-book yet exhausted.

Gathered Laurels

Praise was plenty after the two concerts in New York—in regular course—by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra. On Thursday evening, they were heard in Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony whereupon Mr. Gilman wrote in the Herald-Tribune:

> You can hardly deny to Mr. Koussevitzky the quality of Eventfulness. Some conductors have it—not many. It is not a quality that you can define. It is not even a quality that invariably calls forth praise in the observer. It may provoke exasperation and hot dislike. What it conspicuously does not provoke is boredom. Mr. Koussevitzky can be as irritating as a foreign body in the eye, as disappointing as Wall Street, as infuriating as the arrogance of what Whitman called "elected persons." He can be amazingly, extravagantly wrong—indeed, no conductor can be so wrong as Mr. Koussevitzky at his worst. But boring, tepid, Laodicean, he never is. He has the undecipherable gift.

There are those who call him a sensationalist. Their legend would paint him as a sort of embodied "Surprise" Symphony, with no higher purpose than to startle the somnolent. We do not believe it. Mr. Koussevitzky, as we perceive him, exudes sincerity. He strikes us as almost agonizingly genuine—a simple man, passionately and undissuadably convinced that Beethoven meant this and that by the "Eroica"; that Schubert meant the "Unfinished" to go so and so; that Wagner (believe it or not) was more Russian than Rimsky-Korsakov. We happen to think that Mr. Koussevitzky sometimes misconceives Wagner and maltreats Schubert. We also happen to think that he plays Beethoven

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Mr. Koussevitsky will present a popular program at the annual winter concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, for the benefit of its pension fund. Rossini's overture to "William Tell"; Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," orchestrated by Berlioz; Valse Triste of Sibelius, and Johann Strauss's waltz, "Voices of Spring." The entire "Nutcracker" suite of Tchaikovsky will be played, and to close the same composer's Ouverture Solennell "1812." In the performance of this overture, an auxiliary brass band will play offstage.

BRAHMS ABOVE ALL

TRANSCRIPT Dec 1

Mr. Koussevitzy Enlarges Him for Apex of a "Tuesday" Concert—Familiar Program, on National Lines—The Conductor as Re-discoverer

THE elevator boy in the big downtown building remarked, "It's our regular Tuesday; it always rains on Tuesdays now." And the official at Symphony Hall shook his head as accompaniment for "This is surely not an auspicious day for a beginning." The beginning in question being that of the second year of the newest of series of Symphony concerts, the "Tuesday afternoon series." But though the day was thus unfavorable, to the roving eye the house seemed virtually sold out: The discoverable empty seats were few. And what the day lacked in pleasantness, the concert itself made up in other ways. The audience of Tuesdays has before this been well favored. It was on a memorable Tuesday concert last year that Mr. Koussevitky reached a high-water mark in his conducting. And yesterday again, a Tuesday, the first of the series, brought an unusual assemblage of unusual perfections. Tuesdays seem to be favored by Mr. Koussevitzky.

There are two kinds of conductors. Both prepare their concerts with meticulous care. But the one works up a particular method of presentation of a given piece of music and then sticks to that as closely as though it were graven upon a phonographic record or some form of pianola roll. The other (within certain well understood limits) allows the inspiration of the moment to dictate many details of performance. The first sets a certain definite standard of performance by which a given piece can be judged once and for all. The other seems to view a piece almost as new every time he plays it. The novelty of fresh performance is continually enfolding it. Such a one is Mr. Koussevitzky. Thus one can say that some certain performance of a given work at his hands was better than his first performance of that work but not so good as a second. Thus one is always at the point of rising to the mountain tops with him—frequently one gets there—while another conductor might be "maintaining his standard." And thus it came about that yesterday's must be classed as another exceptional concert.

The program itself approached the ideal. This year's plan for the coming Tuesdays is to group composers according to nationalities. Yesterday the Germans had their turn. The first half of the afternoon presented three of the giants of all time, in delineative, picturing music, with cumulative effect, in order of historical succession: Beethoven with the Leonore Overture No. 3, Wagner of the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan," Strauss in "Till Eulenspiegel." Never was choice better made or sequence better planned. The second half was given to another giant, one standing in a more isolated position, and yet in as real a way as Wagner a successor of Beethoven—Johannes Brahms with his fourth symphony.

That a high degree of justice was to be done to every last phrase, to every single detail, to every contrast, to every emotional turn, was evident from the performance of Beethoven's overture. High clarity clothed it all. But above such clarity and through it and beneath it, was the fire, the dramatic power, the large sweep, hich is Mr. Koussevitzky's discerning way with all Beethoven. Thus part after part of the intense drama unfolded itself as though presented by the spoken word And at the same time, never was individual measure or phrase sacrificed for effect of whole. Hand in hand went the dramatic vision of the plot of Beethoven's opera with one of the most carefully planned pieces of detail yet heard from Mr. Koussevitzky. The unfolding of the story gave room for such thoughts as admiration of the virtuosity of Mr. Laurent's flute passages and the just shading of off-stage trumpet calls.

Wagner's music from "Tristan" Mr. Koussevitzky has frequently played here in Greater Boston. As in Beethoven's overture, justice of tempi, clarity of tonal coloring, finesse of phrasing one noted in this music. It is primarily a music of passion. But when one ordinarily thinks of passion, reads of it, sees or hears it presented, it is as passion aflame. A more difficult task Wagner imposes upon those who would play "Tristan." For much of its passion, he directs, shall be passion languishing. How easy to avoid the straight and narrow path—to be either too ardent or too cold to achieve "languishing passion." Mr. Koussevitzky has been both. But yesterday (and probably once before) it seemed that the very heart of Wagner's intentions must have been exposed in this playing of his music.

And so also with "Till Eulenspiegel." The last time Mr. Koussevitzky played it he placed it after a glowing music from Prokofiev, with the result that it sounded worn and faded. It was impossible to

Continued on Following Page

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Darius Milhaud, the French composer, will be the guest of honor at the ninth regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Milhaud will play the piano part of his "Le Carnaval d'Aix" for piano and orchestra, which he has drawn from his ballet, "Salade." His score has the following movements: Le Corso, Tartaglia, Isabelle, Rosetta, Le Bonnet de Mauvais Tuteur, Cavallo, Le Capitaine Cartuccia, Polichinelle, Polka, Finzio, Souvenir de Rio, finale.

The Symphony will be Schumann's No. 1 in B flat major. The closing number will be Debussy's "Iberia."

Alfred Cortot Soloist With Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the seventh of its Friday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall yesterday, and will repeat it tonight. Alfred Cortot was soloist. The program:

Beethoven—Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.
Beethoven—Concerto for Pianoforte No. 5 in E flat major.
Moussorgsky—"Pictures at an Exhibition" (arranged for orchestra by M. Ravel).

This is the first time Mr. Koussevitzky has presented a soloist at a symphony concert this season. Indeed it is one of the blessings of his administration that assisting artists seldom intrude upon our orchestral comfort, and when they do they must be of particular quality. Thus Mr. Cortot was welcome as an old acquaintance whose exquisitely sensitive (yet also sufficiently imperial) interpretation of the concerto could not fail to give pleasure, even though one would have preferred to hear him in a French composition. Mr. Koussevitzky's accompaniment was admirably discreet.

There is a great deal being done in the way of honoring Beethoven. Let us hope that when the centennial festival comes, next March, we shall not be overtrained. This overture was heard yesterday for the first time from Mr. Koussevitzky at a "regular" subscription concert, though it was presented by him last Tuesday afternoon in another series. That performance had served perhaps as a dress rehearsal, and yesterday's was rather more successful. That is, though the conductor's black and white dynamic scheme persisted there was greater unanimity among the instruments, the climaxes were somewhat more convincingly approached and the trumpet sounded more authoritative.

Moussorgsky's suite orchestrated by Ravel at Mr. Koussevitzky's request, was introduced to the United States by this conductr two years ago. The French composer has done an extraordinarily clever bit of work, using his mastery of the orchestra to sharpen the wit and intensify the color of these little piano pieces, while leaving their distinctively Russian flavor unimpaired. The items, however, are of uneven quality and some of them seem needlessly long—the Polish wagon was an unconscionable time getting out of hearing, and a wagon is less interesting than a Volga barge, anyhow. But the general effect was engagingly Russian. The performance was splendid. Judging by the amount of noise produced, one gathered that one of the composers at least must have attended what is known as a private pre-view of these pictures.

L. A. S.

MUSIC

Monday Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the second concert of its Monday series in Symphony Hall last night, with Nadia Reisenberg as soloist in Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in A major. The other numbers were Brahms' Fourth Symphony and Berlioz's Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," both of which have been played previously this season.

Miss Reisenberg made her first appearance in Boston last night, and she scored an immediate success with the large audience. This young player, who is of Russian origin, is the possessor of an excellent technique, a good tone and not a little musical sensibility, and she gave a commendable performance. Was she well advised in her choice of this concerto? We cannot feel that she was. This music is, if possible, a little more specious than most of Liszt's compositions. (We admit we always feel that way about Liszt, whatever work of his we are hearing.) It requires the bravura style. Miss Reisenberg, with all her accomplishments, is hardly a successor to Liszt as virtuoso. She would have been heard to greater advantage in, for example, Schumann's Concerto.

The German Pathetic Symphony has now been played in three series of symphony concerts in Boston this season. We hope it will be allowed to rest in peace for a few years on the shelves of the Symphony Hall library. Grant everything that has been said in its defense—it seems always to have needed defending. To us it remains a clumsy, tedious piece of music, a sort of musical limburger cheese sandwich two inches thick, to be eaten between dances at a German country fair.

Berlioz's overture, showy, transparent, but full of Gallic vitality and melodic substance, came as a relief after the banalities that had preceded it. It was played, as it had been previously this year, with utmost brilliance. Indeed the orchestral performance throughout the evening was far better than the music in hand deserved.

L. A. S.

Nadia Reisenberg, pianist, with the Boston Symphony orchestra tomorrow evening.

Koussevitzky in New York

CHAMBER-CONCERT; MR. KOUSSEVITZKY; MODERNISTS AGAIN

TRANSCRIPT Nov 20

HIS EVENING WITH THE LEAGUE OF COMPOSERS

Annual Incident in New York—Setting and Audience—Webern Afresh—Krasa Supplemented—New Pieces from Bartok and Mr. Gruenberg—Praises for Conductor and Orchestra in Regular Course at Manhattan

ONCE a year, by present custom, Mr. Koussevitzky conducts in America at a concert outside the schedule of the Boston Orchestra. The League of Composers, one of the brotherhoods in New York for the fostering of modernist music, provides him with the occasion. The Bostonian trustees accord him the necessary permission. From his own forces he assembles a chamber-orchestra; with the League concocts a program of modernity unrelaxed. Sometimes a chosen piece is suitable also to Symphony Hall and may be prepared and tested in Boston. Otherwise, it is made ready in the scanty leisure of the November journey of the orchestra to New York. On Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky and the full band do their usual office at Carnegie Hall. On Saturday evening the conductor and a chosen thirty or forty minister in a smaller concert-room to the League and its public. A year ago these arrangements served the turn. This autumn there was only to renew them.

Town Hall—an amusing name in New York—was the auditorium last Saturday, broad, shallow, ivory-white, well suited to the performance of music "of small dimensions." Upon a sufficient stage, before a pleasing tapestry of Sophonisba and Massinissa sat the orchestra, in one piece no more than twelve or fifteen strong, in another as many as thirty-seven. From the first and the second "desks" of the several Bostonian choirs the players came, clustered loosely about Mr. Koussevitzky, who plainly enjoyed a closer contact than Symphony Hall permits with both orchestra and audience. Evidently conductor and men had the best will in the world; yet as clearly a week of unbroken work had tired them. What the "Five Pieces" of Webern and the Chamber-Symphony of Krasa might have gained under performance in a small concert-room was lost in an impression of assiduous rather than animated effort. With Bartok's "Village Scenes" and Gruenberg's "Creation," both heard for the first time anywhere, comparisons were impossible; but it was within belief that longer rehearsal might have given either piece freer voice and motion. As it was, Stravinsky's "Story of the Soldier" had been put by in lack of time for preparation.

In such matters waifs and strays from Boston might trust their own ears. They were assured, moreover, by obliging Manhattanese that the audience was "brilliant," "representative" and all that sort of thing—encouraging sayings since modernists have rather fallen out of the fashion in New York. Their heyday waned when Stravinsky ceased to be modish. The intelligentsia, after their habit, passed to something else—to Bach, Handel, Mozart, whom it is their present pleasure to acclaim. By the signs of Saturday, however, they are still open-eared to negroid music and Gruenberg's setting of a darkey preacher's sermon—cast into verse by James Weldon Johnson and sung by the colored baritone, Mr. Bledsoe—stirred the listeners not a little. For the rest, they received Bartok's music rather blankly; in one breath, as it were, tittered and clapped over Webern's; regarded Krasa's as an endurance-test mitigated by amusement. The bystanding Bostonian hesitates to venture judgment upon his musical and social betters of the capital; yet with humility suggests that the assembled company seemed overly conscious of itself and warily disposed to stand well in each other's eyes and ears. For there is good form, and also social error, in receptivity to modernist music.

Twice were Webern's "Five Pieces" played in Boston; twice in this concert of Saturday they were repeated in New York. They yielded no new impression and they may now recede into the modernist limbo to which most hearers smilingly consign them. At Town Hall, however, to Krasa's Pastoral and March was appended the final division of his Chamber-Symphony. It sets succinctly as song the verses of Rimbaud which the genteel editor of the program-book in Boston cited only under the French title, "Les Chercheuses de Poux." Yet more genteel, the leaflet of the League of Composers withheld the title, but of necessity printed the poem. Rimbaud assembles the voluptuous sensations (as in his wonage he imagines them) of the removal of "cooties" (to use the war-time euphemism) from the head of a child by two obliging sisters of the hospital, "grandes, charmantes, avec de frêles doigts aux ongles argentins." As it pleased Rimbaud to poetize the scene, so now his verses move Krasa to clothe it in music—for alto voice and orchestra. Within his spareness and directness of tonal means, there are, no doubt, fine shadings of sensation; possibly also half-disclosed ironies. Yet with music as with poetry curiosity at the doing of the thing at all exceeds æsthetic pleasure in the process. There are latitudes and latitudes, not all within Anglo-Saxon metes and bounds—slants in which even the intelligentsia of Manhattan find no amusement. Mr. Koussevitzky did Krasa no disservice and stilled countless tongues when in Boston he cut away this Adam des Poux. The French themselves were blandly shy of it.

Bartok in "Village Scenes," commissioned by the League of Composers, proved the Bartok of anticipation. They are written for small orchestra and a quartet of women's voices. They take title: "Wedding," "Lullaby," "Peasant Dance." They are plainly derived directly from the Hungarian folk-song by which the composer sets store; while through them threads the rueful mood of peasant marryings and givings in marriage that Stravinsky sounded in "Noces." There is dancing, to pounding rhythms, heavy-set and confused. There are orchestral and vocal outcry, shrill and shouting; wild vigor and as sudden brooding; bare and plaintive song; the swift rush of fired feet. Sadness haunts the songful measures—of the life that is gone and ended, of the new life beginning and dreadsome. It is the way of the earth, though men's heels may beat upon it and women's voices speak low in adjuration. Often out of complexity, Bartok gains this rudeness and pungency, this sharpness and simplicity.

To our soil and to no distant Central Europe Mr. Johnson and Mr. Gruenberg are native. The poet once heard a negro-preacher describing the creation of the world, now in homeliness, now in exaltation; here the imagery and the speech of his own people, there the imagery and the speech of the English Bible; the whole in a mounting rhapsody of stilled or shouted fervors. God was lonely in the darkness; made the world; set in the lights of heaven. God looked upon the world and gave it the waters, the beasts, the birds, the flowers, the trees, the hills and valleys. At last, "lonely still" God "made him a man"—and creation was done. In Mr. Gruenberg's music, the voice over-shadows all else. It carries the narrative, taking new body and fresh color from each act of the Divine Will. It bears no less the fervors of the narrator—hushed in awe, alive with expectation, seeing the new world with the wondering eyes of the folk, evoking a Divinity like unto them, quivering with the passion of his faith, fired with the ecstasy of his proclamation. The surface is rough; the rhythms whip; the intervals leap and cut; to a crooning musical speech ensue the frenzies of exultant outcry. Instrument by instrument, the little orchestra slithers in with a flash of color, a dart of accent, longer measures of sustained melody, a motiv reaffirmed, a jangle of aural excitement. The burden is upon the singer—in Mr. Bledsoe become singing actor by twenty racial instincts loosed. Music-making Mr. Gruenberg set the spark; poetizing Mr. Johnson blew the flame; yet out of the singer sprang the consuming fire. By no means is the negroid source-book yet exhausted.

Gathered Laurels

Praise was plenty after the two concerts in New York—in regular course—by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra. On Thursday evening, they were heard in Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony whereupon Mr. Gilman wrote in the Herald-Tribune:

> You can hardly deny to Mr. Koussevitzky the quality of Eventfulness. Some conductors have it—not many. It is not a quality that you can define. It is not even a quality that invariably calls forth praise in the observer. It may provoke exasperation and hot dislike. What it conspicuously does not provoke is boredom. Mr. Koussevitzky can be as irritating as a foreign body in the eye, as disappointing as Wall Street, as infuriating as the arrogance of what Whitman called "elected persons." He can be amazingly, extravagantly wrong—indeed, no conductor can be so wrong as Mr. Koussevitzky at his worst. But boring, tepid, Laodicean, he never is. He has the undecipherable gift.

There are those who call him a sensationalist. Their legend would paint him as a sort of embodied "Surprise" Symphony, with no higher purpose than to startle the somnolent. We do not believe it. Mr. Koussevitzky, as we perceive him, exudes sincerity. He strikes us as almost agonizingly genuine—a simple man, passionately and undissuadably convinced that Beethoven meant this and that by the "Eroica"; that Schubert meant the "Unfinished" to go so and so; that Wagner (believe it or not) was more Russian than Rimsky-Korsakov. We happen to think that Mr. Koussevitzky sometimes misconceives Wagner and maltreats Schubert. We also happen to think that he plays Beethoven'

BRAHMS ABOVE ALL

TRANSCRIPT —Dec 1

Mr. Koussevitzy Enlarges Him for Apex of a "Tuesday" Concert—Familiar Program, on National Lines—The Conductor as Re-discoverer

THE elevator boy in the big downtown building remarked, "It's our regular Tuesday; it always rains on Tuesdays now." And the official at Symphony Hall shook his head as accompaniment for "This is surely not an auspicious day for a beginning." The beginning in question being that of the second year of the newest of series of Symphony concerts, the "Tuesday afternoon series." But though the day was thus unfavorable; to the roving eye the house seemed virtually sold out: The discoverable empty seats were few. And what the day lacked in pleasantness, the concert itself made up in other ways. The audience of Tuesdays has before this been well favored. It was on a memorable Tuesday concert last year that Mr. Koussevitky reached a high-water mark in his conducting. And yesterday again, a Tuesday, the first of the series, brought an unusual assemblage of unusual perfections. Tuesdays seem to be favored by Mr. Koussevitzky.

There are two kinds of conductors. Both prepare their concerts with meticulous care. But the one works up a particular method of presentation of a given piece of music and then sticks to that as closely as though it were graven upon a phonographic record or some form of pianola roll. The other (within certain well understood limits) allows the inspiration of the moment to dictate many details of performance. The first sets a certain definite standard of performance by which a given piece can be judged once and for all. The other seems to view a piece almost as new every time he plays it. The novelty of fresh performance is continually enfolding it. Such a one is Mr. Koussevitzky. Thus one can say that some certain performance of a given work at his hands was better than his first performance of that work but not so good as a second. Thus one is always at the point of rising to the mountain tops with him—frequently one gets there—while another conductor might be "maintaining his standard." And thus it came about that yesterday's must be classed as another exceptional concert.

The program itself approached the ideal. This year's plan for the coming Tuesdays is to group composers according to nationalities. Yesterday the Germans had their turn. The first half of the afternoon presented three of the giants of all time, in delineative, picturing music, with cumulative effect, in order of historical succession: Beethoven with the Leonore Overture No. 3, Wagner of the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan," Strauss in "Till Eulenspiegel." Never was choice better made or sequence better planned. The second half was given to another giant, one standing in a more isolated position, and yet in as real a way as Wagner a successor of Beethoven—Johannes Brahms with his fourth symphony.

That a high degree of justice was to be done to every last phrase, to every single detail, to every contrast, to every emotional turn, was evident from the performance of Beethoven's overture. High clarity clothed it all. But above such clarity and through it and beneath it, was the fire, the dramatic power, the large sweep, hich is Mr. Koussevitzky's discerning way with all Beethoven. Thus part after part of the intense drama unfolded itself as though presented by the spoken word. And at the same time, never was individual measure or phrase sacrificed for effect of whole. Hand in hand went the dramatic vision of the plot of Beethoven's opera with one of the most carefully planned pieces of detail yet heard from Mr. Koussevitzky. The unfolding of the story gave room for such thoughts as admiration of the virtuosity of Mr. Laurent's flute passages and the just shading of off-stage trumpet calls.

Wagner's music from "Tristan" Mr. Koussevitzky has frequently played here in Greater Boston. As in Beethoven's overture, justice of tempi, clarity of tonal coloring, finesse of phrasing one noted in this music. It is primarily a music of passion. But when one ordinarily thinks of passion, reads of it, sees or hears it presented, it is as passion aflame. A more difficult task Wagner imposes upon those who would play "Tristan." For much of its passion, he directs, shall be passion languishing. How easy to avoid the straight and narrow path—to be either too ardent or too cold to achieve "languishing passion." Mr. Koussevitzky has been both. But yesterday (and probably once before) it seemed that the very heart of Wagner's intentions must have been exposed in this playing of his music.

And so also with "Till Eulenspiegel." The last time Mr. Koussevitzky played it he placed it after a glowing music from Prokofiev, with the result that it sounded worn and faded. It was impossible to

Continued on Following Page

Alfred Cortot Soloist With Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the seventh of its Friday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall yesterday, and will repeat it tonight. Alfred Cortot was soloist. The program:

Beethoven—Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.
Beethoven—Concerto for Pianoforte No. 5 in E flat major.
Moussorgsky—"Pictures at an Exhibition" (arranged for orchestra by M. Ravel).

This is the first time Mr. Koussevitzky has presented a soloist at a symphony concert this season. Indeed it is one of the blessings of his administration that assisting artists seldom intrude upon our orchestral comfort, and when they do they must be of particular quality. Thus Mr. Cortot was welcome as an old acquaintance whose exquisitely sensitive (yet also sufficiently imperial) interpretation of the concerto could not fail to give pleasure, even though one would have preferred to hear him in a French composition. Mr. Koussevitzky's accompaniment was admirably discreet.

There is a great deal being done in the way of honoring Beethoven. Let us hope that when the centennial festival comes, next March, we shall not be overtrained. This overture was heard yesterday for the first time from Mr. Koussevitzky at a "regular" subscription concert, though it was presented by him last Tuesday afternoon in another series. That performance had served perhaps as a dress rehearsal, and yesterday's was rather more successful. That is, though the conductor's black and white dynamic scheme persisted there was greater unanimity among the instruments, the climaxes were somewhat more convincingly approached and the trumpet sounded more authoritative.

Moussorgsky's suite orchestrated by Ravel at Mr. Koussevitzky's request, was introduced to the United States by this conductr two years ago. The French composer has done an extraordinarily clever bit of work, using his mastery of the orchestra to sharpen the wit and intensify the color of these little piano pieces, while leaving their distinctively Russian flavor unimpaired. The items, however, are of uneven quality and some of them seem needlessly long—the Polish wagon was an unconscionable time getting out of hearing, and a wagon is less interesting than a Volga barge, anyhow. But the general effect was engagingly Russian. The performance was splendid. Judging by the amount of noise produced, one gathered that one of the composers at least must have attended what is known as a private pre-view of these pictures.

L. A. S.

MUSIC

Monday Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the second concert of its Monday series in Symphony Hall last night, with Nadia Reisenberg as soloist in Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in A major. The other numbers were Brahms' Fourth Symphony and Berlioz's Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," both of which have been played previously this season.

Miss Reisenberg made her first appearance in Boston last night, and she scored an immediate success with the large audience. This young player, who is of Russian origin, is the possessor of an excellent technique, a good tone and not a little musical sensibility, and she gave a commendable performance. Was she well advised in her choice of this concerto? We cannot feel that she was. This music is, if possible, a little more specious than most of Liszt's compositions. (We admit we always feel that way about Liszt, whatever work of his we are hearing.) It requires the bravura style. Miss Reisenberg, with all her accomplishments, is hardly a successor to Liszt as virtuoso. She would have been heard to greater advantage in, for example, Schumann's Concerto.

The German Pathetic Symphony has now been played in three series of symphony concerts in Boston this season. We hope it will be allowed to rest in peace for a few years on the shelves of the Symphony Hall library. Grant everything that has been said in its defense—it seems always to have needed defending. To us it remains a clumsy, tedious piece of music, a sort of musical limburger cheese sandwich two inches thick, to be eaten between dances at a German country fair.

Berlioz's overture, showy, transparent, but full of Gallic vitality and melodic substance, came as a relief after the banalities that had preceded it. It was played, as it had been previously this year, with utmost brilliance. Indeed the orchestral performance throughout the evening was far better than the music in hand deserved.

L. A. S.

Nadia Reisenberg, pianist, with the Boston Symphony orchestra tomorrow evening.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Darius Milhaud, the French composer, will be the guest of honor at the ninth regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Milhaud will play the piano part of his "Le Carnaval d'Aix," for piano and orchestra, which he has drawn from his ballet, "Salade." This score has the following movements: Le Corso, Tartaglia, Isabelle, Rosetta, Le Ronflette de Mauvais Tuteur, Cavatello, Le Capitaine Cartuccia, Polichinelle, Polka, Ginzio, Souvenir de Rio, finale.

The Symphony will be Schumann's No. 1 in B flat major. The closing number will be Debussy's "Iberia."

LIPTON'S TEA is the perfect concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, for the benefit of its pension fund. Rossini's overture to "William Tell"; Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," orchestrated by Berlioz; Valse Triste of Sibelius, and Johann Strauss's waltz, "Voices of Spring." The entire "Nutcracker" suite of Tchaikovsky will be played, and to close the same composer's Ouverture Solennell "1812." In the performance of this overture, an auxiliary brass band will play offstage.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Newcomers to Symphony Hall --- Conce

Possibly Pernicious to the Ear: Certainly Harm

Anton von Webern

William T. Walton

Three Contributors to the Symposium of Modernists at Symphony Hall Tomorrow.

HARVEST OF ZURICH: TANSMAN AND KRASA, WEBERN AND WALTON

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY SUBMITS FOUR MODERNISTS

"Five Orchestral Pieces" of the Briefest Compass and Subtlest Texture—A Full-Throated Dance and a Bright-Colored, Keen-Rhythmed Overture—March and Pastoral for Charm—Assorted Backgrounds

THERE WAS an international festival of orchestral and choral music at Zurich last June. It was organized by the European society that would give outlet to contemporary composers of unorthodox species. The pieces were submitted by juries sitting in the several countries, the United States included. An international jury then made final choice among them, seeking to provide diversified and representative programs. Singers and virtuosi as guests, resident conductors, orchestras and choirs were the performers. Conductors, reviewers, amateurs with modernist leanings, students of the musical time, constituted the audience. Among them, Mr. Koussevitzky listened, pondered, and finally acquired four pieces for performance in Boston and New York. Since none is long, he has assembled them in the first part of the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. Only one of the composers, Tansman—the Parisian Pole—is already known to Boston. The other three are the Viennese, von Webern with "Five Orchestral Pieces"; the Czech, Hans Krasa, with a March and Pastoral from a little Symphony; W. T. Walton, as he customarily signs himself, a young Englishman with an Overture, "Portsmouth Point." Reviews of the festival afford a modicum of information about the newcomers and these pieces. By common consent their music was worth the heeding. Atonality, mild or otherwise, absorbed through Schönberg or Stravinsky, was the harmonic method of all three, Tansman also included.

Webern, the Quietist

Since the Five Pieces of von Webern offer the most original innovation; since further Webern is the most thoroughly established of these modernists, his work deserves first consideration. Born in Vienna in 1883, he is with Alban Berg and Egon Wellesz one of the chief exponents of the Schönbergian theory and practice. He belongs to those wise composers who do not begin to number their works until their style shows itself solidly grounded. His opus 1, a Passacaglia for Orchestra shows a fairly mature composer. In addition to his music for orchestra he has also written for chorus and in ensemble forms. Erwin Stein, in "The Chesterian" writes informingly about him: "The music of von Webern is suffused with an extraordinarily tender and intimate feeling. He is the composer of the 'pianissimo expressivo.' Most of his pieces are short and extremely transparent in sound, and his melodies are highly, sometimes ecstatically expressive. In his later orchestral works, strings and wind are used throughout as solo-instruments and the brass is always muted.

"In the 'Six Movements for String Quartet,' Opus 9, almost every note of a melody is given to a different instrument, and each one in a different tone-color. This, together with a rhythm that often lays stress on the weak beat of a bar, imparts to these pieces something unusually glittering and fluid. . . . It was a natural consequence of the composer's renunciation of the conventional formal means that these movements could not be allowed to assume large dimensions. They are melodies in one breath. Thematic development, climax and contrast do their share from the very beginning, as it were before the melody has lost its initial warmth. Thus are formed shapes of frequently less than ten bars, but of very concentrated expression. The composer only says the barest essentials, and his expression determines the form of the pieces. . . .

"As a consequence of greater wealth of artistic means, the technique of an art is apt to be narrowed down and impovished in other respects. This is not unnatural, for it is difficult for the ear, while becoming accustomed to new sounds, to grasp at the same time such things as complex forms. The harmonic richness of today is therefore frequently accompanied by simplified melodic and formal conceptions. Schönberg and his pupils, however, have not only revived the polyphonic principles of the old masters, they have adapted the modifications of motives and development of themes, the thematic and rhythmic variety evolved by the classics, to their new artistic media. This is undoubtedly a great enrichment of musical expressiveness; and if the hearer be unable to follow immediately, he should have patience and accustom himself to this music by hearing it frequently. It will not fail to reveal its musical wealth to him in time."

What is here said of Opus 9 applies almost word for word to the pieces of the present concerts, Opus 10. They are scored for a novel small orchestra: Flute (interchangeable with Piccolo). Oboe, E-flat Clarinet, B-flat Clarinet (interchangeable with Bass-Clarinet), Horn in F, Trumpet in B-flat, Trombone, Harmonium, Mandoline, Guitar, Celesta, Harp, Solo-Violin, Solo-Viola, Solo-Violoncelo, Double Bass, Glockenspiel, Xylophone, large and small drums, cymbal, triangle, large deep bells, cowbells. With this combination Webern creates his quiet, subdued, musical pointillism. For by no better name can it be called.

The first of the five pieces is exactly twelve measures long: "Sehr ruhig und zart" (Very quietly and tenderly). Number Two, fourteen measures long, is labelled "Lebhaft und zart bewegt" (With lively and delicate motion). Number Three does not extend beyond eleven measures—"Sehr langsam und äusserst ruhig" (Very slowly and with the greatest possible quiet). Number Four of six measures, "Fliessend, äusserst zart" (Flowing, as delicately as possible). And Number Five extending to the amazing length of thirty-one measures, has the superscription "Sehr fliessend" (Very flowing). From these directions the underlying mood is easily discernable.

Here is the procedure of von Webern in the first of these miniatures: first there is a note for horn and muted trumpet on an up-beat. Next comes a chord on the viola (an open string plus a harmonic) reinforced by harp and celesta. Then there are three notes on the glockenspiel. Against a long continued trill on the celesta there is a melody of four notes for the clarinet (with slight further accompaniment, to be sure) and similarly six notes for violoncello. These are the two most extended melodies of the piece. There follow a few harmonies for harp, two notes for the flute, two for trumpet, one for the celesta, and the first piece is finished. The second shows slightly more body. The third, though by no means the longest, is probably the most fully developed. And in the fifth frequently there is not more than a single long-sustained tone sounding.

Of the performance at Zurich, Ursula Greville wrote frankly in "The Sackbut": "Of Anton Webern's five pieces I am not able to speak. I do not know enough about music to appraise such a very new form. One of them at least consisted of four or five bars, and I found myself nervous and giggly at the end of them, which with me merely means I have not yet grasped the idea. I should have been glad to have heard them again. Some one told me that there was a foot-note in the program to the effect that the audience was requested neither to breathe nor to cough during the five pieces, as such a proceeding might spoil the balance. I do not understand foreign langauges well enough to know whether this is true or not."

By word of Dr. Eaglefield Hull. "Webern's pieces caused amazement, amusement or delight, according to the abilities of the hearer to grasp an entirely new kind of music. . . . Webern writes very softly because his chief desire is to induce people to listen in a new way. . . . Webern's language is the language of tone-colors; it speaks almost entirely to the tactile sense of the ear—a sense which we have come to ignore, mainly because it is omnipresent in all our listening; but it is a sense which can undoubtely be put to a direct aesthetic purpose; and at present Webern seems to be the only musician who can compose entirely for it." Thirteen years ago, Webern wrote these pieces; then waited patiently for this first performance

Tansman and Krasa

The Parisian Pole Tansman needs no introduction to the readers of these columns. In contrast to the deep introspection of Webern's music, Tansman's is entirely and purposefully objective. Dance-rhythms dominate it. A busy orchestra is constantly employed.

When the "Dictionary of Modern Music and Musicians" was published two years ago, Hans Krasa was counted worthy of this entry: "German-Czechoslovak composer, born at Prague in 1895. Pupil of A. Zemlinsky. Adopts the atonal style of Stravinsky." Nothing more. Today it is scarcely possible to pick up a musical journal of Central Europe that does not record a performance of something by Krasa. That he has not quite found himself it is easy to read between the lines. That he is a personality of strength and force and thorough technical grounding is equally certain. Dr. Hull wrote laconically that the "Pastoral and March made one wish for the other two movements." And from D. Weissmann comes this fuller note: "The German-Bohemian Hans Krasa from Prague, who knows Paris better than the rest of Europe, was presented by parts of a symphony for small orchestra. All manner of influences, some literary, could be traced in his music. But throughout the whole one can recognize a fine sensibility, a creative sense of timbre, and with it the determination not to allow himself to be dominated by color. And yet this latter, due to his Parisian environment, plays a large part in his make-up." In essence Krasa's pieces are chamber music.

Young England

William Turner Walton is an Englishman born in 1902. His training has been entirely English. He has written chiefly for orchestra and chamber-combinations of all sorts of instruments. His overture, "Portsmouth Point," was well received at Zurich. According to Dr. Hull it was "inspired by a color-print of Rowlandson, the embarking of navy men at Portsmouth during the Napoleonic wars.," and Basil Maine of the London Telegraph writes: "While a few of the works made no impression at all, their function being merely to beat the air—boastfully and vainly—the only English piece included was W. T. Walton's overture, 'Portsmouth Point.' Even to the English members of the audience this work came as a surprise because of delightful freedom from calculated effect and contrivance. . . . The Overture gives the effect of absolute spontaneity." Miss Greville in the "Sackbut" says merely that it is "a breezy, alive little overture." Dr. Weissmann probably gives the comment of the greatest critical worth: 'Anyone who heard Walton's string quartet — undigested Schönberg—at the Salzburg festival two years ago was sure to expect more signs of talent, but nothing similar. For here Walton has really accepted the English tradition as he himself wisely affirms. Purcell, Handel, even Scarlatti helped guide his pen. But added to this is the exuberant whimsicality of the youth who, though standing at the beginning of his career, knows exactly what he wants and what he is able to do . . . That loud brasses are his chief mode of expression was of course to be expected." Finally, The Chesterian may be quoted: "The first theme, of a rollicking gait, given to the brass instruments, is followed by a second, of a reel-like character. In the development and final sections the scoring is particularly brilliant, syncopation is most skilfully used; cross-rhythms are introduced, thus creating an atmosphere of hustle and bustle, and bringing the work to effective conclusion."

A. H. M.

MBER 18, 1926

rts --- Plays and less to the Eye

Hans Krasa

(B. of the Brown Music Library)

TWO-FOLD BEETHOVEN, MUSORGSKY ENLARGED, CONDUCTOR "IN HIGH"

Transcript Dec 4

THE "EMPEROR CONCERTO" AS BY MIRACLE

Mr. Koussevitzky Restores the Music to Itself—So It Was Written and So First Heard—An Overture Over-Dramatized—Ravel's Release of the Russian—Assisting, Mr. Cortot

THE MILLS of the gods are pleasing to watch. Not only do they grind slowly and small. They also grind—occasionally—with an exceeding justice. It was Mr. Alfred Cortot, the Parisian pianist and pedagogue, again on visit to the United States, who insisted upon the inclusion of Beethoven's "Emperor Concerto" in the Symphony Concert of yesterday. If he was to remount the platform of Symphony Hall, that lengthy and usually tedious masterpiece must be his medium. Neither to polite persuasion nor to reasoned objection was he susceptible. A kindly gentleman, accustomed to the unruly, Mr. Koussevitzky yielded to the guest; recast an entire program upon which as center-number stood this Concerto, No. 5, in E-flat major. In it he proceeded to rehearse the orchestra, bringing to bear his signal powers in the re-animation of devitalized Beethoven. Before he was done, he had transformed the "Emperor Concerto" as once upon a time Dr. Muck, with Mr. Kreisler by his side, re-valued and revivified Beethoven's Violin-Concerto. Into Mr. Koussevitzky's symphonic scheme with the music, willy-nilly Mr. Cortot must fit himself. When that process was completed yesterday afternoon, he emerged unmistakably as "assisting artist" in the full sense of the adjective. The informed and unregenerate openly and indecently rejoiced. Of old they were irritated, when Mr. Cortot, descending upon Boston, took over a Symphony Concert—usually with two numbers—as though it existed, for the nonce, to glorify him. Next, they were amused at this virtuoso-presumption. Now, Mr. Cortot would have the "Emperor Concerto" at all costs—only to recede in the actual performance to a relatively subordinate place. The New England word is "come-uppance."

Scarcely a conductor, now practising his profession, excels Mr. Koussevitzky in this reanimation of Beethoven. Mr. Weingartner, at the opposite pole, plays him with a chaste and chiselled rectitude. Listen, my children, and you shall hear exactly why and how the great Ludwig became a classic. Mr. Weingartner's Beethoven is as pure as snow—and not much more warming. Not so Mr. Koussevitzky. For him Beethoven is everlastingly alive and unpedestalled. He is the frowsy Ludwig who quarrelled in Viennese cafés and was not too well-mannered in archdukes' drawing-rooms. He is the vehement Ludwig who paced his chamber and tore his hair and muttered and scribbled in the travail of composition. Above all, he is the Ludwig who was flooding and frightening Vienna with a music such as it had never heard before. It bemused by its power; it befuddled by its beauty; of its diversity there was no end. Listeners, stirred, marvelling, yet hesitant, called it soulful; or else cried in angry voices that it was not the regular thing in the regular way. As for the reviewers they shouted with joy and the neighbors mocked them for their folly. Or they kicked against the pricks and ever afterward posterity has jeered or pitied them. To his time, in such throb around him, Beethoven seemed a highly romantic figure. He remains such to Mr. Koussevitzky. When Beethoven was pondering a piece or setting it to ruled paper, there was but one thing in the world to him—the music-making. When Mr. Koussevitzky, a hundred years later, plays that "classic" similarly it possesses him.

From such daimonic possession sprang the miracle, yesterday, of the "Emperor Concerto." The conductor conceived the music symphonically, not pianistically, gave it depths and heights, stride and wing. The listener heard the unfolding of a far-spreading, full-freighted, design, conformable enough to the orthodoxies of Beethoven's time; but shaped to a manner and conveying a matter within him born. A Concerto of 1809-1811 unmistakably—the long first movement, the slow middle-song, the sharp-rhythmed rondo; subjects, "working-out," repeats, codas, nearly all the sonata-pedantries; the piano-part, the orchestral parts pliant and adjusted. A Concerto, none-the-less, moving with a sweep of line and march far enough from the current virtuoso-practice; charged with thought, emotion and creative passion, expanding, advancing, cumulating, in its own fervors. Dr. Dryasdust can assort the themes and counter-themes of the first movement, trace step by step the "organic development." Beethoven, however, flung each and all into a vast tapestry of sound; wrought and colored it with his own romantic ardors; bade now the orchestra and now the piano, bear his driving speech. Or else for the while stayed his hand and reposed his soul in a gentler contemplation. (So Beethoven strode the countryside crying out to himself, and of a sudden paused, still and rapt.)

The composer, not the classic[illegible] the word to Mr. Koussevitzky. In might of line, glow of motion, splendor of progress, passed this first movement. Exaltation flung out the musical thought; sinewy and strong, it ran its course or else coiled for the instant upon its own beauty. The so-called "passage-work" was rhapsody between piano and orchestra; the mechanism, as it sometimes seems, of the instrumental voices became an interlaced musical speech, quick with life. Over the whole played that sense of newness and strangeness, in creation before watching eyes and listening ears, which is the essence of romance. So this "Emperor Concerto" must have sounded upon those that first heard it when Beethoven himself was the pianist. No doubt, Mr. Cortot did his part well; yet he was but chief among the means that up and down the orchestra the conductor was welding to his single-hearted end.

The slow movement gave the pianist more opportunity. His is the pervading voice in a song that yesterday anticipated the limpid depths, the serene heights, the celestial calm and visioning of the Adagios in the final quartets. He who would infiltrate such music into a horde of hearers, until it also possesses them, must know and feel it simply, directly, as one into whom it has passed both crystallized and diffused. And these are rather the ways of Mr. Koussevitzky with Beethoven than of the mentally musical Mr. Cortot. The conductor reacting upon the pianist, held these middle measures in the hollow of his spirit. Both in the finale fastened upon the exuberant rhapsody intrinsic in the music. They struck fire from the melodic flights and rhythmic turns; kept orchestral and piano tone incandescent; joined Beethoven in a wild and elate jugglery for the sake of its own intoxication—Beethoven the incorrigible at one more flare of romantic heats. Not since the days of Dr. Muck and Mr. Kreisler has a Concerto so renewed him.

Mr. Koussevitzky is often a logical program-maker. With Beethoven must walk Beethoven, both at prime; wherefore the third "Leonora" Overture preceded the "Emperor Concerto." Only last Tuesday the conductor added it to his Bostonian repertory; while yesterday a "subscription-audience" heard him in it for the first time. In the whole range of music there is no such concentrated, climatic drama in such brief and manifold scope of tones. What Beethoven failed to do in the opera itself, with a text, a stage and singing-actors to chain him closer to earth, he accomplished in this preface and epitome. Here "Fidelio" at last gains epic voice; while the doom of Leonora, the moment of fate, the final salvation, are stripped to the quick.

Mr. Koussevitzky missed none of the gathering dreads, the passioned outcry, the tragic suspense, the released and jubilant frenzy. Florestan has not sung more darkly or Leonora wept and plead; or the trumpets cried their mercy; or over faith and freedom a whole universe rejoiced. There were strokes, almost, of interpretive genius as when the whole orchestra seemed to hang hushed and anxious before the first trumpet note. Yet Mr. Koussevitzky, in his eagerness to stress almost every measure musically and to bare it emotionally as well, tended to slice the overture into separate episodes; to take it not only intensely but spasmodically; to isolate the successive scenes rather than to maintain the whole ascendant course of the tonal drama. Not always did the sharpened edges quite join. Not for an instant will Mr. Koussevitzky believe it—but it is possible to try too hard.

In the final number—Ravel's orchestral version of Musorgsky's piano-pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition"—once more a moral was written clear. "New, first time" comes, and also goes, an interesting, impressive piece. Plainly it deserves more or less speedy repetition. Usually it misses that desert, because other "New, first times" crowd it to the back of the library-shelf and the choosing conductor's memory. Ravel's orchestral fantasia on these themes of Musorgsky has somehow escaped such fate. Two years ago, it was played to general and particular regard and approval. Yesterday it was replayed to welcoming and warming response. Musorgsky looked upon his dead-friend's pictures and to them wrote tonal notes—brief, simple, by affectionate memories intensified. He wrote also, thin-lined as it is, a graphic music of characterization. The quarreling Jews, one domineering, the other querulous; the peasant cart rumbling the roads among the folk; the lurching gnome; the chattering children' the tumult of the market-place; the ghostly chant of the catacombs; the witch riding the air; the state and din of old Russia feasting—bear manifold witness to it.

With or without warrant, Ravel saw in these pieces sketches for the piano, rather than of it, out of which he might draw tone-pictures with the definition and the shadings of a twentieth-century orchestra. He set to the task resourcefully and sympathetically. Soon his own delineative imagination was kindled, his own faculty of tonal characterization in diverse play. Where Musorgsky sketched as with the Jews, he now etches. Where Musorgsky set down an impression as with the rumbling cart, he paints a full tone-picture. Musorgsky heard the music of the catacombs and grieved for his dead friend who had drawn the sketch: Ravel makes it poignant and haunting to all men. Musorgsky dreamed of old Russia; Ravel bids a whole orchestra throb with it and cry it to the heavens. Transformation, transfiguration; but, believably enough, an inarticulate and tentative music released, affirmed, in full contours and firm voice. Yesterday, an orchestra twice as sensitive, plastic, colorful and responsive as it was two years ago was the means—and the fulfillment.

H. T. P.

Fourth Symphony of Tschaikovsky to be Given by Boston Orchestra

Pros. Journal Dec 5

Written for the Sunday Journal.
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky is a piece that may be heard from many orchestras and under the baton of many conductors, but of these latter there are few indeed who can penetrate as does Mr. Koussevitzky into the innermost reaches of the score. An unusual experience, then, is in store for those who are to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concert at the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, when this particular symphony is to be the principal item on the programme.

A symphony, in the ordinary acceptance of the term, is absolute music, music which expresses nothing but itself, and yet Tchaikovsky wrote to his friend, Taniev, that "of course" this symphony was programme-music, and moreover, that he did not wish any symphonic work to emanate from him that had "nothing to express" or "consisted merely of harmonies and a purposeless design of rhythms and modulations." In the same communication he further declared that this symphony was in reality a reflection of Beethoven's Fifth—in its central idea, not in its musical content—and added that there was not a single bar of it that was not "an echo of his intimate spiritual life."

It is well known that Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony also had a programme, while presumably his Fifth had likewise a definite poetic foundation. But it is only in the case of his Fourth Symphony that the composer took it upon himself to explain in words just what the music meant to him and what it should in consequence convey to the listener.

The Fourth Symphony bears a dedication to "My Best Friend," who was none other than Najeda von Meck, the wealthy widow who so generously aided the composer, upon the understanding that he and she were never to meet. And it is in a letter written to his benefactress that his interpretation of this Symphony is to be found.

Since this explanation, or the essential part of it, is certain to be contained in Mr. Hale's programme notes for Tuesday's concert, it were superfluous to quote it here. But it may be briefly summarized: The Introduction, a menacing and portentous phrase for horns and bassoons, is symbolical of Fate, of the stern destiny that prevents our desires from reaching fulfillment. Passing to the main body of the movement we find in the chief theme, a melancholy cantilena for violins and violoncellos that, oddly enough, runs to waltz-rhythm, the lament of one who submits, though unwillingly, to Fate's decrees. But the second theme, a solacing melody for the clarinet, brings hope and encouragement. Not thus easily, however, is Fate to be dismissed; the ominous theme of the Introduction reappears and once more we are brought face to face with grim reality.

The second movement "shows suffering in another stage." The plaintive chief theme, given first to the oboe and repeated by the 'cellos, is the expression of that vague sorrow and depression that comes upon us when we sit alone and dream of the past, the mind filled with vain regrets.

By Tchaikovsky's own admission, however, the main body of the third movement, a Scherzo in which the strings, playing alone, are plucked throughout, expresses no definite feeling. But the lively, purposely vulgar Trio gives voice to the memory of a ribald peasant song, and later to the recollection of military music passing in the distance.

No doubt the listener quite unacquainted with Tchaikovsky's avowed intentions would recognize in the Finale the expression of a wild and furious gaiety. This is a popular festival, and, since Tchaikovsky was a Russian, a Russian folk-tune, "In the Fields there stood a Birch-Tree," is appropriately introduced. Here the protagonist of the Symphony, finding no joy in himself, turns to the beholding, and hence the sharing, of the joy of others. The ubiquitous Fate theme again announces its baleful presence, but this time it does not prevail. The popular tumult effectively drowns it out.

Not a particularly subtle or original programme. Nor is Tchaikovsky's invention in this case always distinguished, though his workmanship, his unerring mastery of all the composer's tools, compel here, as elsewhere, universal admiration. But despite the naivete of its underlying poetic idea and the occasional obviousness of its themes, the Fourth Symphony, especially as conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky, convinces and carries away the listener by dint of its burning sincerity, its sheer forcefulness of expression. Distinction in music is sometimes another word for emotional sterility. The most vital composers have not always attained to it while many a lesser music-maker has purchased it at the price of an ultimate oblivion. Despite the taunts of the superior the symphonies of Tchaikovsky still live and flourish, and when a Koussevitzky brings them home to us they stir and impress as little else in music may.

This Symphony has been heard in Providence from the Boston Symphony Orchestra as lately as December, 1921, while of the three remaining numbers on the programme one, Richard Strauss's witty Rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," was performed here by this orchestra on Jan. 23, 1923, and another, the "Forest Murmurs," from Wagner's music-drama "Siegfried," was played here April 21, 1925, but the third, Mozart's Serenade for string orchestra, "Eine Klene Nachtmusik" is, so far as the concerts of the Boston Symphony are concerned, a novelty.

Running in four movements, an Allegro, Romanze, Minuet and Rondo, this Serenade, or "Little Night-Music" as Mozart called it, is typical of that composer's fluent and graceful style, his melodic charm, his facile yet masterly handling of his medium. Music such as this needs no analysis and defies description. Studied in the score it seems slight in content and of an almost academic formality, even primness, but no such impression is gained from the hearing of it, in suitable performance, in the concert hall. There it fulfills the prescription that Mozart himself set down for all music; it "sounds." In that the published score bears the date Aug. 10, 1787, we may know that this Serenade is a product of Mozart's later, riper years.

At first blush nothing could seem farther removed from Mozart than the audacious and exuberant tone-poem of Strauss. But Strauss is a deal closer to Mozart, both in spirit and in musical substance, than many imagine. And small wonder, since Mozart has long been, and still is, Strauss's special idol among the composers of the past. The introductory measures of "Till" which serve the same purpose as the "Once upon a time" that is the classic beginning of all fairy tales, have, despite their modern harmonic and instrumental dress, a distinct Mozartean flavor. Alone among modern composers Strauss

RUSSIAN GIRL SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

The second concert of the Monday Evening Series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was featured by the piano-playing of Nadia Reisenberg, who made her Boston debut by appearing as soloist in Liszt's Piano Concerto in A major.

Her performance was the usual brilliant one demanded by a Liszt piece. She exhibited unusual vigor for a woman pianist, and her technique was always adequate for the intricacies of the score.

Most of all, however, this concerto demands skilled ensemble between solo instrument and orchestra; and last night's performance was notable in this respect. Miss Reisenberg's speed was on occasion dazzling, but she never lost Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. They were always with her. The rendition was deservedly applauded.

In two other pieces that made up the program—Brahms' Fourth Symphony and Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture—the orchestra played well, but not so well as on the occasion of the previous extra concerts this year.

There was not quite the cohesion between the various parts that one has come to expect of the Boston Symphony at its best. The strings had for the most part gorgeous tone, but on several occasions the playing was ragged. There were occasional slips in the brass, too.

The overture was, of course, an ideal piece for Mr. Koussevitzky, as it had been once before this season. Needless to say, the audience was grateful and recalled him many times.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Pros Journal Dec 8

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, played its third concert of its Providence season last evening at the Albee Theatre. The programme on the face of it, was not one to arouse any particular enthusiasm; but the finish of the performance and the marked clarity of the conductor's interpretation, particularly in the first and the last numbers, gave to the whole an interest and a charm that much more pretentious programmes would be unable to surpass.

The programme:

Mozart—"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Serenade for String Orchestra (K. 525)
- I. Allegro.
- II. Romanza: Andante.
- III. Menuetto: Allegretto.
- IV. Rondo: Allegro.

Wagner—"Forest Murmurs" from Siegfried (Act II)

Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner," in Rondo Form, Op. 28

Tchaikovsky—Symphony No. 4 in F-minor, Op. 36
- I. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima (in movimento di valse).
- II. Andantino in modo di canzona.
- III. Scherzo; pizzicato ostinato: Allegro.
- IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik" is a fine example of music that looks perfectly simple while setting the utmost demands on the performer's skill. The rapid bowings that demanded absolute precision, deftness of stroke, lightness of touch, perfect feeling for the conductor's beat, the subtle shifting of colors with the question and answer of violins, cellos, and violas, were delightful to watch as well as to hear. In the romanza the bright little dialogue between first violins and cellos, against a background of second violins and violas, shone like a gem in the light of both composition and performance.

To know Mozart is to have won deliverance from the burden of the heart bowed down. His music sings of the pure joy of living, and if by chance it hints at what lies on the further side of silence, it does so without exciting the least anxiety. His soul is sane and balanced, his superior will dominates a heart that is calm, unshaken by storm or passion. He has no hate, nor scorn, no aftermath of bitterness, nor any malignity. He speaks to a world he loves, whose love he craves in return. But what can he do in the face of such pessimistic archfiends as Strauss and Tchaikovsky?

From Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegels Lustige Streiche" one would observe some caution in speaking of Till's pranks as merry. Mr. Koussevitzky made good use of the trenchant wit that Strauss directed at the "hodge-podge of bankers and business men, basely out on pleasure bent," he made Till a veritable scoffer possessed of the devil, bringing malice to the market place, blasphemy to his monkish robes, seduction to his courtship, bear-baiting to his pedants, and a right good laugh to the hanging in which the stiffening limbs of the rascal make one final effort to do a step of the Charleston. He gave us also, in full measure, the scenes, the dialogue, the landscapes, and whatever else of phantasy or fact may have come into the composer's mind. Strauss was in no merry mood when he wrote the piece; for his disappointment at the failure of Guntram was still rankling in his soul. His use of popular themes on which to build his work has disguised to some extent his purpose; but Mr. Koussevitzky's reading has set it in its true light in-so-far as it can be set:

"But he who understands it would be able
To add a story to the tower of Babel."

Mr. Koussevitzky is at his best in the playing of Tchaikovsky, and he takes care that what he offers is of Tchaikovsky's best, thus keeping high the standard of both music and performance. We have been told of the significance of the Fourth Symphony and those of us who accept it as the working of fate doubtless saw her hand in the various scenes of the symphony. Perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky makes her a little more pitiless and relentless than some of his colleagues. And possibly he lacks a little of the romance and poetic glow of Stokowsky, or the cool, crystal fluency of Gabrilowitsch; but on the other hand he certainly spares us the bumptious uproar of Mengelberg, when that conductor decides to make a noise. His violins never become rough and raucous with excitement, nor do his 'cellos, from over-exertion, ever develop hoarseness and asthma, nor do his brasses and wood winds split the air, even when announcing the entrance of something as formidable and sinister as fate.

But for all that, there were some marshlands of music in that first movement, full of cacophonous monotony, relieved here and there by lovely little fancies; but the whole thing is too bitter for us who take our bitterness with Anglo-Saxon seriousness. The Russian probably enjoys it, taking it evidently with the proverbial salt. We suffer.

The remarkable pizzicato third movement was done pizzicato to the bitter end, in spite of its overwhelming demands on both conductor and players.

M. C. W.

TWO-FOLD BEETHOVEN, MUSORGSKY ENLARGED, CONDUCTOR "IN HIGH"

Transcript Dec 4

THE "EMPEROR CONCERTO" AS BY MIRACLE

Mr. Koussevitzky Restores the Music to Itself—So It Was Written and So First Heard—An Overture Over-Dramatized—Ravel's Release of the Russian—Assisting, Mr. Cortot

THE MILLS of the gods are pleasing to watch. Not only do they grind slowly and small. They also grind—occasionally—with an exceeding justice. It was Mr. Alfred Cortot, the Parisian pianist and pedagogue, again on visit to the United States, who insisted upon the inclusion of Beethoven's "Emperor Concerto" in the Symphony Concert of yesterday. If he was to remount the platform of Symphony Hall, that lengthy and usually tedious masterpiece must be his medium. Neither to polite persuasion nor to reasoned objection was he susceptible. A kindly gentleman, accustomed to the unruly, Mr. Koussevitzky yielded to the guest; recast an entire program upon which as center-number stood this Concerto, No. 5, in E-flat major. In it he proceeded to rehearse the orchestra, bringing to bear his signal powers in the re-animation of devitalized Beethoven. Before he was done, he had transformed the "Emperor Concerto" as once upon a time Dr. Muck, with Mr. Kreisler by his side, re-valued and revivified Beethoven's Violin-Concerto. Into Mr. Koussevitzky's symphonic scheme with the music, willy-nilly Mr. Cortot must fit himself. When that process was completed yesterday afternoon, he emerged unmistakably as "assisting artist" in the full sense of the adjective. The informed and unregenerate openly and indecently rejoiced. Of old they were irritated, when Mr. Cortot, descending upon Boston, took over a Symphony Concert—usually with two numbers—as though it existed, for the nonce, to glorify him. Next, they were amused at this virtuoso-presumption. Now, Mr. Cortot would have the "Emperor Concerto" at all costs—only to recede in the actual performance to a relatively subordinate place. The New England word is "come-uppance."

Scarcely a conductor, now practising his profession, excels Mr. Koussevitzky in this reanimation of Beethoven. Mr. Weingartner, at the opposite pole, plays him with a chaste and chiselled rectitude. Listen, my children, and you shall hear exactly why and how the great Ludwig became a classic. Mr. Weingartner's Beethoven is as pure as snow—and not much more warming. Not so Mr. Koussevitzky. For him Beethoven is everlastingly alive and unpedestalled. He is the frowsy Ludwig who quarrelled in Viennese cafés and was not too well-mannered in archdukes' drawing-rooms. He is the vehement Ludwig who paced his chamber and tore his hair and muttered and scribbled in the travail of composition. Above all, he is the Ludwig who was flooding and frightening Vienna with a music such as it had never heard before. It bemused by its power; it befuddled by its beauty; of its diversity there was no end. Listeners, stirred, marvelling, yet hesitant, called it soulful; or else cried in angry voices that it was not the regular thing in the regular way. As for the reviewers they shouted with joy and the neighbors mocked them for their folly. Or they kicked against the pricks and ever afterward posterity has jeered or pitied them. To his time, in such throb around him, Beethoven seemed a highly romantic figure. He remains such to Mr. Koussevitzky. When Beethoven was pondering a piece or setting it to ruled paper, there was but one thing in the world to him—the music-making. When Mr. Koussevitzky, a hundred years later, plays that "classic" similarly it possesses him.

From such daimonic possession sprang the miracle, yesterday, of the "Emperor Concerto." The conductor conceived the music symphonically, not pianistically, gave it depths and heights, stride and wing. The listener heard the unfolding of a far-spreading, full-freighted, design, conformable enough to the orthodoxies of Beethoven's time; but shaped to a manner and conveying a matter within him born. A Concerto of 1809-1811 unmistakably—the long first movement, the slow middle-song, the sharp-rhythmed rondo; subjects, "working-out," repeats, codas, nearly all the sonata-pedantries; the piano-part, the orchestral parts pliant and adjusted. A Concerto, none-the-less, moving with a sweep of line and march far enough from the current virtuoso-practice; charged with thought, emotion and creative passion, expanding, advancing, cumulating, in its own fervors. Dr. Dryasdust can assort the themes and counter-themes of the first movement, trace step by step the "organic development." Beethoven, however, flung each and all into a vast tapestry of sound; wrought and colored it with his own romantic ardors; bade now the orchestra and now the piano, bear his driving speech. Or else for the while stayed his hand and reposed his soul in a gentler contemplation. (So Beethoven strode the countryside crying out to himself, and of a sudden paused, still and rapt.)

The composer, not the classic[illegible] the word to Mr. Koussevitzky. In might of line, glow of motion, splendor of progress, passed this first movement. Exaltation flung out the musical thought; sinewy and strong, it ran its course or else coiled for the instant upon its own beauty. The so-called "passage-work" was rhapsody between piano and orchestra; the mechanism, as it sometimes seems, of the instrumental voices became an interlaced musical speech, quick with life. Over the whole played that sense of newness and strangeness, in creation before watching eyes and listening ears, which is the essence of romance. So this "Emperor Concerto" must have sounded upon those that first heard it when Beethoven himself was the pianist. No doubt, Mr. Cortot did his part well; yet he was but chief among the means that up and down the orchestra the conductor was welding to his single-hearted end.

The slow movement gave the pianist more opportunity. His is the pervading voice in a song that yesterday anticipated the limpid depths, the serene heights, the celestial calm and visioning of the Adagios in the final quartets. He who would infiltrate such music into a horde of hearers, until it also possesses them, must know and feel it simply, directly, as one into whom it has passed both crystallized and diffused. And these are rather the ways of Mr. Koussevitzky with Beethoven than of the mentally musical Mr. Cortot. The conductor reacting upon the pianist, held these middle measures in the hollow of his spirit. Both in the finale fastened upon the exuberant rhapsody intrinsic in the music. They struck fire from the melodic flights and rhythmic turns; kept orchestral and piano tone incandescent; joined Beethoven in a wild and elate jugglery for the sake of its own intoxication—Beethoven the incorrigible at one more flare of romantic heats. Not since the days of Dr. Muck and Mr. Kreisler has a Concerto so renewed him.

Mr. Koussevitzky is often a logical program-maker. With Beethoven must walk Beethoven, both at prime; wherefore the third "Leonora" Overture preceded the "Emperor Concerto." Only last Tuesday the conductor added it to his Bostonian repertory; while yesterday a "subscription-audience" heard him in it for the first time. In the whole range of music there is no such concentrated, climatic drama in such brief and manifold scope of tones. What Beethoven failed to do in the opera itself, with a text, a stage and singing-actors to chain him closer to earth, he accomplished in this preface and epitome. Here "Fidelio" at last gains epic voice; while the doom of Leonora, the moment of fate, the final salvation, are stripped to the quick.

Mr. Koussevitzky missed none of the gathering dreads, the passioned outcry, the tragic suspense, the released and jubilant frenzy. Florestan has not sung more darkly or Leonora wept and plead; or the trumpets cried their mercy; or over faith and freedom a whole universe rejoiced. There were strokes, almost, of interpretive genius as when the whole orchestra seemed to hang hushed and anxious before the first trumpet note. Yet Mr. Koussevitzky, in his eagerness to stress almost every measure musically and to bare it emotionally as well, tended to slice the overture into separate episodes; to take it not only intensely but spasmodically; to isolate the successive scenes rather than to maintain the whole ascendant course of the tonal drama. Not always did the sharpened edges quite join. Not for an instant will Mr. Koussevitzky believe it—but it is possible to try too hard.

In the final number—Ravel's orchestral version of Musorgsky's piano-pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition"—once more a moral was written clear. "New, first time" comes, and also goes, an interesting, impressive piece. Plainly it deserves more or less speedy repetition. Usually it misses that desert, because other "New, first times" crowd it to the back of the library-shelf and the choosing conductor's memory. Ravel's orchestral fantasia on these themes of Musorgsky has somehow escaped such fate. Two years ago, it was played to general and particular regard and approval. Yesterday it was replayed to welcoming and warming response. Musorgsky looked upon his dead-friend's pictures and to them wrote tonal notes—brief, simple, by affectionate memories intensified. He wrote also, thin-lined as it is, a graphic music of characterization. The quarreling Jews, one domineering, the other querulous; the peasant cart rumbling the roads among the folk; the lurching gnome; the chattering children; the tumult of the market-place; the ghostly chant of the catacombs; the witch riding the air; the state and din of old Russia feasting—bear manifold witness to it.

With or without warrant, Ravel saw in these pieces sketches for the piano, rather than of it, out of which he might draw tone-pictures with the definition and the shadings of a twentieth-century orchestra. He set to the task resourcefully and sympathetically. Soon his own delineative imagination was kindled, his own faculty of tonal characterization in diverse play. Where Musorgsky sketched as with the Jews, he now etches. Where Musorgsky set down an impression as with the rumbling cart, he paints a full tone-picture. Musorgsky heard the music of the catacombs and grieved for his dead friend who had drawn the sketch: Ravel makes it poignant and haunting to all men. Musorgsky dreamed of old Russia; Ravel bids a whole orchestra throb with it and cry it to the heavens. Transformation, transfiguration; but, believably enough, an inarticulate and tentative music released, affirmed, in full contours and firm voice. Yesterday, an orchestra twice as sensitive, plastic, colorful and responsive as it was two years ago was the means—and the fulfillment.

H. T. P.

Fourth Symphony of Tschaikovsky to be Given by Boston Orchestra

Post. Journal Dec 5

Written for the Sunday Journal.
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky is a piece that may be heard from many orchestras and under the baton of many conductors, but of these latter there are few indeed who can penetrate as does Mr. Koussevitzky into the innermost reaches of the score. An unusual experience, then, is in store for those who are to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concert at the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, when this particular symphony is to be the principal item on the programme.

A symphony, in the ordinary acceptance of the term, is absolute music, music which expresses nothing but itself, and yet Tchaikovsky wrote to his friend, Taniev, that "of course" this symphony was programme-music, and moreover, that he did not wish any symphonic work to emanate from him that had "nothing to express" or "consisted merely of harmonies and a purposeless design of rhythms and modulations." In the same communication he further declared that this symphony was in reality a reflection of Beethoven's Fifth—in its central idea, not in its musical content—and added that there was not a single bar of it that was not "an echo of his intimate spiritual life."

It is well known that Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony also had a programme, while presumably his Fifth had likewise a definite poetic foundation. But it is only in the case of his Fourth Symphony that the composer took it upon himself to explain in words just what the music meant to him and what it should in consequence convey to the listener.

The Fourth Symphony bears a dedication to "My Best Friend," who was none other than Najeda von Meck, the wealthy widow who so generously aided the composer, upon the understanding that he and she were never to meet. And it is in a letter written to his benefactress that his interpretation of this Symphony is to be found.

Since this explanation, or the essential part of it, is certain to be contained in Mr. Hale's programme notes for Tuesday's concert, it were superfluous to quote it here. But it may be briefly summarized: The Introduction, a menacing and portentous phrase for horns and bassoons, is symbolical of Fate, of the stern destiny that prevents our desires from reaching fulfillment. Passing to the main body of the movement we find in the chief theme, a melancholy cantilena for violins and violoncellos that, oddly enough, runs to waltz-rhythm, the lament of one who submits, though unwillingly, to Fate's decrees. But the second theme, a solacing melody for the clarinet, brings hope and encouragement. Not thus easily, however, is Fate to be dismissed; the ominous theme of the Introduction reappears and once more we are brought face to face with grim reality.

The second movement "shows suffering in another stage." The plaintive chief theme, given first to the oboe and repeated by the 'cellos, is the expression of that vague sorrow and depression that comes upon us when we sit alone and dream of the past, the mind filled with vain regrets.

By Tchaikovsky's own admission, however, the main body of the third movement, a Scherzo in which the strings, playing alone, are plucked throughout, expresses no definite feeling. But the lively, purposely vulgar Trio gives voice to the memory of a ribald peasant song, and later to the recollection of military music passing in the distance.

No doubt the listener quite unacquainted with Tchaikovsky's avowed intentions would recognize in the Finale the expression of a wild and furious gaiety. This is a popular festival, and, since Tchaikovsky was a Russian, a Russian folk-tune, "In the Fields there stood a Birch-Tree," is appropriately introduced. Here the protagonist of the Symphony, finding no joy in himself, turns to the beholding, and hence the sharing, of the joy of others. The ubiquitous Fate theme again announces its baleful presence, but this time it does not prevail. The popular tumult effectively drowns it out.

Not a particularly subtle or original programme. Nor is Tchaikovsky's invention in this case always distinguished, though his workmanship, his unerring mastery of all the composer's tools, compel here, as elsewhere, universal admiration. But despite the naivete of its underlying poetic idea and the occasional obviousness of its themes, the Fourth Symphony, especially as conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky, convinces and carries away the listener by dint of its burning sincerity, its sheer forcefulness of expression. Distinction in music is sometimes another word for emotional sterility. The most vital composers have not always attained to it while many a lesser music-maker has purchased it at the price of an ultimate oblivion. Despite the taunts of the superior the symphonies of Tchaikovsky still live and flourish, and when a Koussevitzky brings them home to us they stir and impress as little else in music may.

This Symphony has been heard in Providence from the Boston Symphony Orchestra as lately as December, 1921, while of the three remaining numbers on the programme one, Richard Strauss's witty Rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," was performed here by this orchestra on Jan. 23, 1923, and another, the "Forest Murmurs," from Wagner's music-drama "Siegfried," was played here April 21, 1925, but the third, Mozart's Serenade for string orchestra, "Eine Klene Nachtmusik" is, so far as the concerts of the Boston Symphony are concerned, a novelty.

Running in four movements, an Allegro, Romanze, Minuet and Rondo, this Serenade, or "Little Night-Music" as Mozart called it, is typical of that composer's fluent and graceful style, his melodic charm, his facile yet masterly handling of his medium. Music such as this needs no analysis and defies description. Studied in the score it seems slight in content and of an almost academic formality, even primness, but no such impression is gained from the hearing of it, in suitable performance, in the concert hall. There it fulfills the prescription that Mozart himself set down for all music; it "sounds." In that the published score bears the date Aug. 10, 1787, we may know that this Serenade is a product of Mozart's later, riper years.

At first blush nothing could seem farther removed from Mozart than the audacious and exuberant tone-poem of Strauss. But Strauss is a deal closer to Mozart, both in spirit and in musical substance, than many imagine. And small wonder, since Mozart has long been, and still is, Strauss's special idol among the composers of the past. The introductory measures of "Till" which serve the same purpose as the "Once upon a time" that is the classic beginning of all fairy tales, have, despite their modern harmonic and instrumental dress, a distinct Mozartean flavor. Alone among modern composers Strauss

IN ACCLAIM THIS CASE

By MOSES SMITH

The second concert of the Monday Evening Series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was featured by the piano-playing of Nadia Reisenberg, who made her Boston debut by appearing as soloist in Liszt's Piano Concerto in A major.

Her performance was the usual brilliant one demanded by a Liszt piece. She exhibited unusual vigor for a woman pianist, and her technique was always adequate for the intricacies of the score.

Most of all, however, this concerto demands skilled ensemble between solo instrument and orchestra; and last night's performance was notable in this respect. Miss Reisenberg's speed was on occasion dazzling, but she never lost Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. They were always with her. The rendition was deservedly applauded.

In two other pieces that made up the program—Brahms' Fourth Symphony and Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture—the orchestra played well, but not so well as on the occasion of the previous extra concerts this year.

There was not quite the cohesion between the various parts that one has come to expect of the Boston Symphony at its best. The strings had for the most part gorgeous tone, but on several occasions the playing was ragged. There were occasional slips in the brass, too.

The overture was, of course, an ideal piece for Mr. Koussevitzky, as it had been once before this season. Needless to say, the audience was grateful and recalled him many times.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Prov Journal Dec 8

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, played its third concert of its Providence season last evening at the Albee Theatre. The programme on the face of it, was not one to arouse any particular enthusiasm; but the finish of the performance and the marked clarity of the conductor's interpretation, particularly in the first and the last numbers, gave to the whole an interest and a charm that much more pretentious programmes would be unable to surpass.

The programme:

Mozart—"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Serenade for String Orchestra (K. 525)
- I. Allegro.
- II. Romanza: Andante.
- III. Menuetto: Allegretto.
- IV. Rondo: Allegro.

Wagner—"Forest Murmurs" from Siegfried (Act II)

Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner," in Rondo Form, Op. 28

Tchaikovsky—Symphony No. 4 in F-minor, Op. 36
- I. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima (in movimento di valse).
- II. Andantino in modo di canzona.
- III. Scherzo; pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.
- IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik" is a fine example of music that looks perfectly simple while setting the utmost demands on the performer's skill. The rapid bowings that demanded absolute precision, deftness of stroke, lightness of touch, perfect feeling for the conductor's beat, the subtle shifting of colors with the question and answer of violins, cellos, and violas, were delightful to watch as well as to hear. In the romanza the bright little dialogue between first violins and cellos, against a background of second violins and violas, shone like a gem in the light of both composition and performance.

To know Mozart is to have won deliverance from the burden of the heart bowed down. His music sings of the pure joy of living, and if by chance it hints at what lies on the further side of silence, it does so without exciting the least anxiety. His soul is sane and balanced, his superior will dominates a heart that is calm, unshaken by storm or passion. He has no hate, nor scorn, no aftermath of bitterness, nor any malignity. He speaks to a world he loves, whose love he craves in return. But what can he do in the face of such pessimistic archfiends as Strauss and Tchaikovsky?

From Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegels Lustige Streiche" one would observe some caution in speaking of Till's pranks as merry. Mr. Koussevitzky made good use of the trenchant wit that Strauss directed at the "hodge-podge of bankers and business men, basely out on pleasure bent," he made Till a veritable scoffer possessed of the devil, bringing malice to the market place, blasphemy to his monkish robes, seduction to his courtship, bear-baiting to his pedants, and a right good laugh to the hanging in which the stiffening limbs of the rascal make one final effort to do a step of the Charleston. He gave us also, in full measure, the scenes, the dialogue, the landscapes, and whatever else of phantasy or fact may have come into the composer's mind. Strauss was in no merry mood when he wrote the piece; for his disappointment at the failure of Guntram was still rankling in his soul. His use of popular themes on which to build his work has disguised to some extent his purpose; but Mr. Koussevitzky's reading has set it in its true light in so far as it can be set:

"But he who understands it would be able
To add a story to the tower of Babel."

Mr. Koussevitzky is at his best in the playing of Tchaikovsky, and he takes care that what he offers is of Tchaikovsky's best, thus keeping high the standard of both music and performance. We have been told of the significance of the Fourth Symphony and those of us who accept it as the working of fate doubtless saw her hand in the various scenes of the symphony. Perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky makes her a little more pitiless and relentless than some of his colleagues. And possibly he lacks a little of the romance and poetic glow of Stokowsky, or the cool, crystal fluency of Gabrilowitsch; but on the other hand he certainly spares us the bumptious uproar of Mengelberg, when that conductor decides to make a noise. His violins never become rough and raucous with excitement, nor do his 'cellos, from over-exertion, ever develop hoarseness and asthma, nor do his brasses and wood winds split the air, even when announcing the entrance of something as formidable and sinister as fate.

But for all that, there were some marshlands of music in that first movement, full of cacophonous monotony, relieved here and there by lovely little fancies; but the whole thing is too bitter for us who take our bitterness with Anglo-Saxon seriousness. The Russian probably enjoys it, taking it evidently with the proverbial salt. We suffer.

The remarkable pizzicato third movement was done pizzicato to the bitter end, in spite of its overwhelming demands on both conductor and players.

M. C. W.

To-night's Boston Symphony Concert

Hartford Times Dec 8

Through Radio Station WBZ at 8:15

To-night's Boston Symphony orchestra concert, the ninth of the series of twenty-four Saturday night concerts, will be broadcast through station WBZ at 8:15. This concert will be sent out only on the wave of WBZ, the chain network of six stations now linked together for transmitting the symphony programs not tieing in with WBZ until Saturday, December 25.

Modern French music will be featured on this week's program by the celebrated orchestra of 107 musicians under the direction of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, the program including Ravel's poem, "La Valse," and Darius Milhaud's suite, "The Carnival D'Aix." Ravel made a sketch of "The Waltz" during the war and finished the work in 1920.

Darius Milhaud, celebrated pianist, who will appear as soloist on this program, is one of the group of young French composers known as "The Six." This group, which includes Honneger, Poulenc, Mlle. Tailleferre, Durey and Auric, represents the most radical tendencies in modern French music.

The complete program is as follows:

Schumann—Symphony in B flat major, No. 1 Op. 38.
- I. Andante un poco meestoso; Allegro molto vivace.
- II. Larghetto.
- III. Scherzo; molto vivace. Trio I. Molto piu vivace; trio II.

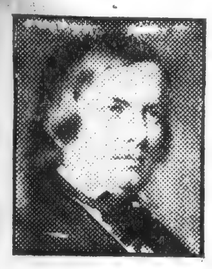
Milhaud—"Le Carnaval d'Aix"; Fantasy for piano and orchestra on the ballet, "Salade."
- I. Le Corso.
- II. Tartaglia.
- III. Isabelle.
- IV. Rosetta.
- V. Le Bon et le Nauvais Tuteur.
- VI. Coviello.
- VII. Le Capitaine Cartuccia.
- VIII. Polichinelle.
- IX. Polka.
- X. Cinzio.
- XI. Souvenir de Rio (tango).
- XII. Finale.

Ravel—"La Valse," Choregraphic poem.

Soloist—Darius Milhaud.

[The following notes are taken from this week's Boston Symphony program book.]

Symphony No. 1, in B-Flat Major. Op. 38
Robert Schumann



Robert Schumann

(Born at Wickau, Saxony, June 8, 1810; died at Endenich, near Bonn, July 29, 1856)

Schumann was married to Clara Wieck, September 12, 1840, after doubts, anxieties, and opposition on the part of her father; after a nervous strain of three or four years. His happiness was great, but to say with some that his joy was the direct inspiration of the First Symphony would be to go against the direct evidence submitted by the composer. He wrote Ferdinand Wenzel: "It is not possible for me to think of the journal"—the Neue Zeitschrift fur Musik, founded by Schumann, Wieck, Schunke, and Knorr in 1834, and edited in 1841 by Schumann alone; "I have during the last days finished a task (at least in sketches) which filled me with happiness, and almost exhausted me. Think of it, a whole symphony—and, what is more, a Spring symphony: I, myself, can hardly believe that it is finished." And he said in a letter (November 23, 1842) to Spohr: "I wrote the symphony toward the end of the winter of 1841, and, if I may say so, in the vernal passion that sways men until they are very old, and surprises them again with each year. I do not wish to portray, to paint; but I believe firmly that the period in which the symphony was produced influenced its form and character, and shaped it as it is." He wrote to Wilhelm Taubert, who was to conduct the work in Berlin: "Could you infuse into your orchestra in the performance a sort of longing for the Spring, which I had chiefly in mind when I wrote in February, 1841? The first entrance of trumpets, this I should like to have sounded as though it were from high above, like unto a call to awakening; and then I should like reading between the lines, in the fest of the Introduction, how everywhere it begins to grow green, how a butterfly takes wing; and, in the Allegro, how little by little all things come that in any way belong to Spring. True, these are fantastic thoughts, which came to me after my work was finished: only, I tell you this about the Finale, that I thought it as the good-bye of Spring."

Berthold Litzmann, in the second volume of his "Clara Schumann" (Leipsic, 1906), gives interesting extracts from the common diary of Schumann and his wife, notes written while Schumann was composing this symphony.

Towards the end of December, 1840, she complained that Robert had been for some days "very cold toward her, yet the reason for it is a delightful one." On January 17-23, 1841, she wrote that it was not her week to keep the diary, "but, if a man is composing a symphony, it is not to be expected that he will do anything else."

According to the diary, Schumann completed the symphony on Tuesday, January 26. "Begun and finished in four days. . . . If there were only an orchestra for it right away. I must confess, my dear husband, I did not give you credit for such dexterity." Schumann began to work on the instrumentation January 27, and Clara impatiently waited to hear a note of the symphony. The instrumentation of the first movement was completed February 4, that of the second and third movements on February 13, the fourth on February 20, in the year 1841. Not till February 14 did Schumann play the symphony to her. E. F. Wenzel, later a teacher at the Leipsic Conservatory, and E. Pfundt, a kettledrum player of the Gewandhaus orchestra, were present. "I should like," she wrote in her diary, "to say a little something about the symphony, yet I should not be able to speak of the little buds, the perfume of the violets, the fresh green leaves, the birds in the air. . . . Do not laugh at me, my dear husband! If I cannot express myself poetically, nevertheless the poetic breath of this work has stirred my very soul." The instrumentation was completed on February 20.

The symphony was first performed, from manuscript, at a concert given by Clara Schumann for the benefit of the Orchestra Pension Fund in the hall of the Gewandhaus, Leipsic, March 31, 1841. Mendelssohn conducted. Clara Schumann played the Adaigo and Rondo from Chopin's Concerto in F minor, and pieces by Schumann, Mendelssohn, Scarlatti, Thalberg's Fantaisie on themes from Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," and with Mendelssohn his new duo for four hands. H. Schmidt sang an air from Gluck's "Iphigenie"

The first performance in New York was by the Philharmonic Society, April 23, 1853, led by Theodore Eisfeld.

The first performance in Boston was a little earlier, January 15, 1853, by the Musical Fund Society, Mr. Suck conductor.

"Le Carnaval d'Aix," Fantasia for Pianoforte and Orchestra (after "Salade") ..... Darius Milhaud

(Born at Aix, in Provene, September 4, 1892; now living)

This Suite was produced in New York by the Philharmonic Society, Mr. Mengelberg conductor, on December 9, 1926. Mr. Milhaud gave the following information to Mr. Lawrence Gilman, the brilliant editor of the Philharmonic Society's Programme Books.

" 'The Carnaval d'Aix' is a suite of twelve morceaux. It was composed in June of the present year, especially for my present American tour, and for performance (the first anywhere) with the Philharmonic Society. I have given the titles of traditional figures of old Italian Comedy to certain of the movements. Certain others —as that of No. XI, 'Souvenirs de Rio (Tango),' explain themselves. The old Italian Comedy personages appear also in my ballet 'Salade,' from which the 'Carnival d'Aix' is derived. 'Salade,' a 'ballet chante,' was produced in June, 1924"—(here Mr. Milhaud is mistaken. Read "the latter part of May, 1924"—see Le Menestrel and Revue Musicale). " . . . The scenario of the ballet is an imbroglio of the Italian Comedy which explains the title. The music of the 'Carnival d'Aix' aims merely at a gay and vivacious treatment of the ideas suggested by the subject. The scoring is very simple, and is for a normal orchestra."

Mr. Milhaud first visited the United States as pianist, lecturer, conductor, in the season of 1922-23. In Boston, he was then heard as lecturer and pianist. Two movements of a string quartet composed in 1912 and dedicated to the memory of Paul Cezanne had been played in Boston by the Flonzaley Quartet (December 10, 1914); Lawrence Haynes had sung "Dissolution" (April 6, 1920); and Milhaud's Second Orchestral Suite had been performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, on April 22, 1921.

On January 26, 27, 1923, Mr. Milhaud conducted in Philadelphia a concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra when he introduced an Overture by Poulenc, a Nocturne from Anric's music for Moliere's "Les Facheux," Satie's "Parade," three Dances from his own "Saudades do Brasil" and Steinbach's arrangement of C. P. E. [illegible]erto in D.

On December 5, 1926, he played the piano part of his Ballade (piano and orchestra) with the New York Symphony Orchestra. (He had played it at a concert of the International Composers' Guild, New York, on January 17, 1923.)

Mr. Milhaud entered the Paris Conservatory in 1909 and studied there until 1915: the violin with Berthelier, harmony with Leroux, counterpoint with Gedalge, and composition with Widor. In 1911 he was awarded a first accessit for violin-playing; in 1914-15 a first accessit for counterpoint. "In 1915 he obtained a prize for composition by his sonata for two violins and pianoforte."

"The Waltz," A Choregraphic Poem
Joseph Maurice Ravel

Joseph Maurice Ravel

(Born at Ciboure, Basses-Pyrenees, March 7, 1875; living near Paris)

This distinguished composer of the modern French school was educated in music at the Conservatory of Paris, entering in 1890, the preparatory class in piano playing, and remaining in the school until 1904, having then reached the age limit of eligibility for the Roman Prize.

He was a pupil of de Beriot in piano playing, of Pessard in harmony, of Gedalge in counterpoint and of Gabriel Faure in composition.

When "La Valse" was played in Paris for the first time at a Lamoureaux concert, December 12, 1920, the music suggested to the critic, Raymond Schwab, "the atmosphere of a Court-ball of the Second Empire, at first a frenzy indistinctly sketched by the pizzicati of double-basses, then transports sounding forth the full hysteria of an epoch. To the graces and languors of Carpeaux is opposed an implied anguish with some Prud-homme exclaiming: 'We dance on a volcano.' There is a certain threatening in this bacchanale, a drunkenness, as it were, warning itself of its decay, perhaps by the dissonances and shock of timbres, especially the repeated combinations in which the strings grate against the brass."

We are indebted to Mr. Alfredo Casella, the celebrated composer and pianist, for the following information.

"The Waltz" was sketched by Ravel during the war and completed in 1920. The themes employed are of the Viennese nature. "The Waltz" was composed with the thought of a dance-production, but Ravel had no exact idea of a choregraphic production. In November, 1920, Ravel and Casella played an arrangement for two pianofortes at a concert of the Schoenberg-Musikverein in Vienna.

Darius Milhaud, young French composer who has courted renown as a musical radical, will play the piano part in the first American performance of his fantasy, "The Carnival at Aix," at the Symphony concerts this week Friday and Saturday. M Milhaud, now 34 years of age, was several years ago a prime mover in a group of Parisian composers who called themselves "The Six," though there were actually but five of them. When Mr Monteux was conductor here he put one of Milhaud's works on the program, with the result that a few actively annoyed auditors hissed it, one of the very few occasions when hisses have been heard in Symphony Hall. The fantasy to be heard this week is drawn from a ballet entitled jocosely "Salad."

Nadia Reisenberg, who will be soloist at the Monday symphony this week, studied at the Leningrad Conservatory in Russia and later in New York with Alexander Lambert. She has appeared as soloist with the New York Symphony Society and at concerts of the League of Composers and of the Friends of Music in New York. Her first Boston recital will be given Feb 17 next.

Mr Koussevitzky has set for the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony, to be given Dec 26, a "popular" program on which the featured number will be Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture, with an auxiliary brass band off stage. Strauss' "Voices of Spring," waltz; Rossini's "William Tell" overture; Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" (orchestrated by Berlioz); Sibelius' "Valse Triste" and all of Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker" suite are the other numbers.

It will be interesting to hear what the regular orchestra under its regular conductor can do with these favorites of "Pops" audiences. Mr Koussevitzky, unlike the Pops' conductors, can command unlimited rehearsals. His version of "1812' should be worth hearing—preferably from a considerable distance.

Mr Mollenhauer will conduct the annual "Messiah" performances next week, which have for generations been an established part of the holiday festivities in Boston at Christmas time.

John McCormack will sing today in Symphony Hall his favorite song, which perhaps to the surprise of some of his admirers is not an Irish song at all but Brahms' "May Night." As the title is listed in German he will probably sing it in that tongue. Curiously, Edwin Schneider, for many years McCormack's accompanist, will play a piano piece by Selim Palmgren with the same title, "May Night." This time there will be no assisting fiddler or cellist, but Mr Schneider will play solos in the tenor's necessary resting periods.

64

SEVENTH OF SIBELIUS

TRANSCRIPT Dec 9

The Composer's Newest Symphony Impending from Mr. Koussevitzky—A New Sort of Novelty—Course of the Music and Characteristics Along the Way—Again Directness and Economy

OF NOVELTIES in the concert-hall there are both degrees and kinds. No conductor known to Boston has been more assiduous with them than Mr. Koussevitzky. Into the past he has delved for music all but forgotten. Novelty it has yielded. To the present he has turned for music which would force the hand of the future. To aspiring youth among composers he has been generous. Novelty again, manifold. Less frequently has he sought composers of established reputation and taken from them new pieces that espoused no theory, proclaimed no progress, tried no experiment, forced no idiom; were merely the making of music out of creative impulse in the form and language preferred by the maker. Such a piece is almost a new kind of novelty for Symphony Hall under the present dispensation. Friday and Saturday will bring it—the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, first played at Copenhagen in 1925, heard again at Philadelphia in the spring of 1926.

From his first Symphony (1899) to this Seventh, Sibelius, like Beethoven, has given strong impress of individuality to each of his larger works. None of his Symphonies is like either its predecessors or its successors. In each, form, harmony, themes, orchestration, spring out of the mood to which the composer would give utterance in music. This Seventh Symphony is cast in a single movement. It has been said that it is without key, yet it gravitates about the key of C major, is actually in C major, as much as any "classic" of the same length would have been had it been overtly labelled "in the key of C." Beginning in A minor, it shows the reverse side of C major. The major key soon enters; grows somber as C minor, and returns. Heightened feeling takes it to E-flat major; through many final measures C major is the tonality. Never was key-scheme more conservative, more economical.

The formal structure is seemingly conditioned by two purposes. The first is to dignify, ennoble and clarify the main theme by all manner of contrasting device, from the gloomy, semi-articulate introductory measures, through scherzo-like sections, to a close in which for the first time sentiment, though but for a moment, shows its head amidst heights and breadths. The second is to reach the glories of that close by a series of climaxes each more lofty than the other, after the manner of the mountain climber who must first scale subsidiary peaks before he may stand upon the highest pinnacle of the range. This main theme is always intoned by solo-trombone; and three times its full grandeur is proclaimed. Each time the tempo is Adagio. In the first Adagio, at the beginning of the symphony, it is heralded by two preceding themes. The comparison with the ascent of the mountain peak may be useful. Ascending minor scale-passages make one feel the darkness. There is an occasional flicker of light as woodwinds play about. A serene, highly lyric theme for strings leaves the gloom of the minor behind. How the massed strings do sing! It is day, the white dawn of day in the mountains. And now the trombone theme. The topmost peak has become visible, the radiant sun is upon it. Pulses quicken. Scale-passages and woodwind-figures, now anything but gloomy, gradually bring on a Vivacissimo which reminds Mr. Gilman of the Scherzo of Beethoven's Eroica Symphony. Presently high sprits relax. The Adagio returns and with it another glimpse of the trombone theme. But the key is now C minor—with clouds overshadowing the mountain-top. The theme itself keeps to the same notes as at the first appearance. Sibelius ingeniously avoids in it such tones as distinguish major from minor. Background alone has the more somber cast.

Again there is more animation. The background scale-figure takes on new forms. We are lead through C major, Allegro Molto, to a second climax—another secondary peak, if you will. With further quickening of spirits, Sibelius proceeds through a Vivace, E-flat, to next to the highest peak. The Allegro Molto has a theme, taken antiphonally by strings and woodwinds, in playful folk-song style. In the Vivace a new Scherzo-figure is used and maintained through the more vivid presto (C major). Before long holding notes in the horns broaden and deepen the mood without losing sense of the heights that have been attained. In all its glory and grandeur the trombone theme again appears in a sustained and exalted Adagio. The mountain-top is conquered; the world lies outspread. Still further the mood broadens to a largamento. Summarily yet with a touch of sentiment, Sibelius recalls the themes he has encountered in his ascent to the heights; then with a little splash of harmonic color and a few broad chords, swiftly ends the symphony.

The idiom in which Sibelius writes this Seventh Symphony is for this day and age, startlingly direct and surprisingly simple. The harmonies are largely diatonic and altogether straightforward. Nor does the composer ask an especially large orchestra. Flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, in pairs; a quartet of horns; of trumpets and trombones three each; the usual strings; timpani—and his orchestra is complete.

No better summary of Sibelius's present place in music can easily be found than that in a short essay published anonymously by the English house of Chester: "It is easy to see what exactly it is that captivates the music-lover in some of Sibelius's smaller compositions; but the task of defining what is attractive or repellant, as the case may be, to the cultivated musician in his larger work, is a much harder one. The old objection to the 'unapproachable nature' of his idiom will hardly be raised nowadays; it is the meaning behind the idiom which still remains difficult to grasp. Our luxurious age is accustomed to hear a great deal of elaborate and discursive music which covers up a small mental effort by means of repetition and sham development, contrived with changes of color and rhythm. Can we wonder that it finds it disconcerting to listen to a music which is simply concerned with the delivery of its message in the most direct manner, and leaves off, often abruptly, as soon as this task is fulfilled? The music of Sibelius never comes to us as a shallow-minded but voluble guest, who hides the poverty of his conversation under an agreeable verbal flow, and wastes much empty phraseology over his leave-taking. . . . If we are willing to forego much in the way of orthodox recapitulation and conventional peroration, we shall experience the peculiar satisfaction of having listened to the expression of a vigorous mentality, while others will only complain of lack of coherence and climax."

A. H. M.

MANY-VOICED SONORITIES

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Orchestra Vouchsafe Brahms to the "Monday" Public—The Strings Triumphant—Miss Reisenberg with a Will

THE audience last evening at Symphony Hall was the last of Bostonian audiences to hear a work in which Mr. Koussevitzky is adding greatly to his laurels, in which the orchestra as a sonorous and sensitive instrument excels, in which composer is freshly coming to his rights—Brahms's Fourth Symphony. To the Friday and Saturday audiences Mr. Koussevitzky has played it, to that of Tuesday afternoon, and now the audience of the Monday series had opportunity to benefit by such refinements as come to a piece of music through repeated performance and rehearsal. Again Mr. Koussevitzky made of the symphony a living thing, warm-blooded, full-throated. To him the rhythmically characteristic theme of the first movement, indeed the whole movement—its rich counterpoint, its harmonic freshness, its ever-changing tonal coloring, is a piece of glowing, throbbing pageantry. And how the song of the second movement wends its revealing and appealing way, through change after change. And where have composer and conductor combined to make a third movement more sportive, more numerous and gay, more full of fun and jollity than in this symphony of Brahms? And the variations of the last are a veritable tone poem on an unannounced subject. Much has been said recently about the preponderance of brass in Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting. Not so much has been said about the reverse side of the matter. The last movement yesterday provided a case in point. Toward the middle of the movement after a powerful climax there is a relaxing of mood, brasses play softly in a sort of Sarabande rhythm. After a lull full brass in full sonority is heard. Through it pierce the massed violins. And pierce it they did. They would pierce anything anywhere. One is reminded that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now one hundred and eight men strong, that most of the increase over the standard one hundred of many years, is in these very strings for the purpose of balancing and justifying a more sonorous brass. Of course very listener knows that there are times when brass is intended by the composer to dominate all. But last evening at any rate, and frequently before, whenever strings or wood-winds really had something to say against loud brass, they gave good account of themselves. Increase in brass sonority by and of itself is not open to objection if there is corresponding other increase. At least so reasons one hearer whose seat is always at the right of Symphony Hall. Is the left really different, with brasses seated back stage, blowing straight down the center of the hall?

For assisting artist Mr. Kousevitzky presented Miss Nadia Reisenberg. With orchestra she played Liszt's second concerto, in A major, the one which Mr. Apthorp has so felicitously called "The Life and Adventures of a Melody." Again a pageant of glowing color. It runs riot, here, there, everywhere. The piano itself often does no more than add its characteristic color. While at other times it sings themes, or adds to the general hubbub. The whole Liszt is in this music. Finer pages than some of these he has not written. But amongst this finery are also pages which the present ear would willingly delete. Thus sounds too much of Liszt.

Miss Reisenberg possesses all the accomplishments of the soloist who would appear successfully with an orchestra such as the Boston Symphony. Her technic can meet any demands—in facility, as an agent of color, in producing volume of sound. Of equal excellence is the tonal quality of her melodies. To it all she brings discerning musicianship. With Liszt she can languish and with him she can strike fire. And above all she plays with a will, a will of her own. Not altogether is she satisfied to take tempos and moods from Mr. Koussevitzky. With head and shoulders tracing her rhythms in the air, time and again she sets her own tempos, plans her own interpretations, which conductor and orchestra follow. And to no disadvantage does she do this. For hers is an understanding admirably equipped thus to direct the course of much of the music she plays. One would welcome Miss Reisenberg in a recital of her own.

For close upon this program of three numbers came Berlioz's overture of the Roman Carnival. Again the English horn sang its plaintive song, again flutes painted flying red scarfs (where else, in all music, do flutes paint brilliant red?), again the tumult of the crowds ran its highly rhythmed course. To such song, such color, such tumult Mr. Koussevitzky gave each its fullest play. If excitement is good for the ending of a program this overture is well chosen closing number. And if this overture provides excitement, Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra are its proper voice. For nerves and heartbeats of all listeners were in high state of stimulation before the overture was finished. Upon a brass chord it finishes. That chord stands at the very pinnacle of the tremendous climax. Here it alone must carry the weight of all that has lead up to it. Here justly, then, that brass chord must obliterate all else before it is able to stand by itself. And—without apologies—it does.

A. H. M.

REDUCTION

RATIO

13x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MILHAUD AS GUEST; SCHUMANN RENEWED; RAVEL THREADBARE

Transcript Dec 18

THE NEWCOMER'S ENTERTAINING MUSIC

A Light, Neat, Lively Suite of Dance-Tunes, Pleasantly Fanciful—"The Waltz" for Piece Too Often Played—The One "Spring Symphony" Under Mr. Koussevitzky's Hand

LIKE the Lady Angela in "Patience," Mr. Darius Milhaud, guest yesterday at the Symphony Concert, is "a plump and pleasing person." Self-effacingly and sufficiently, he played the piano-part in one of his pieces, designed in particular for his present American tour; smiled upon an applausive audience; waved a glad hand to an orchestra that had served him well; set quite enough tongues gossipping because he wore working dress for what some count a ceremonious occasion. (In spite of these good ladies, the fashion of jackets by day in the concert-hall is becoming custom—even such easy-going jackets as Mr. Milhaud's.) His piece was "The Carnival at Aix"—his native town—Fantasia for Piano and Orchestra in twelve divisions, drawn from "Salade," ballet, or as the composer chose to label it, "choreographic counterpoint," devised in the spring of 1924 for the esoteric "soirées" in Paris of the Count of Beaumont. "Salade" was then interspersed with speech and song. If the reviewers are to be believed, the "choreographic counterpoint" was intended to prove something—exactly what they fail to make clear. There is nothing, however, contentious or esoteric about Mr. Milhaud's derivative Fantasia. Its purpose is to please, and it pleases as "gayly and vivaciously" as the composer would have it.

The orchestra is a normal orchestra, seldom subtilized by sub-divided or intricately suffused timbres; rarely distorted, as in the ornate exercises for the tuba; then obviously for whim. The piano-part is as free from excursions into virtuosity or meanderings into decoration for decoration's sake, rhythms it. So far as this Fantasia goes, he lusts not at all for polytonality, atonality and other gawds of modernity. Nor is he inclined, beyond comfortable endurance, to acerbated and biting harmonies. Mr. Milhaud would not be himself did he not wind into his "Carnival" speech incisive; while spiritedly he discordant keys. The zest for jazz that ran in him during his first visit to America seems to have "petered out"; while he chooses ragtime but sparingly. In fact, the whole impression of the Fantasia is of a sprightly, smiling, occasionally fanciful music, simplified throughout. In not a few measures it would have suited a glorified musical comedy. No more persistently do composers in that genre rhythm with the drums.

There are twelve divisions in "The Carnival at Aix," so brief that the whole fête—and its music—barely consume a half hour. One, by way of introduction, is the street-scene ("Le Corso") with crowding figures and hurrying feet many-gaited, rhythmed and paced accordingly. Another is a bedizened, wanton, sophisticated polka, brought glintingly off. A third is the tango, deliciously languorous at the beginning, only to fling loose in syncopations and discordancies—the two sides, as it were, of an intrinsically sensual music. For ending, a Finale of summarizing and departing gusto. The other divisions were each labelled with the name of a personage from the commedia dell' arte, even to such rarely reappearing figures as Coviello and Cinzio. Under these titles Mr. Milhaud wrote now a music of frank and lively humor; again a music of running melody and sportive sentiment; yet again a music of pleasing fancies, with harmonic and instrumental sauce piquante. Only at rare moments did one or another of these dainty dishes jell a bit too heavily. Often, for that matter, the orchestra seemed lighter-handed than the composer.

In sum a Fantasia (or a "choreographic counterpoint") that was entertainment, content with that office, by no means to be disparaged on either score. The overrighteous, the superfluously priggish, may spend all their time, if they like, in "communion" with "the masters"—like the kneeling figures, stiff-sculptured upon mediæval tombs. For the rest of us, less free from human frailty, occasional half-hours of music that bears no "message," achieves no "heights," diverts and is done. There is reason to wish only that it be gaily invented, fancifully fashioned, piquantly flavored. Mr. Milhaud's Fantasia answers to these prescriptions. Though the will sometimes surpasses the deed, it is no small virtue in the younger French and Italian composers—Rieti for the latter—that they have led music as entertainment back into theater and concert-hall. Like the devil with the good tunes, the musical comedies need not have all the fun.

An elder Parisian succeeded Mr. Milhaud upon the symphonic scene—Ravel, of another "choreographic counterpoint," to wit "The Waltz." At five pairs of concerts within as many years has it been played in Symphony Hall. Agreed that conductors, the world over, love the piece to frequent repetition—as they cherish other singular and perverse affections. Admitted that Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, many times mated in it, have brought performance to high pitch of skill and surety. None the less, from sheer over-acquaintance, the music is wearing thin and shiny. We listeners hear all the shortcomings; half-close our ears to most of the accomplishment; heed the orchestra rather than the composer. The catastrophic close has become, for the while, rather empty sound and fury; the upbuilding and the shattering of the waltz-tune seem no more than adept conjuring; the waltz-motiv emerging from the dark, no longer stirs sensuous sensations, evokes no courtly visions. Not the substance and the imagery, but the rhetoric and the manipulation, now engage us. Hardly fair to Ravel is this present residue, though "The Waltz" falls short of his richest and keenest work. More unfair is the present seclusion, upon some overlooked shelf, of his "Spanish Rhapsody," the suite in memory of Couperin, even the orchestral version of "Alborada del Gracioso."

A welcome restoration, however, began the concert, applauded to the echo by an audience that remembered, anticipated and took fresh joy. For the first time in four or five seasons. Schumann's Symphony in B-flat major—his Symphony of the Spring—returned to the active repertory. It is true that he wrote for no such piercing brass as now answers to Mr. Koussevitzky's call. His was the mellower German way of the mid-nineteenth century. True also, the conductor over-labored sundry measures for the sake of musical emphasis or emotion outflung. Oftener than Mr. Koussevitzky seems to believe, the lyric Schumann, like the more lyric Schubert, is content merely to sing along. True, finally, he might have more clarified Schumann at his instrumental thickest and eased him when he is fumbling his symphonic tools. On the other hand, the conductor, after his habit, gave the composer rhythmic and melodic life; intensified the warm-running moods; achieved—the virtuosi of the orchestra aiding—many a rare and fine felicity.

Little matter these reservations of reflection. Led again into the living world, Schumann spoke out—or rather sung out—for himself. The introduction stirred from middle grayness into bright anticipation, and Mr. Koussevitzky gave it tonal splendor. The first movement ran quick with ardent mood, spurring rhythm, ascendant song. As an old English word has it, within and without was glee. Possibly Schumann wrote the Larghetto like a piano-piece; but it was in such musing and quick-coming fancies that he struck his most characteristic note. Nor, secreted in a piano, are there singing horns. The two Trios of the Scherzo are like gayety irresistibly renewed, brightening at each new flight. Ways and means rarely cumber. In the Finale, where Mr. Koussevitzky was over-strenuous, runs indeed the lustihood of spring and of symphonic song, but graciously, lightly, eagerly and evasively—both moods at once. "Full spring" indeed, as Schumann early purposed to label it, but spring still nymph-like, tripping the Rhenish hills. For once in a flood of moods, Schumann forgot anxious scruple over a form that the orthodox of those days too jealously guarded. Joyously, he wrote to a friend, he worked—and the one vernal rhapsody in symphonic music still gladdens the ears of men.

H. T. P.

As Guest-Conductors

Mr. Casella and Mr. Respighi at the Symphony Concerts

IN the first week of January, the Symphony Orchestra will make another journey to New York. Upon its return, Mr. Koussevitzky will take a fortnight's holiday. During his absence, two composers will be guest-conductors—Mr. Casella at the concerts of Jan. 14 and 15; Mr. Respighi at the concerts of Jan. 21 and 22. In Mr. Monteux's time, Mr. Casella came in both capacities to Symphony Hall, and was pianist as well. His own pieces lacked neither skill nor individual flavor; he was sufficiently able as conductor; as pianist he was notable. In the second visit, he will be heard in his own music and in the music of other composers. He will not, however, be pianist, since Mr. Gieseking is "assisting artist" at the same pair of concerts, presumably in one or another of Mr. Casella's pieces for piano and orchestra. In outlook, the composer-conductor may be described as a modernist who has not forgotten the classics; cosmopolitan rather than Italian.

Mr. Respighi, overlooked in Boston during his first visit to the United States last winter, is the familiar composer of the two orchestral suites, "Fountains of Rome" and "Pines of Rome," the transcriber also of a remembered set of ancient dances. Other of his pieces are still unplayed in Boston—a "Dramatic Symphony," a second set of archaic dances, the prelude to his opera, "Belphegor." One or more of these is likely to stand on his program. In Italy and Germany Mr. Respighi is favorably known as conductor; while as such a year ago, Philadelphia and Chicago received him warmly. He is older than Mr. Casella, more conservative and more Italian. . . . So choosing, the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra better the quality and enlarge the interest of their guest-conductors.

a tango out of the Brazil that he affectionately remembers from fruitful sojourn. He may even touch it with mildly Rather, it tends to be heavy-handed and square-toed; for, truth to tell, Mr. Milhaud as pianist has not what the Victorians called "a delicate finger." Directness of musical speech is evidently one of his traits as composer of the present day. Utilizing the higher "registers" of his instruments and "pointing up" the piano-part, he also makes that

Two Generations; Two Cosmopolites

Ottorino Respighi

Alfredo Casella

Guest-Conductors and Guest-Composers, Next Month, at the Symphony Concerts

More and Soon

A Lacking $10,000 for the Opera Guarantee Fund — Advantages to Guarantors

THE Guarantee Fund for the fortnight of opera next February is still in need of additional subscriptions. In the past fortnight it has increased by $5000, but $10,000 more is necessary to security and ease. So good a cause, so reasonable a request, should require no urging. At least twenty thousand persons in Boston and roundabout take the pleasure of this annual visit of the Chicago Company. Most of them anticipate it confidently and a bit too complacently. Yet a Guarantee Fund, yearly subscribed to the full amount, is essential. Otherwise, Boston would go operaless. It enjoys opera now, because relatively few of that twenty thousand take the unescapable deficit on their shoulders—unescapable if variety of repertory and merit of performance are to be maintained.

The Boston-Chicago Opera Association assumes the risk for no other object than the prestige and the pleasure of the city. It does not pass the buck or bid "George" do it, asking for its considerable and otherwise unrequited labors only the subscriptions of fellow-citizens to the Guarantee Fund it has itself begun. Possible subscribers, dreading a large assessment, need have no fears that it will exceed, for 1927, the usual eighteen or twenty per cent. Desiring some tangible advantage, they may remember that they will have first choice of seats. They will do well. likewise, to give quickly, as the distribution of guarantors' seats is in progress. Now is the time; the offices of the Opera-Association at 24 Federal Street, the place. The telephone—Congress 6500—will do the job.

SYMPHONY SUBSCRIPTIONS

Four-Fifths of the Fund to Meet the Annual Deficit Now Pledged—Need of Another $15,000—Arrayed Subscribers

The current program-book at the Symphony Concerts makes a first report of the subscription and the subscribers to the annual "operating deficit" of the Symphony Orchestra. Of the $75,000 asked by the trustees last October to meet running expenses for the season of 1926-27, $62,614.67 has been pledged within two months—large and clear response to the merit of the orchestra, the interest of the concerts, the prestige of the conductor, the wisdom of the management. A further $15,000 would not only be welcome, but is necessary to the continuance of present quality and standards. To Mr. E. B. Dane, treasurer, at 6 Beacon street, additional subscriptions should be sent. Present subscribers to the deficit are:

A—Gordon Abbott, Clara A. Adams, Mrs. Thomas Allen, Mrs. William H. Ames, Margaret Anthony, Percy L. Atherton.

B—Charles E. Bacon, Mrs. Arthur J. Barkhouse, R. S. Barlow, Mr. and Mrs. S. J. Barnet, Mrs. John W. Bartol, The Misses Bates, Mr. and Mrs. Edward B. Bayley, Mrs. Walter C. Bayliss, Mrs. Boylston A. Beal, Mrs. Daniel Beckwith (Providence, R. I.), Sylenda Beebe, Mrs. Edward H. Best, Mrs. Arthur W. Blake, Henry W. Bliss, Charles Boyden, Mary G. Bradford, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas S. Bradlee, Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Cameron Bradley, Mrs. E. D. Brandegee, F. R. Brewer, Leo Bruzza (Brooklyn, N. Y.), Ellen T. Bullard, Helen C. Burnham, M. C. Burnham, Mrs. W. A. Burnham, Mrs. H. M. Burr, I. Tucker Burr.

C—Mrs. Arthur T. Cabot, Frederick P. Cabot, Henry B. Cabot, Mrs. J. W. Carter, Louise W. Case, Horace D. Chapin, Mabel H. Chapin, Mrs. Henry M. Chase, Dr. and Mrs. D. Cheever, Mrs. George O. G. Coale, Mrs. Edwin Pauling Cochran (New Haven, Conn.), C. A. Codman, Winthrop Coffin, E. L. Coleman, Mr. and Mrs. James D. Colt, Mrs. William C. Conant, Mrs. Algernon Coolidge, Ellen W. Coolidge, Mrs. J. G. Coolidge, Mrs. J. T. Coolidge, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Coonley, Mrs. S. V. R. Crosby, Charles P. Curtis, Sarah P. Cushing, In Memory of C. S. D.

D—R. H. Dana Mr. and Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, Mabel W. Daniels, Mrs. Henry B. Day, Mr. and Mrs. Robert L. DeNormandie, Ross L. Dexter, Mrs. Malcolm Donald, Mr. and Mrs. John Duff, F. L. Dunne & Co.

E—Mabel T. Eager, B. L. Eaton, L. H. Eaton, Violet Edmands, Hannah M. Edwards, Mrs. L. F. Edwards, [illegible] Eisenmann, Irene Ellis, Augusta C. Ely, Elizabeth B. Ely, H. D. Eustis, The Misses Eustis.

F—Dr. and Mrs. John W. Farlow, Mrs. William G. Farlow, Mrs. D. E. Fay, William Fenollosa, Frederick P. Fish, Edith S. Fisher, Frances B. Fisher, Carrie T. Fitch, Emma Fitts, Mrs. R. H. Fitz, Arthur Foote, George Foote, Mrs. Ralph E. Forbes, Lina H. Frankenstein, Mr. and Mrs. Donald McKay Frost, Horace W. Frost, Mrs. Louis A. Frothingham.

G—Mrs. W. A. Caston, E. Howard Gay, Hel[illegible] G. Gilbert, Mrs. G. L. Gilmore, Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr., Mrs. John Chipman Gray, Morris Gray, Mrs. Frances L. Grover, S. L. Guild.

H—Mrs. Frederick C. Hall, Mrs. H. S. Hall, Mr. and Mrs. N. Penrose Hallowell, Frances K. Harris, G. Fred Harwood, Parkman B. Haven, Mrs. George Hawley, William C. Hellman, Mrs. Joseph M. Herman, Mrs. John Jay Hicks, F. L. Higginson, Jr., Mrs. John F. Hill, Mrs. Franklin Warren Hobbs, Mary S. Holbrook, Alice Marion Holmes, Edward J. Holmes, Ida E. Holmes, Marian Homans, Henry Hornblower, Mrs. Henry Hornblower, Mr. and Mrs. Clement S. Houghton, Elizabeth G. Houghton, Henry S. Howe, Mrs. Henry S. Howe, Mrs. J. Murray Howe, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Abby W. Hunt.

J—Dr. Frederick L. Jack, Dr. Henry Jackson, Mrs. James Jackson, Arthur S. Johnson, Mrs. E. J. Johnson, Edith Morse Johnson.

K—Albert W. Kaffenburgh, Carl J. Kaffenburgh, M. B. Kaufman, Mrs. L. M. Keeler, Mrs. Alice Cotting Kent, Mrs. Henry P. King, The Misses King, Mr. and Mrs. Abraham Koshland, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Koshland.

L—Aimee Lamb, Mrs. H. A. Lamb, Margaret Ruthven Lang, Mrs. Henry G. Lapham, Elizabeth Lasell, Mrs. John Lawrence, Mr. and Mrs. George C. Lee, J. Howard Leman, Mrs. George Lewis, Mrs. David M. Little, Mrs. Thornton K. Lothrop, Mrs. W. S. H. Lothrop, Lucy Lowell, Stephen B. Luce, Arthur Lyman, John A. Lyons.

M—Earl G. Manning, Fanny P. Mason, Henry L. Mason, Mrs. Jesse H. Metcalf, Providence, R. I.; Miss Mildred A. Miller, Arthur N. Milliken, Mrs. James I. Milliken, Mrs. John Moir, Mrs. Edward C. Moore, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur W. Moors, Henry Lee Morse, J. G. Morse, J. Torrey Morse, Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Morss, Mrs. F. S. Moseley, Mrs. E. Preble Motley, Mrs. George S. Mumford, Emily W. McKibbin, Mrs. L. G. McMichael.

N—William E. Nickerson, Mrs. W. G. Nickerson.

O—Emily L. Osgood.

P—Rev. George L. Paine, R. T. Paine, 2d, Mrs. Henry Parkman, James E. Patton, G. L. Perera, Mrs. Franklin T. Pfaelzer, Mrs. Edgar Pierce, Mrs. M. V. Pierce, Mrs. John R. Post, Mrs. Charles A. Proctor, Mrs. James J. Putnam, Louisa H. Putnam, Marian C. Putnam.

R—Helen M. Ranney, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mr. and Mrs. A. C. Ratshesky, Mrs. Franklin F. Raymond, W. K. Richardson, Howard L. Rogers, Mrs. J. W. Rollins, Colonel and Mrs. William H. Root, Bernard J. Rothwell, Mrs. E. S. Rousmaniere.

S—George A. Sagendorph, Charles E. Sampson, Mrs. Charles R. Sanger, Mrs. William Saville, Mr. and Mrs. Henry B. Sawyer, Robert W. Sayles, Elizabeth Schneider, Annie L. Sears, Mary P. Sears, Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. Q. A. Shaw, Jr., Mrs. Henry B. Shepard, Mrs. Charles Lewis Slattery, Mrs. William H. Slocum, Mrs. A. F. Sortwell, Mrs. Philip L. Spalding, Emma F. Spaulding, Mrs. Frederick D. Stackpole, Mr. and Mrs. Pierpont L. Stackpole, Katharine Stanton, Mrs. C. J. Steedman (Providence, R. I.), Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Steinert, Frederick T. Steinway (New York city), Moses T. Stevens, Mrs. Oliver Crocker Stevens, Mrs. Robert H. Stevenson, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Galen L. Stone, Mrs. Leon Strauss.

T—Alice P. Tapley, Henry F. Tapley, Mrs. Edward Thaw, Mrs. John E. Thayer, Mrs. Washington B. Thomas, Mr. and Mrs. Ward Thoron, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred M. Tozzer, Nellie B. Turner.

V—Bertha H. Vaughan.

W—Mrs. A. F. Wadsworth, Professor R. DeC. Ward, Henry Ware, Mr. and Mrs. Bayard Warren, Bentley W. Warren, Mrs. George E. Warren, Mrs. Thomas R. Watson, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin S. Webster, Leo Weidhorn, E. Sohier Welch, Mrs. Charles G. Weld, Charles H. Weston, Richard Wheatland, Mrs. Albert R. Whittier, Moses Williams, Donald B. Wilson, A. E. Wilson, Mrs. Frederick Winsor, Mrs. Roger Wolcott, Dr. Nathaniel K. Wood, Mrs. Walter [illegible] Wright.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
DEC 17 1926

NINTH BOSTON SYMPHONY BROADCAST

Modern French Music Will Be Featured on Local Radio Offering Tomorrow Night

The next Boston Symphony orchestra concert, the ninth of the series of 24, will be broadcast through WBZ at 8.15 Saturday night. This concert will only be sent out on the wave of the Westinghouse station, the chain network of six stations now linked together for transmitting the symphony programs not tieing in with WBZ until the 25th.

Modern French music will be featured on this week's program by the orchestra of 107 musicians under the direction of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, the program including Ravel's poem, "La Valse," and Darius Milhaud's suite, "The Carnaval d'Aix." Ravel made a sketch of "The Waltz" during the war and finished the work in 1920. The meaning of the music is indicated in the following description which is printed on the music; "Whirling clouds give glimpses through rifts, of couples waltzing. The clouds scatter little by little, one sees an immense hall peopled with ha thrilling crowd. The scene is gradually illuminated. The light of the chandeliers brusts forth fortissimo. An imperial court about 1855."

Darius Milhaud, celebrated pianist who will appear as soloist on this program, is one of the group of young French composers known as "The Six." This group, which includes Honneger, Poulenc, Mlle Tailleferre, Durey and Auric represents the most radical tendencies in modern French music.

Before the program begins, Prof John Patten Marshall who interprets the symphony programs for the radio audience will discuss Schumann's First Symphony, the opening number on the program. Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Margaret Starr McLain, pianist will assist Prof Marshall in his interpretations by illustrating musically the principal themes of the symphony. During the intermission following the symphony, Prof Marshall will tell his listeners something about the works by Milhaud and Ravel. The complete program is as follows:—

Symphony in B flat major, No 1, opus 38, Schumann
- a Andante un poco maestoso; allegro molto vivace
- b Larghetto
- c Scherzo; molto vivace; trio I molto piu vivace; trio II

"Le Carnival d'Aix," fantasy for piano and orchestra on the ballet, "Salade"..Milhaud
- a Le corso
- b Tartaglia
- c Isabelle
- d Rosetta
- e Le bon et le mauvais tuteur
- f Coviello
- g Le Capitaine Cartuccia
- h Polichinelle
- i Polka
- j Cinzio
- k Souvenir de Rio (tango)
- l Finale

"La Valse," choreographic poem.....Ravel

Soloist, Darius Milhaud.

MILHAUD AS GUEST; SCHUMANN RENEWED; RAVEL THREADBARE

Transcript Dec 18

THE NEWCOMER'S ENTERTAINING MUSIC

A Light, Neat, Lively Suite of Dance-Tunes, Pleasantly Fanciful—"The Waltz" for Piece Too Often Played—The One "Spring Symphony" Under Mr. Koussevitzky's Hand

LIKE the Lady Angela in "Patience," Mr. Darius Milhaud, guest yesterday at the Symphony Concert, is "a plump and pleasing person." Self-effacingly and sufficiently, he played the piano-part in one of his pieces, designed in particular for his present American tour; smiled upon an applausive audience; waved a glad hand to an orchestra that had served him well; set quite enough tongues gossipping because he wore working dress for what some count a ceremonious occasion. (In spite of these good ladies, the fashion of jackets by day in the concert-hall is becoming custom—even such easy-going jackets as Mr. Milhaud's.) His piece was "The Carnival at Aix"—his native town—Fantasia for Piano and Orchestra in twelve divisions, drawn from "Salade," ballet, or as the composer chose to label it, "choreographic counterpoint," devised in the spring of 1924 for the esoteric "soirées" in Paris of the Count of Beaumont. "Salade" was then interspersed with speech and song. If the reviewers are to be believed, the "choreographic counterpoint" was intended to prove something—exactly what they fail to make clear. There is nothing, however, contentious or esoteric about Mr. Milhaud's derivative Fantasia. Its purpose is to please, and it pleases as "gayly and vivaciously" as the composer would have it.

The orchestra is a normal orchestra, seldom subtilized by sub-divided or intricately suffused timbres; rarely distorted, as in the ornate exercises for the tuba; then obviously for whim. The piano-part is as free from excursions into virtuosity or meanderings into decoration for decoration's sake. rhythms it. So far as this Fantasia goes, he lusts not at all for polytonality, atonality and other gawds of modernity. Nor is he inclined, beyond comfortable endurance, to acerbated and biting harmonies. Mr. Milhaud would not be himself did he not wind into his "Carnival" speech incisive; while spiritedly he discordant keys. The zest for jazz that ran in him during his first visit to America seems to have "petered out"; while he chooses ragtime but sparingly. In fact, the whole impression of the Fantasia is of a sprightly, smiling, occasionally fanciful music, simplified throughout. In not a few measures it would have suited a glorified musical comedy. No more persistently do composers in that genre rhythm with the drums.

There are twelve divisions in "The Carnival at Aix," so brief that the whole fête—and its music—barely consume a half hour. One, by way of introduction, is the street-scene ("Le Corso") with crowding figures and hurrying feet many-gaited, rhythmed and paced accordingly. Another is a bedizened, wanton, sophisticated polka, brought glintingly off. A third is the tango, deliciously languorous at the beginning, only to fling loose in syncopations and discordancies—the two sides, as it were, of an intrinsically sensual music. For ending, a Finale of summarizing and departing gusto. The other divisions were each labelled with the name of a personage from the commedia dell' arte, even to such rarely reappearing figures as Coviello and Cinzio. Under these titles Mr. Milhaud wrote now a music of frank and lively humor; again a music of running melody and sportive sentiment; yet again a music of pleasing fancies, with harmonic and instrumental sauce piquante. Only at rare moments did one or another of these dainty dishes jell a bit too heavily. Often, for that matter, the orchestra seemed lighter-handed than the composer.

In sum a Fantasia (or a "choreographic counterpoint") that was entertainment, content with that office, by no means to be disparaged on either score. The overrighteous, the superfluously priggish, may spend all their time, if they like, in "communion" with "the masters"—like the kneeling figures, stiff-sculptured upon mediæval tombs. For the rest of us, less free from human frailty, occasional half-hours of music that bears no "message," achieves no "heights," diverts and is done. There is reason to wish only that it be gaily invented, fancifully fashioned, piquantly flavored. Mr. Milhaud's Fantasia answers to these prescriptions. Though the will sometimes surpasses the deed, it is no small virtue in the younger French and Italian composers—Rieti for the latter—that they have led music as entertainment back into theater and concert-hall. Like the devil with the good tunes, the musical comedies need not have all the fun.

An elder Parisian succeeded Mr. Milhaud upon the symphonic scene—Ravel, of another "choreographic counterpoint," to wit "The Waltz." At five pairs of concerts within as many years has it been played in Symphony Hall. Agreed that conductors, the world over, love the piece to frequent repetition—as they cherish other singular and perverse affections. Admitted that Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, many times mated in it, have brought performance to high pitch of skill and surety. None the less, from sheer over-acquaintance, the music is wearing thin and shiny. We listeners hear all the shortcomings; half-close our ears to most of the accomplishment; heed the orchestra rather than the composer. The catastrophic close has become, for the while, rather empty sound and fury; the upbuilding and the shattering of the waltz-tune seem no more than adept conjuring; the waltz-motiv emerging from the dark, no longer stirs sensuous sensations, evokes no courtly visions. Not the substance and the imagery, but the rhetoric and the manipulation, now engage us. Hardly fair to Ravel is this present residue, though "The Waltz" falls short of his richest and keenest work. More unfair is the present seclusion, upon some overlooked shelf, of his "Spanish Rhapsody," the suite in memory of Couperin, even the orchestral version of "Alborada del Gracioso."

A welcome restoration, however, began the concert, applauded to the echo by an audience that remembered, anticipated and took fresh joy. For the first time in four or five seasons. Schumann's Symphony in B-flat major—his Symphony of the Spring—returned to the active repertory. It is true that he wrote for no such piercing brass as now answers to Mr. Koussevitzky's call. His was the mellower German way of the mid-nineteenth century. True also, the conductor over-labored sundry measures for the sake of musical emphasis or emotion outflung. Oftener than Mr. Koussevitzky seems to believe, the lyric Schumann, like the more lyric Schubert, is content merely to sing along. True, finally, he might have more clarified Schumann at his instrumental thickest and eased him when he is fumbling his symphonic tools. On the other hand, the conductor, after his habit, gave the composer rhythmic and melodic life; intensified the warm-running moods; achieved—the virtuosi of the orchestra aiding—many a rare and fine felicity.

Little matter these reservations of reflection. Led again into the living world, Schumann spoke out—or rather sung out—for himself. The introduction stirred from middle grayness into bright anticipation, and Mr. Koussevitzky gave it tonal splendor. The first movement ran quick with ardent mood, spurring rhythm, ascendant song. As an old English word has it, within and without was glee. Possibly Schumann wrote the Larghetto like a piano-piece; but it was in such musing and quick-coming fancies that he struck his most characteristic note. Nor, secreted in a piano, are there singing horns. The two Trios of the Scherzo are like gayety irresistibly renewed, brightening at each new flight. Ways and means rarely cumber. In the Finale, where Mr. Koussevitzky was over-strenuous, runs indeed the lustihood of spring and of symphonic song, but graciously, lightly, eagerly and evasively—both moods at once. "Full spring" indeed, as Schumann early purposed to label it, but spring still nymph-like, tripping the Rhenish hills. For once in a flood of moods, Schumann forgot anxious scruple over a form that the orthodox of those days too jealously guarded. Joyously, he wrote to a friend, he worked—and the one vernal rhapsody in symphonic music still gladdens the ears of men.

H. T. P.

As Guest-Conductors

Mr. Casella and Mr. Respighi at the Symphony Concerts

IN the first week of January, the Symphony Orchestra will make another journey to New York. Upon its return, Mr. Koussevitzky will take a fortnight's holiday. During his absence, two composers will be guest-conductors—Mr. Casella at the concerts of Jan. 14 and 15; Mr. Respighi at the concerts of Jan. 21 and 22. In Mr. Monteux's time, Mr. Casella came in both capacities to Symphony Hall, and was pianist as well. His own pieces lacked neither skill nor individual flavor; he was sufficiently able as conductor; as pianist he was notable. In the second visit, he will be heard in his own music and in the music of other composers. He will not, however, be pianist, since Mr. Gieseking is "assisting artist" at the same pair of concerts, presumably in one or another of Mr. Casella's pieces for piano and orchestra. In outlook, the composer-conductor may be described as a modernist who has not forgotten the classics; cosmopolitan rather than Italian.

Mr. Respighi, overlooked in Boston during his first visit to the United States last winter, is the familiar composer of the two orchestral suites, "Fountains of Rome" and "Pines of Rome," the transcriber also of a remembered set of ancient dances. Other of his pieces are still unplayed in Boston—a "Dramatic Symphony," a second set of archaic dances, the prelude to his opera, "Belphegor." One or more of these is likely to stand on his program. In Italy and Germany Mr. Respighi is favorably known as conductor; while as such a year ago, Philadelphia and Chicago received him warmly. He is older than Mr. Casella, more conservative and more Italian. . . . So choosing, the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra better the quality and enlarge the interest of their guest-conductors.

a tango out of the Brazil that he affectionately remembers from fruitful sojourn. He may even touch it with mildly Rather, it tends to be heavy-handed and square-toed; for, truth to tell, Mr. Milhaud as pianist has not what the Victorians called "a delicate finger." Directness of musical speech is evidently one of his traits as composer of the present day. Utilizing the higher "registers" of his instruments and "pointing up" the piano-part, he also makes that

Two Generations: Two Cosmopolites

Ottorino Respighi

Alfredo Casella

Guest-Conductors and Guest-Composers, Next Month, at the Symphony Concerts

More and Soon

A Lacking $10,000 for the Opera Guarantee Fund — Advantages to Guarantors

THE Guarantee Fund for the fortnight of opera next February is still in need of additional subscriptions. In the past fortnight it has increased by $5000, but $10,000 more is necessary to security and ease. So good a cause, so reasonable a request, should require no urging. At least twenty thousand persons in Boston and roundabout take the pleasure of this annual visit of the Chicago Company. Most of them anticipate it confidently and a bit too complacently. Yet a Guarantee Fund, yearly subscribed to the full amount, is essential. Otherwise, Boston would go operaless. It enjoys opera now, because relatively few of that twenty thousand take the unescapable deficit on their shoulders—unescapable if variety of repertory and merit of performance are to be maintained.

The Boston-Chicago Opera Association assumes the risk for no other object than the prestige and the pleasure of the city. It does not pass the buck or bid "George" do it, asking for its considerable and otherwise unrequited labors only the subscriptions of fellow-citizens to the Guarantee Fund it has itself begun. Possible subscribers, dreading a large assessment, need have no fears that it will exceed, for 1927, the usual eighteen or twenty per cent. Desiring some tangible advantage, they may remember that they will have first choice of seats. They will do well, likewise, to give quickly, as the distribution of guarantors' seats is in progress. Now is the time: the offices of the Opera-Association at 24 Federal Street, the place. The telephone—Congress 6500—will do the job.

SYMPHONY SUBSCRIPTIONS

Four-Fifths of the Fund to Meet the Annual Deficit Now Pledged—Need of Another $15,000—Arrayed Subscribers

The current program-book at the Symphony Concerts makes a first report of the subscription and the subscribers to the annual "operating deficit" of the Symphony Orchestra. Of the $75,000 asked by the trustees last October to meet running expenses for the season of 1926-27, $62,614.67 has been pledged within two months—large and clear response to the merit of the orchestra, the interest of the concerts, the prestige of the conductor, the wisdom of the management. A further $15,000 would not only be welcome, but is necessary to the continuance of present quality and standards. To Mr. E. B. Dane, treasurer, at 6 Beacon street, additional subscriptions should be sent. Present subscribers to the deficit are:

A—Gordon Abbott, Clara A. Adams, Mrs. Thomas Allen, Mrs. William H. Ames, Margaret Anthony, Percy L. Atherton.

B—Charles E. Bacon, Mrs. Arthur J. Barkhouse, R. S. Barlow, Mr. and Mrs. S. J. Barnet, Mrs. John W. Bartol, The Misses Bates, Mr. and Mrs. Edward B. Bayley, Mrs. Walter C. Baylies, Mrs. Boylston A. Beal, Mrs. Daniel Beckwith (Providence, R. I.), Sylenda Beebe, Mrs. Edward H. Best, Mrs. Arthur W. Blake, Henry W. Bliss, Charles Boyden, Mary G. Brad[illegible] ford, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas S. Bradlee, Mr. an[illegible] Mrs. J. D. Cameron Bradley, Mrs. E. D. Brande[illegible] gee, F. R. Brewer, Leo Bruzza (Brooklyn, N. Y.), Ellen T. Bullard, Helen C. Burnham, M. C[illegible] Burnham, Mrs. W. A. Burnham, Mrs. H. M[illegible] Burr, I. Tucker Burr.

C—Mrs. Arthur T. Cabot, Frederick P. Cabot, Henry B. Cabot, Mrs. J. W. Carter, Louise W[illegible] Case, Horace D. Chapin, Mabel H. Chapin, Mrs. Henry M. Chase, Dr. and Mrs. D. Cheever, Mrs. George O. G. Coale, Mrs. Edwin Pau[illegible] Cochran (New Haven, Conn.), C. A. Codman, Winthrop Cotin, E. L. Coleman, Mr. and Mrs. James D. Colt, Mrs. William C. Conant, Mrs. Algernon Coolidge, Ellen W. Coolidge, Mrs. J. G. Coolidge, Mrs. J. T. Coolidge, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Coonley, Mrs. S. V. R. Crosby, Charles P. Curtis, Sarah P. Cushing, In Memory of C. S. D.

D—R. H. Dana, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest B[illegible] Dane, Mabel W. Daniels, Mrs. Henry B. Day, Mr. and Mrs. Robert L. DeNormandie, Ros[illegible] L. Dexter, Mrs. Malcolm Donald, Mr. an[illegible] Mrs. John Duff, F. L. Dunne & Co.

E—Mabel T. Eager, B. L. Eaton, L. H[illegible] Eaton, Violet Edmands, Hannah M. Edwards, Mrs. L. P. Edwards, [illegible] Ellis, Augusta C. Ely, Elizabeth B. Ely, H. D[illegible] Eustis, The Misses Eustis.

F—Dr. and Mrs. John W. Farlow, Mrs. Wi[illegible] liam G. Farlow, Mrs. D. E. Fay, William [illegible] Fenollosa, Frederick P. Fish, Edith S. Fishe[illegible] Frances B. Fisher, Carrie T. Fitch, Emma [illegible] Fitts, Mrs. R. H. Fitz, Arthur Foote, George [illegible] Foote, Mrs. Ralph E. Forbes, Lina H. Fran[illegible] enstein, Mr. and Mrs. Donald McKay Fros[illegible] Horace W. Frost, Mrs. Louis A. Frothingham.

G—Mrs. W. A. Gaston, E. Howard Gay, Hol[illegible] C. Gilbert, Mrs. G. L. Gilmore, Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr., Mrs. Jose[illegible] [illegible] Gray, Mrs. Frances L. Grover, S. L. Guild.

H—Mrs. Frederick C. Hall, Mrs. H. S. Hall, Mr. and Mrs. N. Penrose Hallowell, Frances K. Harris, G. Fred Harwood, Parkman B. Haven, Mrs. George Hawley, William C. Heilman, Mrs. Joseph M. Herman, Mrs. John Jay Hicks, F. L. Higginson, Jr., Mrs. John F. Hill, Mrs. Franklin Warren Hobbs, Mary S. Holbrook, Alice Marion Holmes, Edward J. Holmes, Ida E. Holmes, Marian Homans, Henry Hornblower, Mrs. Henry Hornblower, Mr. and Mrs. Clement S. Houghton, Elizabeth G. Houghton, Henry S. Howe, Mrs. Henry S. Howe, Mrs. J. Murray Howe, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Abby W. Hunt.

J—Dr. Frederick L. Jack, Dr. Henry Jackson, Mrs. James Jackson, Arthur S. Johnson, Mrs. E. J. Johnson, Edith Morse Johnson.

K—Albert W. Kaffenburgh, Carl J. Kaffenburgh, M. B. Kaufman, Mrs. L. M. Keeler, Mrs. Alice Cotting Kent, Mrs. Henry P. King, The Misses King, Mr. and Mrs. Abraham Koshland, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Koshland.

L—Aimee Lamb, Mrs. H. A. Lamb, Margaret Ruthven Lang, Mrs. Henry G. Lapham, Elizabeth Lasell, Mrs. John Lawrence, Mr. and Mrs. [illegible] Lee, J. Howard Leman, Mrs. George Lewis, Mrs. David M. Little, Mrs. Thornton K. Lothrop, Mrs. W. S. H. Lothrop, Lucy Lowell, Stephen B. Luce, Arthur Lyman, John A. Lyons.

M—Earl G. Manning, Fanny P. Mason, Henry L. Mason, Mrs. Jesse H. Metcalf, Providence, R. I.; Miss Mildred A. Miller, Arthur N. Milliken, Mrs. James I. Milliken, Mrs. John Moir, Mrs. Edward C. Moore, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur W. Moors, Henry Lee Morse, J. G. Morse, J. Torrey Morse, Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Morss, Mrs. F. S. Moseley, Mrs. E. Preble Motley, Mrs. George S. Mumford, Emily W. McKibbin, Mrs. L. G. McMichael.

N—William E. Nickerson, Mrs. W. G. Nickerson.

O—Emily L. Osgood.

P—Rev. George L. Paine, R. T. Paine, 2d, Mrs. Henry Parkman, James E. Patton, G. L. Perera, Mrs. Franklin T. Pfaelzer, Mrs. Edgar Pierce, Mrs. M. V. Pierce, Mrs. John R. Post, Mrs. Charles A. Proctor, Mrs. James J. Putnam, Louisa H. Putnam, Marian C. Putnam.

R—Helen M. Ranney, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mr. and Mrs. A. C. Ratshesky, Mrs. Franklin F. Raymond, W. K. Richardson, Howard L. Rogers, Mrs. J. W. Rollins, Colonel and Mrs. William H. Root, Bernard J. Rothwell, Mrs. E. S. Rousmaniere.

S—George A. Sagendorph, Charles E. Sampson, Mrs. Charles R. Sanger, Mrs. William Saville, Mr. and Mrs. Henry B. Sawyer, Robert W. Sayles, Elizabeth Schneider, Annie L. Sears, Mary P. Sears, Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. Q. A. Shaw, Jr., Mrs. Henry B. Shepard, Mrs. Charles Lewis Slattery, Mrs. William H. Slocum, Mrs. A. F. Sortwell, Mrs. Philip L. Spalding, Emma F. Spaulding, Mrs. Frederick D. Stackpole, Mr. and Mrs. Pierpont L. Stackpole, Katharine Stanton, Mrs. C. J. Steedman (Providence, R. I.), Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Steinert, Frederick T. Steinway (New York city), Moses T. Stevens, Mrs. Oliver Crocker Stevens, Mrs. Robert H. Stevenson, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Galen L. Stone, Mrs. Leon Strauss.

T—Alice P. Tapley, Henry F. Tapley, Mrs. Edward Thaw, Mrs. John E. Thayer, Mrs. Washington B. Thomas, Mr. and Mrs. Ward Thoron, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred M. Tozzer, Nellie B. Turner.

V—Bertha H. Vaughan.

W—Mrs. A. F. Wadsworth, Professor R. DeC. Ward, Henry Ware, Mr. and Mrs. Bayard Warren, Bentley W. Warren, Mrs. George E. Warren, Mrs. Thomas R. Watson, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin S. Webster, Leo Weidhorn, E. Sohier Welch, Mrs. Charles G. Weld, Charles H. Weston, Richard Wheatland, Mrs. Albert R. Whittier, Moses Williams, Donald B. Wilson, A. E. Wilson, Mrs. Frederick Winsor, Mrs. Roger Wolcott, Dr. Nathaniel K. Wood, Mrs. Walter [illegible] Wright.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
DEC 17 1926

NINTH BOSTON SYMPHONY BROADCAST

Modern French Music Will Be Featured on Local Radio Offering Tomorrow Night

The next Boston Symphony orchestra concert, the ninth of the series of 24, will be broadcast through WBZ at 8.15 Saturday night. This concert will only be sent out on the wave of the Westinghouse station, the chain network of six stations now linked together for transmitting the symphony programs not tieing in with WBZ until the 25th.

Modern French music will be featured on this week's program by the orchestra of 107 musicians under the direction of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, the program including Ravel's poem, "La Valse," and Darius Milhaud's suite, "The Carnaval d'Aix." Ravel made a sketch of "The Waltz" during the war and finished the work in 1920. The meaning of the music is indicated in the following description which is printed on the music; "Whirling clouds give glimpses through rifts, of couples waltzing. The clouds scatter little by little, one sees an immense hall peopled with ha thrilling crowd. The scene is gradually illuminated. The light of the chandeliers brusts forth fortissimo. An imperial court about 1855."

Darius Milhaud, celebrated pianist who will appear as soloist on this program, is one of the group of young French composers known as "The Six." This group, which includes Honneger, Poulenc, Mlle Taillefferre, Durey and Auric represents the most radical tendencies in modern French music.

Before the program begins, Prof John Patten Marshall who interprets the symphony programs for the radio audience will discuss Schumann's First Symphony, the opening number on the program. Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Margaret Starr McLain, pianist will assist Prof Marshall in his interpretations by illustrating musically the principal themes of the symphony. During the intermission following the symphony, Prof Marshall will tell his listeners something about the works by Milhaud and Ravel. The complete program is as follows:—

Symphony in B flat major, No 1, opus 38, ... Schumann
a Andante un poco maestoso; allegro molto vivace
b Larghetto
c Scherzo; molto vivace; trio I molto piu vivace; trio II

"Le Carnival d'Aix," fantasy for piano an orchestra on the ballet, "Salade"..Milhav a Le corso
b Tartaglia
c Isabelle
d Rosetta
e Le bon et le mauvais tuteu
f Coviello
g Le Capitaine Cartuccia
h Polichinelle
i Polka
j Cinzio
k Souvenir de Rio (tango)
l Finale

"La Valse," choreographic poem. ...Ravel
Soloist, Darius Milhaud.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

SYMPHONY MAKES BABY MUSIC VOGUE

Dec. 18

Milhaud Plays Piano Part in Latest "Salade"

Boston Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Whatever else the Symphony Concert of yesterday might be called, it might not properly be referred to as dull. First on Mr. Koussevitzky's list came Schumann's outspoken and tuneful B-flat major Symphony, the final number was that remarkable sublimation of the musically obvious, Ravel's "La Valse," and between these there appeared "in person" Darius Milhaud to play the solo piano part in his new "Le Carnaval d'Aix," a startling example of the infantilism now in vogue among certain of the younger Parisian composers.

OFF "HIGH BROW" STUFF

This is not M. Milhaud's first visit to Boston. He appeared here as lecturer and as pianist in his own chamber-music in the season of 1922-23; and since M. Monteux conducted his daring Second Suite in the spring of 1921 his orchestral music was not previously unknown to Symphony hall. The evolution—some might perhaps call it the disintegration—as composer of M. Milhaud, now in his 35th year, has been curious. His early violin sonatas and string quartets might well be described as masterly.

He has had his fling at the writing of music of a violently dissonant and "futuristic" character. But of late he has chiefly cultivated two forms of expression: the dance style, either in terms of the Brazilian tango or of American jazz and the consciously naive.

Little Folks' Tunes

Twelve little pieces make the fantasy heard yesterday, a work derived, by the way, from the composer's ballet "Salade." Hearing them the listener was violently torn between the cafe-chantant and the nursery. Of the twelve the seventh, by title "Le Capitaine Cartiuccia," a march based upon the "Johnny-get-a-hatrack" rhythm long dear to beaters upon toy drums, evoked a burst of applause that for a moment disrupted the continuity of effect intended by composer and conductor.

And at the end M. Milhaud, a stoutish man exceedingly amiable of aspect who had played his music in a persistent staccato fashion, was many times recalled.

Revitalizing Schumann

That of yesterday was the first Boston performance under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction of Schumann's so-called "Spring" symphony. Realizing that its fading pages stand sorely in need of revitalizing, the conductor yesterday made a palpable effort to "pep up" this music, and to a generally satisfactory if sometimes over-noisy result. In this music which flowed so freely from Schumann's pen that the actual composition, aside from the orchestration, was completed in four days, the audience of yesterday took unbounded delight. By such token, then, the piece has not yet outlived its usefulness, although the hypercritical may still protest its lack of true symphonic texture, its want of proper symphonic dignity, its wearisome repetitions of inconsequential figures, its occasional triviality, its persistently gauche and amateurish instrumentation. Witness, then, in the Symphony's success of yesterday the combined triumph of melody, sing-song rhythm and conductorial enthusiasm.

Brilliant, too, was the performance yesterday accorded Ravel's apotheosis of the Viennese waltz, a piece in which Mr. Koussevitzky has more than once demonstrated his own and the orchestra's prowess.

BURLINGTON, Ia.
HAWK EYE
DEC 19 1926

SYMPHONY IN 9TH CONCERT TONIGHT

Herald Dec 18

Tonight's concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the ninth in the series of 24 of the season, will be broadcast through station WBZ only, the chain network of six nations now linked together for transmitting the programs not tieing-in with WBZ until next Saturday. The entire series of concerts of this famous organization is broadcast through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago.

Featuring tonight's program by the orchestra of 107 musicians under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will be music of the modern French school. The program includes Ravel's poem, "La Valse," and Darius Milhaud's suite, "The Carnival d'Aix." Ravel made a sketch of "The Waltz" during the war and finished the work in 1920. The meaning of the music is indicated in the following description which is printed on the music: "Whirling clouds give glimpses, through rifts, of couples waltzing. The clouds scatter little by little. One sees an immense hall peopled with a twirling crowd. The scene is gradually illuminated. The light of the chandeliers bursts forth fortissimo. An imperial court about 1855." The themes employed suggest the melodies of Viennese waltzes.

Darius Milhaud, celebrated pianist, who will appear as soloist on this program, is one of the group of young French composers known as "The Six." This group, which includes Honneger, Poulenc, Mle. Tailleferre, Durey and Auric, represents the most radical tendencies in modern French music.

Before the program begins, Prof. John Patten Marshall who interprets the symphony programs in a most interesting manner for the radio audience will discuss Schumann's First Symphony, the opening number on the program. Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will assist Prof. Marshall in his interpretations by illustrating musically the principal themes of the Symphony.

The complete program is as follows:

Schumann, Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, op. 38.
1. Andante un poco maestoso: allegro molto vivace.
2. Larghetto.
3. Scherzo: molto vivace. Trio 1: molto piu vivace. Trio 2.
4. Allegro animato e grazioso.

Milhaud, "Le Carnaval d'Aix"; Fantasy for piano and orchestra on the ballet, "Salade."
1. Le Corso.
2. Tartaglia.
3. Isabelle.
4. Rosetta.
5. Le Bon et le Mauvais Tuteur.
6. Coviello.
7. Le Capitaine Cartuccia.
8. Polichinelle.
9. Polka.
10. Cinzio.
11. Souvenir de Rio (tango).
12. Finale.

Ravel. "La Valse." Choreographic Poem.

Soloist, Darius Milhaud

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
DEC 19 1926

Boston Orchestra to Play Sibelius' Seventh Symphony at Next Brooklyn Concert.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the following programme for the second Brooklyn concert of the season, at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 7.

Concerto for Orchestra, in D major (C. P. E. Bach—arranged by Maximilian Steinberg); Symphony No. 7 (Sibelius); Prelude to "Lohengrin," Funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods," Forest Murmers from "Siegfried," Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

THIS CLIPPING FROM CONSTITUTION
ATLANTA, GA.
DEC 19 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON AIR CHRISTMAS

New York, December 18.—The regular weekly concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast by WJZ, WBZ, WGY, WFBL, WMAK and WHAM at 7:30 Christmas night, December 25. Under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, the Boston Symphony orchestra playing in Symphony hall, Boston, will be heard in a concert of appropriate yuletide compositions.

It will be noted that three additional radio stations will tie-in with WBZ, WJZ and WGY in this feature. It is expected that this chain will continue to handle the broadcasts of this orchestra in the future.

In the explanatory remarks preceding the program Professor Marshall, the head of the music department of Holy Cross and Boston colleges, will discuss the life and works of the various composers to be heard.

[illegible] each Christmas time.

* * *

Boston Symphony Christmas Night.

The regular weekly concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast by WJZ, WBZ, WGY, WFBL, WMAK and WHAM at 7:10 Christmas night, Dec. 25. Under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, the Boston Symphony orchestra playing in Symphony Hall, Boston, will be heard in a concert of appropriate Yuletide compositions.

SYMPHONY GIVES NINTH CONCERT

HER DEC 18

Schumann's "The Carnival of Aix" in B Flat Major Is Presented

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, was as follows: Schumann, Symphony, B flat major, No. 1. Milhaud, "The Carnival of Aix," fantasy for piano and orchestra on the Ballet "Salade" (Mr. Milhaud, pianist). Ravel, "The Waltz."

Schumann wished Taubert, the conductor, to infuse into his orchestra in the performance of this symphony "a sort of longing for the spring," which, he said, he had chiefly in mind when he wrote the music. He admitted that his thoughts were fantastic and came to him after the work was finished. (He did not give the titles to the sections of his "Carnival" for piano until the music was all written). His wife said that he called the symphony a "Spring" symphony; it is also reported that he at first purposed to name the momento, "Dawn of Spring, "Evening," 'Joyful Playing," "Full Spring." It is known that a poem by Boettger about spring was in his mind.

But the symphony finally appeared as a symphony in B flat major—this and nothing more; and for dwellers in New England, this is enough. Spring is known to us only through poets of more favored climes. It is not easy for us to be rapturous about this season of the year. Whittier, the New Englander, as a poet of nature, was happiest when he wrote "Snowbound." In the concert hall the songs exulting in the spring leave us cold; the more joyous the song, the more foreign it is to us. Surely no one thinks of skipping lambs, nor is one inclined to join in the refrain, "Fa-la-la, Fal-lal-la" of many glees and madrigals. So we doubt whether Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday urged his players to think of spring when they were playing. This did not prevent the performance from being a glorious one, in headlong rush, in musically animal spirits, in the beauty of the more intimate passages which are peculiarly Schumannian, in the finest sense of proportion in dialogue and ensemble, in the pervading genial and poetic nature of the interpretation.

And so whatever has been said in disparagement of Schumann's orchestration, there was no thought yesterday of crudeness or clumsiness; no one felt like repeating the well-worn saying that he wrote as for a piano. The musical thoughts of the composer were in the foreground; the symphony sounded far better than would appear from the cold and lifeless score, for the notes were vitalized and beautified by the aesthetic skill of the conductor and the technical proficiency of the players.

As we have said before, music is not music until it is performed, until it sounds. It is the task of the conductor to make it sound so that it stirs or moves the hearer. There should not be too rigid respect for the letter, for the mint and cummin. Indications of tempo should be as signposts, pointing the general direction, but allowing the traveler to loiter or hasten on the way, so that he finds new beauty in a landscape, or gathers flowers here and there, or passes quickly over muddy or rocky stretches. Schumann is not a composer for a metronomic time-beater. Poet calls unto poet; the poet thus called upon must not be of the Queen Anne school.

Mr. Milhaud drew a Suite from his ballet "Salade," especially for his present tour. The Philharmonic Society of New York was the first to play the Suite. The ballet itself was produced in Paris two years and a half ago. The ballet introduced characters from the old Italian Comedy, known to us by the drawings of Callot. Some of these characters give titles to movements in the Suite. There are 12 movements, some very short, none very long. The Tango (Souvenir de Rio) reminds one that Mr. Milhaud and Paul Claudel, now French Ambassador to this country, were in 1917 and 1918 in the diplomatic corps at Rio.

Those who were acquainted with some of Mr. Milhaud's earlier works, seeing yesterday the title "Salade," no doubt expected to find an undue use of vinegar with strange and unknown seasoning in the dressing, the "fatiguing" of this music. They were disappointed. There was little that was shocking to ultra-conservative ears, there was much to please, to amuse (in the better sense of that word.) We are all to much inclined to be unduly serious at Symphony Concerts; to insist on only the noble and sublime. Sir Thomas Browne was not of that mind.

"For even that vulgar and tavern-music, which makes one man merry, another mad, strikes in me a deep fit of devotian, and a profound contemplation of the first composer."

That the audience yesterday enjoyed the Suite was shown by the spontaneous applause at the end and the several calls for the composer-pianist. Three of the movements made an immediate direct appeal: Isabelle, Polka, Souvenir de Rio. There were interesting features in other movements.

It is extremely doubtful whether Ravel's "Waltz"—it has been put on the stage at Ghent—will stand among his better compositions. The mysterious opening, the muttered hints, the exposition with refined treatment of the chief items are still fresh; the latter half seems long spun out; to use a homely phrase "fussed-up."

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows. Handel, Concerto Grosso, No. 6, G minor. Vaughan Williams, A Norfolk Rhapsody No. 1. Wagner, Prelude and Love Death ("Tristan and Isolde"). Rimsky-Korsakov, "Scheherazade."

MILHAUD SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dec. 18

Parisian Composer Plays His Own Music

Boston Globe

Darius Milhaud, much talked of Parisian composer, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. He played the piano part in his own fantasy for piano and orchestra "The Carnival at Aix," written "especially for my American tour," as he confided to New York interviewers the other day. It is based on a ballet called "Salad," performed in 1924 in Paris.

M Milhaud in this fantasy has not written a serious masterpiece or advanced the art of music. But it should be counted to his credit that he has not tried to do so. The 12 brief sections of this fantasy are so many more or less amusing trifles, with a rhythmic ingenuity and frequently a rather naive humor about them calculated to please an audience.

These pieces might have been written in 1900. Here are few traces of the appalling and irresponsible polytonality which won Milhaud a reputation as a dangerous musical radical.

The piano part in this suite is not written so as to demand of the performer any prodigious display of technical skill, nor is M Milhaud a pianist of remarkable excellence.

As for his talent as composer, one would prefer to postpone passing judgment until hearing a work which he himself appears to take seriously. Facility and, within a limited range, ingenuity he certainly has. Yesterday's audience applauded with the politeness expected in the case of distinguished visitors.

"First in America"

It perhaps deserves mention that although the original announcement stated that the Boston performances would be "the first in America," the actual first performance anywhere was as it turned out, given in New York by the Philharmonic Orchestra Dec 9. The really remarkable circumstance is that both Koussevitzky and Mengelberg should have been willing to offer their audiences music so very slight, which the composer himself obviously wrote for a lark.

There is no further excuse for excluding from the Symphony concerts the works of Irving Berlin, George Gershwil, and Confrey, any one of whom handles rhythms more skilfully and invents more ingratiating themes than Milhaud's. But Milhaud is a Parisian "highbrow" and they are "American lowbrows." Of musical snobberies there is, in America, no end.

Mr Koussevitzky began the program with Schumann's First Symphony, and concluded it with Ravel's "La Valse." Debussy's "Iberia," several times announced, was again withdrawn, no doubt for further rehearsal.

The performance of the Schumann Symphony was on the whole among the most successful of all those that Mr Koussevitzky has conducted here. The first two movements, in particular were read with remarkable eloquence which in this instance did not result in violence being done to the letter and the spirit of Schumann's score. Mr Koussevitzky had taken great pains with the piece, which, because it is badly written for orchestra, is difficult to make sound as the composer meant it.

In the scherzo the old difficulty about establishing the proper tempo in the opening measure baffled the conductor's skill. Can it be, as a musician in the audience yesterday suggested, that Mr Koussevitzky's beat is in such cases momentarily obscure?

In places in the finale and scherzo there was ragged playing, with the strings, in particular, not quite together. But when the general effect was so impressive it is perhaps ungracious to point out these flaws in the execution, chronic faults with the orchestra under its present conductor.

Dramatically Successful

There was a fitful hysterical eloquence in the reading of "La Valse," but the continuity of the set of waltzes which should be marked by the underlying waltz rhythm, was obscured by Mr Koussevitzky's tendency to make effects with particular passages. There were so many of these effects, often in themselves dramatically successful, that the effect of the whole piece was lost.

The Christmas program, as now announced, will include Rimsky Korsakoff's "Scheherezade," a concerto grosso (which one is not stated), by Handel; the Prelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan," and, for the first time here, "A Norfolk Rhapsody" by Vaughan Williams. P. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
DEC 19 1926

Program for Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the following program for the second Brooklyn concert of the season by the orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 7, at 8:15 o'clock:

Concerto for Orchestra in D Major, C. P. E. Bach
Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante lento moto.
III. Allegro.

Symphony No. 7 (in one movement), Op. 105 ..... Sibelius

Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner

Funeral Music of Siegfried, from "The Dusk of the Gods."

"Forest Murmurs," from ...

ATTLEBORO, MASS.
SUN
DEC 22 1926

FAN MAIL NOT SO IMPRESSIVE

After a radio fan has been listening all evening to various stations, and each and every one of these latter have exhorted him to "be sure and write in and tell just how the music got across,' be begins to wonder how many people do write in.

The superintendent of broadcasting of WEEI, Boston, Charles W. Burton, gives some interesting points on fan mail in a special statement printed in the January Radio Broadcast magazine. "When WEEI broadcast the famous Boston Symphony orchestra for the first time, the novelty of the thing attracted to our wavelength about 1,500,000 people," he says. "This number was estimated from the number of sales of tubes and batteries, and by another way. We are convinced that only one person in every 500 tuned-in on a program will write a letter to the station about it. Three thousand letters followed the initial Symphony orchestra concert broadcast.

"Most stations and programs sponsors exaggerate the importance of fan mail," thinks Mr. Burton. "It cannot reflect the attitude of the audience in general; it rarely offers any intelligent criticism, and its requests, if complied with, add to the deadly similitude of programs. Many program sponsors, in order to stimulate letter writing, are offering samples, radio logs, and other articles as an inducement. Of what value to radio, or their campaign, is this? It merely indicates that people like to get something for nothing. It doesn't show whether the program has a popular appeal. Indeed, I have seen letters something like this: 'Your tenor ought to have his throat cut, and obviously your orchestra was organized 15 minutes before the program opened. Please send me one of your handy bottle openers.' A great many kind listeners do write fine letters to WEEI, however, and we love them for it. We hope their numbers will increase. But we do not hold with the old tradition that fan mail is the very life blood of the broadcasting industry."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
DEC 23 1926

SINGER SUES SYMPHONY

Says Boston Conductor Induced Her to Leave Paris.

By United Press.

Boston, Dec. 23.—Mme. Valia Valia Valentinova, Russian singer, has filed a claim here against the Boston Symphony Orchestra, alleging breach of contract.

She charged that Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor of that orchestra, induced her to leave Paris on a promise that she would be booked to sing three concerts with the orchestra, and failed to fulfill his agreement.

No specific amount of damages was asked. Koussevitzky's interpreter said:

"It is not true at all. There was no contract, no definite agreement."

SYMPHONY MAKES BABY MUSIC VOGUE

Dec. 18

Milhaud Plays Piano Part in' Latest "Salade"

Boston Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Whatever else the Symphony Concert of yesterday might be called, it might not properly be referred to as dull. First on Mr. Koussevitzky's list came Schumann's outspoken and tuneful B-flat major Symphony, the final number was that remarkable sublimation of the musically obvious, Ravel's "La Valse," and between these there appeared "in person" Darius Milhaud to play the solo piano part in his new "Le Carnaval d'Aix," a startling example of the infantilism now in vogue among certain of the younger Parisian composers.

OFF "HIGH BROW" STUFF

This is not M. Milhaud's first visit to Boston. He appeared here as lecturer and as pianist in his own chamber-music in the season of 1922-23; and since M. Monteux conducted his daring Second Suite in the spring of 1921 his orchestral music was not previously unknown to Symphony hall. The evolution—some might perhaps call it the disintegration—as composer of M. Milhaud, now in his 35th year, has been curious. His early violin sonatas and string quartets might well be described as masterly.

He has had his fling at the writing of music of a violently dissonant and "futuristic" character. But of late he has chiefly cultivated two forms of expression: the dance style, either in terms of the Brazilian tango or of American jazz and the consciously naive.

Little Folks' Tunes

Twelve little pieces make the fantasy heard yesterday, a work derived, by the way, from the composer's ballet "Salade." Hearing them the listener was violently torn between the cafe-chantant and the nursery. Of the twelve the seventh, by title "Le Capitaine Cartiuccia," a march based upon the "Johnny-get-a-hatrack" rhythm long dear to beaters upon toy drums, evoked a burst of applause that for a moment disrupted the continuity of effect intended by composer and conductor.

And at the end M. Milhaud, a stoutish man exceedingly amiable of aspect who had played his music in a persistent staccato fashion, was many times recalled.

Revitalizing Schumann

That of yesterday was the first Boston performance under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction of Schumann's so-called "Spring" symphony. Realizing that its fading pages stand sorely in need of revitalizing, the conductor yesterday made a palpable effort to "pep up" this music, and to a generally satisfactory if sometimes over-noisy result. In this music which flowed so freely from Schumann's pen that the actual composition, aside from the orchestration, was completed in four days, the audience of yesterday took unbounded delight. By such token, then, the piece has not yet outlived its usefulness, although the hypercritical may still protest its lack of true symphonic texture, its want of proper symphonic dignity, its wearisome repetitions of inconsequential figures, its occasional triviality, its persistently gauche and amateurish instrumentation. Witness, then, in the Symphony's success of yesterday the combined triumph of melody, sing-song rhythm and conductorial enthusiasm.

Brilliant, too, was the performance yesterday accorded Ravel's apotheosis of the Viennese waltz, a piece in which Mr. Koussevitzky has more than once demonstrated his own and the orchestra's prowess.

BURLINGTON, IA.
HAWK EYE
DEC 19 1926

...ated each Christmas time.

* * *

Boston Symphony Christmas Night.

The regular weekly concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast by WJZ, WBZ, WGY, WFBL, WMAK and WHAM at 7:10 Christmas night, Dec. 25. Under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, the Boston Symphony orchestra playing in Symphony Hall, Boston, will be heard in a concert of appropriate Yuletide compositions.

SYMPHONY IN 9TH CONCERT TONIGHT

Herald Dec 18

Tonight's concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the ninth in the series of 24 of the season, will be broadcast through station WBZ only, the chain network of six nations now linked together for transmitting the programs not tieing-in with WBZ until next Saturday. The entire series of concerts of this famous organization is broadcast through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago.

Featuring tonight's program by the orchestra of 107 musicians under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will be music of the modern French school. The program includes Ravel's poem, "La Valse," and Darius Milhaud's suite, "The Carnival d'Aix." Ravel made a sketch of "The Waltz" during the war and finished the work in 1920. The meaning of the music is indicated in the following description which is printed on the music: "Whirling clouds give glimpses, through rifts, of couples waltzing. The clouds scatter little by little. One sees an immense hall peopled with a twirling crowd. The scene is gradually illuminated. The light of the chandeliers bursts forth fortissimo. An imperial court about 1855." The themes employed suggest the melodies of Viennese waltzes.

Darius Milhaud, celebrated pianist, who will appear as soloist on this program, is one of the group of young French composers known as "The Six." This group, which includes Honneger, Poulenc, Mle. Tailleferre, Durey and Auric, represents the most radical tendencies in modern French music.

Before the program begins, Prof. John Patten Marshall who interprets the symphony programs in a most interesting manner for the radio audience will discuss Schumann's First Symphony, the opening number on the program. Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will assist Prof. Marshall in his interpretations by illustrating musically the principal themes of the Symphony.

The complete program is as follows:

Schumann, Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, op. 38.
1. Andante un poco maestoso; allegro molto vivace.
2. Larghetto.
3. Scherzo; molto vivace, Trio 1; molto piu vivace, Trio 2.
4. Allegro animato e grazioso.

Milhaud, "Le Carnaval d'Aix"; Fantasy for piano and orchestra on the ballet, "Salade."
1. Le Corso.
2. Tartaglia.
3. Isabelle.
4. Rosetta.
5. Le Bon et le Mauvais Tuteur.
6. Coviello.
7. Le Capitaine Cartuccia.
8. Polichinelle.
9. Polka.
10. Cinzio.
11. Souvenir de Rio (tango).
12. Finale.

Ravel, "La Valse." Choreographic Poem.
Soloist, Darius Milhaud

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
DEC 19 1926

Boston Orchestra to Play Sibelius' Seventh Symphony at Next Brooklyn Concert.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the following programme for the second Brooklyn concert of the season, at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 7.

Concerto for Orchestra, in D major (C. P. E. Bach—arranged by Maximilian Steinberg). Symphony No. 7 (Sibelius); Prelude to "Lohengrin," Funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods," Forest Murmers from "Siegfried," Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

THIS CLIPPING FROM CONSTITUTION
ATLANTA, GA.
DEC 19 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON AIR CHRISTMAS

New York, December 18.—The regular weekly concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast by WJZ, WBZ, WGY, WFBL, WMAK and WHAM at 7:30 Christmas night, December 25. Under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, the Boston Symphony orchestra playing in Symphony hall, Boston, will be heard in a concert of appropriate yuletide compositions.

It will be noted that three additional radio stations will tie-in with WBZ, WJZ and WGY in this feature. It is expected that this chain will continue to handle the broadcasts of this orchestra in the future.

In the explanatory remarks preceding the program Professor Marshall, the head of the music department of Holy Cross and Boston colleges, will discuss the life and works of the various composers to be heard.

SYMPHONY GIVES NINTH CONCERT

HER DEC 18

Schumann's "The Carnival of Aix" in B Flat Major Is Presented

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, was as follows: Schumann, Symphony, B flat major, No. 1. Milhaud, "The Carnival of Aix," fantasy for piano and orchestra on the Ballet "Salade" (Mr. Milhaud, pianist). Ravel, "The Waltz."

Schumann wished Taubert, the conductor, to infuse into his orchestra in the performance of this symphony "a sort of longing for the spring," which, he said, he had chiefly in mind when he wrote the music. He admitted that his thoughts were fantastic and came to him after the work was finished. (He did not give the titles to the sections of his "Carnival" for piano until the music was all written). His wife said that he called the symphony a "Spring" symphony, it is also reported that he at first purposed to name the momento, "Dawn of Spring, "Evening,' 'Joyful Playing," "Full Spring." It is known that a poem by Boettger about spring was in his mind.

But the symphony finally appeared as a symphony in B flat major—this and nothing more; and for dwellers in New England, this is enough. Spring is known to us only through poets of more favored climes. It is not easy for us to be rapturous about this season of the year. Whittier, the New Englander, as a poet of nature, was happiest when he wrote "Snowbound." In the concert hall the songs exulting in the spring leave us cold; the more joyous the song, the more foreign it is to us. Surely no one thinks of skipping lambs, nor is one inclined to join in the refrain, "Fa-la-la, Fal-lal-la" of many glees and madrigals. So we doubt whether Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday urged his players to think of spring when they were playing. This did not prevent the performance from being a glorious one, in headlong rush, in musically animal spirits, in the beauty of the more intimate passages which are peculiarly Schumannian, in the finest sense of proportion in dialogue and ensemble, in the pervading genial and poetic nature of the interpretation.

And so whatever has been said in disparagement of Schumann's orchestration, there was no thought yesterday of crudeness or clumsiness; no one felt like repeating the well-worn saying that he wrote as for a piano. The musical thoughts of the composer were in the foreground; the symphony sounded far better than would appear from the cold and lifeless score, for the notes were vitalized and beautified by the aesthetic skill of the conductor and the technical proficiency of the players.

As we have said before, music is not music until it is performed, until it sounds. It is the task of the conductor to make it sound so that it stirs or moves the hearer. There should not be too rigid respect for the letter, for the mint and cummin. Indications of tempo should be as signposts, pointing the general direction, but allowing the traveler to loiter or hasten on the way, so that he finds new beauty in a landscape, or gathers flowers here and there, or passes quickly over muddy or rocky stretches. Schumann is not a composer for a metronomic time-beater. Poet calls unto poet; the poet thus called upon must not be of the Queen Anne school.

Mr. Milhaud drew a Suite from his ballet "Salade," especially for his present tour. The Philharmonic Society of New York was the first to play the Suite. The ballet itself was produced in Paris two years and a half ago. The ballet introduced characters from the old Italian Comedy, known to us by the drawings of Callot. Some of these characters give titles to movements in the Suite. There are 12 movements, some very short, none very long. The Tango (Souvenir de Rio) reminds one that Mr. Milhaud and Paul Claudel, now French Ambassador to this country, were in 1917 and 1918 in the diplomatic corps at Rio.

Those who were acquainted with some of Mr. Milhaud's earlier works, seeing yesterday the title "Salade," no doubt expected to find an undue use of vinegar with strange and unknown seasoning in the dressing, the "fatiguing" of this music. They were disappointed. There was little that was shocking to ultra-conservative ears, there was much to please, to amuse (in the better sense of that word.) We are all to much inclined to be unduly serious at Symphony Concerts; to insist on only the noble and sublime. Sir Thomas Browne was not of that mind.

"For even that vulgar and tavern-music, which makes one man merry, another mad, strikes in me a deep fit of devotian, and a profound contemplation of the first composer."

That the audience yesterday enjoyed the Suite was shown by the spontaneous applause at the end and the several calls for the composer-pianist. Three of the movements made an immediate direct appeal: Isabelle, Polka, Souvenir de Rio. There were interesting features in other movements.

It is extremely doubtful whether Ravel's "Waltz"—it has been put on the stage at Ghent—will stand among his better compositions. The mysterious opening, the muttered hints, the exposition with refined treatment of the chief items are still fresh; the latter half seems long spun out; to use a homely phrase "fussed-up."

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows. Handel, Concerto Grosso, No. 6, G minor. Vaughan Williams, A Norfolk Rhapsody No. 1. Wagner, Prelude and Love Death ("Tristan and Isolde"). Rimsky-Korsakov, "Scheherazade."

MILHAUD SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dec. 18

Parisian Composer Plays His Own Music

Boston Globe

Darius Milhaud, much talked of Parisian composer, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. He played the piano part in his own fantasy for piano and orchestra "The Carnival at Aix," written "especially for my American tour," as he confided to New York interviewers the other day. It is based on a ballet called "Salad," performed in 1924 in Paris.

M Milhaud in this fantasy has not written a serious masterpiece or advanced the art of music. But it should be counted to his credit that he has not tried to do so. The 12 brief sections of this fantasy are so many more or less amusing trifles, with a rhythmic ingenuity and frequently a rather naive humor about them calculated to please an audience.

These pieces might have been written in 1900. Here are few traces of the appalling and irresponsible polytonality which won Milhaud a reputation as a dangerous musical radical.

The piano part in this suite is not written so as to demand of the performer any prodigious display of technical skill, nor is M Milhaud a pianist of remarkable excellence.

As for his talent as composer, one would prefer to postpone passing judgment until hearing a work which he himself appears to take seriously. Facility and, within a limited range, ingenuity he certainly has. Yesterday's audience applauded with the politeness expected in the case of distinguished visitors.

"First in America"

It perhaps deserves mention that although the original announcement stated that the Boston performances would be "the first in America," the actual first performance anywhere was as it turned out, given in New York by the Philharmonic Orchestra Dec 9. The really remarkable circumstance is that both Koussevitzky and Mengelberg should have been willing to offer their audiences music so very slight, which the composer himself obviously wrote for a lark.

There is no further excuse for excluding from the Symphony concerts the works of Irving Berlin, George Gershwil, and Confrey, any one of whom handles rhythms more skilfully and invents more ingratiating themes than Milhaud's. But Milhaud is a Parisian "highbrow" and they are "American lowbrows." Of musical snobberies there is, in America, no end.

Mr Koussevitzky began the program with Schumann's First Symphony, and concluded it with Ravel's "La Valse." Debussy's "Iberia," several times announced, was again withdrawn, no doubt for further rehearsal.

The performance of the Schumann Symphony was on the whole among the most successful of all those that Mr Koussevitzky has conducted here. The first two movements, in particular were read with remarkable eloquence which in this instance did not result in violence being done to the letter and the spirit of Schumann's score. Mr Koussevitzky had taken great pains with the piece, which, because it is badly written for orchestra, is difficult to make sound as the composer meant it.

In the scherzo the old difficulty about establishing the proper tempo in the opening measure baffled the conductor's skill. Can it be, as a musician in the audience yesterday suggested, that Mr Koussevitzky's beat is in such cases momentarily obscure?

In places in the finale and scherzo there was ragged playing, with the strings, in particular, not quite together. But when the general effect was so impressive it is perhaps ungracious to point out these flaws in the execution, chronic faults with the orchestra under its present conductor.

Dramatically Successful

There was a fitful hysterical eloquence in the reading of "La Valse," but the continuity of the set of waltzes which should be marked by the underlying waltz rhythm, was obscured by Mr Koussevitzky's tendency to make effects with particular passages. There were so many of these effects, often in themselves dramatically successful, that the effect of the whole piece was lost.

The Christmas program, as now announced, will include Rimsky Korsakoff's "Scheherezade," a concerto grosso (which one is not stated), by Handel; the Prelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan," and, for the first time here, "A Norfolk Rhapsody" by Vaughan Williams. P. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
DEC 19 1926

Program for Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the following program for the second Brooklyn concert of the season by the orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 7, at 8:15 o'clock:

Concerto for Orchestra in D Major, C. P. E. Bach
Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante lento moto.
III. Allegro.
Symphony No. 7 (in one movement), Op. 105 ..... Sibelius
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Funeral Music of Siegfried, from "The Dusk of the Gods."
"Forest Murmurs," from ...

ATTLEBORO, MASS.
SUN
DEC 22 1926

FAN MAIL NOT SO IMPRESSIVE

After a radio fan has been listening all evening to various stations, and each and every one of these latter have exhorted him to "be sure and write in and tell just how the music got across,' he begins to wonder how many people do write in.

The superintendent of broadcasting of WEEI, Boston, Charles W. Burton, gives some interesting points on fan mail in a special statement printed in the January Radio Broadcast magazine. "When WEEI broadcast the famous Boston Symphony orchestra for the first time, the novelty of the thing attracted to our wavelength about 1,500,000 people," he says. "This number was estimated from the number of sales of tubes and batteries, and by another way. We are convinced that only one person in every 500 tuned-in on a program will write a letter to the station about it. Three thousand letters followed the initial Symphony orchestra concert broadcast.

"Most stations and programs sponsors exaggerate the importance of fan mail," thinks Mr. Burton. "It cannot reflect the attitude of the audience in general; it rarely offers any intelligent criticism, and its requests, if complied with, add to the deadly similitude of programs. Many program sponsors, in order to stimulate letter writing, are offering samples, radio logs, and other articles as an inducement. Of what value to radio, or their campaign, is this? It merely indicates that people like to get something for nothing. It doesn't show whether the program has a popular appeal. Indeed, I have seen letters something like this: 'Your tenor ought to have his throat cut, and obviously your orchestra was organized 15 minutes before the program opened. Please send me one of your handy bottle openers.' A great many kind listeners do write fine letters to WEEI, however, and we love them for it. We hope their numbers will increase. But we do not hold with the old tradition that fan mail is the very life blood of the broadcasting industry."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
DEC 23 1926

SINGER SUES SYMPHONY

Says Boston Conductor Induced Her to Leave Paris.

By United Press.

Boston, Dec. 23.—Mme. Valia Valia Valentinova, Russian singer, has filed a claim here against the Boston Symphony Orchestra, alleging breach of contract.

She charged that Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor of that orchestra, induced her to leave Paris on a promise that she would be booked to sing three concerts with the orchestra, and failed to fulfill his agreement.

No specific amount of damages was asked. Koussevitzky's interpreter said:

"It is not true at all. There was no contract, no definite agreement."

SYMPHONY MAKES BABY MUSIC VOGUE

Dec. 18

Milhaud Plays Piano Part in Latest "Salade"

Boston Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Whatever else the Symphony Concert of yesterday might be called, it might not properly be referred to as dull. First on Mr. Koussevitzky's list came Schumann's outspoken and tuneful B-flat major Symphony, the final number was that remarkable sublimation of the musically obvious, Ravel's "La Valse," and between these there appeared "in person" Darius Milhaud to play the solo piano part in his new "Le Carnaval d'Aix," a startling example of the infantilism now in vogue among certain of the younger Parisian composers.

OFF "HIGH BROW" STUFF

This is not M. Milhaud's first visit to Boston. He appeared here as lecturer and as pianist in his own chamber-music in the season of 1922-23; and since M. Monteux conducted his daring Second Suite in the spring of 1921 his orchestral music was not previously unknown to Symphony hall. The evolution—some might perhaps call it the disintegration—as composer of M. Milhaud, now in his 35th year, has been curious. His early violin sonatas and string quartets might well be described as masterly.

He has had his fling at the writing of music of a violently dissonant and "futuristic" character. But of late he has chiefly cultivated two forms of expression: the dance style, either in terms of the Brazilian tango or of American jazz and the consciously naive.

Little Folks' Tunes

Twelve little pieces make the fantasy heard yesterday, a work derived, by the way, from the composer's ballet "Salade." Hearing them the listener was violently torn between the cafe-chantant and the nursery. Of the twelve the seventh, by title "Le Capitaine Cartuccia," a march based upon the "Johnny-get-a-hatrack" rhythm long dear to beaters upon toy drums, evoked a burst of applause that for a moment disrupted the continuity of effect intended by composer and conductor.

And at the end M. Milhaud, a stoutish man exceedingly amiable of aspect who had played his music in a persistent staccato fashion, was many times recalled.

Revitalizing Schumann

That of yesterday was the first Boston performance under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction of Schumann's so-called "Spring" symphony. Realizing that its fading pages stand sorely in need of revitalizing, the conductor yesterday made a palpable effort to "pep up" this music, and to a generally satisfactory if sometimes over-noisy result. In this music which flowed so freely from Schumann's pen that the actual composition, aside from the orchestration, was completed in four days, the audience of yesterday took unbounded delight. By such token, then, the piece has not yet outlived its usefulness, although the hypercritical may still protest its lack of true symphonic texture, its want of proper symphonic dignity, its wearisome repetitions of inconsequential figures, its occasional triviality, its persistently gauche and amateurish instrumentation. Witness, then, in the Symphony's success of yesterday the combined triumph of melody, sing-song rhythm and conductorial enthusiasm.

Brilliant, too, was the performance yesterday accorded Ravel's apotheosis of the Viennese waltz, a piece in which Mr. Koussevitzky has more than once demonstrated his own and the orchestra's prowess.

BURLINGTON, IA.
HAWK EYE
DEC 19 1926

* * *

Boston Symphony Christmas Night.

The regular weekly concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast by WJZ, WBZ, WGY, WFBL, WMAK and WHAM at 7:10 Christmas night, Dec. 25. Under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, the Boston Symphony orchestra playing in Symphony Hall, Boston, will be heard in a concert of appropriate Yuletide compositions.

SYMPHONY IN 9TH CONCERT TONIGHT

Herald Dec 18

Tonight's concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the ninth in the series of 24 of the season, will be broadcast through station WBZ only, the chain network of six nations now linked together for transmitting the programs not tieing-in with WBZ until next Saturday. The entire series of concerts of this famous organization is broadcast through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago.

Featuring tonight's program by the orchestra of 107 musicians under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will be music of the modern French school. The program includes Ravel's poem, "La Valse," and Darius Milhaud's suite, "The Carnival d'Aix." Ravel made a sketch of "The Waltz" during the war and finished the work in 1920. The meaning of the music is indicated in the following description which is printed on the music: "Whirling clouds give glimpses, through rifts, of couples waltzing. The clouds scatter little by little. One sees an immense hall peopled with a twirling crowd. The scene is gradually illuminated. The light of the chandeliers bursts forth fortissimo. An imperial court about 1855." The themes employed suggest the melodies of Viennese waltzes.

Darius Milhaud, celebrated pianist, who will appear as soloist on this program, is one of the group of young French composers known as "The Six." This group, which includes Honneger, Poulenc, Mle. Tailleferre, Durey and Auric, represents the most radical tendencies in modern French music.

Before the program begins, Prof. John Patten Marshall who interprets the symphony programs in a most interesting manner for the radio audience will discuss Schumann's First Symphony, the opening number on the program. Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, will assist Prof. Marshall in his interpretations by illustrating musically the principal themes of the Symphony.

The complete program is as follows:

Schumann, Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, op. 38.
1. Andante un poco maestoso; allegro molto vivace.
2. Larghetto.
3. Scherzo; molto vivace. Trio 1: molto piu vivace. Trio 2.
4. Allegro animato e grazioso.

Milhaud, "Le Carnaval d'Aix"; Fantasy for piano and orchestra on the ballet, "Salade."
1. Le Corso.
2. Tartaglia.
3. Isabelle.
4. Rosetta.
5. Le Bon et le Mauvais Tuteur.
6. Coviello.
7. Le Capitaine Cartuccia.
8. Polichinelle.
9. Polka.
10. Cinzio.
11. Souvenir de Rio (tango).
12. Finale.

Ravel, "La Valse." Choreographic Poem.
Soloist, Darius Milhaud

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
DEC 19 1926

Boston Orchestra to Play Sibelius' Seventh Symphony at Next Brooklyn Concert.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the following programme for the second Brooklyn concert of the season, at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 7.

Concerto for Orchestra, in D major (C. P. E. Bach—arranged by Maximilian Steinberg), Symphony No. 7 (Sibelius); Prelude to "Lohengrin," Funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods," Forest Murmers from "Siegfried," Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

THIS CLIPPING FROM CONSTITUTION
ATLANTA, GA.
DEC 19 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON AIR CHRISTMAS

New York, December 18.—The regular weekly concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast by WJZ, WBZ, WGY, WFBL, WMAK and WHAM at 7:30 Christmas night, December 25. Under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, the Boston Symphony orchestra playing in Symphony hall, Boston, will be heard in a concert of appropriate yuletide compositions.

It will be noted that three additional radio stations will tie-in with WBZ, WJZ and WGY in this feature. It is expected that this chain will continue to handle the broadcasts of this orchestra in the future.

In the explanatory remarks preceding the program Professor Marshall, the head of the music department of Holy Cross and Boston colleges, will discuss the life and works of the various composers to be heard.

SYMPHONY GIVES NINTH CONCERT

HER DEC 18

Schumann's "The Carnival of Aix" in B Flat Major Is Presented

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, was as follows: Schumann, Symphony, B flat major, No. 1. Milhaud, "The Carnival of Aix," fantasy for piano and orchestra on the Ballet "Salade" (Mr. Milhaud, pianist). Ravel, "The Waltz."

Schumann wished Taubert, the conductor, to infuse into his orchestra in the performance of this symphony "a sort of longing for the spring," which, he said, he had chiefly in mind when he wrote the music. He admitted that his thoughts were fantastic and came to him after the work was finished. (He did not give the titles to the sections of his "Carnival" for piano until the music was all written). His wife said that he called the symphony a "Spring" symphony; it is also reported that he at first purposed to name the momento, "Dawn of Spring, "Evening,' 'Joyful Playing," "Full Spring." It is known that a poem by Boettger about spring was in his mind.

But the symphony finally appeared as a symphony in B flat major—this and nothing more; and for dwellers in New England, this is enough. Spring is known to us only through poets of more favored climes. It is not easy for us to be rapturous about this season of the year. Whittier, the New Englander, as a poet of nature, was happiest when he wrote "Snowbound." In the concert hall the songs exulting in the spring leave us cold; the more joyous the song, the more foreign it is to us. Surely no one thinks of skipping lambs, nor is one inclined to join in the refrain, "Fa-la-la, Fal-lal-la" of many glees and madrigals. So we doubt whether Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday urged his players to think of spring when they were playing. This did not prevent the performance from being a glorious one, in headlong rush, in musically animal spirits, in the beauty of the more intimate passages which are peculiarly Schumannian, in the finest sense of proportion in dialogue and ensemble, in the pervading genial and poetic nature of the interpretation.

And so whatever has been said in disparagement of Schumann's orchestration, there was no thought yesterday of crudeness or clumsiness; no one felt like repeating the well-worn saying that he wrote as for a piano. The musical thoughts of the composer were in the foreground; the symphony sounded far better than would appear from the cold and lifeless score, for the notes were vitalized and beautified by the aesthetic skill of the conductor and the technical proficiency of the players.

As we have said before, music is not music until it is performed, until it sounds. It is the task of the conductor to make it sound so that it stirs or moves the hearer. There should not be too rigid respect for the letter, for the mint and cummin. Indications of tempo should be as signposts, pointing the general direction, but allowing the traveler to loiter or hasten on the way, so that he finds new beauty in a landscape, or gathers flowers here and there, or passes quickly over muddy or rocky stretches. Schumann is not a composer for a metronomic time-beater. Poet calls unto poet; the poet thus called upon must not be of the Queen Anne school.

Mr. Milhaud drew a Suite from his ballet "Salade," especially for his present tour. The Philharmonic Society of New York was the first to play the Suite. The ballet itself was produced in Paris two years and a half ago. The ballet introduced characters from the old Italian Comedy, known to us by the drawings of Callot. Some of these characters give titles to movements in the Suite. There are 12 movements, some very short, none very long. The Tango (Souvenir de Rio) reminds one that Mr. Milhaud and Paul Claudel, now French Ambassador to this country, were in 1917 and 1918 in the diplomatic corps at Rio.

Those who were acquainted with some of Mr. Milhaud's earlier works, seeing yesterday the title "Salade," no doubt expected to find an undue use of vinegar with strange and unknown seasoning in the dressing, the "fatiguing" of this music. They were disappointed. There was little that was shocking to ultra-conservative ears, there was much to please, to amuse (in the better sense of that word.) We are all to much inclined to be unduly serious at Symphony Concerts; to insist on only the noble and sublime. Sir Thomas Browne was not of that mind.

"For even that vulgar and tavern-music, which makes one man merry, another mad, strikes in me a deep fit of devotian, and a profound contemplation of the first composer."

That the audience yesterday enjoyed the Suite was shown by the spontaneous applause at the end and the several calls for the composer-pianist. Three of the movements made an immediate direct appeal: Isabelle, Polka, Souvenir de Rio. There were interesting features in other movements.

It is extremely doubtful whether Ravel's "Waltz"—it has been put on the stage at Ghent—will stand among his better compositions. The mysterious opening, the muttered hints, the exposition with refined treatment of the chief items are still fresh; the latter half seems long spun out; to use a homely phrase "fussed-up."

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows. Handel, Concerto Grosso, No. 6, G minor. Vaughan Williams, A Norfolk Rhapsody No. 1. Wagner, Prelude and Love Death ("Tristan and Isolde"). Rimsky-Korsakov, "Scheherazade."

MILHAUD SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dec. 18

Parisian Composer Plays His Own Music

Boston Globe

Darius Milhaud, much talked of Parisian composer, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. He played the piano part in his own fantasy for piano and orchestra "The Carnival at Aix," written "especially for my American tour," as he confided to New York interviewers the other day. It is based on a ballet called "Salad." performed in 1924 in Paris.

M Milhaud in this fantasy has not written a serious masterpiece or advanced the art of music. But it should be counted to his credit that he has not tried to do so. The 12 brief sections of this fantasy are so many more or less amusing trifles, with a rhythmic ingenuity and frequently a rather naive humor about them calculated to please an audience.

These pieces might have been written in 1900. Here are few traces of the appalling and irresponsible polytonality which won Milhaud a reputation as a dangerous musical radical.

The piano part in this suite is not written so as to demand of the performer any prodigious display of technical skill, nor is M Milhaud a pianist of remarkable excellence.

As for his talent as composer, one would prefer to postpone passing judgment until hearing a work which he himself appears to take seriously. Facility and, within a limited range, ingenuity he certainly has. Yesterday's audience applauded with the politeness expected in the case of distinguished visitors.

"First in America"

It perhaps deserves mention that although the original announcement stated that the Boston performances would be "the first in America," the actual first performance anywhere was as it turned out, given in New York by the Philharmonic Orchestra Dec 9. The really remarkable circumstance is that both Koussevitzky and Mengelberg should have been willing to offer their audiences music so very slight, which the composer himself obviously wrote for a lark.

There is no further excuse for excluding from the Symphony concerts the works of Irving Berlin, George Gershwil, and Confrey, any one of whom handles rhythms more skilfully and invents more ingratiating themes than Milhaud's. But Milhaud is a Parisian "highbrow" and they are "American lowbrows." Of musical snobberies there is, in America, no end.

Mr Koussevitzky began the program with Schumann's First Symphony, and concluded it with Ravel's "La Valse." Debussy's "Iberia," several times announced, was again withdrawn, no doubt for further rehearsal.

The performance of the Schumann Symphony was on the whole among the most successful of all those that Mr Koussevitzky has conducted here. The first two movements, in particular were read with remarkable eloquence which in this instance did not result in violence being done to the letter and the spirit of Schumann's score. Mr Koussevitzky had taken great pains with the piece, which, because it is badly written for orchestra, is difficult to make sound as the composer meant it.

In the scherzo the old difficulty about establishing the proper tempo in the opening measure baffled the conductor's skill. Can it be, as a musician in the audience yesterday suggested, that Mr Koussevitzky's beat is in such cases momentarily obscure?

In places in the finale and scherzo there was ragged playing, with the strings, in particular, not quite together. But when the general effect was so impressive it is perhaps ungracious to point out these flaws in the execution, chronic faults with the orchestra under its present conductor.

Dramatically Successful

There was a fitful hysterical eloquence in the reading of "La Valse," but the continuity of the set of waltzes which should be marked by the underlying waltz rhythm, was obscured by Mr Koussevitzky's tendency to make effects with particular passages. There were so many of these effects, often in themselves dramatically successful, that the effect of the whole piece was lost.

The Christmas program, as now announced, will include Rimsky Korsakoff's "Scheherezade," a concerto grosso (which one is not stated), by Handel; the Prelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan," and, for the first time here, "A Norfolk Rhapsody" by Vaughan Williams. P. R.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
DEC 19 1926

Program for Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the following program for the second Brooklyn concert of the season by the orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 7, at 8:15 o'clock:

Concerto for Orchestra in D Major, C. P. E. Bach
Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante lento moto.
III. Allegro.
Symphony No. 7 (in one movement), Op. 105 ..... Sibelius
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Funeral Music of Siegfried, from "The Dusk of the Gods."
"Forest Murmurs," from "Siegf[illegible]" (Act II).
Prelude to "The M[illegible]," MASS.

SUN
DEC 22 1926

FAN MAIL NOT SO IMPRESSIVE

After a radio fan has been listening all evening to various stations, and each and every one of these latter have exhorted him to "be sure and write in and tell just how the music got across,' he begins to wonder how many people do write in.

The superintendent of broadcasting of WEEI, Boston, Charles W. Burton, gives some interesting points on fan mail in a special statement printed in the January Radio Broadcast magazine. "When WEEI broadcast the famous Boston Symphony orchestra for the first time, the novelty of the thing attracted to our wavelength about 1,500,000 people," he says. "This number was estimated from the number of sales of tubes and batteries, and by another way. We are convinced that only one person in every 500 tuned-in on a program will write a letter to the station about it. Three thousand letters followed the initial Symphony orchestra concert broadcast.

"Most stations and programs sponsors exaggerate the importance of fan mail," thinks Mr. Burton. "It cannot reflect the attitude of the audience in general; it rarely offers any intelligent criticism, and its requests, if complied with, add to the deadly similitude of programs. Many program sponsors, in order to stimulate letter writing, are offering samples, radio logs, and other articles as an inducement. Of what value to radio, or their campaign, is this? It merely indicates that people like to get something for nothing. It doesn't show whether the program has a popular appeal. Indeed, I have seen letters something like this: 'Your tenor ought to have his throat cut, and obviously your orchestra was organized 15 minutes before the program opened. Please send me one of your handy bottle openers.' A great many kind listeners do write fine letters to WEEI, however, and we love them for it. We hope their numbers will increase. But we do not hold with the old tradition that fan mail is the very life blood of the broadcasting industry."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
DEC 23 1926

SINGER SUES SYMPHONY

Says Boston Conductor Induced Her to Leave Paris.

By United Press.

Boston, Dec. 23.—Mme. Valia Valia Valentinova, Russian singer, has filed a claim here against the Boston Symphony Orchestra, alleging breach of contract.

She charged that Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor of that orchestra, induced her to leave Paris on a promise that she would be booked to sing three concerts with the orchestra, and failed to fulfill his agreement.

No specific amount of damages was asked. Koussevitzky's interpreter said:

"It is not true at all. There was no contract, no definite agreement."

NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
DEC 261926

Another recent Sibelius work, his Seventh Symphony, Op. 105, will be introduced here by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in their Brooklyn concert of Friday, January 6, and the following afternoon at Carnegie Hall. On Thursday night, January 5, in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky's program will include Haydn's E flat Symphony (B. & H. No. 3), a Mozart rondo for harpsichord and orchestra, with Wanda Landowska as soloist; de Falla's concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and cello, with Mme. Landowska taking part, and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

The afternoon program of the 7th begins with a concerto by C. P. E. Bach in D major, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, the suite from Stravinsky's "L'Oiseau de Feu," the Sibelius symphony and Ravel's "La Valse." At the Brooklyn Academy on Friday night, the 6th, the Emanuel Bach concerto and the Sibelius symphony will precede four Wagner numbers—the "Lohengrin" prelude, Funeral Music from "Götterdämmerung," Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried" and the "Meistersinger" prelude.

Sibelius's Seventh Symphony is in one movement, without key designation; it opens in A minor and closes in the relative major key of C, and is scored for a relatively modest orchestra: woodwind in pairs (without English horn), four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, tympani and strings. It was published in 1925 and, according to Mr. Parker's colleague, A. H. M., in "The Boston Evening Transcript," was first performed in Copenhagen in the spring of that year. Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra gave the first American performance of the work in Philadelphia on April 3 of this year; the Boston Symphony played it in Boston on December 10 and 11. Mr. Stokowski also introduced Sibelius's Sixth Symphony to America on April 24; this has not yet been heard in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
DEC 261926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON THIS AFTERNOON

Pension Fund Concert of Orchestra Will Be Broadcast —Features of the Week

With thousands of new sets in operation, many new fans have been initiated to the ranks of the unseen audience. That these new listeners, may have a wide variety of entertainment from which to choose. Station WBZ has arranged an interesting and varied program of entertainment for the coming week with many surprises thrown in for good measure.

The first surprise of the week will come at 3.30 this afternoon when WBZ will broadcast direct from Symphony hall in Boston, the Boston Symphony orchestra pension fund concert. This special concert will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra and a very attractive program has been arranged by Serge Koussevitsky, the Russian conductor of the organization.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
BROOKLYN EAGLE
DEC 26192

Sibelius' Seventh Symphony will have its first performance in Greater New York at the Boston Symphony concert that Mr. Koussewitsky will conduct at the Brooklyn Academy Friday evening of next week. This composition was played in Philadelphia last season, under Leopold Stokowski's direction, and more recently Mr. Koussewitsky introduced to Boston audiences. The Brooklyn program in full is:

C. P. E. Bach. Concerto in D
Sibelius..... Seventh Symphony
Wagner..... Excerpts from "Lohengrin," "Gottesdammerung," "Siegfried" and "Meistersinger."

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
DEC 261926

The Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, the latest score of the Finnish composer, and the series of excerpts from Wagnerian music drams will be features of the pending second visit to Brooklyn of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for a concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 7. Sibelius has confined this symphony to a single movement, and scored it for the full choirs of the orchestra rather than for solo instrumental voices as used to be his way. Although Sibelius has written much in a daring and experimental vein, this symphony is quite simple, harmonically speaking. It marks a return to a possible diatonic and straight-forward style. When Koussevitzky recently introduced this score to Boston, it evoked considerable interest and enthusiasm.

Mr. Koussevitzky will also present the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin"; the funeral music of Siegfried from the last act of "The Dusk of the Gods"; the "Forest Murmurs" from the second act of "Siegfried"; and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg".

The evening will begin with a Concerto of Philip Emanuel Bach, which Maximilian Steinberg arranged for orchestra especially for the use of the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
BROOKLYN EAGLE
DEC 261926

A Sibelius Symphony

By EDWARD CUSHING

A RECENT work in large form by the greatest living symphonist will have its initial hearing in New York at the Academy of Music on the evening of Jan. 9. It is the Seventh Symphony of Jean Sibelius (born in Tavestehus, Finland, 1865), which Mr. Koussewitsky brings to Brooklyn a few weeks after its first performance under his direction by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston. The Symphony was completed in 1925, and had its premiere that year in Copenhagen. Last season the indefatigable Mr. Stokowski acquainted Philadelphia audiences with this as well as with the Sixth Symphony, by the same composer, but included neither work on the lost of compositions comprising the programs of that season's ten Carnegie Hall concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Sibelius' First and Fifth Symphonies alone have, of recent years, represented their author's more ambitious creative efforts before a New York public, and there is no record of the performance of either of these works in Brooklyn. Mr. Koussewitsky's intention, then, of conducting the Seventh Symphony as the novelty of his second concert at the Academy, under Institute auspices, is more than interesting—it is important. And anticipating the event itself, the following description and analysis of the score are reprinted from the columns of the excellent Boston Transcript:

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
DEC 261926

The next large musical event of importance will be on Sunday, January 9, when the Boston Symphony orchestra gives its annual program in the Y. M. C. A. series at the Auditorium. Details of the program to be given here, have not yet come to hand, but it seems certain that Conductor Koussevitsky's genius for program-making is still with him, and that we will have a fine, well balanced afternoon of orchestral music. This city could easily stand many more orchestral concerts than it gets. In recent years interest in large orchestras has grown by leaps and bounds, as witness the excellent support, which the Springfield Symphony is receiving this season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM GLOBE DEMOCRAT
ST. LOUIS, MO.
DEC 12 1926

Timing the Little Speeches.

"How do you know just what the numbers will be and just how long they will take?" we asked the broadcast announcer for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Each Friday afternoon the orchestra plays the same program they do Saturday night," was the answer. "We avail ourselves of this opportunity to get a line up on the program. Every minute from the time the orchestra starts until it finishes is accounted for. The program of Saturday is a duplicate, almost to seconds, of the one on Friday."

"This accounts then for the perfect timing of your little speeches between each number?"

"That's it exactly."—Walter Gordon in Springfield Republican.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RECORD
DEC 27 1926

Boston Symphony To Play Hartford Feb. 6

Frank Sedgwick has just received from Serge Koussevitsky a copy of the program for the Hartford concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which promises to be the most interesting program ever introduced there.

Beginning with the Eroica symphony by Beethoven, and followed by a suite from the opera, "The Loss of Three Oranges," by Psokokiffe. Philip Hale, in writing of the performance in Boston of this work said: "The prevailing mood is one of riotous gaiety; only in the shortest of the movements is there a touch of sentiment, a poetic impression. Yet how fresh and joyous are the rhymes. Nor is Psokokieff ashamed of salient musical ideas. His themes are not scrappy, and after they are announced, he is not at a loss what to do with them. He has his own schemes of orchestral dress. The final movement is constructed ingeniously and with irresistible effect. A remarkable man, this Serge Psokokieff who follows his bent."

Seat sale is now in progress at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street, Hartford, for the concert at the Capitol theater in that city on Sunday afternoon, February 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN
DEC 31 1926

Mme. Landowsky to Play With Boston Symphony

Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" will be played at the second Thursday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on January 6, and the same composer's "Fire Bird" Suite on January 8.

Wanda Landowska will appear as soloist with the orchestra at the Thursday concert in a concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and violoncello, which De Falla has written especially for her, and also in a Rondo of Mozart.

A feature of the Saturday afternoon concert will be the first performance in New York of the latest symphony of Sibelius (No. 7).

Koussevitzky will open the Thursday concert with the symphony of Haydn in E flat, No. 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM POST
DENVER, COLO.
DEC 27 1926

REPORTER WHO BECAME RICH FINANCIER DIES

Galen L. Stone of Boston Began Commercial Career As Broker's Employe.

Brookline, Mass., Dec. 27.—(By Associated Press.)—Galen L. Stone, who rose from reportorial obscurity to financial heights, is dead.

Mr. Stone was a member of one of Boston's greatest investment houses, Hayden, Stone & Co., which he established more than thirty years ago with Charles Hayden, like himself, a subordinate in a brokerage house.

Stone had been a cub reporter for the old Commercial Bulletin, but it was not long before he became financial editor of the Boston Advertiser.

Then he decided to learn the investment situation first hand and took a job with the brokerage firm where he met Hayden, a graduate of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, who had started work the year previous as a ticker boy at $3 a week.

Soon they were partners. Many copper companies owed their existence to the firm's financing, and later it turned to steamships, railroads and other enterprises. Mr. Stone was at one time or another a director in more than twenty corporations.

He retired in 1923 to give his time to interests, philanthropic, artistic and musical, which had always concerned him. He died last night in his sixty-fourth year. He was a trustee of Wellesley college and has been a vice president of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
DEC 281926

G. L. Stone, Founder Of Boston Financial House, Dies at 64

Joined With Charles Hayden in Establishing Investment Firm After Rise From Position of Reporter

BROOKLINE, Mass., Dec. 27 (AP).—Galen L. Stone, sixty-four years old, who rose from reportorial obscurity to financial heights, died here to-day.

Mr. Stone was a member and founder of one of Boston's greatest investment houses, Hayden, Stone & Co., which he established more than thirty years ago with Charles Hayden, like himself, a subordinate in a brokerage house.

Stone had been a cub reporter for the old "Commercial Bulletin," but it was not long before he became financial editor of "The Boston Advertiser," and a recognized expert.

Then he decided to learn the investment situation first hand. He took a job with the brokerage firm, where he met Hayden, a graduate of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, who had started work the year previous as a ticker boy at $3 a week.

Soon they were partners. The greatest group of copper producing companies in the world owed its existence to their financing, it was said, and later they turned to steamships, railroads and other enterprises. Mr. Stone was at one time or another a director of more than twenty large companies.

He retired in 1923 to give his time to interests philanthropic, artistic and musical, which had always attracted him.

In 1924 he presented a group of valuable Chinese paintings to the Fogg Art Museum of Harvard, and last year $75,000 to the cause of Negro education. He was a trustee of Wellesley College and had been a vice-president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Stone was born in Leominster in 1862.

NY WORLD DEC 31

THE second visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will include concerts at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and a week from tomorrow afternoon. Wanda Landowska, soloist at the opening concert, will present for the first time in this country a concerto by Manuel De Falla, for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and violoncello, and also a Rondo by Mozart. Other numbers on the program will be Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." At the Saturday concert the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius will have its first New York performance.

SYMPHONY PRESENTS NEW ARTIST

Nadia Reisenberg Is a Pianist of Unusual Skill

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last evening at the season's second Monday concert of the Symphony Orchestra a new pianist of no ordinary quality was introduced to Boston. Nadia Reisenberg is her name; Russia was her birthplace; New York is her present residence; and to her unusual pianistic accomplishments and musical gifts the kindly fates have added no small degree of personal charm.

LISZT'S A MAJOR CONCERTO

For her "vehicle," as the expression goes, Miss Reisenberg chose last evening Liszt's Concerto in A major, a piece that is not so much music, in the highest sense of the word, as an amazingly ingenious compilation of tonal tricks. But Miss Reisenberg, with Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra to give substantial aid, played this gilt and tinsel and pseudo-poetizing in a manner to blind the listener to its inherent emptiness.

First of all, Miss Reisenberg is mistress of the arts of musical rhetoric; her playing has the quality that compels attention. To judge by the ease with which she surmounted the difficulties that bestrew the pianist's path in this concerto, technique is for her a matter of second nature, while a lovelier tone than hers, and a more persuasive knack of moulding a melody, is not often to be met with. Nor must the general statement that the entire performance of this concerto last evening was brilliant and effective in the extreme go unenforced by the specific mention of Mr. Bedetti's beautiful playing of the few measures for solo 'cello in the slow division. It is hardly necessary to add that Miss Reisenberg was liberally applauded by the large audience.

For purely orchestral pieces, last evening's concert provided the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, already heard here more than once under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton, and Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival," another piece in which Mr. Koussevitzky's prowess is now familiar. Save for an occasional stridency and thickening of tone in the first movement, the symphony was played in a manner to reveal to the fullest its grave eloquence and autumnal beauty, its nobill and its manly strength. And, to judge by the warmth of its reception last evening, this once baffling and perplexing music is formidable and forbidding no longer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
DEC 31 1926

WILLIAM MENGELBERG concludes his present season with the Philharmonic Orchestra with the Brooklyn concert on Sunday afternoon the tour to Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Harrisburg and Pittsburgh, and the Carnegie Hall concert of a week from Sunday afternoon. Next week Sunday's program will be Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Bach's "Sinfonia," Strauss's "Salome's Dance" and the prelude to Act II of Chabrier's "Gwendoline." Arturo Toscanini will arrive here Tuesday and direct his first concert this season of the Philharmonic Society, January 13, in Carnegie Hall.

Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" will be played at the second Thursday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall January 6, and the same composer's "Fire-Bird" suite at the matinee the following Saturday. Wanda Landowska will appear as soloist with the orchestra at the Thursday concert in a concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and violoncello, which De Falla has written especially for her, and also in a rondo of Mozart.

A feature of the Saturday afternoon concert will be the first performance in New York of the latest symphony of Sibelius (No. 7).

Koussevitzky will open the Thursday concert with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and will also play at the Saturday concert a concerto of Philip Emanuel Bach arranged for orchestra by Steinberg, and Ravel's "La Valse."

NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE
DEC 261926

Another recent Sibelius work, his Seventh Symphony, Op. 105, will be introduced here by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in their Brooklyn concert of Friday, January 6, and the following afternoon at Carnegie Hall. On Thursday night, January 5, in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky's program will include Haydn's E flat Symphony (B. & H. No. 3), a Mozart rondo for harpsichord and orchestra, with Wanda Landowska as soloist; de Falla's concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and cello, with Mme. Landowska taking part, and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

The afternoon program of the 7th begins with a concerto by C. P. E. Bach in D major, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, the suite from Stravinsky's "L'Oiseau de Feu," the Sibelius symphony and Ravel's "La Valse." At the Brooklyn Academy on Friday night, the 6th, the Emanuel Bach concerto and the Sibelius symphony will precede four Wagner numbers—the "Lohengrin" prelude, Funeral Music from "Götterdämmerung," Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried" and the "Meistersinger" prelude.

Sibelius's Seventh Symphony is in one movement, without key designation; it opens in A minor and closes in the relative major key of C, and is scored for a relatively modest orchestra: woodwind in pairs (without English horn), four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, tympani and strings. It was published in 1925 and, according to Mr. Parker's colleague, A. H. M., in "The Boston Evening Transcript," was first performed in Copenhagen in the spring of that year. Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra gave the first American performance of the work in Philadelphia on April 3 of this year; the Boston Symphony played it in Boston on December 10 and 11. Mr. Stokowski also introduced Sibelius's Sixth Symphony to America on April 24; this has not yet been heard in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
DEC 261926

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON THIS AFTERNOON

Pension Fund Concert of Orchestra Will Be Broadcast —Features of the Week

With thousands of new sets in operation, many new fans have been initiated to the ranks of the unseen audience. That these new listeners, may have a wide variety of entertainment from which to choose. Station WBZ has arranged an interesting and varied program of entertainment for the coming week with many surprises thrown in for good measure.

The first surprise of the week will come at 3.30 this afternoon when WBZ will broadcast direct from Symphony hall in Boston, the Boston Symphony orchestra pension fund concert. This special concert will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra and a very attractive program has been arranged by Serge Koussevitsky, the Russian conductor of the organization.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK BROOKLYN EAGLE
DEC 261926

Sibelius' Seventh Symphony will have its first performance in Greater New York at the Boston Symphony concert that Mr. Koussewitsky will conduct at the Brooklyn Academy of Friday evening of next week. This composition was played in Philadelphia last season, under Leopold Stokowski's direction, and more recently Mr. Koussewitsky introduced it to Boston audiences. The Brooklyn program in full is:

C. P. E. Bach. Concerto in D
Sibelius.....Seventh Symphony
Wagner.....Excerpts from "Lohengrin," "Gottesdammerung," "Siegfried" and "Meistersinger."

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
DEC 261926

The Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, the latest score of the Finnish composer, and the series of excerpts from Wagnerian music drams will be features of the pending second visit to Brooklyn of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for a concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 7. Sibelius has confined this symphony to a single movement, and scored it for the full choirs of the orchestra rather than for solo instrumental voices as used to be his way. Although Sibelius has written much in a daring and experimental vein, this symphony is quite simple, harmonically speaking. It marks a return to a possible diatonic and straight-forward style. When Koussevitzky recently introduced this score to Boston, it evoked considerable interest and enthusiasm.

Mr. Koussevitzky will also present the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin"; the funeral music of Siegfried from the last act of "The Dusk of the Gods"; the "Forest Murmurs" from the second act of "Siegfried"; and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg".

The evening will begin with a Concerto of Philip Emanuel Bach, which Maximilian Steinberg arranged for orchestra especially for the use of the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK BROOKLYN EAGLE
DEC 261926

A Sibelius Symphony

By EDWARD CUSHING

A RECENT work in large form by the greatest living symphonist will have its initial hearing in New York at the Academy of Music on the evening of Jan. 9. It is the Seventh Symphony of Jean Sibelius (born in Tavestehus, Finland, 1865), which Mr. Koussewitsky brings to Brooklyn a few weeks after its first performance under his direction by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston. The Symphony was completed in 1925, and had its premiere that year in Copenhagen. Last season the indefatigable Mr. Stokowski acquainted Philadelphia audiences with this as well as with the Sixth Symphony, by the same composer, but included neither work on the lost of compositions comprising the programs of that season's ten Carnegie Hall concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Sibelius' First and Fifth Symphonies alone have, of recent years, represented their author's more ambitious creative efforts before a New York public, and there is no record of the performance of either of these works in Brooklyn. Mr. Koussewitsky's intention, then, of conducting the Seventh Symphony as the novelty of his second concert at the Academy, under Institute auspices, is more than interesting—it is important. And anticipating the event itself, the following description and analysis of the score are reprinted from the columns of the excellent Boston Transcript:

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
DEC 261926

The next large musical event of importance will be on Sunday, January 9, when the Boston Symphony orchestra gives its annual program in the Y. M. C. A. series at the Auditorium. Details of the program to be given here, have not yet come to hand, but it seems certain that Conductor Koussevitsky's genius for program-making is still with him, and that we will have a fine, well balanced afternoon of orchestral music. This city could easily stand many more orchestral concerts than it gets. In recent years interest in large orchestras has grown by leaps and bounds, as witness the excellent support, which the Springfield Symphony is receiving this season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM GLOBE DEMOCRAT
ST. LOUIS, MO.
DEC 12 [illegible]

Timing the Little Speeches.

"How do you know just what the numbers will be and just how long they will take?" we asked the broadcast announcer for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Each Friday afternoon the orchestra plays the same program they do Saturday night," was the answer. "We avail ourselves of this opportunity to get a line up on the program. Every minute from the time tne orchestra starts until it finishes is accounted for. The program of Saturday is a duplicate, almost to seconds, of the one on Friday."

"This accounts then for the perfect timing of your little speeches between each number?"

"That's it exactly."—Walter Gordon in Springfield Republican.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RECORD
DEC 27 1926

Boston Symphony To Play Hartford Feb. 6

Frank Sedgwick has just received from Serge Koussevitsky a copy of the program for the Hartford concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which promises to be the most interesting program ever introduced there.

Beginning with the Eroica symphony by Beethoven, and followed by a suite from the opera, "The Loss of Three Oranges," by Psokokiffe. Philip Hale, in writing of the performance in Boston of this work said: "The prevailing mood is one of riotous gaiety; only in the shortest of the movements is there a touch of sentiment, a poetic impression. Yet how fresh and joyous are the rhymes. Nor is Psokokieff ashamed of salient musical ideas. His themes are not scrappy, and after they are announced, he is not at a loss what to do with them. He has his own schemes of orchestral dress. The final movement is constructed ingeniously and with irresistible effect. A remarkable man, this Serge Psokokieff who follows his bent."

Seat sale is now in progress at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street, Hartford, for the concert at the Capitol theater in that city on Sunday afternoon, February 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN
DEC 31 1926

Mme. Landowsky to Play With Boston Symphony

Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" will be played at the second Thursday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on January 6, and the same composer's "Fire Bird" Suite on January 8.

Wanda Landowska will appear as soloist with the orchestra at the Thursday concert in a concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and violoncello, which De Falla has written especially for her, and also in a Rondo of Mozart.

A feature of the Saturday afternoon concert will be the first performance in New York of the latest symphony of Sibelius (No. 7).

Koussevitzky will open the Thursday concert with the symphony of Haydn in E flat, No. 3,

THIS CLIPPING FROM POST
DENVER, COLO.
DEC 27 1926

REPORTER WHO BECAME RICH FINANCIER DIES

Galen L. Stone of Boston Began Commercial Career As Broker's Employe.

Brookline, Mass., Dec. 27.—(By Associated Press.)—Galen L. Stone, who rose from reportorial obscurity to financial heights, is dead.

Mr. Stone was a member of one of Boston's greatest investment houses, Hayden, Stone & Co., which he established more than thirty years ago with Charles Hayden, like himself, a subordinate in a brokerage house.

Stone had been a cub reporter for the old Commercial Bulletin, but it was not long before he became financial editor of the Boston Advertiser.

Then he decided to learn the investment situation first hand and took a job with the brokerage firm where he met Hayden, a graduate of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, who had started work the year previous as a ticker boy at $3 a week.

Soon they were partners. Many copper companies owed their existence to the firm's financing, and later it turned to steamships, railroads and other enterprises. Mr. Stone was at one time or another a director in more than twenty corporations.

He retired in 1923 to give his time to interests, philanthropic, artistic and musical, which had always concerned him. He died last night in his sixty-fourth year. He was a trustee of Wellesley college and has been a vice president of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE
DEC 281926

G. L. Stone, Founder Of Boston Financial House, Dies at 64

Joined With Charles Hayden in Establishing Investment Firm After Rise From Position of Reporter

BROOKLINE, Mass., Dec. 27 (AP).—Galen L. Stone, sixty-four years old, who rose from reportorial obscurity to financial heights, died here to-day.

Mr. Stone was a member and founder of one of Boston's greatest investment houses, Hayden, Stone & Co., which he established more than thirty years ago with Charles Hayden, like himself, a subordinate in a brokerage house.

Stone had been a cub reporter for the old "Commercial Bulletin," but it was not long before he became financial editor of "The Boston Advertiser," and a recognized expert.

Then he decided to learn the investment situation first hand. He took a job with the brokerage firm, where he met Hayden, a graduate of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, who had started work the year previous as a ticker boy at $3 a week.

Soon they were partners. The greatest group of copper producing companies in the world owed its existence to their financing, it was said, and later they turned to steamships, railroads and other enterprises. Mr. Stone was at one time or another a director of more than twenty large companies.

He retired in 1923 to give his time to interests philanthropic, artistic and musical, which had always attracted him.

In 1924 he presented a group of valuable Chinese paintings to the Fogg Art Museum of Harvard, and last year $75,000 to the cause of Negro education. He was a trustee of Wellesley College and had been a vice-president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Stone was born in Leominster in 1862.

NY WORLD DEC 31

THE second visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will include concerts at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and a week from tomorrow afternoon. Wanda Landowska, soloist at the opening concert, will present for the first time in this country a concerto by Manuel De Falla, for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and violoncello, and also a Rondo by Mozart. Other numbers on the program will be Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." At the Saturday concert the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius will have its first New York performance.

SYMPHONY PRESENTS NEW ARTIST

Nadia Reisenberg Is a Pianist of Unusual Skill

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last evening at the season's second Monday concert of the Symphony Orchestra a new pianist of no ordinary quality was introduced to Boston. Nadia Reisenberg is her name; Russia was her birthplace; New York is her present residence; and to her unusual pianistic accomplishments and musical gifts the kindly fates have added no small degree of personal charm.

LISZT'S A MAJOR CONCERTO

For her "vehicle," as the expression goes, Miss Reisenberg chose last evening Liszt's Concerto in A major, a piece that is not so much music, in the highest sense of the word, as an amazingly ingenious compilation of tonal tricks. But Miss Reisenberg, with Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra to give substantial aid, played this gilt and tinsel and pseudo-poetizing in a manner to blind the listener to its inherent emptiness.

First of all, Miss Reisenberg is mistress of the arts of musical rhetoric; her playing has the quality that compels attention. To judge by the ease with which she surmounted the difficulties that bestrew the pianist's path in this concerto, technique is for her a matter of second nature, while a lovelier tone than hers, and a more persuasive knack of moulding a melody, is not often to be met with. Nor must the general statement that the entire performance of this concerto last evening was brilliant and effective in the extreme go unenforced by the specific mention of Mr. Bedetti's beautiful playing of the few measures for solo 'cello in the slow division. It is hardly necessary to add that Miss Reisenberg was liberally applauded by the large audience.

For purely orchestral pieces, last evening's concert provided the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, already heard here more than once under Mr Koussevitzky's baton, and Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival," another piece in which Mr. Koussevitzky's prowess is now familiar. Save for an occasional stridency and thickening of tone in the first movement, the symphony was played in a manner to reveal to the fullest its grave eloquence and autumnal beauty, its nobili and its manly strength. And, to judge by the warmth of its reception last evening, this once baffling and perplexing music is formidable and forbidding no longer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY N. Y.
DEC 31

WILLIAM MENGELBERG concludes his present season with the Philharmonic Orchestra with the Brooklyn concert on Sunday afternoon, the tour to Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Harrisburg and Pittsburgh and the Carnegie Hall concert of a week from Sunday afternoon. Next week Sunday's program will be Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Bach's "Sinfonia," Strauss's "Salome's Dance" and the prelude to Act II of Chabrier's "Gwendoline." Arturo Toscanini will arrive here Tuesday and direct his first concert this season of the Philharmonic Society, January 13, in Carnegie Hall.

Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" will be played at the second Thursday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall January 6, and the same composer's "Fire-Bird" suite at the matinee the following Saturday. Wanda Landowska will appear as soloist with the orchestra at the Thursday concert in a concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and violoncello, which De Falla has written especially for her, and also in a rondo of Mozart.

A feature of the Saturday afternoon concert will be the first performance in New York of the latest symphony of Sibelius (No. 7).

Koussevitzky will open the Thursday concert with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and will also play at the Saturday concert a concerto of Philip Emanuel Bach arranged for orchestra by Steinberg, and Ravel's "La Valse."

MISS REISENBERG THRILLS AUDIENCE

HERALD

Large Crowd Hears Second Boston Symphony Concert

DEC 14

There was a large and highly enthusiastic audience on hand last night to hear the second symphony concert of the Monday series. Mr. Koussevitzky had arranged for it an unusually attractive program, even though it had room for none of the new music which the Monday audiences would probably be glad to hear.

The program began with the Brahms E minor symphony, went on to Liszt's A major piano concerto (Nadia Reisenberg), and ended with Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture. What could, of the kind, have been better?

Since the symphony has been recently played here and discussed, added comment seems superfluous. Of the concerto, too, it is not easy to say new things, such as people today, like the Athenians of old, like to hear. It has enjoyed frequent performances in Boston, always with much abuse to follow, little by way of praise. Listeners who like it can never convince those who don't that it is more than music of gauds and tinsel, written for display—so why try? Some conductors, though, and pianists, find in it more than a means for exhibition.

Probably Mr. Koussevitzky does, although he did not see his way last night to all the swell and surge, the languor and the sombreness to which this ultra-romantic music can give voice. Nor did he choose to dash on the color so freely as Liszt's music will allow—he hardly could; he was supporting a very young pianist.

Miss Reisenberg has already a fine technique, with good tone in its favor and a considerable degree of brilliancy. Manifestly an excellent musician, she played the concerto extremely well, intelligently, and with notable security, finding her happiest moments when the music is most songful or gentle. She lacks at present the virtuoso qualities needful for the usual dazzling type of performance; also the high degree of imagination by which a different sort of performance can be made both delightful and effective. Miss Reisenberg was cordially applauded.

R. R. G.

Symphony 'Out of Tune' & With Her Songs

AMER DEC 23

DIVA NOW IN CHORUS

Mme. Valia Valentinova, who has filed claims against the Boston Symphony Orchestra, claiming a broken contract to sing, is in the chorus to earn a living.

FINDING LIFE HARD

Mme. Valentinova, former member of the Russian Grand Opera Company, says loss of the contract has left her almost destitute here.

"IT IS FOR MY SON I DEMAND P

The singer and her son, Igor, age 2, as they appear humble quarters in Shawmut avenue. She says tor Serge Koussevitzky engaged her to sing, but h her allegations. Suit has not yet been filed.

TRANS In the Round DEC 16

Darius Milhaud (Revue Musicale)

Composer, Pianist, Guest at the Symphony Concerts

Russian Singer Brings Suit Against Symphony

(Photo by Garo)

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

VALIA VALENTINOVA

TRANS DEC 23

Mme. Valentinova Alleges Koussevitzky Failed to Keep Agreements with Her—Leader Denies Any Pact Made

Declaring that Serge Kousesevitsky, leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, failed to keep agreements with her, causing loss of much time and money, Mme. Valentinova, a Russian singer, has brought suit against the orchestra through her attorneys, Walsh & Walsh.

Koussevitzky, however, answers the charge with the statement that all of the singer's declarations are untrue, except that he sent her a score of "Svadiebka" to rehearse, but never made an agreement. The singer had declared that, on receipt of word from the famous conductor, she prepared for concerts here and in Philadelphia and Brooklyn.

Mme. Valentinova said: "It was on June 19, 1925, that Mr. Koussevitzky, who was then appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, wrote to me a letter from Paris booking me for three concerts to sing "Svadiebka," by Igor Stravinsky, for the latter part of the season of 1925-26 in Boston, Brooklyn and Philadelphia. His niece saw me personally and advised me against accepting engagements anywhere until these three concerts would be fulfilled.

"In a few weeks I received from Mr. Koussevitzky the score of this opera and I began to work rehearsing with a professional accompanist as the opera is very difficult and involved. During that time I received a number of offers, among them the leading role in 'The Song of the Flame.'

"Having in mind this important booking, I refused all other offers, my whole career in America and abroad depending upon this."

Mme. Valentinova then went on to explain that all negotiations were brought to end abruptly by the orchestra leader.

MISS REISENBERG THRILLS AUDIENCE

HERALD

Large Crowd Hears Second Boston Symphony Concert

DEC 14

There was a large and highly enthusiastic audience on hand last night to hear the second symphony concert of the Monday series. Mr. Koussevitzky had arranged for it an unusually attractive program, even though it had room for none of the new music which the Monday audiences would probably be glad to hear.

The program began with the Brahms E minor symphony, went on to Liszt's A major piano concerto (Nadia Reisenberg), and ended with Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture. What could, of the kind, have been better?

Since the symphony has been recently played here and discussed, added comment seems superfluous. Of the concerto, too, it is not easy to say new things, such as people today, like the Athenians of old, like to hear. It has enjoyed frequent performances in Boston, always with much abuse to follow, little by way of praise. Listeners who like it can never convince those who don't that it is more than music of gauds and tinsel, written for display—so why try? Some conductors, though, and pianists, find in it more than a means for exhibition.

Probably Mr. Koussevitzky does, although he did not see his way last night to all the swell and surge, the languor and the sombreness to which this ultra-romantic music can give voice. Nor did he choose to dash on the color so freely as Liszt's music will allow—he hardly could; he was supporting a very young pianist.

Miss Reisenberg has already a fine technique, with good tone in its favor and a considerable degree of brilliancy. Manifestly an excellent musician, she played the concerto extremely well, intelligently, and with notable security, finding her happiest moments when the music is most songful or gentle. She lacks at present the virtuoso qualities needful for the usual dazzling type of performance; also the high degree of imagination by which a different sort of performance can be made both delightful and effective. Miss Reisenberg was cordially applauded.

R. R. G.

Symphony 'Out of Tune' With Her Songs

AMER DEC 23

DIVA NOW IN CHORUS

Mme. Valia Valentinova, who has filed claims against the Boston Symphony Orchestra, claiming a broken contract to sing, is in the chorus to earn a living.

FINDING LIFE HARD

Mme. Valentinova, former member of the Russian Grand Opera Company, says loss of the contract has left her almost destitute here.

"IT IS FOR MY SON I DEMAND P

The singer and her son, Igor, age 2, as they appear humble quarters in Shawmut avenue. She says tor Serge Koussevitzky engaged her to sing, but h her allegations. Suit has not yet been filed.

TRANS In the Round DEC 16

(Revue Musicale)

Darius Milhaud

Composer, Pianist, Guest at the Symphony Concerts

Russian Singer Brings Suit Against Symphony

(Photo by Garo)

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

VALIA VALENTINOVA

TRANS DEC 23

Mme. Valentinova Alleges Koussevitzky Failed to Keep Agreements with Her—Leader Denies Any Pact Made

Declaring that Serge Kousesevitsky, leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, failed to keep agreements with her, causing loss of much time and money, Mme. Valentinova, a Russian singer, has brought suit against the orchestra through her attorneys, Walsh & Walsh.

Koussevitzky, however, answers the charge with the statement that all of the singer's declarations are untrue, except that he sent her a score of "Svadlebka" to rehearse, but never made an agreement. The singer had declared that, on receipt of word from the famous conductor, she prepared for concerts here and in Philadelphia and Brooklyn.

Mme. Valentinova said: "It was on June 19, 1925, that Mr. Koussevitzky, who was then appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, wrote to me a letter from Paris booking me for three concerts to sing "Svadiebka," by Igor Stravinsky, for the latter part of the season of 1925-26 in Boston, Brooklyn and Philadelphia. His niece saw me personally and advised me against accepting engagements anywhere until these three concerts would be fulfilled.

"In a few weeks I received from Mr. Koussevitzky the score of this opera and I began to work rehearsing with a professional accompanist as the opera is very difficult and involved. During that time I received a number of offers, among them the leading role in 'The Song of the Flame.'

"Having in mind this important booking, I refused all other offers, my whole career in America and abroad depending upon this."

Mme. Valentinova then went on to explain that all negotiations were brought to end abruptly by the orchestra leader.

ENGLISH MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Williams' Rhapsody Is Striking Feature of Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In that it was new to Boston, uncommonly interesting, beautifully played, and most cordially received, Vaughan Williams' "Norfolk Rhapsody" No. 1 may be accounted the most striking feature of yesterday's Symphony Concert, even though its companion pieces were a Concerto Grosso of Handel's, the Prelude and Love-Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherezade."

TYPICALLY ENGLISH

As the years roll by Vaughan Williams seems more and more to loom above other living English makers of music. Among them, he alone is virtually free of the reproach of electicism. His musical idiom is at the same time typically English and characteristically personal. Not Wagner and Brahms, but Byrd and Tallis are his true musical ancestors. His music is not a compendium of various Continental influences, but a tonal speech that smacks of the soil, British through and through And it is by virtue of this authenticity of utterance that to an outlander he seems to stand quite above and apart from his fellows, gifted in their several ways as are Elgar, Delius, Holst, Bax, Goossens and the rest.

The Rhapsody heard yesterday is not new. It was written, in fact, as long ago as 1906, though revised some eight years later. Folk-songs make the bulk of its thematic content, but in passing through the crucible of the composer's mind these simple and homely strains have emerged with a new dignity and expressiveness. Pervading the music, too, is a haunting suggestion of nostalgia, a mood that, by the way, permeates much of this composer's remarkable "Pastoral" Symphony, as yet heard in Boston only at the hands of the Conservatory Orchestra.

Received Cordially

That this Rhapsody, a composition unpretentious and unproclaimed, should have been so warmly applauded yesterday speaks well for the taste of an audience whose discrimination in matters musical has at times been called into question.

It was Beethoven himself who said: "Handel is the unattained master of all masters. Go to him and learn how to produce great effects with scant deploy of means." And how aptly these words apply to the Concerto Grosso heard yesterday, one of 12 composed, incredible as it seems, in the space of 32 days. Here is music scored only for strings, devoid of all tricks, free of all striving after effect, yet superbly vital, rich in substance, satisfying alike the mind and the heart.

Nobly Eloquent

Always happy with the music of the early 18th century, Mr. Koussevitzky conducted yesterday a nobly eloquent performance of this Concerto. In this music he was heard in Boston for the first time, whereas his prowess with the "Tristan" fragments and with "Scheherazade" is well known to us of this city.

It remains only to add that the orchestral performance was throughout the afternoon of a high order, and that the proximity of Christmas had little effect on the size of the audience, which remained almost in toto to the end of the concert and greeted with pronounced enthusiasm the performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's glowing, gorgeously colored and imaginative suite.

ness, reminded the hearers that Christmas Eve should be something more than an excuse for eating and drinking, hysterical music and riotous jollity. The lively movements have a stirring virility. Those to whom the "Scotch snap" is a burning question, who trace this "snap" in music of every age and every school, rejoiced to find it in the Musette, a movement curiously named, for it is without the traditional form.

There was a passionately eloquent performance of the familiar excerpts from "Tristan and Isolde"; a remarkably effective reading and playing of Rimsky - Korsakov's "Scheherazade," that gorgeous tonal picture, reproducing wild tales of Afrites and Jinns, one-eyed Kalanders and enchanting princesses, the sea of Sindbad with the magnetic mountain, the splendor of Bagdad under its great Caliph, the sensuality, the cruelty, the perfumes, the lust and the glamour of the Orient.

The second piece on the program was played here for the first time. It was well worth hearing. Vaughan Williams, a firm believer in folk-music as thematic material, although for his more important works he invented his own themes, heard over 20 years ago folk-songs in a Norfolk village that pleased him greatly, and inspired him to write three Norfolk Rhapsodies. The one performed yesterday was No. 1. The words of the songs used are delightfully naive; the tunes heard yesterday are for the most part pleasingly melancholy, with one that is rollicking and typically English in its straightforwardness. The introductory section is beautiful by reason of the theme announced in a beautiful manner both in tone and in expression by Mr. Lafranc, the leader of the viola section, and by the treatment of this theme, the charming and original orchestration. The lively section is wholly free from the coarseness that is too frequently found in music of English and other composers when they wish to be unmistakably gay. The close, too, is beautiful in its unexpected quietness. This Rhapsody would bear repetition at an early day. The Rhapsody is nearer in spirit to the same composer's "Wenlock Edge" than to his "London" Symphony.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Scarlatti, Three Pieces, arranged for orchestra by Roland-Manuel; de Falla, Concerto for Clavichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin (so the announcement states, but others say "viola") and violoncello; Mozart, Rondo (being the Finale of a piano concerto), for harpsichord and orchestra; Stravinsky, "The Rite of Spring." Wanda Landowska will be the soloist.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY OLD MUSIC

Concert to Be Broadcast Over Radio Tonight by WBZ

HER — DEC 25

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be broadcast tonight through Westinghouse station WBZ and the chain network under the direction of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, is the most varied and in many respects the most interesting thus far in the series, according to Prof. John Patten Marshall who interprets the Saturday symphony programs for the radio audience.

Lovers of old music will delight in Handel's concerto, Wagnerians will welcome the performance of the Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," the modernists will receive their portion in the Vaughan Williams' Norfolk rhapsody and everyone will thoroughly enjoy Rimsky-Korsakov's popular symphonic suite, "Scherezade."

In addition to WBZ, the "key" station, six stations are included in the network which will broadcast tonight's symphony concert through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago, producers of La Touraine coffee and tea. The stations which will make this concert available to an audience aggregating millions are WBZ, Boston and Springfield; WJZ, New York; WGY, Schenectady; WFBL, Syracuse; WHAM, Rochester; and WMAK, Buffalo.

Before the program, Professor Marshall will tell the audience of the six stations something about Vaughan Williams' work, which is performed at this concert for the first time in America, and will illustrate the motif from Isolde's Love-Death. During the intermission he will, with the assistance of Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, illustrate the fascinating melodies of the Scheherezade. This music, which is illustrative of tales from the Arabian Nights, tells of Sinbad the Sailor, the Kalendar Prince and the evening which he spent with three ladies of Bagdad, and of the beautiful Scheherezade who appears in the music as a dream-like vision. Professor Marshall will not analyze this music, for such analysis will not help the listeners; he will confine himself to telling the story and pointing out some of the features of the work which the radio audience should not miss.

The complete program follows:

Handel.....Concerto Grosso
Vaughan Williams.....A Norfolk Rhapsody
Wagner.....Prelude and Love-Death, "Tristan and Isolde"
Rimsky-Korsakov,
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night") Op. 35.
I. The Sea and Sinbad's Ship.
II. The Story of the Kalendar Prince.
III. The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
IV. Festival at Bagdad; the sea; the ship goes to pieces on a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior; conclusion.

10TH SYMPHONY IS BRILLIANT

HER — DEC 25

Handel's Concerto Grosso Lends Dignity to Eve of Christmas

CONCERT WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Symphony hall, yesterday afternoon. For the holidays Mr. Koussevitzky arranged an interesting and brilliant program.

First came Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 6. The solemn first movement, solemn but with Handel's peculiar tender-

VARIED PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Handel, Wagner, Williams and Rimsky Korsakov

Globe Dec 25

Mr Koussevitzky has set an agreeably varied program for the Christmas pair of Boston Symphony concerts. Yesterday afternoon's audience seemed on the whole greatly pleased with a miscellany which ranged from a Handel concerto grosso, through a "Norfolk Rhapsody" by Vaughan Williams, and the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan" to Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherezade."

The majority of the subscribers had as usual in Christmas week given their tickets to friends. It is a pity that Mr Koussevitzky's midseason vacation cannot be given him at this time, by arranging to have no concerto for two weeks, and lengthening the season in Fall or Spring. Too few people can find time for concerts amid the holiday rush.

The only novelty on yesterday's program, Vaughan Williams' "Norfolk Rhapsody, No. 1," was not so very new, having been composed in 1905. Its themes are old popular songs (therefore dignified by the title "folk songs") which Dr Williams collected at Kings Lynn, Norfolk, England, the town for which our Lynn was named. The harmonization and arrangement are effective enough, but the introductory measures, especially a passage with viola solo, are the only really notable things about the piece. These measures, differently scored, recur at its close.

This is an early and not very characteristic work of the composer of the "London Symphony" and "Pastoral Symphony." The latter work has not been heard here, except at a New England Conservatory concert, though much praised elsewhere. It should be added that yesterday's audience was delighted with this Rhapsody, applauding it until Mr Koussevitzky brought the players to their feet after several recalls.

Favorite Piece

The next number, the prelude and "Lovedeath" from "Tristan and Isolde," first performed in concert in 1859 (though the opera was not given until 1865), is music not merely (as is obvious) far greater than that of Vaughan Williams, but also far more modern in harmonic idiom. The audience received this coldly, one could not make out why, since it has long been a favorite piece at the P[illegible]. Mr Koussevitzky's interpretation [illegible] very eloquent, but not in accordance with those of other conductors.

He varies the tempi and at the final climax in the "Liebestod" so distorts the dynamics as to break the whole line of the melody, as though he did not feel the classic firmness and beauty of form underlying all the emotional and dramatic expression in the music. He also overdrives the orchestra in forte passages, and fails to keep the players absolutely together, though the luminous clarity of this score is not the least of its many superlative qualities.

This music should not be interpreted as though it were by Tchaikovsky. Yet nobody can justly accuse Koussevitzky of failing to make this or any piece interesting. Dullness is a musical crime not to be charged against him.

The first number was Handel's concerto grosso in G minor, No. 6. One wondered why it was not announced in advance just which of the 12 was to be played. A good many in these audiences try to prepare beforehand by looking over the chosen pieces, and therefore wish to know ahead which pieces have been chosen. Yet next week's audience is kept in the dark as to just which rondo by Mozart Mme Landowska will play with the orchestra.

This concerto was given yesterday a moving and eloquent reading. The quality of tone from the strings was beautiful in most of it, nor were those slight failures to keep together which so often coarsen the orchestra's playing remarked more than once or twice. But why need they have been there at all? There seems no excuse now for this sort of thing from this orchestra, any more than there would have been before the war, however much one may have been willing to overlook in the past nine years.

Of High Rank

Mr Koussevitzky is certainly in many ways a musician of very high rank. The present membership of the orchestra includes many first rate and no incompetent players. Why then need there have been rough places in yesterday's concert, in, for instance, so familiar a repertory piece as "Scheherezade," which was melodramatically interpreted without quite capturing the crude passion and terror of the "Arabian Nights" and at the sacrifice of some of its clarity and elegance of style.

When will Mr Koussevitzky realise that it is possible for an orchestra to play with the most intense emotion without coarsening of tone or blurring of musical outlines?

Mme Wanda Landowska will play the harpsichord in pieces by Mozart and de Falla next week. The rest of the program announced includes Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" and excerpts from Scarlatti arranged by Roland Manuel.

P. R.

CONCERT OF PROWESS: CONDUCTOR, AUDIENCE, ORCHESTRA, "AT HIGH"

TRANS — DEC 27

FROM HANDEL, OVER WAGNER, TO RIMSKY-KORSAKOV

A Concerto for the Strings—Mr. Koussevitsky and the Prelude to "Tristan"—"Scheherazade" and the Conductor's Courses—Vaughan Williams Newly and in Character

YOU will write best when you hate your job most, said the sage to the stripling in the newspaper office. With the scene shifted, the saying held good of the Symphony Orchestra at its concert on Saturday evening. Long since report had it that the members of the band were not exactly rejoicing at the prospect of three concerts over as many holidays or semi-holidays. As likely as not; yet at the mid-most of the three they drowned chagrins in accomplishment; while some vague sense of loyalty may have stirred within them, subconsciously. After all, the Symphony Concerts are a sequence from October to May, not to be interrupted by accidents of the calendar, secular or churchly. An audience that left hardly any vacant places on Friday, and not too many on Saturday, was plainly of this mind. The conductor obviously shared it, since he set a program, equally in order at the middle of November or the end of February. Submission was clearly the grace of the occasion; as it happened, exhilaration also crowned it—and upon responsive ears. The listeners of Saturday sat rapt; more than once at the end of a number came those seconds of silence and return which are the performers' dearest reward; then the tumult of applause. Three times, at the least, the orchestra stood to acknowledge it.

From the outset this pitch of performance ran high. Handel's Concerto Grosso in G minor—for string orchestra—begins with one of his full-voiced, large-striding, amplitudinous preludes. It teems with long-held, full-rounded measures, outspread and ascending in a great curve of climax. Superb to hear were the richness and the resonance of the choir; its unanimity of attack, release and shapen phrase between; its ready plasticity to every turn of the music. The conductor rounded the curve; held the rhythm both firm and free; infused into the whole the creative ardor of the composer. Before our eyes and ears was music made as in an opened crucible. . . . The second and the final divisions of the Concerto asked and received the sharpness of stroke, the pungency of accent, the tone impinging irresistibly upon the ear, which are likewise virtues of this string choir; while again the conductor charged the measures with re-creative vitality. Once more we hearers sat by at the weaving of these sound-patterns out of an incandescent air.

Between passed another slow-movement, a Musette—to disclose anew the singing voices of these violins, violas, violoncellos and basses, the warmth of their phrasing, the verve of their progress, their up-swelling unity, their contrasting divisibility, at the composer's and the conductor's will. Mr. Koussevitzky excels in this eighteenth-century music, because he restores to it magnificence of tone, large advance, creative passion and cumulation. And now the string choir is fulfilling and intensifying instrument, above its predecessors incomparable. It is time that the conductor searched farther into Handel than these convenient Concerti Grossi. The Water-Music, unheard these many years at Symphony Hall; the Fireworks-Music, rediscovered by Sir Hamilton Harty at Manchester, the "Occasional Overtures," all await him.

In the Prelude to "Tristan," Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra excelled their every recent venture into Wagner. A year ago last month when he first played the Prelude in Boston, he seemed somehow to suffocate it, to pen it within harem-walls. Now it moved open and free; while to the rhythms he lent enlarging and intensifying weight, as though to an epic of passion. He enhanced the suspensive quality of the beginning; spaced his pauses with the keenest sense of Wagner's rhetoric; reachieved upon the audience the possession that ascends from these measures of fate. Muck sounding them from the pit of the Prinz-Regenten at Munich, Toscanini lifting them across the Metropolitan, was not more puissant or illusory. Thenceforth most of us were as clay when the genius of Wagner is the potter. Yet judgment did note the breathless, ever-mounting line in which Mr. Koussevitzky sustained the ecstasy of the lovers, his deep blending of the harmonic colors, the gathering intensity, glow upon glow, of each ascending phrase, the fervors of tone, the ardors of accent that the orchestra to a man gave back.

The climax came, and the descent of the music into dun desolation. Everyone knows the moment in the opera—the wan dawn over the garden, the apparition of Melot and Marke upon the lovers, the shatter of disillusion. Here was, distilled, intensified, out of this bar and isolated peformance in the concert hall. For almost the first time, outside the apotheosis of Siegfried in "Götterdämmerung," Mr. Koussevitzky's Wagner sounded like Wagner, untinged by Slav neurosis . . . To moments in the "Liebestod," though the instrumental melody scaled the heavens with Isolde's devotion and bade the earth be still at Isolde's woe, it was possible to demur. Not quite out of the depths of the orchestra does Mr. Koussevitzky yet evoke the great climax; too sharply does he accent with the drum-beats the two preliminary steps toward it. Once more, however, Wagner's music was the music of superlative genius unlessening. And in a month, Boston will hear the whole opera—for the first time in four years. Fancy! in a capital of music, as the school-circulars call it.

Finally, "Scheherazade"—the one music of Rimsky-Korsakov to which Mr. Koussevitzky seems to warm. ("Antar" is gone from the repertory; the "Spanish Caprice" and the overtures seldom return). Therewith the conductor may array tonal splendors and instrumental virtuosities to his heart's content. His sea-music rolls and thunders, now out of unisons, again out of multifold sonorities. As he spaces and sounds it, there is reason to believe that the Kalendar Prince told his tale at what our untender youth call "a wild party." Around the Young Prince and the Young Princess, sitting all day in the garden, speaking, or silent, with love, the conductor and the orchestra weave a gleaming web of harmonic and instrumental color; stir it with changeful rhythms, wind into it recurring motivs. At the end, the revelry in many a beat and pace, the surge of the sea-music, the fading into the mists of fable. Along the way virtuosity upon virtuosity—from first violin, first flute and first clarinet; even the first bassoon has an inning; but most of all the skill and susceptibility of a full orchestra intertwining many rhythms, fusing, shading, contrasting endless colors, maintaining melody, veiling or stripping motivs.

There are purists and traditionalists that speak slightingly of this "Scheherazade." They hear askance a music that is not contrapuntal, developing and working themes in more or less orthodox molds; would have Rimsky's fantastic suite mere repetitious congeries of rhythmic devices, harmonic and instrumental trappings. They forget that both devices and colors are a marvel of inventive and manipulative skill; that they sound like those of no other composer, orchestrally masterful, from Berlioz through Wagner and Strauss, to Stravinsky and Honegger. They forget, also, as Mr. Koussevitzky does not, that "Scheherazade" is an intrinsically barbaric music, from the Arabian Nights as Burton or Mardrus translate them, not in the manicured versions, handed about in schoolrooms. With reason, the sea-music booms; or the Kalendar Prince tells a broadly comic tale in responsive company. The princelings are not all for love—in the abstract. There is proof positive that revels at Bagdad were as "fierce" as Rimsky and Mr. Koussevitzky make them. A barbarian lurks—or ought to lurk—in us all under our precious skin of civilization. "Scheherazade" releases him.

Similarly, in degree, with those that dislike Mr. Koussevitzky's vigors of tone and incisiveness of accents. They writhe under the shape bite of bows upon strings in the swifter movements of this Concerto Grosso of Handel, or the other day in Siebelius's Seventh Symphony. They complain of an astringent quality in the oboes and in the wood-winds generally, when the conductor would have these voices keenly charactered. They repine under what they call his piercing, thin-bodied brass, cleaving orchestral tumults. It is quite true that all this is a scale of instrumental tone, a play of instrumental color, that conductors at the turn of the century did not cultivate; that some refuse to accept even today. It was not Gericke's, for example, here in Boston, nor is it Mr. Weingartner's or Mr. Gabrilowitsch's. On the other hand, it is the scale and the palette of the newer generation of conductors, modernly minded. It is the only possible scale and palette for much of the music that they play. Naturally, they transfer both to older-established pieces—often as with "Scheherazade," to clear advantage. Like or dislike the new means and the new ends, there is no altering them. "The ancients were the ancients," though they date but a quarter-century back. "And we are the people of today"—even at the Symphony Concerts.

The novel number of the evening was Vaughan Williams's "Norfolk Rhapsody," for his first appearance under the present régime "at these concerts." He derives the music from folk-tunes that he gathered in the county. He shapes it in a familiar form—songful and musing beginning; rougher-surfaced, sharper-rhythmed, more vigorous middle measures; return to the earlier mood and manner. He writes it in close-woven texture, out of which dart instruments that he would individualize, into which he threads fine harmonic shadings. Even when it is liveliest, the Rhapsody is a relatively quiet music, far from the hearty rough-and-tumble, say, of

Continued on Page Twelve

ENGLISH MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Williams' Rhapsody Is Striking Feature of Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In that it was new to Boston, uncommonly interesting, beautifully played and most cordially received, Vaughan Williams' "Norfolk Rhapsody" No. 1 may be accounted the most striking feature of yesterday's Symphony Concert, even though its companion pieces were a Concerto Grosso of Handel's, the Prelude and Love-Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherezade."

TYPICALLY ENGLISH

As the years roll by Vaughan Williams seems more and more to loom above other living English makers of music. Among them, he alone is virtually free of the reproach of electicism. His musical idiom is at the same time typically English and characteristically personal. Not Wagner and Brahms, but Byrd and Tallis are his true musical ancestors. His music is not a compendium of various Continental influences, but a tonal speech that smacks of the soil, British through and through. And it is by virtue of this authenticity of utterance that to an outlander he seems to stand quite above and apart from his fellows, gifted in their several ways as are Elgar, Delius, Holst, Bax, Goossens and the rest.

The Rhapsody heard yesterday is not new. It was written, in fact, as long ago as 1906, though revised some eight years later. Folk-songs make the bulk of its thematic content, but in passing through the crucible of the composer's mind these simple and homely strains have emerged with a new dignity and expressiveness. Pervading the music, too, is a haunting suggestion of nostalgia, a mood that, by the way, permeates much of this composer's remarkable "Pastoral" Symphony, as yet heard in Boston only at the hands of the Conservatory Orchestra.

Received Cordially

That this Rhapsody, a composition unpretentious and unproclaimed, should have been so warmly applauded yesterday speaks well for the taste of an audience whose discrimination in matters musical has at times been called into question.

It was Beethoven himself who said: "Handel is the unattained master of all masters. Go to him and learn how to produce great effects with scant deploy of means." And how aptly these words apply to the Concerto Grosso heard yesterday, one of 12 composed, incredible as it seems, in the space of 32 days. Here is music scored only for strings, devoid of all tricks, free of all striving after effect, yet superbly vital, rich in substance, satisfying alike the mind and the heart.

Nobly Eloquent

Always happy with the music of the early 18th century, Mr. Koussevitzky conducted yesterday a nobly eloquent performance of this Concerto. In this music he was heard in Boston for the first time, whereas his prowess with the "Tristan" fragments and with "Scheherazade" is well known to us of this city.

It remains only to add that the orchestral performance was throughout the afternoon of a high order, and that the proximity of Christmas had little effect on the size of the audience, which remained almost in toto to the end of the concert and greeted with pronounced enthusiasm the performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's glowing, gorgeously colored and imaginative suite.

10TH SYMPHONY IS BRILLIANT

HER — DEC 25

Handel's Concerto Grosso Lends Dignity to Eve of Christmas

CONCERT WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Symphony hall, yesterday afternoon. For the holidays Mr. Koussevitzky arranged an interesting and brilliant program.

First came Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 6. The solemn first movement, solemn but with Handel's peculiar tenderness, reminded the hearers that Christmas Eve should be something more than an excuse for eating and drinking, hysterical music and riotous jollity. The lively movements have a stirring virility. Those to whom the "Scotch snap" is a burning question, who trace this "snap" in music of every age and every school, rejoiced to find it in the Musette, a movement curiously named, for it is without the traditional form.

There was a passionately eloquent performance of the familiar excerpts from "Tristan and Isolde"; a remarkably effective reading and playing of Rimsky - Korsakov's "Scheherazade," that gorgeous tonal picture, reproducing wild tales of Afrites and Jinns, one-eyed Kalanders and enchanting princesses, the sea of Sindbad with the magnetic mountain, the splendor of Bagdad under its great Caliph, the sensuality, the cruelty, the perfumes, the lust and the glamour of the Orient.

The second piece on the program was played here for the first time. It was well worth hearing. Vaughan Williams, a firm believer in folk-music as thematic material, although for his more important works he invented his own themes, heard over 20 years ago folk-songs in a Norfolk village that pleased him greatly, and inspired him to write three Norfolk Rhapsodies. The one performed yesterday was No. 1. The words of the songs used are delightfully naive; the tunes heard yesterday are for the most part pleasingly melancholy, with one that is rollicking and typically English in its straightforwardness. The introductory section is beautiful by reason of the theme announced in a beautiful manner both in tone and in expression by Mr. Lafranc, the leader of the viola section, and by the treatment of this theme, the charming and original orchestration. The lively section is wholly free from the coarseness that is too frequently found in music of English and other composers when they wish to be unmistakably gay. The close, too, is beautiful in its unexpected quietness. This Rhapsody would bear repetition at an early day. The Rhapsody is nearer in spirit to the same composer's "Wenlock Edge" than to his "London" Symphony.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Scarlatti, Three Pieces, arranged for orchestra by Roland-Manuel; de Falla, Concerto for Clavichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin (so the announcement states, but others say "viola") and violoncello; Mozart, Rondo (being the Finale of a piano concerto), for harpsichord and orchestra; Stravinsky, "The Rite of Spring." Wanda Landowska will be the soloist.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY OLD MUSIC

Concert to Be Broadcast Over Radio Tonight by WBZ

HER — DEC 25

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be broadcast tonight through Westinghouse station WBZ and the chain network under the direction of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, is the most varied and in many respects the most interesting thus far in the series, according to Prof. John Patten Marshall who interprets the Saturday symphony programs for the radio audience.

Lovers of old music will delight in Handel's concerto, Wagnerians will welcome the performance of the Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," the modernists will receive their portion in the Vaughan Williams' Norfolk rhapsody and everyone will thoroughly enjoy Rimsky-Korsakov's popular symphonic suite, "Scheregade."

In addition to WBZ, the "key" station, six stations are included in the network which will broadcast tonight's symphony concert through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby of the W. S. Quinby Company of Boston, New York and Chicago, producers of La Touraine coffee and tea. The stations which will make this concert available to an audience aggregating millions are WBZ, Boston and Springfield; WJZ, New York; WGY, Schenectady; WEBL, Syracuse; WHAM, Rochester; and WMAK, Buffalo.

Before the program, Professor Marshall will tell the audience of the six stations something about Vaughan Williams' work, which is performed at this concert for the first time in America, and will illustrate the motif from Isolde's Love-Death. During the intermission he will, with the assistance of Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist, illustrate the fascinating melodies of the Scheherezade. This music, which is illustrative of tales from the Arabian Nights, tells of Sinbad the Sailor, the Kalendar Prince and the evening which he spent with three ladies of Bagdad, and of the beautiful Scheherezade who appears in the music as a dream-like vision. Professor Marshall will not analyze this music, for such analysis will not help the listeners; he will confine himself to telling the story and pointing out some of the features of the work which the radio audience should not miss.

The complete program follows:

Handel.....Concerto Grosso
Vaughan Williams.....A Norfolk Rhapsody
Wagner.....Prelude and Love-Death, "Tristan and Isolde"
Rimsky-Korsakov.....Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night") Op. 35.
I. The Sea and Sinbad's Ship.
II. The Story of the Kalendar Prince.
III. The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
IV. Festival at Bagdad; the sea; the ship goes to pieces on a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior; conclusion.

VARIED PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Handel, Wagner, Williams and Rimsky Korsakov

Globe Dec 25

Mr Koussevitzky has set an agreeably varied program for the Christmas pair of Boston Symphony concerts. Yesterday afternoon's audience seemed on the whole greatly pleased with a miscellany which ranged from a Handel concerto grosso, through a "Norfolk Rhapsody" by Vaughan Williams, and the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan" to Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherezade."

The majority of the subscribers had as usual in Christmas week given their tickets to friends. It is a pity that Mr Koussevitzky's midseason vacation cannot be given him at this time, by arranging to have no concerto for two weeks, and lengthening the season in Fall or Spring. Too few people can find time for concerts amid the holiday rush.

The only novelty on yesterday's program, Vaughan Williams' "Norfolk Rhapsody, No. 1," was not so very new, having been composed in 1905. Its themes are old popular songs (therefore dignified by the title "folk songs") which Dr Williams collected at Kings Lynn, Norfolk, England, the town for which our Lynn was named. The harmonization and arrangement are effective enough, but the introductory measures, especially a passage with viola solo, are the only really notable things about the piece. These measures, differently scored, recur at its close.

This is an early and not very characteristic work of the composer of the "London Symphony" and "Pastoral Symphony." The latter work has not been heard here, except at a New England Conservatory concert, though much praised elsewhere. It should be added that yesterday's audience was delighted with this Rhapsody, applauding it until Mr Koussevitzky brought the players to their feet after several recalls.

Favorite Piece

The next number, the prelude and "Lovedeath" from "Tristan and Isolde," first performed in concert in 1859 (though the opera was not given until 1865), is music not merely (as is obvious) far greater than that of Vaughan Williams, but also far more modern in harmonic idiom. The audience received this coldly, one could not make out why, since it has long been a favorite piece at the Pops. Mr Koussevitzky's interpretation was very eloquent, but not in accordance with those of other conductors.

He varies the tempi and at the final climax in the "Liebestod" so distorts the dynamics as to break the whole line of the melody, as though he did not feel the classic firmness and beauty of form underlying all the emotional and dramatic expression in the music. He also overdrives the orchestra in forte passages, and fails to keep the players absolutely together, though the luminous clarity of this score is not the least of its many superlative qualities.

This music should not be interpreted as though it were by Tchaikovsky. Yet nobody can justly accuse Koussevitzky of failing to make this or any piece interesting. Dullness is a musical crime not to be charged against him.

The first number was Handel's concerto grosso in G minor, No. 6. One wondered why it was not announced in advance just which of the 12 was to be played. A good many in these audiences try to prepare beforehand by looking over the chosen pieces, and therefore wish to know ahead which pieces have been chosen. Yet next week's audience is kept in the dark as to just which rondo by Mozart Mme Landowska will play with the orchestra.

This concerto was given yesterday a moving and eloquent reading. The quality of tone from the strings was beautiful in most of it, nor were those slight failures to keep together which so often coarsen the orchestra's playing remarked more than once or twice. But why need they have been there at all? There seems no excuse now for this sort of thing from this orchestra, any more than there would have been before the war, however much one may have been willing to overlook in the past nine years.

Of High Rank

Mr Koussevitzky is certainly in many ways a musician of very high rank. The present membership of the orchestra includes many first rate and no incompetent players. Why then need there have been rough places in yesterday's concert, in, for instance so familiar a repertory piece as "Scheherezade," which was melodramatically interpreted without quite capturing the crude passion and terror of the "Arabian Nights" and at a sacrifice of some of its clarity and elegance of style.

When will Mr Koussevitzky realise that it is possible for an orchestra to play with the most intense emotion without coarsening of tone or blurring of musical outlines?

Mme Wanda Landowska will play the harpsichord in pieces by Mozart and de Falla next week. The rest of the program announced includes Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" and excerpts from Scarlatti arranged by Roland Manuel.

P. R.

CONCERT OF PROWESS. CONDUCTOR, AUDIENCE, ORCHESTRA, "AT HIGH"

TRANS — DEC 27

FROM HANDEL, OVER WAGNER, TO RIMSKY-KORSAKOV

A Concerto for the Strings—Mr. Koussevitsky and the Prelude to "Tristan"—"Scheherazade" and the Conductor's Courses—Vaughan Williams Newly and in Character

YOU will write best when you hate your job most, said the sage to the stripling in the newspaper office. With the scene shifted, the saying held good of the Symphony Orchestra at its concert on Saturday evening. Long since report had it that the members of the band were not exactly rejoicing at the prospect of three concerts over as many holidays or semi-holidays. As likely as not; yet at the mid-most of the three they drowned chagrins in accomplishment; while some vague sense of loyalty may have stirred within them, subconsciously. After all, the Symphony Concerts are a sequence from October to May, not to be interrupted by accidents of the calendar, secular or churchly. An audience that left hardly any vacant places on Friday, and not too many on Saturday, was plainly of this mind. The conductor obviously shared it, since he set a program, equally in order at the middle of November or the end of February. Submission was clearly the grace of the occasion; as it happened, exhilaration also crowned it—and upon responsive ears. The listeners of Saturday sat rapt; more than once at the end of a number came those seconds of silence and return which are the performers' dearest reward; then the tumult of applause. Three times, at the least, the orchestra stood to acknowledge it.

From the outset this pitch of performance ran high. Handel's Concerto Grosso in G minor—for string orchestra—begins with one of his full-voiced, large-striding, amplitudinous preludes. It teems with long-held, full-rounded measures, outspread and ascending in a great curve of climax. Superb to hear were the richness and the resonance of the choir; its unanimity of attack, release and shapen phrase between; its ready plasticity to every turn of the music. The conductor rounded the curve; held the rhythm both firm and free; infused into the whole the creative ardor of the composer. Before our eyes and ears was music made as in an opened crucible. . . . The second and the final divisions of the Concerto asked and received the sharpness of stroke, the pungency of accent, the tone impinging irresistibly upon the ear, which are likewise virtues of this string choir; while again the conductor charged the measures with re-creative vitality. Once more we hearers sat by at the weaving of these sound-patterns out of an incandescent air.

Between passed another slow-movement, a Musette—to disclose anew the singing voices of these violins, violas, violoncellos and basses, the warmth of their phrasing, the verve of their progress, their up-swelling unity, their contrasting divisibility, at the composer's and the conductor's will. Mr. Koussevitzky excels in this eighteenth-century music, because he restores to it magnificence of tone, large advance, creative passion and cumulation. And now the string choir is fulfilling and intensifying instrument, above its predecessors incomparable. It is time that the conductor searched farther into Handel than these convenient Concerti Grossi. The Water-Music, unheard these many years at Symphony Hall; the Fireworks-Music, rediscovered by Sir Hamilton Harty at Manchester, the "Occasional Overtures," all await him.

In the Prelude to "Tristan," Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra excelled their every recent venture into Wagner. A year ago last month when he first played the Prelude in Boston, he seemed somehow to suffocate it, to pen it within harem-walls. Now it moved open and free; while to the rhythms he lent enlarging and intensifying weight, as though to an epic of passion. He enhanced the suspensive quality of the beginning: spaced his pauses with the keenest sense of Wagner's rhetoric; reachieved upon the audience the possession that ascends from these measures of fate. Muck sounding them from the pit of the Prinz-Regenten at Munich, Toscanini lifting them across the Metropolitan, was not more puissant or illusory. Thenceforth most of us were as clay when the genius of Wagner is the potter. Yet judgment did note the breathless, ever-mounting line in which Mr. Koussevitzky sustained the ecstasy of the lovers, his deep blending of the harmonic colors, the gathering intensity, glow upon glow, of each ascending phrase, the fervors of tone, the ardors of accent that the orchestra to a man gave back.

The climax came, and the descent of the music into dun desolation. Everyone knows the moment in the opera—the wan dawn over the garden, the apparition of Melot and Marke upon the lovers, the shatter of disillusion. Here was, distilled, intensified, out of this bar and isolated peformance in the concert hall. For almost the first time, outside the apotheosis of Siegfried in "Götterdämmerung," Mr. Koussevitzky's Wagner sounded like Wagner, untinged by Slav neurosis . . . To moments in the "Liebestod," though the instrumental melody scaled the heavens with Isolde's devotion and bade the earth be still at Isolde's woe, it was possible to demur. Not quite out of the depths of the orchestra does Mr. Koussevitzky yet evoke the great climax; too sharply does he accent with the drum-beats the two preliminary steps toward it. Once more, however, Wagner's music was the music of superlative genius unlessening. And in a month, Boston will hear the whole opera—for the first time in four years. Fancy! in a capital of music, as the school-circulars call it.

Finally, "Scheherazade"—the one music of Rimsky-Korsakov to which Mr. Koussevitzky seems to warm. ("Antar" is gone from the repertory; the "Spanish Caprice" and the overtures seldom return). Therewith the conductor may array tonal splendors and instrumental virtuosities to his heart's content. His sea-music rolls and thunders, now out of unisons, again out of multifold sonorities. As he spaces and sounds it, there is reason to believe that the Kalendar Prince told his tale at what our untender youth call "a wild party." Around the Young Prince and the Young Princess, sitting all day in the garden, speaking, or silent, with love, the conductor and the orchestra weave a gleaming web of harmonic and instrumental color; stir it with changeful rhythms, wind into it recurring motivs. At the end, the revelry in many a beat and pace, the surge of the sea-music, the fading into the mists of fable. Along the way virtuosity upon virtuosity—from first violin, first flute and first clarinet; even the first bassoon has an inning; but most of all the skill and susceptibility of a full orchestra intertwining many rhythms, fusing, shading, contrasting endless colors, maintaining melody, veiling or stripping motivs.

There are purists and traditionalists that speak slightingly of this "Scheherazade." They hear askance a music that is not contrapuntal, developing and working themes in more or less orthodox molds; would have Rimsky's fantastic suite mere repetitious congeries of rhythmic devices, harmonic and instrumental trappings. They forget that both devices and colors are a marvel of inventive and manipulative skill; that they sound like those of no other composer, orchestrally masterful, from Berlioz through Wagner and Strauss, to Stravinsky and Honegger. They forget, also, as Mr. Koussevitzky does not, that "Scheherazade" is an intrinsically barbaric music, from the Arabian Nights as Burton or Mardrus translate them, not in the manicured versions, handed about in schoolrooms. With reason, the sea-music booms; or the Kalendar Prince tells a broadly comic tale in responsive company. The princelings are not all for love—in the abstract. There is proof positive that revels at Bagdad were as "fierce" as Rimsky and Mr. Koussevitzky make them. A barbarian lurks—or ought to lurk—in us all under our precious skin of civilization. "Scheherazade" releases him.

Similarly, in degree, with those that dislike Mr. Koussevitzky's vigors of tone and incisiveness of accents. They writhe under the shape bite of bows upon strings in the swifter movements of this Concerto Grosso of Handel, or the other day in Siebelius's Seventh Symphony. They complain of an astringent quality in the oboes and in the wood-winds generally, when the conductor would have these voices keenly charactered. They repine under what they call his piercing, thin-bodied brass, cleaving orchestral tumults. It is quite true that all this is a scale of instrumental tone, a play of instrumental color, that conductors at the turn of the century did not cultivate; that some refuse to accept even today. It was not Gericke's, for example, here in Boston, nor is it Mr. Weingartner's or Mr. Gabrilowitsch's. On the other hand, it is the scale and the palette of the newer generation of conductors, modernly minded. It is the only possible scale and palette for much of the music that they play. Naturally, they transfer both to older-established pieces often as with "Scheherazade," to clear advantage. Like or dislike the new means and the new ends, there is no altering them. "The ancients were the ancients," though they date but a quarter-century back. "And we are the people of today"—even at the Symphony Concerts.

The novel number of the evening was Vaughan Williams's "Norfolk Rhapsody," for his first appearance under the present régime "at these concerts." He derives the music from folk-tunes that he gathered in the county. He shapes it in a familiar form—songful and musing beginning; rougher-surfaced, sharper-rhythmed, more vigorous middle measures; return to the earlier mood and manner. He writes it in close-woven texture, out of which dart instruments that he would individualize, into which he threads fine harmonic shadings. Even when it is liveliest, the Rhapsody is a relatively quiet music, far from the hearty rough-and-tumble, say, of

Continued on Page Twelve

PENSION FUND LIST POPULAR

Post DEC 27

Shopworn Pieces Are Made Brilliant Under Koussevitzky

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Playing yesterday in aid of its pension fund, the Boston Symphony Orchestra quite unprecedentedly offered a frankly "popular" programme, drawn from the music of Rossini, Weber (by way of Berlioz), Sibelius, Johann Strauss and Tchaikovsky. And despite the weather and a date highly unpropitious for concert-giving, the hall was very nearly filled by an audience that expressed its pleasure in no uncertain terms.

A TREAT ANYWAY

Whether that old standby of Pension Fund Concerts, the all-Wagner programme, would have drawn to Symphony Hall more people than were brought here by Mr. Koussevitsky's lighter list of yesterday can not be known, but surely his wisdom in presenting this popular programme may go unchallenged.

Moreover, to hear from such an orchestra and from such a conductor and in such vital performance the Overture to "William Tell," "The Invitation to the Dance," the "Valse Triste," the waltz "Voices of Spring," the "Nutcracker" Suite and the "1812" Overture must have proved a rare treat to all, whatever the general trend and level of each individual's musical taste.

If recollection does not err the "William Tell" Overture was last played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—outside the "Pops"—in the concert directed by Mr. Gericke for the benefit of the sufferers in the San Francisco earthquake and fire, although Mr. Monteux successfully ventured two of Rossini's other overtures at subscription concerts. Granted that its "storm music" is hollow and theatrical, that its finale borders on vulgarity, the "Tell" Overture remains an uncommonly brilliant and effective orchestral piece, and jaded indeed must have been the listener who did not receive an electric thrill or two from yesterday's performance of it.

In "The Invitation to the Dance," Mr. Koussevitzky was, perhaps, a trifle heavy-handed, but he more than made up for it by his adroit fashioning of the "Valse Triste," his verve in the "Voices of Spring" (not too often before has Symphony Hall heard in a Strauss Waltz the true Viennese swing), and his exceeding deftness with the ingeniously orchestrated and ever-delightful "Nutcracker" Suite.

"1812" the Grand Climax

Of course, such a programme must have its "grand climax," and this proper culmination came yesterday in the "1812," in which a sizable brass ensemble from the New England Conservatory, trained by Louis Kloepfel of the orchestra's trumpet section, helped swell the final tumult. Like the "William Tell," this Overture, in which Tchaikovsky celebrated Napoleon's retreat from Moscow, has been called obvious and dismissed as "old hat," yet yesterday, with the fire of Mr. Koussevitzky's Russian temperament to illumine it, the piece made no inconsiderable effect. Long and loud was the applause, and, as he had previously done at the end of the Strauss Waltz, the conductor made response by summoning the players to their feet.

goer, really a bit dull. True, Mr. Koussevitzky gave very interesting and—for a Boston audience—novel interpretations of such things as Rossini's "William Tell" Overture, Sibelius' "Valse Triste", and the Weber-Berlioz "Invitation to the Dance."

The Sibelius waltz was particularly well played, and it was a revelation to those who have merely heard this piece played in perfunctory fashion at the "Pop" concerts. In Johan Strauss' Waltz, "Voices of Spring," the Russian leader, though offering novel effects, seemed to miss the real spirit of the German waltz-king.

Tchaikovsky, with the "Nutcracker" Suite and the "1812" Overture, filled the second half of the program. The first was delightfully played. In the overture, although the performance was probably the greatest ever, on the side of sound and fury, there was naturally nothing novel in a piece that has been worked to death by countless conductors.

Another recent Sibelius work, his Seventh Symphony, Op. 105, will be introduced here by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in their Brooklyn concert of Friday, January 6, and the following afternoon at Carnegie Hall. On Thursday night, January 5, in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky's program will include Haydn's E flat Symphony (B. & H. No. 3), a Mozart rondo for harpsichord and orchestra, with Wanda Landowska as soloist; de Falla's concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and cello, with Mme. Landowska taking part, and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

The afternoon program of the 7th begins with a concerto by C. P. E. Bach in D major, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, the suite from Stravinsky's "L'Oiseau de Feu," the Sibelius symphony and Ravel's "La Valse." At the Brooklyn Academy on Friday night, the 6th, the Emanuel Bach concerto and the Sibelius symphony will precede four Wagner numbers—the "Lohengrin" prelude, Funeral Music from "Götterdämmerung," Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried" and the "Meistersinger" prelude.

N.Y. TRIBUNE

Sibelius's Seventh Symphony is in one movement, without key designation; it opens in A minor and closes in the relative major key of C, and is scored for a relatively modest orchestra: woodwind in pairs (without English horn), four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, tympani and strings. It was published in 1925 and, according to Mr. Parker's colleague, A. H. M., in "The Boston Evening Transcript," was first performed in Copenhagen in the spring of that year. Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra gave the first American performance of the work in Philadelphia on April 3 of this year; the Boston Symphony played it in Boston on December 10 and 11. Mr. Stokowski also introduced Sibelius's Sixth Symphony to America on April 24; this has not yet been heard in New York.

DEC 26

1927

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
TOLEDO, OHIO

JAN 1 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN CONCERT.

The Boston symphony orchestra will be on the air tonight with a concert, through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby, from station WBZ, Springfield. The concert will begin at 8:10, eastern time. At 11:30, messages of the Canadian mounted police will be broadcast.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CALL
WOONSOCKET, R. I.

JAN 1 1927

The Boston Symphony Orchestra program, which will be heard from WBZ at 8:10 this evening will include the "Siegfried Funeral Music" from "Die Gotterdamerung," romdo from Mozart's concerto in D major for piano, played on the harpsichord by Wanda Landowska, concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, vuilin, and violoncello by Manuel de Falla, and rite of Spring by Stravinsky.

SYMPHONY IN BENEFIT CONCERT

AMER DEC 27

By MOSES SMITH

An old-fashioned popular program was the musical fare at the first Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Despite the severe weather there were few empty seats when Serge Koussevitzky appeared to conduct the first number—a remarkable tribute to the popularity of the leader and his Orchestra.

It is many years since a similar collection of pieces was played at a Pension Fund affair. Recently such heavy matter as Brahms' "Requiem" and the Beethoven Ninth Symphony has served to attract capacity audiences. But yesterday's program offered the first opportunity for Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston to conduct in lighter symphonic works.

Though the experiment looked interesting in advance, the concert [illegible] for the hardened symphony

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD
ILL.

ISSUE OF

JAN 1 1927

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be on the air tonight with a concert, through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby, from Station WBZ, Springfield. The concert will begin at 7:10, Central time. At 11:30, messages of the Canadian Mounted Police will be broadcast.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
AKRON, O.

JAN 1 1927

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be on the air tonight with a concert, through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby, from station WBZ, Springfield. The concert will begin at 8:10. At 11:30, messages of the Canadian mounted police will be broadcast.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORKER

JAN 1 - 1927

ORCHESTRAS

PHILHARMONIC — Mengelberg conducting. CARNEGIE HALL, Fri. Aft., Dec. 31; Sat. Eve., Jan. 1.

NEW YORK SYMPHONY—Damrosch conducting. CARNEGIE HALL, Fri. Eve., Dec. 31; Sat. Aft., Jan. 1 (Young People's Concert). MECCA TEMPLE, Sun. Aft., Jan. 2. Klemperer conducting. CARNEGIE HALL, Fri. Eve., Jan. 7.

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA — Stokowski conducting. CARNEGIE HALL, Tues. Eve., Jan. 4.

BOSTON SYMPHONY—Koussevitzky conducting. CARNEGIE HALL, Thurs. Eve., Jan. 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

JAN 2 1927

On Friday evening at the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussewitzky, will give its second Brooklyn concert this season. The following program will be played:

Bach-Steinberg .....Concerto in D
Siebelius .....Seventh Symphony
Wagner,
Excerpts from "Lohengrin," "Goetterdaemmerung," "Siegfried" and "Die Meistersinger.

The Sibelius Symphony will on this occasion have its first performance in New York. Mr. Koussewitsky introduced it to Boston some weeks ago. It was first played in America by the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Stokowski, in Philadelphia.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

JAN 4 1927

An Opportunity in Music.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I am sure that across the intervening years the elder generation of American music lovers have not forgotten the distinguished pianist Fraulein Adele aus der Ohe, whose work as a young woman in recital and in concert was long a charming feature of our American Winters. Particularly memorable was her triumph at the dedication of Carnegie Hall, when she played—I think with the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the concerto of Tchaikovsky, winning the tumultuous applause of a picked audience. She was, and I presume still is, Court Pianist at Weimar, though she is living in Berlin—15 Pariserstrasse—having with difficulty survived the trying vicissitudes of the war. She is, however, no longer equal to the demands of a concert tour, but is chiefly occupied with giving lessons. She is very desirous to have more American pupils at her home, and this note is written in the hope of furthering that desire. Perhaps no one now living so truly represents the Liszt tradition in the piano, for she was indeed the favorite pupil of that master. I cannot think of any better fortune that could befall an advanced student of music than association with so distinguished an artist. I should willingly do anything possible to promote a relationship of such manifest advantage both to teacher and to pupil.

ROBERT UNDERWOOD JOHNSON.
New York, Dec. 30, 1926.

THIS CLIPPING FROM GLOBE DEMOCRAT
ST. LOUIS, MO.

JAN 2 - 192

SYLVAIN NOACK, who came to St. Louis as concert master of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra the first of this season, makes his debut as a concert soloist with that orchestra at the Odeon Friday afternoon and Saturday night of this week. He will play the Bruch Concerto for violin, No. 2, in D minor, a work originally composed for Pablo de Sarasate, to whom it is dedicated.

Max Bruch was a master of musical form, and while perhaps his greatest work is the fruit of his years as conductor of and composer for singing societies in Berlin and elsewhere, he was peculiarly happy in his works for violin. The four principal ones are three concertos and his "Scotch Fantasie," which were written, two each, for Sarasate and Joachim. And while the works are grateful in their melodic content, they have such brilliance and make such technical demands upon the artist that they are in the repertoire of almost every great virtuoso of the violin. The second in D minor—which is the first of two written in that tonality—is peculiarly melodic and attractive.

Noack's obvious success in his post as concert master has aroused a genuine anticipation and interest in his appearance this week as soloist. He came to St. Louis from Los Angeles, where he was concert master of the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra, and in turn went to Los Angeles from Boston, where he was assistant concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck and under Henri Rabaud. In that city he was founder of the Boston Quartet.

Made a Fine Start.

A native of Holland, Noack's pride is in his American citizenship. From childhood he devoted himself to music, at first intending to become a pianist, and as a pianist he made his professional debut at 15, playing the Mozart D Minor Concerto. Since the Conservatory demanded that each student study also a secondary instrument, he took up the violin, with the result that it won him from his first love, and at 17 he became a first violin in the famous Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam, at the same time entering the Conservatory there as a pupil of Andre Spoor. From that institution he graduated with the Prix d'Honneur, its highest distinction.

He became associated with the Amsterdam Conservatory as a teacher and was for four years assistant to Carl Flesch, becoming a member of the famous conservatory quartet and second violin to Flesch's first in that organization. In 1906 he became concert-master of the Aix le Chappelle Orchestra and two years later tucked his fiddle under his arm—figuratively speaking—and set forth for Boston.

That fiddle, by the way, which he will play in the concert this week, is a Giovanni Battista Guadagnini, made in Turin in 1779, and one of the finest works of that great master.

Respighi's Novelty.

This concert program will serve to introduce to St. Louis the symphonic poem "Pines of Rome," by Respighi, whose "Fountains of Rome" has twice delighted symphony audiences in recent years. It also serves to introduce into the orchestra a new instrument—a phonograph, for in the course of his work Respighi has occasion for the song of a nightingale and a carefully recorded song from that bird is played by the phonograph as a part of the music. "The Pines of Rome" is a series of mental pictures which by association of incidents connected with Italian history evokes images of Latin greatness and might even, by no great imaginative flight, be conceived to be a vision of a Mussolinist future for that nation.

The concert opens with Smetana's comic overture—the overture to "The Bartered Bride" with its charming interweaving of delightful folk-melody and naive gusto and fun. It will also present the Dohnanyi Suite for Orchestra Op. 19, a work which, while modern in its implications, is marked by sound classical musicianship in its development.

Detailed Program.

In detail the offerings are:

Overture to The Merry Wives of Windsor .....Nicolai
Second Movement Largo, from Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, Opus 95, From the New World .....Dvorak
Capriccio Brilliante for Pianoforte, Opus 22 .....Mendelssohn
Suite No. 1, Peer Gynt, Opus 46....Grieg
Intermezzo from William Ratcliffe—Mascagni
Rhapsody on a Persian Air.....Mason
Emperor Waltzes.....Strauss

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

JAN 2 1927

Landowska Outli Concerto for P

The concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and cello by Manuel De Falla, which will be played for the first time in America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday night at Carnegie Hall, was dedicated to Mme. Wanda Landowska, soloist at the recital.

Mme. Landowska explains that its inception in the composer's mind took from four years ago when she visited De Falla in Grenada, who became interested in adapting the possibilities of the delightful instrument, the harpsichord, to modern forms.

"It must be said," an annotator notes, "that the composer did not intend to write a concerto for a soloist with an instrumental ensemble as accompaniment; on the contrary, though the part of the harpsichord is throughout the work preponderant, the other instruments not only do not reduce their action to a simple 'ripieno' but are as important in the total contexture as the principal instrument.

"Nor was it the intention of the author to follow rigorously the structure of the classical concerto. We have here a work of free conception, in which, however, it is easy to discover certain traditional values of character and form; and in its realization the laws of tonality, inasmuch

ines De Falla's remiere Thursday

as they are unchangeable, have been obeyed.

"The music of this concerto as to its rhythmic, tonal and melodic character, and as to its form, finds its origin in the various sources of Spanish music: religious, noble and popular. And the musical structure employed by the composer often proceeds from desuete and even very ancient forms, used nevertheless in accordance with the manner and possibilities of our own mode of expression. May this short and imperfect summary serve as an attempt to expose the interesting tendencies of this celebrated composer."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
MADISON, WIS.

JAN 2 1927

Renaissance o "Corn Provi by Prager

This article, taken from The Boston Transcript, was written by Nelson M. Jansky, formerly music editor of this paper. Mr. Jansky is at present on the staff of the Boston paper as a special writer and assistant to the music editor.

By N. M. J

NEW YORK heard the first and only performance of the New Symphony orchestra last year No sooner had the winter season come to a close than Dr. Sigfrid Prager, conductor of the organization, gave up his post and struck out for the hinterland of America. He had caught the rumor of a rebirth of music in the corn provinces and in the region of the Great Lakes. Musicians and music-lovers long had been toying with a new phrase: "America is about to witness a great renaissance of music in the Middle West." In its mysterious way, the whisper has caught the ear of adventurers everywhere. Sometimes the phrase runs one way, sometimes another. But always it beckons the pioneer. It promises a new era of music to come. Even earlier adventurers sometimes spoke vaguely of the new order. Theodore Thomas dreamed it; Walt Whitman predicted it; musicians and music-lovers of the Middle West claim it is upon them.

PENSION FUND LIST POPULAR

Post DEC 27

Shopworn Pieces Are Made Brilliant Under Koussevitzky

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Playing yesterday in aid of its pension fund, the Boston Symphony Orchestra quite unprecedentedly offered a frankly "popular" programme, drawn from the music of Rossini, Weber (by way of Berlioz), Sibelius, Johann Strauss and Tchaikovsky. And despite the weather and a date highly unpropitious for concert-giving, the hall was very nearly filled by an audience that expressed its pleasure in no uncertain terms.

A TREAT ANYWAY

Whether that old standby of Pension Fund Concerts, the all-Wagner programme, would have drawn to Symphony Hall more people than were brought here by Mr. Koussevitsky's lighter list of yesterday can not be known, but surely his wisdom in presenting this popular programme may go unchallenged.

Moreover, to hear from such an orchestra and from such a conductor and in such vital performance the Overture to "William Tell," "The Invitation to the Dance," the "Valse Triste," the waltz "Voices of Spring," the "Nutcracker" Suite and the "1812" Overture must have proved a rare treat to all, whatever the general trend and level of each individual's musical taste.

If recollection does not err the "William Tell" Overture was last played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—outside the "Pops"—in the concert directed by Mr. Gericke for the benefit of the sufferers in the San Francisco earthquake and fire, although Mr. Monteux successfully ventured two of Rossini's other overtures at subscription concerts. Granted that its "storm music" is hollow and theatrical, that its finale borders on vulgarity, the "Tell" Overture remains an uncommonly brilliant and effective orchestral piece, and jaded indeed must have been the listener who did not receive an electric thrill or two from yesterday's performance of it.

In "The Invitation to the Dance," Mr. Koussevitzky was, perhaps, a trifle heavy-handed, but he more than made up for it by his adroit fashioning of the "Valse Triste," his verve in the "Voices of Spring" (not too often before has Symphony Hall heard in a Strauss Waltz the true Viennese swing), and his exceeding deftness with the ingeniously orchestrated and ever-delightful "Nutcracker" Suite.

"1812" the Grand Climax

Of course, such a programme must have its "grand climax," and this proper culmination came yesterday in the "1812," in which a sizable brass ensemble from the New England Conservatory, trained by Louis Kloepfel of the orchestra's trumpet section, helped swell the final tumult. Like the "William Tell," this Overture, in which Tchaikovsky celebrated Napoleon's retreat from Moscow, has been called obvious and dismissed as "old hat," yet yesterday, with the fire of Mr. Koussevitzky's Russian temperament to illumine it, the piece made no inconsiderable effect. Long and loud was the applause, and, as he had previously done at the end of the Strauss Waltz, the conductor made response by summoning the players to their feet.

goer, really a bit dull. True, Mr. Koussevitzky gave very interesting and—for a Boston audience—novel interpretations of such things as Rossini's "William Tell" Overture, Sibelius' "Valse Triste", and the Weber-Berlioz "Invitation to the Dance."

The Sibelius waltz was particularly well played, and it was a revelation to those who have merely heard this piece played in perfunctory fashion at the "Pop" concerts. In Johan Strauss' Waltz, "Voices of Spring," the Russian leader, though offering novel effects, seemed to miss the real spirit of the German waltz-king.

Tchaikovsky, with the "Nutcracker" Suite and the "1812" Overture, filled the second half of the program. The first was delightfully played. In the overture, although the performance was probably the greatest ever, on the side of sound and fury, there was naturally nothing novel in a piece that has been worked to death by countless conductors.

Another recent Sibelius work, his Seventh Symphony, Op. 105, will be introduced here by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in their Brooklyn concert of Friday, January 6, and the following afternoon at Carnegie Hall. On Thursday night, January 5, in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky's program will include Haydn's E flat Symphony (B. & H. No. 3), a Mozart rondo for harpsichord and orchestra, with Wanda Landowska as soloist; de Falla's concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and cello, with Mme. Landowska taking part, and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

The afternoon program of the 7th begins with a concerto by C. P. E. Bach in D major, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, the suite from Stravinsky's "L'Oiseau de Feu," the Sibelius symphony and Ravel's "La Valse." At the Brooklyn Academy on Friday night, the 6th, the Emanuel Bach concerto and the Sibelius symphony will precede four Wagner numbers—the "Lohengrin" prelude, Funeral Music from "Götterdämmerung," Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried" and the "Meistersinger" prelude.

N.Y. TRIBUNE

Sibelius's Seventh Symphony is in one movement, without key designation; it opens in A minor and closes in the relative major key of C, and is scored for a relatively modest orchestra: woodwind in pairs (without English horn), four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, tympani and strings. It was published in 1925 and, according to Mr. Parker's colleague, A. H. M., in "The Boston Evening Transcript," was first performed in Copenhagen in the spring of that year. Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra gave the first American performance of the work in Philadelphia on April 3 of this year; the Boston Symphony played it in Boston on December 10 and 11. Mr. Stokowski also introduced Sibelius's Sixth Symphony to America on April 24; this has not yet been heard in New York.

DEC 26

1927

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
TOLEDO, OHIO

JAN 1 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN CONCERT.
The Boston symphony orchestra will be on the air tonight with a concert, through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby, from station WBZ, Springfield. The concert will begin at 8:10, eastern time. At 11:30, messages of the Canadian mounted police will be broadcast.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CALL
WOONSOCKET, R. I.

JAN 1 1927

The Boston Symphony Orchestra program, which will be heard from WBZ at 8:10 this evening will include the "Siegfried Funeral Music" from "Die Gotterdamerung," romdo from Mozart's concerto in D major for piano, played on the harpsichord by Wanda Landowská, concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, vuilin, and violoncello by Manuel de Falla, and rite of Spring by Stravinsky.

SYMPHONY IN BENEFIT CONCERT

AMER DEC 27

BY MOSES SMITH

An old-fashioned popular program was the musical fare at the first Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Despite the severe weather there were few empty seats when Serge Koussevitzky appeared to conduct the first number—a remarkable tribute to the popularity of the leader and his Orchestra.

It is many years since a similar collection of pieces was played at a Pension Fund affair. Recently such heavy matter as Brahms' "Requiem" and the Beethoven Ninth Symphony has served to attract capacity audiences. But yesterday's program offered the first opportunity for Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston to conduct in lighter symphonic works.

Though the experiment looked interesting in advance, the concert was for the hardened symphony-

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD
ILL.

ISSUE OF

JAN 1 1927

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be on the air tonight with a concert, through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby, from Station WBZ, Springfield. The concert will begin at 7:10, Central time. At 11:30, messages of the Canadian Mounted Police will be broadcast.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
AKRON, O.

JAN 1 1927

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be on the air tonight with a concert, through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby, from station WBZ, Springfield. The concert will begin at 8:10. At 11:30, messages of the Canadian mounted police will be broadcast.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORKER

JAN 1 1927

ORCHESTRAS

PHILHARMONIC — Mengelberg conducting. CARNEGIE HALL, Fri. Aft., Dec. 31; Sat. Eve., Jan. 1.

NEW YORK SYMPHONY—Damrosch conducting. CARNEGIE HALL, Fri. Eve., Dec. 31; Sat. Aft., Jan. 1 (Young People's Concert). MECCA TEMPLE, Sun. Aft., Jan. 2. Klemperer conducting. CARNEGIE HALL, Fri. Eve., Jan. 7.

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA — Stokowski conducting. CARNEGIE HALL, Tues. Eve., Jan. 4.

BOSTON SYMPHONY—Koussevitzky conducting. CARNEGIE HALL, Thurs. Eve., Jan. 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

JAN 2 1927

On Friday evening at the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussewitzky, will give its second Brooklyn concert this season. The following program will be played:

Bach-Steinberg .....Concerto in D
Siebelius .....Seventh Symphony
Wagner.
Excerpts from "Lohengrin," "Goetterdaemmerung," "Siegfried" and "Die Meistersinger.

The Sibelius Symphony will on this occasion have its first performance in New York. Mr. Koussewitsky introduced it to Boston some weeks ago. It was first played in America by the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Stokowski, in Philadelphia.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

JAN 4 1927

An Opportunity in Music.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I am sure that across the intervening years the elder generation of American music lovers have not forgotten the distinguished pianist Fraulein Adele aus der Ohe, whose work as a young woman in recital and in concert was long a charming feature of our American Winters. Particularly memorable was her triumph at the dedication of Carnegie Hall, when she played—I think with the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the concerto of Tchaikovsky, winning the tumultuous applause of a picked audience. She was, and I presume still is, Court Pianist at Weimar, though she is living in Berlin—15 Pariserstrasse—having with difficulty survived the trying vicissitudes of the war. She is, however, no longer equal to the demands of a concert tour, but is chiefly occupied with giving lessons. She is very desirous to have more American pupils at her home, and this note is written in the hope of furthering that desire. Perhaps no one now living so truly represents the Liszt tradition in the piano, for she was indeed the favorite pupil of that master. I cannot think of any better fortune that could befall an advanced student of music than association with so distinguished an artist. I should willingly do anything possible to promote a relationship of such manifest advantage both to teacher and to pupil.

ROBERT UNDERWOOD JOHNSON.
New York, Dec. 30, 1926.

THIS CLIPPING FROM GLOBE DEMOCRAT
ST. LOUIS, MO.

JAN 2 -192

SYLVAIN NOACK, who came to St. Louis as concert master of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra the first of this season, makes his debut as a concert soloist with that orchestra at the Odeon Friday afternoon and Saturday night of this week. He will play the Bruch Concerto for violin, No. 2, in D minor, a work originally composed for Pablo de Sarasate, to whom it is dedicated.

Max Bruch was a master of musical form, and while perhaps his greatest work is the fruit of his years as conductor of and composer for singing societies in Berlin and elsewhere, he was peculiarly happy in his works for violin. The four principal ones are three concertos and his "Scotch Fantasie," which were written, two each, for Sarasate and Joachim. And while the works are grateful in their melodic content, they have such brilliance and make such technical demands upon the artist that they are in the repertoire of almost every great virtuoso of the violin. The second in D minor—which is the first of two written in that tonality—is peculiarly melodic and attractive.

Noack's obvious success in his post as concert master has aroused a genuine anticipation and interest in his appearance this week as soloist. He came to St. Louis from Los Angeles, where he was concert master of the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra, and in turn went to Los Angeles from Boston, where he was assistant concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck and under Henri Rabaud. In that city he was founder of the Boston Quartet.

Made a Fine Start.

A native of Holland, Noack's pride is in his American citizenship. From childhood he devoted himself to music, at first intending to become a pianist, and as a pianist he made his professional debut at 15, playing the Mozart D Minor Concerto. Since the Conservatory demanded that each student study also a secondary instrument, he took up the violin, with the result that it won him from his first love, and at 17 he became a first violin in the famous Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam, at the same time entering the Conservatory there as a pupil of Andre Spoor. From that institution he graduated with the Prix d'Honneur, its highest distinction.

He became associated with the Amsterdam Conservatory as a teacher and was for four years assistant to Carl Flesch, becoming a member of the famous conservatory quartet and second violin to Flesch's first in that organization. In 1906 he became concert-master of the Aix le Chappelle Orchestra and two years later tucked his fiddle under his arm—figuratively speaking—and set forth for Boston.

That fiddle, by the way, which he will play in the concert this week, is a Giovanni Battista Guadagnini, made in Turin in 1779, and one of the finest works of that great master.

Respighi's Novelty.

This concert program will serve to introduce to St. Louis the symphonic poem "Pines of Rome," by Respighi, whose "Fountains of Rome" has twice delighted symphony audiences in recent years. It also serves to introduce into the orchestra a new instrument—a phonograph, for in the course of his work Respighi has occasion for the song of a nightingale and a carefully recorded song from that bird is played by the phonograph as a part of the music. "The Pines of Rome" is a series of mental pictures which by association of incidents connected with Italian history evokes images of Latin greatness and might even, by no great imaginative flight, be conceived to be a vision of a Mussolinist future for that nation.

The concert opens with Smetana's comic overture—the overture to "The Bartered Bride" with its charming interweaving of delightful folk-melody and naive gusto and fun. It will also present the Dohnanyi Suite for Orchestra Op. 19, a work which, while modern in its implications, is marked by sound classical musicianship in its development.

Detailed Program.

In detail the offerings are:

Overture to The Merry Wives of Windsor .....Nicolai
Second Movement Largo, from Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, Opus 95. From the New World .....Dvorak
Capriccio Brilliante for Pianoforte, Opus 22 .....Mendelssohn
Suite No. 1, Peer Gynt, Opus 46....Grieg
Intermezzo from William Ratcliffe—Mascagni
Rhapsody on a Persian Air.....Mason
Emperor Waltzes.....Strauss

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

JAN 2 1927

70

Landowska Outli Concerto for P

The concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and cello by Manuel De Falla, which will be played for the first time in America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday night at Carnegie Hall, was dedicated to Mme. Wanda Landowska, soloist at the recital.

Mme. Landowska explains that its inception in the composer's mind took from four years ago when she visited De Falla in Grenada, who became interested in adapting the possibilities of the delightful instrument, the harpsichord, to modern forms.

"It must be said," an annotator notes, "that the composer did not intend to write a concerto for a soloist with an instrumental ensemble as accompaniment; on the contrary, though the part of the harpsichord is throughout the work preponderant, the other instruments not only do not reduce their action to a simple 'ripieno' but are as important in the total contexture as the principal instrument.

"Nor was it the intention of the author to follow rigorously the structure of the classical concerto. We have here a work of free conception, in which, however, it is easy to discover certain traditional values of character and form; and in its realization the laws of tonality, inasmuch as they are unchangeable, have been obeyed.

ines De Falla's remiere Thursday

"The music of this concerto as to its rhythmic, tonal and melodic character, and as to its form, finds its origin in the various sources of Spanish music: religious, noble and popular. And the musical structure employed by the composer often proceeds from desuete and even very ancient forms, used nevertheless in accordance with the manner and possibilities of our own mode of expression. May this short and imperfect summary serve as an attempt to expose the interesting tendencies of this celebrated composer."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
MADISON, WIS.

JAN 2 1927

Renaissance o "Corn Provi by Prager

This article, taken from The Boston Transcript, was written by Nelson M. Jansky, formerly music editor of this paper. Mr. Jansky is at present on the staff of the Boston paper as a special writer and assistant to the music editor.

By N. M. J

NEW YORK heard the first and only performance of the New Symphony orchestra last year No sooner had the winter season come to a close than Dr. Sigfrid Prager, conductor of the organization, gave up his post and struck out for the hinterland of America. He had caught the rumor of a rebirth of music in the corn provinces and in the region of the Great Lakes. Musicians and music-lovers long had been toying with a new phrase: "America is about to witness a great renaissance of music in the Middle West." In its mysterious way, the whisper has caught the ear of adventurers everywhere. Sometimes the phrase runs one way, sometimes another. But always it beckons the pioneer. It promises a new era of music to come. Even earlier adventurers sometimes spoke vaguely of the new order. Theodore Thomas dreamed it; Walt Whitman predicted it; musicians and music-lovers of the Middle West claim it is upon them.

Symphony No. 5, in C minor ... Beethoven

PENSION FUND LIST POPULAR

Post DEC 27

Shopworn Pieces Are Made Brilliant Under Koussevitzky

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Playing yesterday in aid of its pension fund, the Boston Symphony Orchestra quite unprecedentedly offered a frankly "popular" programme, drawn from the music of Rossini, Weber (by way of Berlioz), Sibelius, Johann Strauss and Tchaikovsky. And despite the weather and a date highly unpropitious for concert-giving, the hall was very nearly filled by an audience that expressed its pleasure in no uncertain terms.

A TREAT ANYWAY

Whether that old standby of Pension Fund Concerts, the all-Wagner programme, would have drawn to Symphony Hall more people than were brought here by Mr. Koussevitsky's lighter list of yesterday can not be known, but surely his wisdom in presenting this popular programme may go unchallenged.

Moreover, to hear from such an orchestra and from such a conductor and in such vital performance the Overture to "William Tell," "The Invitation to the Dance," the "Valse Triste," the waltz "Voices of Spring," the "Nutcracker" Suite and the "1812" Overture must have proved a rare treat to all, whatever the general trend and level of each individual's musical taste.

If recollection does not err the "William Tell" Overture was last played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—outside the "Pops"—in the concert directed by Mr. Gericke for the benefit of the sufferers in the San Francisco earthquake and fire, although Mr. Monteux successfully ventured two of Rossini's other overtures at subscription concerts. Granted that its "storm music" is hollow and theatrical, that its finale borders on vulgarity, the "Tell" Overture remains an uncommonly brilliant and effective orchestral piece, and jaded indeed must have been the listener who did not receive an electric thrill or two from yesterday's performance of it.

In "The Invitation to the Dance," Mr. Koussevitzky was, perhaps, a trifle heavy-handed, but he more than made up for it by his adroit fashioning of the "Valse Triste," his verve in the "Voices of Spring" (not too often before has Symphony Hall heard in a Strauss Waltz the true Viennese swing), and his exceeding deftness with the ingeniously orchestrated and ever-delightful "Nutcracker" Suite.

"1812" the Grand Climax

Of course, such a programme must have its "grand climax," and this proper culmination came yesterday in the "1812," in which a sizable brass ensemble from the New England Conservatory, trained by Louis Kloepfel of the orchestra's trumpet section, helped swell the final tumult. Like the "William Tell," this Overture, in which Tchaikovsky celebrated Napoleon's retreat from Moscow, has been called obvious and dismissed as "old hat," yet yesterday, with the fire of Mr. Koussevitzky's Russian temperament to illumine it, the piece made no inconsiderable effect. Long and loud was the applause, and, as he had previously done at the end of the Strauss Waltz, the conductor made response by summoning the players to their feet.

goer, really a bit dull. True, Mr. Koussevitzky gave very interesting and—for a Boston audience—novel interpretations of such things as Rossini's "William Tell" Overture, Sibelius' "Valse Triste", and the Weber-Berlioz "Invitation to the Dance."

The Sibelius waltz was particularly well played, and it was a revelation to those who have merely heard this piece played in perfunctory fashion at the "Pop" concerts. In Johan Strauss' Waltz, "Voices of Spring," the Russian leader, though offering novel effects, seemed to miss the real spirit of the German waltz-king.

Tchaikovsky, with the "Nutcracker" Suite and the "1812" Overture, filled the second half of the program. The first was delightfully played. In the overture, although the performance was probably the greatest ever, on the side of sound and fury, there was naturally nothing novel in a piece that has been worked to death by countless conductors.

Another recent Sibelius work, his Seventh Symphony, Op. 105, will be introduced here by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in their Brooklyn concert of Friday, January 6, and the following afternoon at Carnegie Hall. On Thursday night, January 5, in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky's program will include Haydn's E flat Symphony (B. & H. No. 3), a Mozart rondo for harpsichord and orchestra, with Wanda Landowska as soloist; de Falla's concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and cello, with Mme. Landowska taking part, and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

The afternoon program of the 7th begins with a concerto by C. P. E. Bach in D major, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, the suite from Stravinsky's "L'Oiseau de Feu," the Sibelius symphony and Ravel's "La Valse." At the Brooklyn Academy on Friday night, the 6th, the Emanuel Bach concerto and the Sibelius symphony will precede four Wagner numbers—the "Lohengrin" prelude, Funeral Music from "Götterdämmerung," Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried" and the "Meistersinger" prelude.

N.Y. TRIBUNE

Sibelius's Seventh Symphony is in one movement, without key designation; it opens in A minor and closes in the relative major key of C, and is scored for a relatively modest orchestra: woodwind in pairs (without English horn), four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, tympani and strings. It was published in 1925 and, according to Mr. Parker's colleague, A. H. M., in "The Boston Evening Transcript," was first performed in Copenhagen in the spring of that year. Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra gave the first American performance of the work in Philadelphia on April 3 of this year; the Boston Symphony played it in Boston on December 10 and 11. Mr. Stokowski also introduced Sibelius's Sixth Symphony to America on April 24; this has not yet been heard in New York.

DEC 26

1927

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
TOLEDO, OHIO

JAN 1 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN CONCERT.

The Boston symphony orchestra will be on the air tonight with a concert, through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby, from station WBZ, Springfield. The concert will begin at 8:10, eastern time. At 11:30, messages of the Canadian mounted police will be broadcast.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CALL
WOONSOCKET, R. I.

JAN 1 1927

The Boston Symphony Orchestra program, which will be heard from WBZ at 8:10 this evening will include the "Siegfried Funeral Music" from "Die Gotterdamerung," romdo from Mozart's concerto in D major for piano, played on the harpsichord by Wanda Landowská, concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, vuilin, and violoncello by Manuel de Falla, and rite of Spring by Stravinsky.

SYMPHONY IN BENEFIT CONCERT

AM ER DEC 27

BY MOSES SMITH

An old-fashioned popular program was the musical fare at the first Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Despite the severe weather there were few empty seats when Serge Koussevitzky appeared to conduct the first number—a remarkable tribute to the popularity of the leader and his Orchestra.

It is many years since a similar collection of pieces was played at a Pension Fund affair. Recently such heavy matter as Brahms' "Requiem" and the Beethoven Ninth Symphony has served to attract capacity audiences. But yesterday's program offered the first opportunity for Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston to conduct in lighter symphonic works.

Though the experiment looked interesting in advance, the concert [illegible] for the hardened symphony-

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD
ILL.

ISSUE OF

JAN 1 1927

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be on the air tonight with a concert, through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby, from Station WBZ, Springfield. The concert will begin at 7:10, Central time. At 11:30, messages of the Canadian Mounted Police will be broadcast.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
AKRON, O.

JAN 1 1927

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be on the air tonight with a concert, through the courtesy of W. S. Quinby, from station WBZ, Springfield. The concert will begin at 8:10. At 11:30, messages of the Canadian mounted police will be broadcast.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORKER

JAN 1 1927

ORCHESTRAS

PHILHARMONIC — Mengelberg conducting. CARNEGIE HALL, Fri. Aft., Dec. 31; Sat. Eve., Jan. 1.

NEW YORK SYMPHONY—Damrosch conducting. CARNEGIE HALL, Fri. Eve., Dec. 31; Sat. Aft., Jan. 1 (Young People's Concert). MECCA TEMPLE, Sun. Aft., Jan. 2. Klemperer conducting. CARNEGIE HALL, Fri. Eve., Jan. 7.

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA — Stokowski conducting. CARNEGIE HALL, Tues. Eve., Jan. 4.

BOSTON SYMPHONY—Koussevitzky conducting. CARNEGIE HALL, Thurs. Eve., Jan. 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

JAN 2 1927

On Friday evening at the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussewitzky, will give its second Brooklyn concert this season. The following program will be played:

Bach-Steinberg .....Concerto in D
Siebelius .....Seventh Symphony
Wagner.
Excerpts from "Lohengrin," "Goetterdaemmerung," "Siegfried" and "Die Meistersinger.

The Sibelius Symphony will on this occasion have its first performance in New York. Mr. Koussewitsky introduced it to Boston some weeks ago. It was first played in America by the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Stokowski, in Philadelphia.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

JAN 2 1927

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting, gives two concerts in Carnegie Hall this week. At the first, on Thursday evening, Wanda Landowska will be soloist, making her first New York appearance this season. The following program will be played:

Haydn .....Symphony in E-flat major
Mozart .....Rondo for Harpsichord and Orchestra
De Falla .....Concerto for Harpsichord
Strawinsky.....“Sacre du Printemps”

Mr. Koussewitsky's second concert will be given on Saturday afternoon. No soloist will appear at this concert. The program is as follows:

Bach-Steinberg .....Concerto in D
Sibelius .....Seventh Symphony
Strawinsky .....“L'Oiseau de Fen”
Ravel .....“La Valse”

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM GLOBE DEMOCRAT
ST. LOUIS, MO.

JAN 2 -192

SYLVAIN NOACK, who came to St. Louis as concert master of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra the first of this season, makes his debut as a concert soloist with that orchestra at the Odeon Friday afternoon and Saturday night of this week. He will play the Bruch Concerto for violin, No. 2, in D minor, a work originally composed for Pablo de Sarasate, to whom it is dedicated.

Max Bruch was a master of musical form, and while perhaps his greatest work is the fruit of his years as conductor of and composer for singing societies in Berlin and elsewhere, he was peculiarly happy in his works for violin. The four principal ones are three concertos and his "Scotch Fantasie," which were written, two each, for Sarasate and Joachim. And while the works are grateful in their melodic content, they have such brilliance and make such technical demands upon the artist that they are in the repertoire of almost every great virtuoso of the violin. The second in D minor—which is the first of two written in that tonality—is peculiarly melodic and attractive.

Noack's obvious success in his post as concert master has aroused a genuine anticipation and interest in his appearance this week as soloist. He came to St. Louis from Los Angeles, where he was concert master of the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra, and in turn went to Los Angeles from Boston, where he was assistant concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck and under Henri Rabaud. In that city he was founder of the Boston Quartet.

Made a Fine Start.

A native of Holland, Noack's pride is in his American citizenship. From childhood he devoted himself to music, at first intending to become a pianist, and as a pianist he made his professional debut at 15, playing the Mozart D Minor Concerto. Since the Conservatory demanded that each student study also a secondary instrument, he took up the violin, with the result that it won him from his first love, and at 17 he became a first violin in the famous Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam, at the same time entering the Conservatory there as a pupil of Andre Spoor. From that institution he graduated with the Prix d'Honneur, its highest distinction.

He became associated with the Amsterdam Conservatory as a teacher and was for four years assistant to Carl Flesch, becoming a member of the famous conservatory quartet and second violin to Flesch's first in that organization. In 1906 he became concert-master of the Aix le Chappelle Orchestra and two years later tucked his fiddle under his arm—figuratively speaking—and set forth for Boston.

That fiddle, by the way, which he will play in the concert this week, is a Giovanni Battista Guadagnini, made in Turin in 1779, and one of the finest works of that great master.

Respighi's Novelty.

This concert program will serve to introduce to St. Louis the symphonic poem "Pines of Rome," by Respighi, whose "Fountains of Rome" has twice delighted symphony audiences in recent years. It also serves to introduce into the orchestra a new instrument—a phonograph, for in the course of his work Respighi has occasion for the song of a nightingale and a carefully recorded song from that bird is played by the phonograph as a part of the music. "The Pines of Rome" is a series of mental pictures which by association of incidents connected with Italian history evokes images of Latin greatness and might even, by no great imaginative flight, be conceived to be a vision of a Mussolinist future for that nation.

The concert opens with Smetana's comic overture—the overture to "The Bartered Bride" with its charming interweaving of delightful folk-melody and naive gusto and fun. It will also present the Dohnanyi Suite for Orchestra Op. 19, a work which, while modern in its implications, is marked by sound classical musicianship in its development.

Detailed Program.

In detail the offerings are:

Overture to The Merry Wives of Windsor .....Nicolai
Second Movement Largo, from Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, Opus 95, From the New World .....Dvorak
Capriccio Brilliante for Pianoforte, Opus 22 .....Mendelssohn
Suite No. 1, Peer Gynt, Opus 46....Grieg
Intermezzo from William Ratcliffe—Mascagni
Rhapsody on a Persian Air.....Mason
Emperor Waltzes.....Strauss

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

JAN 2 1927

20

Landowska Outli Concerto for P

The concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and cello by Manuel De Falla, which will be played for the first time in America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday night at Carnegie Hall, was dedicated to Mme. Wanda Landowska, soloist at the recital.

Mme. Landowska explains that its inception in the composer's mind took from four years ago when she visited De Falla in Grenada, who became interested in adapting the possibilities of the delightful instrument, the harpsichord, to modern forms.

"It must be said," an annotator notes, "that the composer did not intend to write a concerto for a soloist with an instrumental ensemble as accompaniment; on the contrary, though the part of the harpsichord is throughout the work preponderant, the other instruments not only do not reduce their action to a simple 'ripieno' but are as important in the total contexture as the principal instrument.

"Nor was it the intention of the author to follow rigorously the structure of the classical concerto. We have here a work of free conception, in which, however, it is easy to discover certain traditional values of character and form; and in its realization the laws of tonality, inasmuch as they are unchangeable, have been obeyed.

"The music of this concerto as to its rhythmic, tonal and melodic character, and as to its form, finds its origin in the various sources of Spanish music: religious, noble and popular. And the musical structure employed by the composer often proceeds from desuete and even very ancient forms, used nevertheless in accordance with the manner and possibilities of our own mode of expression. May this short and imperfect summary serve as an attempt to expose the interesting tendencies of this celebrated composer."

ines De Falla's remiere Thursday

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
MADISON, WIS.

JAN 2 1927

Renaissance o "Corn Provi by Prager

This article, taken from The Boston Transcript, was written by Nelson M. Jansky, formerly music editor of this paper. Mr. Jansky is at present on the staff of the Boston paper as a special writer and assistant to the music editor.

By N. M. J

NEW YORK heard the first and only performance of the New Symphony orchestra last year No sooner had the winter season come to a close than Dr. Sigfrid Prager, conductor of the organization, gave up his post and struck out for the hinterland of America. He had caught the rumor of a rebirth of music in the corn provinces and in the region of the Great Lakes. Musicians and music-lovers long had been toying with a new phrase: "America is about to witness a great renaissance of music in the Middle West." In its mysterious way, the whisper has caught the ear of adventurers everywhere. Sometimes the phrase runs one way, sometimes another. But always it beckons the pioneer. It promises a new era of music to come. Even earlier adventurers sometimes spoke vaguely of the new order. Theodore Thomas dreamed it; Walt Whitman predicted it; musicians and music-lovers of the Middle West claim it is upon them.

[illegible] Theatre, with Guthrie McClintic direction. "The Sea-Woman's Cloak," by Amelie Rives, was acted at the Amerson Lehorietory Theatre last night for the first time this season. It will be repeated tonight.
"Princess Turandot" was withdrawn from the Greenwich Village Theatre on Saturday night. Evelyn Herbert, now rehearsing in "My Maryland," has resumed her old role in "Princess Flavia," for a few performances in Boston, owing to the illness of Muriel Hanna[illegible]. "The Strange Prince," ended its New York engagement at the Fifty-second Street
Theatre Saturday night. "The Black Cockatoo," will close Comedy this Saturday.

Walt Whitman's Phrase

Perhaps the New York conductor was aware of the Whitman prediction. At any rate, it was but recently that Mrs. Aubertine Woodward Moore wrote a series of articles for the Musical Leader. They recalled the phrase of America's poet which has become a by-word in the musical circles of the provinces. Mrs. Moore is a former Boston resident, a pioneer in the field of illustrated talks on music, and often mentioned as having presented the first "lecture-recital" in America. She gave her first talk with musical illustrations at Concord in 1880, and for her early efforts in behalf of music is well known by the older generation of Boston concert-goers. Mrs. Moore recently celebrated her eighty-fifth birthday in Madison, Wis., by repeating once more what Walt Whitman said almost a half-century ago. As she remembers them, these are his words: "There will one day come from the heart of America the noblest music the world has yet known, and it will arise in the great Middle West."

Strangely, the occasion was a dinner in her honor attended by members of a civic music association and by the former New York musician who had given up his position as leader of the New Symphony orchestra. He had accepted the conductorship of a new symphony orchestra of the Middle West. As it

Music association named him conductor of the orchestra it fostered, and gave him free rein. Professor E. B. Gordon of the University of Wisconsin School of Music, and recent head of the Music Supervisors' National conference, is president of the Madison society which is dedicated to the task of eradicating the reasons for the more or less opprobious terms which the East has made popular in its references to the Central states. The "hinterland," the "backwoods," the "sticks," favorite words of the theatrical world, bid fair to pass from the language if their campaign is successful.

That eighty-five musicians for such an orchestra could be found in the college town and its environs was bu the fruit of the early labors of such pioneers as Theodore Thomas. Education in music has gained an ever-strengthening foothold in the North Central states. City after city has begun to offer free instruction in all instruments and in the several branches of theory, as well, to students in public schools and high schools. Gradually the Middle West is becoming musically self-sufficient and self-conscious. The day o traveling orchestras is past. N longer is it necessary for communi ties to depend upon occasional an often financially disastrous visits o Mr. Frederick Stock and the Chicago orchestra, of Mr. Henri Verbrugghen and the Minneapolis orchestra, and of Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch and th Detroit players. As Boston recentl demonstrated upon accasion of th visit of Mr. Mengelberg and the Ne York musicians, concertgoers are b ginning to prefer and depend upo the home product.

f Music in nces" Proven and Orchestra

exemplifying the movement in music which has swept the central sections of the country in recent years, Madison citizens had made him conductor of the first symphony orchestra of a civic nature to be organized in the city which is the captital of Wisconsi nand the seat of the state university.

The new orchestra, with Dr. Prager conducting, gave its first performance Tuesday, Dec. 14. Esther Dale, soprano, who was heard one time with the Boston symphony, appeared as soloist, and Mr. Gilbert Ross, who announces a recital in this city during the season, occupied the concertmaster's chair. Beethoven's Second symphony was the principal number of the program.

Prager Holds Unique Position ..

Dr. Sigfrid Prager, though a citizen of Argentine and conductor of opera at the Theatro Liceo, Barcelona, Spain, in 1919, at the Royal Opera house, Berlin, in 1910-1913 and 1917-1918, and at Buenos Aires in 1920-25, nevertheless, holds a unique position in American music. However established, however numerous, however efficient orchestras in the United States may be,, he is the first to make a principle of performing music by American composers. Adopting this new departure in musical tradition while conductor of the New Symphony orchestra, New York city, he will continue the practice in Madison. He announces that he will present a composition by a representative American composer on every orchestra program which he conducts, and that previous to the concert he will give a "lecture-recital" dealing with the nature of the program to come. This feature of the plans for the new orchestra grew out of the series of "lecture-recitals" which he gave in Madison during the past two summers in colaboration with George Walker, American basso of the Berlin State opera. Assisiting him in these lectures during the past two summers were Francs Silva, soprano, and Viola Ellis, contralto, as rpresentative of a few of those who helped make the Middle Western city a considerable colony of concert artists during the season.

Thtt the East is "fed up" on concerts and music and musicians is the explanation Dr. Prager gives for his flight from New York. "It is not artistry and musicianship, merely, which is of prime importance in the crowded cities of the East, but commercial expediency, and routine," he says. "This is not the fault of music and musicians, but the natural result of the present economic condition. Competition is the determining factor in metropolitan music—competition not in singing and in playing, but in electric sign-boards and in cover advertising in music magazines. In the Middle West, however, a new renaissance in music will occur, I believe, under the proper conditions. This growth will take place, not so much through the building of new theaters and new concert halls, but through giving American composers and musicians an opportunity to be represented by organizations now producing music in America."

"Hear America First"

Thus, coming from Argentine in 1925, this apostle of the Middle West has adopted the word and the deed of promoters of America in other lines of endeavor. "Hear America First," he believes, is the appropri- variant of the better known in railroad advertising.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 3 1927

Boston Symphony

The present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is its forty-sixth and the third under its Russian leader, Serge Koussevitzky. M. Koussevitzky led his seventh successive series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris last summer with extraordinary success and remains the dominating figure in symphony concerts of western Europe.

The program to be given in Hartford February 6 includes Beethoven's Eroica Symphony in E flat major, the Prokokief Suite from the opera "The Love of Three Oranges," Debussy's Nocturn "Fetes," Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," Sibelius's "Finlandia Symphon Poem Op. 26, No. 7."

Many of Hartford music lovers hav

been fortunate enough to hear th weekly broadcasts of the Boston Sym phony Orchestra. Nevertheless, th most ideal way to obtain full appre ciation of the concerts is to see th musicians and the excellent directin of Mr. Koussevitzky. The seat sale now in progress at McCoy's, No. 89 Asy lum street, or reservations may b made by calling 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIMES STAR
CINCINNATI, OHIO
JAN 3 1927

"Music Makes Great Strides in America"

Opinion of Former Cincinnatian "Back Home" on Visit.

PROF. A. J. GANTVOORT, former manager of the Cincinnati College of Music, now lecturer in music in the University of California, Southern Branch, at Los Angeles, was at the Hotel Havlin Monday on a New Year's visit to his old "home town," He was guest at a luncheon given by three of his friends, Prof. John Uri Lloyd, A. J. Conroy and Attorney Frank H. Shaffer.

Prof. Gantvoort just came from New York, where he played Santa Claus for the children, including twins, of his son, Herman, who is the producer of "Hell's Bells" and other successful Broadway plays. The professor addressed the National Music Teachers' Association convention at Rochester, N. Y.

"Music has received a tremendous impetus in America the past few years," he said. "There is a vast and growing love for music around Los Angeles—and the number of persons aged over 40 who are studying music and other subjects in the University is amazing.

"If good music is provided on the radio it will prove a wonderful musical educator. The other night in New York I heard a radio hour by the Boston Symphony orchestra, an hour by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and an hour by the Metropolitan Opera Quartet. Three such great organizations in three hours. I even reached out into the air to see what Cincinnati was doing that night—but it happened to be 'silent night' here.

"But I had the pleasure of hearing at the Los Angeles Bowl a number of concerts given under the able leadership of Fritz Reiner, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. We also heard Sir Henry Wood of England and a group of the world's noted conductors at the Bowl concerts, and Mr. Reiner, by his virile and forceful leadership, upheld the reputation of Cincinnati very well, indeed."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 4 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Phillip Hale's review of the Boston Symphony orchestra's first concert this season, said, in speaking of the great Russian leader's conducting of the Eroica symphony:

"He delighted in the sudden and great contrasts, in unexpected orchestral crashes. Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation was not 'sensational;' it was remarkable for its varied eloquence, for its majesty, for its pathos, for its fervor in the final variations. Beethoven was romantic, furiously romantic. He did not shout and toss his hat in the air. Does any sane person think for a moment that the first movement of this symphony should be performed in an undeviating, inexorable tempo? Should a pathetic passage, a song of tenderness, a plaintive cry, be played in the tempo of the preceding measures? Perish the thought: Was the funeral march dramatic? Death is dramatic: burial is dramatic: a nation's grief is dramatic. For once this march did not seem to consume as much time as the passage of Napoleon's body from St. Helena to the Hotel des Invalides. The orchestral performance was of the highest quality."

The tickets for the Hartford concert, February 6, to be given at the Capitol theater, under Frank A. Sedgwick's management, are now on sale at McCoy's, or reservations can be made by calling 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 4 1927

Famous Leader Of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Coming

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The Boston Symphony orchestra conducted by its famous leader, Serge Koussevitzky, will make its annual appearance Sunday afternoon at the Auditorium, as one of the Young Men's Christian association concerts. This is the great feature of the season and the demand for seats always exceeds the supply. The concert will begin at 3 p. m., and 15 minutes before the hour the front doors will be opened and the seats then remaining put at the disposal, while there is room, of the holders of the free tickets which may be had at the Young Men's Christian association and at the music stores.

At 2 the terrace door will be opened for holders of the season subscribers' tickets at $3 each, and also for the holders of patrons' cards which may be had upon payment of $5 which entitles the subscriber to five cards. Names of patrons received before Friday will be printed in the program. Groups of persons contributing $1 each may be formed for such a subscription.

The program will be one of the best that the orchestra has given, leaning to the classical side, yet giving a taste of modern music in the suite from Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." The symphony is appropriately by Beethoven ,the centenary of whose death is observed this year, and it is the favorite among all his symphonies, the one in C minor, No. 5. The Berlioz and Wagner numbers are also old favorites, but Mr Koussevitzky is likely to give them all a new thrill. The program:—

Overture, "La Carnaval Romaine"..Berlioz
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
"Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried,".....Wagner
Suite from "The Love for Three Oranges".....Prokofieff
Symphony No. 5, in C minor.....Beethoven

THIS CLIPPING FROM STAR-EAGLE
NEWARK, N. J.
JAN 4 1927

Sittig Trio at WOR Tonight

Lovers of perfect harmony and brilliance in musical selection should welcome the return engagement at WOR tonight at 10 of the Sittig trio. The approval showered upon the trio by radio listeners following their previous concerts was well earned for one recognized in them a fine spirit, high aspiration and disciplined ranks.

The pride of the group is Miss Margaret Sittig, a young violiniste, whose art in the last few seasons has commanded sufficient prominent attention to include her among the most promising violinists. Her brother, Edgar, has won for himself an excellent reputation as a musician and virtuoso. Frederick Sittig, the father, predominates the ensemble; modest and reliable in his work at the piano, yet coming into prominence at the right times.

Levitow at Local Station

WOR is pleased to announce that Bernard Levitow's Hotel Commodore Dance Orchestra will again broadcast through the local station at 11 tonight, under the direction of "Si" Nathan. Mr. Levitow is musical director of hotels Commodore, Belmont and Ansonia. He formerly opened his professional career as violin soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and at that time was honored by reason of the fact that he was the youngest violinist ever to be so honored. His reputation as a radio artist is well known and his background has enabled him to produce good music with a style and creative interpretation which has marked him unusual.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 4 1927

FAMOUS LEADER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, COMING

The Boston Symphony orchestra conducted by its famous leader, Serge Koussevitzky, will make its annual appearance Sunday afternoon at the Auditorium, as one of the Young Men's Christian association concerts. This is the great feature of the season and the demand for seats always exceeds the supply. The concert will begin at 3 p. m., and 15 minutes before the hour the front doors will be opened and the seats then remaining put at the disposal, while there is room, of the holders of the free tickets which may be had at the Young Men's Christian association and at the music stores.

At 2 the terrace door will be opened for holders of the season subscribers' tickets at $3 each, and also for the holders of patrons' cards which may be had upon payment of $5 which entitles the subscriber to five cards.

Names of patrons received before Friday will be printed in the program. Groups of persons contributing $1 each may be formed for such a subscription.

The program will be one of the best that the orchestra has given, leaning to the classical side, yet giving a taste of modern music in the suite from Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." The symphony is appropriately by Beethoven ,the centenary of whose death is observed this year, and it is the favorite among all his symphonies, the one in C minor, No. 5. The Berlioz and Wagner numbers are also old favorites, but Mr Koussevitzky is likely to give them all a new thrill. The program:—

Overture, "La Carnaval Romaine"..Berlioz
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
"Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried,".....Wagner
Suite from "The Love for Three Oranges".....Prokofieff
Symphony No. 5, in C minor.....Beethoven

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 5 - 1927

Boston Symphony Will Be Heard Here January 31

The announcement that the Delaware Musical Association will present the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concert for the first time in Wilmington at the Shubert Playhouse on the evening of January 31, means little to the casual reader but that a very fine attraction has been secured for the delight of Wilmington music lovers.

But to those familiar with the ...history the thought comes immediately that here is another triumph for a devoted group of people who shoulder the responsibility of a series of symphony concerts each season with the sole motive of giving local people opportunity to hear the best music the world has to offer.

An incident of each concert season is an inevitable deficit and were it not that persons have been found who, out of their own pockets, guarantee the payment of any shortage, the bookings which have been made in this and other seasons would have been impossible. The expense of presenting a first class symphony orchestra is tremendous, a fact liable to escape one at times, and even if the usual theatre were filled to the rafters, there would still be the necessity for outside help. This has never been found wanting here, a sucient number of persons loving art for art's sake to prevent any embarrassment.

The organization known as the Delaware Musical Association grew out of the Delaware Committee for the Philadelphia Orchestra, which, after 16 years of service, disbanded when the Philadelphia Orchestra decided to discontinue its annual series of concerts in Wilmington.

The Delaware Committee for the Philadelphia Orchestra came into existence shortly after the organization of the orchestra itself. At the solicitation of the Philadelphia managers a group of Wilmington Music lovers banded together for the purpose of presenting the orchestra in Wilmington which was long included in its itinerary. The first president was the late Mrs. Joseph Swift and among her early associates were the late Mrs. Lewis C. Vandegrift and Mrs. Ellwood C. Jackson. Mrs. William N. Bannard began her association with it in 1908, replacing Mrs. Jackson, who left the city about that time. She has continued her work uninterruptedly and is officially known as Business Manager.

When the Philadelphia Orchestra was no longer available for local appearance those who had done so much to stimulate interest in it felt that a season without music of a like character would be a great deprivation and so the Delaware Musical Association was formed for the purpose of engaging such music and putting it before the people in a way that would give the most pleasure and do the most good. Its present executive force includes Mrs. William S. Bergland, president; Mrs. Eugene duPont, first vice-president; Mrs. J. Thompson Brown, second vice-president; Mrs. Clarence Underwood, secretary; Miss Helen L. Kurtz treasurer; Mrs. William N. Bannard, business manager and the following executive committee, Mrs. Julian Adair, Mrs. John Bancroft, Mrs. William C. Blatz, Miss Ellen Cannon Buckalew, Mrs. Caleb E. Burchenal, Mrs. Charles E. Griffith, Mrs. Cristy Pryer, Mrs. John J. Raskob, Mrs. Edmond G. Robinson and Mrs. Carl Snellenburg.

The association has never made an announcement with more pride than that the Boston Symphony will appear under its auspices. Mrs. Bannard is now taking orders for seats and will do so until they are placed on sale at the box office a few days in advance of the concert. Many are taking advantage of this opportunity to secure good seats, feeling that it is well to have them in hand in plenty of time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 5 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT ATTRACTS

This City Hasn't Difficulties to Face to House Famous Organization Providence Had

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which plays here Sunday afternoon under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A., announced early last year that the symphony concerts at Providence would have to be discontinued because of the demolition of Infantry hall, which has housed the Boston Symphony for several years.

The prospect of an interruption of the series of Boston Symphony concerts, under Koussevitzky, in Providence caused much concern among the orchestra's patrons there. Plans were completed for a Masonic temple with a large auditorium, but this will not be in readiness for at least a year.

At the instigation of President W. H. P. Faunce of Brown university, Mrs Avis Bliven Charbonnel and a group of citizens, a campaign for $6000 was started on April 7. On April 10 the amount was oversubscribed. By this contribution the E. F. Albee theater, at which daily performances are given throughout the year, will be made available for five evenings in the present season.

Walt Whitman's Phrase

Perhaps the New York conductor was aware of the Whitman prediction. At any rate, it was but recently that Mrs. Aubertine Woodward Moore wrote a series of articles for the Musical Leader. They recalled the phrase of America's poet which has become a by-word in the musical circles of the provinces. Mrs. Moore is a former Boston resident, a pioneer in the field of illustrated talks on music, and often mentioned as having presented the first "lecture-recital" in America. She gave her first talk with musical illustrations at Concord in 1880, and for her early efforts in behalf of music is well known by the older generation of Boston concert-goers. Mrs. Moore recently celebrated her eighty-fifth birthday in Madison, Wis., by repeating once more what Walt Whitman said almost a half-century ago. As she remembers them, these are his words: "There will one day come from the heart of America the noblest music the world has yet known. and it will arise in the great Middle West."

Strangely, the occasion was a dinner in her honor attended by members of a civic music association and by the former New York musician who had given up his position as leader of the New Symphony orchestra. He had accepted the conductorship of a new symphony orchestra of the Middle West. As if

f Music in nces" Proven and Orchestra

exemplifying the movement in music which has swept the central sections of the country in recent years, Madison citizens had made him conductor of the first symphony orchestra of a civic nature to be organized in the city which is the captital of Wisconsi nand the seat of the state university.

The new orchestra, with Dr. Prager conducting, gave its first performance Tuesday, Dec. 14. Esther Dale, soprano, who was heard one time with the Boston symphony, appeared as soloist, and Mr. Gilbert Ross, who announces a recital in this city during the season, occupied the concertmaster's chair. Beethoven's Second symphony was the principal number of the program.

.. Prager Holds Unique Position ..

Dr. Sigfrid Prager, though a citizen of Argentine and conductor of opera at the Theatro Liceo, Barcelona, Spain, in 1919, at the Royal Opera house, Berlin, in 1910-1913 and 1917-1918, and at Buenos Aires in 1920-25, nevertheless, holds a unique position in American music. However established, however numerous, however efficient orchestras in the United States may be,, he is the first to make a principle of performing music by American composers. Adopting this new departure in musical tradition while conductor of the New Symphony orchestra, New York city, he will continue the practice in Madison. He announces that he will present a composition by a representative American composer on every orchestra program which he conducts, and that previous to the concert he will give a "lecture-recital" dealing with the nature of the program to come. This feature of the plans for the new orchestra grew out of the series of "lecture-recitals" which he gave in Madison during the past two summers in colaboration with George Walker, American basso of the Berlin State opera. Assisiting him in these lectures during the past two summers were Francs Silva, soprano, and Viola Ellis, contralto, as rpresentative of a few of those who helped make the Middle Western city a considerable colony of concert artists during the season.

Thtt the East is "fed up" on concerts and music and musicians is the explanation Dr. Prager gives for his flight from New York. "It is not artistry and musicianship, merely, which is of prime importance in the crowded cities of the East, but commercial expediency, and routine," he says. "This is not the fault of music and musicians, but the natural result of the present economic condition. Competition is the determining factor in metropolitan music—competition not in singing and in playing, but in electric sign-boards and in cover advertising in music magazines. In the Middle West, however, a new renaissance in music will occur, I believe, under the proper conditions. This growth will take place, not so much through the building of new theaters and new concert halls, but through giving American composers and musicians an opportunity to be represented by organizations now producing music in America."

"Hear America First"

Thus, coming from Argentine in 1925, this apostle of the Middle West has adopted the word and the deed of promoters of America in other lines of endeavor. "Hear America First," he believes, is the appropriate variant of the better known phrase found in railroad advertising.

Lining his project, the ... Music association named him conductor of the orchestra it fostered, and gave him free rein. Professor E. B. Gordon of the University of Wisconsin School of Music, and recent head of the Music Supervisors' National conference, is president of the Madison society which is dedicated to the task of eradicating the reasons for the more or less opprobious terms which the East has made popular in its references to the Central states. The "hinterland," the "backwoods," the "sticks," favorite words of the theatrical world, bid fair to pass from the language if their campaign is successful.

That eighty-five musicians for such an orchestra could be found in the college town and its environs was bu the fruit of the early labors of such pioneers as Theodore Thomas. Education in music has gained an ever-strengthening foothold in the North Central states. City after city has begun to offer free instruction in all instruments and in the several branches of theory, as well, to students in public schools and high schools. Gradually the Middle West is becoming musically self-sufficient and self-conscious. The day o traveling orchestras is past. N longer is it necessary for communi ties to depend upon occasional an often financially disastrous visits o Mr. Frederick Stock and the Chicago orchestra, of Mr. Henri Verbrugghen and the Minneapolis orchestra, and of Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch and th Detroit players. As Boston recentl demonstrated upon accasion of th visit of Mr. Mengelberg and the Ne York musicians, concertgoers are b ginning to prefer and depend upo the home product.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 3 1927

Boston Symphony

The present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is its forty-sixth and the third under its Russian leader, Serge Koussevitzky. M. Koussevitzky led his seventh successive series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris last summer with extraordinary success and remains the dominating figure in symphony concerts of western Europe.

The program to be given in Hartford February 6 includes Beethoven's Eroica Symphony in E flat major, the Prokofief Suite from the opera "The Love of Three Oranges," Debussy's Nocturn "Fetes," Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," Sibelius's "Finlandia Symphoni Poem Op. 26, No. 7."

Many of Hartford music lovers hav

been fortunate enough to hear th weekly broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Nevertheless, th most ideal way to obtain full appre ciation of the concerts is to see th musicians and the excellent directin of Mr. Koussevitzky. The seat sale now in progress at McCoy's, No. 89 Asy lum street, or reservations may b made by calling 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIMES STAR
CINCINNATI, OHIO
JAN 3 1927

"Music Makes Great Strides in America"

Opinion of Former Cincinnatian "Back Home" on Visit.

PROF. A. J. GANTVOORT, former manager of the Cincinnati College of Music, now lecturer in music in the University of California, Southern Branch, at Los Angeles, was at the Hotel Havlin Monday on a New Year's visit to his old "home town," He was guest at a luncheon given by three of his friends, Prof. John Uri Lloyd, A. J. Conroy and Attorney Frank H. Shaffer.

Prof. Gantvoort just came from New York, where he played Santa Claus for the children, including twins, of his son, Herman, who is the producer of "Hell's Bells" and other successful Broadway plays. The professor addressed the National Music Teachers' Association convention at Rochester, N. Y.

"Music has received a tremendous impetus in America the past few years," he said. "There is a vast and growing love for music around Los Angeles—and the number of persons aged over 40 who are studying music and other subjects in the University is amazing.

"If good music is provided on the radio it will prove a wonderful musical educater. The other night in New York I heard a radio hour by the Boston Symphony ... then an hour by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and an hour by the Metropolitan Opera Quartet. Three such great organizations in three hours. I even reached out into the air to see what Cincinnati was doing that night—but it happened to be 'silent night' here.

"But I had the pleasure of hearing at the Los Angeles Bowl a number of concerts given under the able leadership of Fritz Reiner, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. We also heard Sir Henry Wood of England and a group of the world's noted conductors at the Bowl concerts, and Mr. Reiner, by his virile and forceful leadership, upheld the reputation of Cincinnati very well, indeed."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 4 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Phillip Hale's review of the Boston Symphony orchestra's first concert this season, said, in speaking of the great Russian leader's conducting of the Eroica symphony:

"He delighted in the sudden and great contrasts, in unexpected orchestral crashes. Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation was not 'sensational;' it was remarkable for its varied eloquence, for its majesty, for its pathos, for its gaiety in the final variations. Beethoven was romantic, furiously romantic. He did not shout and toss his hat in the air. Does any sane person think for a moment that the first movement of this symphony should be performed in an undeviating, inexorable tempo? Should a pathetic passage, a song of tenderness, a plaintive cry, be played in the tempo of the preceding measures? Perish the thought: Was the funeral march dramatic? Death is dramatic: burial is dramatic: a nation's grief is dramatic. For once this march did not seem to consume as much time as the passage of Napoleon's body from St. Helena to the Hotel des Invalides. The orchestral performance was of the highest quality."

The tickets for the Hartford concert, February 6, to be given at the Capitol theater, under Frank A. Sedgwick's management, are now on sale at McCoy's, or reservations can be made by calling 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 4 1927

Famous Leader Of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Coming

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The Boston Symphony orchestra conducted by its famous leader, Serge Koussevitzky, will make its annual appearance Sunday afternoon at the Auditorium, as one of the Young Men's Christian association concerts. This is the great feature of the season and the demand for seats always exceeds the supply. The concert will begin at 3 p. m., and 15 minutes before the hour the front doors will be opened and the seats then remaining put at the disposal, while there is room, of the holders of the free tickets which may be had at the Young Men's Christian association and at the music stores.

At 2 the terrace door will be opened for holders of the season subscribers' tickets at $3 each, and also for the holders of patrons' cards which may be had upon payment of $5 which entitles the subscriber to five cards. Names of patrons received before Friday will be printed in the program. Groups of persons contributing $1 each may be formed for such a subscription.

The program will be one of the best that the orchestra has given, leaning to the classical side, yet giving a taste of modern music in the suite from Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." The symphony is appropriately by Beethoven ,the centenary of whose death is observed this year, and it is the favorite among all his symphonies, the one in C minor, No. 5. The Berlioz and Wagner numbers are also old favorites, but Mr Koussevitzky is likely to give them all a new thrill. The program:—

Overture, "La Carnaval Romaine"..Berlioz
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
"Forest Murmurs" from
"Siegfried,".....Wagner
Suite from "The Love for Three

THIS CLIPPING FROM STAR-EAGLE
NEWARK, N. J.
JAN 4 1927

Sittig Trio at WOR Tonight

Lovers of perfect harmony and brilliance in musical selection should welcome the return engagement at WOR tonight at 10 of the Sittig trio. The approval showered upon the trio by radio listeners following their previous concerts was well earned for one recognized in them a fine spirit, high aspiration and disciplined ranks.

The pride of the group is Miss Margaret Sittig, a young violiniste, whose art in the last few seasons has commanded sufficient prominent attention to include her among the most promising violinists. Her brother, Edgar, has won for himself an excellent reputation as a musician and virtuoso. Frederick Sittig, the father, predominates the ensemble; modest and reliable in his work at the piano, yet coming into prominence at the right times.

Levitow at Local Station

WOR is pleased to announce that Bernard Levitow's Hotel Commodore Dance Orchestra will again broadcast through the local station at 11 tonight, under the direction of "Si" Nathan. Mr. Levitow is musical director of hotels Commodore, Belmont and Ansonia. He formerly opened his professional career as violin soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and at that time was honored by reason of the fact that he was the youngest violinist ever to be so honored. His reputation as a radio artist is well known and his background has enabled him to produce good music with a style and creative interpretation which has marked him unusual.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 4 1927

FAMOUS LEADER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, COMING

The Boston Symphony orchestra conducted by its famous leader, Serge Koussevitzky, will make its annual appearance Sunday afternoon at the Auditorium, as one of the Young Men's Christian association concerts. This is the great feature of the season and the demand for seats always exceeds the supply. The concert will begin at 3 p. m., and 15 minutes before the hour the front doors will be opened and the seats then remaining put at the disposal, while there is room, of the holders of the free tickets which may be had at the Young Men's Christian association and at the music stores.

At 2 the terrace door will be opened for holders of the season subscribers' tickets at $3 each, and also for the holders of patrons' cards which may be had upon payment of $5 which entitles the subscriber to five cards. Names of patrons received before Friday will be printed in the program. Groups of persons contributing $1 each may be formed for such a subscription.

The program will be one of the best that the orchestra has given, leaning to the classical side, yet giving a taste of modern music in the suite from Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." The symphony is appropriately by Beethoven ,the centenary of whose death is observed this year, and it is the favorite among all his symphonies, the one in C minor, No. 5. The Berlioz and Wagner numbers are also old favorites, but Mr Koussevitzky is likely to give them all a new thrill. The program:—

Overture, "La Carnaval Romaine"..Berlioz
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
"Forest Murmurs" from
"Siegfried,".....Wagner
Suite from "The Love for Three Oranges".....Prokofieff
Symphony No. 5, in C minor.....Beethoven

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 5 1927

Boston Symphony Will Be Heard Here January 31

The announcement that the Delaware Musical Association will present the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concert for the first time in Wilmington at the Shubert Playhouse on the evening of January 31, means little to the casual reader but that a very fine attraction has been secured for the delight of Wilmington music lovers.

But to those familiar with the ... history the thought comes immediately that here is another triumph for a devoted group of people who shoulder the responsibility of a series of symphony concerts each season with the sole motive of giving local people opportunity to hear the best music the world has to offer.

An incident of each concert season is an inevitable deficit and were it not that persons have been found who, out of their own pockets, guarantee the payment of any shortage, the bookings which have been made in this and other seasons would have been impossible. The expense of presenting a first class symphony orchestra is tremendous, a fact liable to escape one at times, and even if the usual theatre were filled to the rafters, there would still be the necessity for outside help. This has never been found wanting here, a sucient number of persons loving art for art's sake to prevent any embarrassment.

The organization known as the Delaware Musical Association grew out of the Delaware Committee for the Philadelphia Orchestra, which, after 16 years of service, disbanded when the Philadelphia Orchestra decided to discontinue its annual series of concerts in Wilmington.

The Delaware Committee for the Philadelphia Orchestra came into existence shortly after the organization of the orchestra itself. At the solicitation of the Philadelphia managers a group of Wilmington Music lovers banded together for the purpose of presenting the orchestra in Wilmington which was long included in its itinerary. The first president was the late Mrs. Joseph Swift and among her early associates were the late Mrs. Lewis C. Vandegrift and Mrs. Ellwood C. Jackson. Mrs. William N. Bannard began her association with it in 1908, replacing Mrs. Jackson, who left the city about that time. She has continued her work uninterruptedly and is officially known as Business Manager.

When the Philadelphia Orchestra was no longer available for local appearance those who had done so much to stimulate interest in it felt that a season without music of a like character would be a great deprivation and so the Delaware Musical Association was formed for the purpose of engaging such music and putting it before the people in a way that would give the most pleasure and do the most good. Its present executive force includes Mrs. William S. Bergland, president; Mrs. Eugene duPont, first vice-president; Mrs. J. Thompson Brown, second vice-president; Mrs. Clarence Underwood, secretary; Miss Helen L. Kurtz treasurer; Mrs. William N. Bannard, business manager and the following executive committee, Mrs. Julian Adair, Mrs. John Bancroft, Mrs. William C. Blatz, Miss Ellen Cannon Buckalew, Mrs. Caleb E. Burchenal, Mrs. Charles E. Griffith, Mrs. Cristy Pryer, Mrs. John J. Raskob, Mrs. Edmond G. Robinson and Mrs. Carl Snellenburg.

The association has never made an announcement with more pride than that the Boston Symphony will appear under its auspices. Mrs. Bannard is now taking orders for seats and will do so until they are placed on sale at the box office a few days in advance of the concert. Many are taking advantage of this opportunity to secure good seats, feeling that it is well to have them in hand in plenty of time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 5 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT ATTRACTS

This City Hasn't Difficulties to Face to House Famous Organization Providence Had

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which plays here Sunday afternoon under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A., announced early last year that the symphony concerts at Providence would have to be discontinued because of the demolition of Infantry hall, which has housed the Boston Symphony for several years.

The prospect of an interruption of the series of Boston Symphony concerts, under Koussevitzky, in Providence caused much concern among the orchestra's patrons there. Plans were completed for a Masonic temple with a large auditorium, but this will not be in readiness for at least a year.

At the instigation of President W. H. P. Faunce of Brown university, Mrs Avis Bliven Charbonnel and a group of citizens, a campaign for $6000 was started on April 7. On April 10 the amount was oversubscribed. By this contribution the E. F. Albee theater, at which daily performances are given throughout the year, will be made available for five evenings in the present season.

Walt Whitman's Phrase

Perhaps the New York conductor was aware of the Whitman prediction. At any rate, it was but recently that Mrs. Aubertine Woodward Moore wrote a series of articles for the Musical Leader. They recalled the phrase of America's poet which has become a by-word in the musical circles of the provinces. Mrs. Moore is a former Boston resident, a pioneer in the field of illustrated talks on music, and often mentioned as having presented the first "lecture-recital" in America. She gave her first talk with musical illustrations at Concord in 1880, and for her early efforts in behalf of music is well known by the older generation of Boston concert-goers. Mrs. Moore recently celebrated her eighty-fifth birthday in Madison, Wis., by repeating once more what Walt Whitman said almost a half-century ago. As she remembers them, these are his words: "There will one day come from the heart of America the noblest music the world has yet known, and it will arise in the great Middle West."

Strangely, the occasion was a dinner in her honor attended by members of a civic music association and by the former New York musician who had given up his position as leader of the New Symphony orchestra. He had accepted the conductorship of a new symphony orchestra of the Middle West. As if

f Music in nces" Proven and Orchestra

exemplifying the movement in music which has swept the central sections of the country in recent years, Madison citizens had made him conductor of the first symphony orchestra of a civic nature to be organized in the city which is the captital of Wisconsi nand the seat of the state university.

The new orchestra, with Dr. Prager conducting, gave its first performance Tuesday, Dec. 14. Esther Dale, soprano, who was heard one time with the Boston symphony, appeared as soloist, and Mr. Gilbert Ross, who announces a recital in this city during the season, occupied the concertmaster's chair. Beethoven's Second symphony was the principal number of the program.

.. Prager Holds Unique Position ..

Dr. Sigfrid Prager, though a citizen of Argentine and conductor of opera at the Theatro Liceo, Barcelona, Spain, in 1919, at the Royal Opera house, Berlin, in 1910-1913 and 1917-1918, and at Buenos Aires in 1920-25, nevertheless, holds a unique position in American music. However established, however numerous, however efficient orchestras in the United States may be,, he is the first to make a principle of performing music by American composers. Adopting this new departure in musical tradition while conductor of the New Symphony orchestra, New York city, he will continue the practice in Madison. He announces that he will present a composition by a representative American composer on every orchestra program which he conducts, and that previous to the concert he will give a "lecture-recital" dealing with the nature of the program to come. This feature of the plans for the new orchestra grew out of the series of "lecture-recitals" which he gave in Madison during the past two summers in colaboration with George Walker, American basso of the Berlin State opera. Assisiting him in these lectures during the past two summers were Francs Silva, soprano, and Viola Ellis, contralto, as rpresentative of a few of those who helped make the Middle Western city a considerable colony of concert artists during the season.

Thtt the East is "fed up" on concerts and music and musicians is the explanation Dr. Prager gives for his flight from New York. "It is not artistry and musicianship, merely, which is of prime importance in the crowded cities of the East, but commercial expediency, and routine," he says. "This is not the fault of music and musicians, but the natural result of the present economic condition. Competition is the determining factor in metropolitan music--competition not in singing and in playing, but in electric sign-boards and in cover advertising in music magazines. In the Middle West, however, a new renaissance in music will occur, I believe, under the proper conditions. This growth will take place, not so much through the building of new theaters and new concert halls, but through giving American composers and musicians an opportunity to be represented by organizations now producing music in America."

"Hear America First"

Thus, coming from Argentine in 1925, this apostle of the Middle West has adopted the word and the deed of promoters of America in other lines of endeavor. "Hear America First," he believes, is the appropriate variant of the better known [illegible] found in railroad advertising.

Music association named him conductor of the orchestra it fostered, and gave him free rein. Professor E. B. Gordon of the University of Wisconsin School of Music, and recent head of the Music Supervisors' National conference, is president of the Madison society which is dedicated to the task of eradicating the reasons for the more or less opprobious terms which the East has made popular in its references to the Central states. The "hinterland," the "backwoods," the "sticks," favorite words of the theatrical world, bid fair to pass from the language if their campaign is successful.

That eighty-five musicians for such an orchestra could be found in the college town and its environs was bu the fruit of the early labors of such pioneers as Theodore Thomas. Education in music has gained an ever-strengthening foothold in the North Central states. City after city has begun to offer free instruction in all instruments and in the several branches of theory, as well, to students in public schools and high schools. Gradually the Middle West is becoming musically self-sufficient and self-conscious. The day o traveling orchestras is past. N longer is it necessary for communi ties to depend upon occasional an often financially disastrous visits o Mr. Frederick Stock and the Chicago orchestra, of Mr. Henri Verbrugghen and the Minneapolis orchestra, and of Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch and th Detroit players. As Boston recentl demonstrated upon accasion of th visit of Mr. Mengelberg and the Ne York musicians, concertgoers are b ginning to prefer and depend upo the home product.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 3 1927

Boston Symphony

The present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is its forty-sixth and the third under its Russian leader, Serge Koussevitzky. M. Koussevitzky led his seventh successive series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris last summer with extraordinary success and remains the dominating figure in symphony concerts of western Europe.

The program to be given in Hartford February 6 includes Beethoven's Eroica Symphony in E flat major, the Prokokief Suite from the opera "The Love of Three Oranges." Debussy's Nocturn "Fetes," Wagner's prelude to "Lohen grin," Sibelius's "Finlandia Symphoni Poem Op. 26, No. 7."

Many of Hartford music lovers hav been fortunate enough to hear th weekly broadcasts of the Boston Sym phony Orchestra. Nevertheless, th most ideal way to obtain full appre ciation of the concerts is to see th musicians and the excellent directin of Mr. Koussevitzky. The seat sale now in progress at McCoy's, No. 89 Asy lum street, or reservations may b made by calling 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIMES STAR
CINCINNATI, OHIO
JAN 3 1927

"Music Makes Great Strides in America"

Opinion of Former Cincinnatian "Back Home" on Visit.

PROF. A. J. GANTVOORT, former manager of the Cincinnati College of Music, now lecturer in music in the University of California, Southern Branch, at Los Angeles, was at the Hotel Havlin Monday on a New Year's visit to his old "home town," He was guest at a luncheon given by three of his friends, Prof. John Uri Lloyd, A. J. Conroy and Attorney Frank H. Shaffer.

Prof. Gantvoort just came from New York, where he played Santa Claus for the children, including twins, of his son, Herman, who is the producer of "Hell's Bells" and other successful Broadway plays. The professor addressed the National Music Teachers' Association convention at Rochester, N. Y.

"Music has received a tremendous impetus in America the past few years," he said. "There is a vast and growing love for music around Los Angeles—and the number of persons aged over 40 who are studying music and other subjects in the University is amazing.

"If good music is provided on the radio it will prove a wonderful musical educator. The other night in New York I heard a radio hour by the Boston Symphony [illegible] then an hour by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and an hour by the Metropolitan Opera Quartet. Three such great organizations in three hours. I even reached out into the air to see what Cincinnati was doing that night—but it happened to be 'silent night' here.

"But I had the pleasure of hearing at the Los Angeles Bowl a number of concerts given under the able leadership of Fritz Reiner, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. We also heard Sir Henry Wood of England and a group of the world's noted conductors at the Bowl concerts, and Mr. Reiner, by his virile and forceful leadership, upheld the reputation of Cincinnati very well, indeed."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 4 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Phillip Hale's review of the Boston Symphony orchestra's first concert this season, said, in speaking of the great Russian leader's conducting of the Eroica symphony:

"He delighted in the sudden and great contrasts, in unexpected orchestral crashes. Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation was not 'sensational;' it was remarkable for its varied eloquence, for its majesty, for its pathos, for its gaiety in the final variations. Beethoven is romantic, furiously romantic. He does shout and toss his hat in the air. Does any sane person think for a moment that the first movement of this symphony should be performed in an undeviating, inexorable tempo? Should a pathetic passage, a song of tenderness, a plaintive cry, be played in the tempo of the preceding measures? Perish the thought: Was the funeral march dramatic? Death is dramatic: burial is dramatic: a nation's grief is dramatic. For once this march did not seem to consume as much time as the passage of Napoleon's body from St. Helena to the Hotel des Invalides. The orchestral performance was of the highest quality."

The tickets for the Hartford concert, February 6, to be given at the Capitol theater, under Frank A. Sedgwick's management, are now on sale at McCoy's, or reservations can be made by calling 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 4 1927

Famous Leader Of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Coming

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The Boston Symphony orchestra conducted by its famous leader, Serge Koussevitzky, will make its annual appearance Sunday afternoon at the Auditorium, as one of the Young Men's Christian association concerts. This is the great feature of the season and the demand for seats always exceeds the supply. The concert will begin at 3 p. m., and 15 minutes before the hour the front doors will be opened and the seats then remaining put at the disposal, while there is room, of the holders of the free tickets which may be had at the Young Men's Christian association and at the music stores.

At 2 the terrace door will be opened for holders of the season subscribers' tickets at $3 each, and also for the holders of patrons' cards which may be had upon payment of $5 which entitles the subscriber to five cards. Names of patrons received before Friday will be printed in the program. Groups of persons contributing $1 each may be formed for such a subscription.

The program will be one of the best that the orchestra has given, leaning to the classical side, yet giving a taste of modern music in the suite from Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." The symphony is appropriately by Beethoven ,the centenary of whose death is observed this year, and it is the favorite among all his symphonies, the one in C minor, No. 5. The Berlioz and Wagner numbers are also old favorites, but Mr Koussevitzky is likely to give them all a new thrill. The program:—

Overture, "La Carnaval Romaine"..Berlioz
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
"Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried,".....Wagner
Suite from "The Love for Three Oranges".....Prokofieff
Symphony No. 5, in C minor.....Beethoven

THIS CLIPPING FROM STAR-EAGLE
NEWARK, N. J.
JAN 4 1927

Sittig Trio at WOR Tonight

Lovers of perfect harmony and brilliance in musical selection should welcome the return engagement at WOR tonight at 10 of the Sittig trio. The approval showered upon the trio by radio listeners following their previous concerts was well earned for one recognized in them a fine spirit, high aspiration and disciplined ranks.

The pride of the group is Miss Margaret Sittig, a young violiniste, whose art in the last few seasons has commanded sufficient prominent attention to include her among the most promising violinists. Her brother, Edgar, has won for himself an excellent reputation as a musician and virtuoso. Frederick Sittig, the father, predominates the ensemble; modest and reliable in his work at the piano, yet coming into prominence at the right times.

Levitow at Local Station

WOR is pleased to announce that Bernard Levitow's Hotel Commodore Dance Orchestra will again broadcast through the local station at 11 tonight, under the direction of "Si" Nathan. Mr. Levitow is musical director of hotels Commodore, Belmont and Ansonia. He formerly opened his professional career as violin soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and at that time was honored by reason of the fact that he was the youngest violinist ever to be so honored. His reputation as a radio artist is well known and his background has enabled him to produce good music with a style and creative interpretation which has marked him unusual.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 4 1927

FAMOUS LEADER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, COMING

The Boston Symphony orchestra conducted by its famous leader, Serge Koussevitzky, will make its annual appearance Sunday afternoon at the Auditorium, as one of the Young Men's Christian association concerts. This is the great feature of the season and the demand for seats always exceeds the supply. The concert will begin at 3 p. m., and 15 minutes before the hour the front doors will be opened and the seats then remaining put at the disposal, while there is room, of the holders of the free tickets which may be had at the Young Men's Christian association and at the music stores.

At 2 the terrace door will be opened for holders of the season subscribers' tickets at $3 each, and also for the holders of patrons' cards which may be had upon payment of $5 which entitles the subscriber to five cards.

Names of patrons received before Friday will be printed in the program. Groups of persons contributing $1 each may be formed for such a subscription.

The program will be one of the best that the orchestra has given, leaning to the classical side, yet giving a taste of modern music in the suite from Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." The symphony is appropriately by Beethoven ,the centenary of whose death is observed this year, and it is the favorite among all his symphonies, the one in C minor, No. 5. The Berlioz and Wagner numbers are also old favorites, but Mr Koussevitzky is likely to give them all a new thrill. The program:—

Overture, "La Carnaval Romaine"..Berlioz
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
"Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried,".....Wagner
Suite from "The Love for Three Oranges".....Prokofieff
Symphony No. 5, in C minor.....Beethoven

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WILMINGTON, DEL.
[illegible] 1927

Boston Symphony Will Be Heard Here January 31

The announcement that the Delaware Musical Association will present the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concert for the first time in Wilmington at the Shubert Playhouse on the evening of January 31, means little to the casual reader but that a very fine attraction has been secured for the delight of Wilmington music lovers.

But to those familiar with the [illegible] history the thought comes immediately that here is another triumph for a devoted group of people who shoulder the responsibility of a series of symphony concerts each season with the sole motive of giving local people opportunity to hear the best music the world has to offer.

An incident of each concert season is an inevitable deficit and were it not that persons have been found who, out of their own pockets, guarantee the payment of any shortage, the bookings which have been made in this and other seasons would have been impossible. The expense of presenting a first class symphony orchestra is tremendous, a fact liable to escape one at times, and even if the usual theatre were filled to the rafters, there would still be the necessity for outside help. This has never been found wanting here, a sucient number of persons loving art for art's sake to prevent any embarrassment.

The organization known as the Delaware Musical Association grew out of the Delaware Committee for the Philadelphia Orchestra, which, after 16 years of service, disbanded when the Philadelphia Orchestra decided to discontinue its annual series of concerts in Wilmington.

The Delaware Committee for the Philadelphia Orchestra came into existence shortly after the organization of the orchestra itself. At the solicitation of the Philadelphia managers a group of Wilmington Music lovers banded together for the purpose of presenting the orchestra in Wilmington which was long included in its itinerary. The first president was the late Mrs. Joseph Swift and among her early associates were the late Mrs. Lewis C. Vandegrift and Mrs. Ellwood C. Jackson. Mrs. William N. Bannard began her association with it in 1908, replacing Mrs. Jackson, who left the city about that time. She has continued her work uninterruptedly and is officially known as Business Manager.

When the Philadelphia Orchestra was no longer available for local appearance those who had done so much to stimulate interest in it felt that a season without music of a like character would be a great deprivation and so the Delaware Musical Association was formed for the purpose of engaging such music and putting it before the people in a way that would give the most pleasure and do the most good. Its present executive force includes Mrs. William S. Bergland, president; Mrs. Eugene duPont, first vice-president; Mrs. J. Thompson Brown, second vice-president; Mrs. Clarence Underwood, secretary; Miss Helen L. Kurtz treasurer; Mrs. William N. Bannard, business manager and the following executive committee, Mrs. Julian Adair, Mrs. John Bancroft, Mrs. William C. Blatz, Miss Ellen Cannon Buckalew, Mrs. Caleb E. Burchenal, Mrs. Charles E. Griffith, Mrs. Cristy Pryer, Mrs. John J. Raskob, Mrs. Edmond G. Robinson and Mrs. Carl Snellenburg.

The association has never made an announcement with more pride than that the Boston Symphony will appear under its auspices. Mrs. Bannard is now taking orders for seats and will do so until they are placed on sale at the box office a few [illegible] in advance of the concert. [illegible] are taking advantage of this [illegible]ty to secure good seats, [illegible] it is well to have them in [illegible]plenty of time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 5 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT ATTRACTS

This City Hasn't Difficulties to Face to House Famous Organization Providence Had

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which plays here Sunday afternoon under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A., announced early last year that the symphony concerts at Providence would have to be discontinued because of the demolition of Infantry hall, which has housed the Boston Symphony for several years.

The prospect of an interruption of the series of Boston Symphony concerts, under Koussevitzky, in Providence caused much concern among the orchestra's patrons there. Plans were completed for a Masonic temple with a large auditorium, but this will not be in readiness for at least a year.

At the instigation of President W. H. P. Faunce of Brown university, Mrs Avis Bliven Charbonnel and a group of citizens, a campaign for $6000 was started on April 7. On April 10 the amount was oversubscribed. By this contribution the E. F. Albee theater, at which daily performances are given throughout the year, will be made available for five evenings in the present season.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Springfield welcomes this concert each year with the largest audience that can be accommodated in the Springfield Municipal Auditorium. Sunday will be no exception to this rule.

The Y. M. C. A. is having its usual large demand for admission tickets. Admission is free at the front doors for as many as can be accommodated after the season's subscribers and patrons are admitted. The terrace door opens at 2, the front doors at 2.45, and the concert begins at 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
JAN 5 - 1927

Moments

By SIDNEY

To Whom Announcements a Matters May Be Ad

ON THE CALENDAR.

Jan. 9—Lowell Philharmonic Orchestral Society, Liberty hall, 3 p. m

Next Sunday afternoon in Liberty hall the Lowell Philharmonic Orchestral Society, Julius Woessner conducting, will give the first concert of its second season as one of the city's musical organizations. Varying the instrumental numbers will be an operatic aria and a group of songs by Miss Amey L. French, soprano, with Miss Margaret R. Martin at the piano for the latter. In the case of one or two of the instruments needed for a satisfactory performance, such as the oboe and bassoon, the orchestra will be supplemented by musicians from Boston. Tickets at 50 cents may be had at the music stores. The program, as Mr. Woessner has arranged it, will be as follows:

March Militaire ..... Schubert
Unfinished Symphony, Allegro Moderato ..... Schubert
Serenata ..... Moskowski

One Fine Day (from Madame Butterfly) ..... Puccini
Miss French, with orchestra.

La Feria, Suite Espagnole..Lacome
(a) Los Toros
(b) La Reja
(c) La Zarguela
Reve Angelique ..... Rubinstein

Bergerettes ..... Arr. Weckerlin
(a) Bergere Legere
(b) Jeunne Fillette
Wings of Night ..... Watts
The Little Red Lark ..... Needham
Miss French, with piano.

Two Guitars ..... Horlick
Skaters' Waltz ..... Waldteufel
Selections from Lucia ..... Donizetti
Tancrede Overture ..... Rossini

It is now two years since a group of the employees of the Lowell Electric Light Corp. voluntarily formed and organized an orchestra.

Weekly rehearsals, lasting for two or three hours, have brought the members into close association musically, resulting in a degree of proficiency that is not very often attained by organizations of a similar character.

Back of the organization has been a three-fold purpose: First, to play for their own pleasure and musical benefit the best music of the best composers; second, to pass on some of that enjoyment and inspiration to their fellow employees; third, to contribute, without competing with commercial or so-called professional orchestras, to the musical enjoyment of the community.

For the first purpose, in some degree, they might have turned to the popular music of the day. They chose rather to cultivate a taste for music of less ephemeral a character, music that would be worth the study and time put into its preparation. The slogan has been and is "To Inspire and Stimulate the Love of Good Music." Hence the weekly rehearsals have been devoted almost exclusively to classical music and concert selections. To this end the members have given their time and effort without pay.

Thus, in the program they played before the Middlesex Women's Club on Monday afternoon they were able to give very genuine pleasure as Mr. John A. Hunnewell led them through such numbers as the Liberty Bell March of Sousa; the first part of the Ballet Egyptienne, by Luigini; Arditi's waltz, Il Bacio; Ase's Death, from Grieg's Peer Gynt Suite, and the Poet and Peasant Overture, by von Suppe.

Rearrangement of the music for the instrumentation of the orchestra seems to have been more than ordinarily successful. The ensemble has learned to subordinate volume to the accom[illegible]strument. There [illegible] of to[illegible] shade [illegible] war[illegible]

[illegible] with the limitations of its membership and of its instrumentation the orchestra is now capable of giving no little color and character to the music in hand.

Hearing it on Monday, it was easy to understand Mr. Hunnewell's personal interest in a development toward which his own love for good music has undoubtedly contributed in great degree, supplementing the work of the orchestra's capable director and leading violinist, Mr. H. O. Faust.

That the fellow employees of the members have come to take a pride in the orchestra, and that, while in no sense a part of the structure of the Lowell Electric Light Corp., that concern has been glad to encourage it are facts that are not surprising, in view of the painstaking interest of the young men who play in it.

Among the musical organizations of the city in several respects it may be said to have a distinctive place.

Certainly when it is learned that the orchestra is about to take up the study of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, there is encouragement for those who do not believe that music begins and ends with jazz.

On the last day of the month the Chicago Civic Opera Co. will open its annual two-weeks engagement in the Boston Opera House, in the course of which 16 performances with ex-

Musical

R. FLEET

d Communications on Musical dressed at This Office.

cellent casts are scheduled. Aida will be the opera for the first night.

This week the Boston Symphony orchestra makes one of its musical pilgrimages to New York, so that there will be no concerts at home Friday and Saturday.

John Charles Thomas, baritone, formerly and deservedly a favorite in musical comedy, but who of late has bene singing in grand opera in Brussels, was well received in concert in Boston on Sunday. The reviewers agree that he was especially successful and pleasing in such operatic excerpts as were included in a varied program. After a short concert tour in this country he is to return to Brussels to take his place among the company at La Monnale Opera.

A daughter was born recently to Mr. and Mrs. Deems Taylor. Mr. Taylor, who once came to Lowell for the production by the Choral Society of his cantata, The Highwayman, is the composer of a new opera, The King's Henchman, soon to be produced by the Meropolitan Opera Co.

Millo Picco, baritone, well known in Lowell, continues to be one of the most useful members of the Metropolitan Opera Co., judging from the frequency with which his name appears in the announcements of the casts.

There have been reports that the St. Louis Symphony orchestra might be unable to finish its season, owing to a lack of funds. Hopefully musical people of means in that city will be found to come to the rescue. Certainly it would be a pity to abandon the orchestra now that its musical development is so promising.

Marion Talley, whose 20th birthday anniversary was last week Monday, celebrated by signing a new contract with the Metropolitan Opera Co.

The dates of Springfield's annual music festival have been changed to May 2, 3 and 4, when the chorus under the baton of John J. Bishop will give Verdi's Requiem as the chief choral work on the list. The soloists will be Elizabeth Rethberg, Katherine Meisle, Arthur Hackett-Granville and Leon Rothier.

Richard Strauss is reported to be of the opinion that music for the films is one of the most promising mediums for composers. While a number of well known composers have written scores to accompany the filmed drama, the fact that so many of the films pass into oblivion after a short run has discouraged a more general interest in this field of composition. To write music for a movie which holds the screen for an hour and a half requires no little time and effort on the part of the composer. And there is little prospect that the piece will remain in the screen repertory for more than a few months at the most. Whether this condition will be changed by the invention of the vitaphone, synchronizing recorded music with the films, remains to be seen. It seems possible, however, that the development may give wider opportunity for the composer's talent.

The National Opera Club of America is conducting a nation-wide con[illegible]or young American trained sing[illegible]n conjunction with the National [illegible]ration of Music Clubs. A jury [illegible]rominent musicians will decide [illegible]ontests, and every trained woman singer from 20 to 32 years may have part. A prize of $1000 will be awarded the final victor, an audition at the Metropolitan Opera House, an appearance with the San Carlo Opera Co. and launching upon the stage without retainer fee. In addition, the federation voice prize of $500 may be won by the same contestant. Contests will be held first by state, then by district, the final national contest being held in April, 1927. Full particulars upon request to Mrs. E. H. Cahill, chairman of contest committee, 839 West End avenue, New York city.

Within a few days, according to the publishers, the sales of Nevin's best known song, "The Rosary," reached the six million mark. In all, the family of the lamented composer has received $400,000 in royalties for this one song.

Writing in the November number of the Etude on certain details that are often neglected by pianists, Arthur Foote of Boston included the following interesting paragraph:

"It is of value to the pupil to realize how the style of writing (for the pianoforte) at different periods has been influenced by the mechanism of the clavichord, harpischord and the pianoforte of 1826 as well as that of today. When the action of the pianoforte was light, with but a little dip of the keys, and little resistance to the finger tips, the tendency was toward exceedingly rapid passage work and quick tempi, the reverse being the case today. An example of the unmusical rapid tempi that were encouraged by the light pianoforte action of 100 years ago is seen in the metronome marks of Czerny's studies and of his Bach edition. It is odd how a once favorite pianoforte figure (that of repeated notes in quick tempo) has nearly disappeared, owing to its extreme difficulty of performance with our heavier action."

THIS CLIPPING FROM REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
MAR 2 - 1927

THE CAREER OF SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Nothin, save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to Woolsey Hall, March 9, than the circumstances of his career.

He first conducted as a boy of 12, when he led the local theater orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in northern Russia.

Koussevitzky's abilities, were not of the sort to be so confined to a limited field, and from 1909 he devoted all his energies to conducting. He organized his own symphony orchestra in Moscow, which soon came to be considered the finest in Russia.

Koussevitzky could not rest content with bringing music to the city folk of Russia. There lay about him a vast agrarian population, most of whom had never even heard a symphony concert. He chartered a large steamer, on the Volga River, and taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends, made several voyages along the 2,500 miles of its basin. The party would port at each town along its bank, and announce a symphony concert in the local town hall. The country folk were of course astonished at this wonderful, new kind of music, but they were also both delighted and moved by it.

In 1909, in partnership with his wife, Koussevitzky inaugurated in Russia what has come to be one of the most important of music publishing concerns. In this way there have been published works by such Russian composers as Stravinsky, Rachmaninoff, Prokofieff, and Scriabin. This, in championing a new score which he believes significant, Koussevitzky can give it public performance and publication as well.

The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, but not of his energies. He became conductor of the Russian State Orchestra (formerly the Court Orchestra).

Each Spring, since Koussevitzky became the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924, he has returned at the conclusion of his American season to conduct his Paris and London series, which the European public evidently hold to be an indispensable part of their musical life.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TRIBUNE
TERRE HAUTE, IND.
JAN 6 - 1927

SPALDING WINS ONLY PRAISE FROM CRITICS

When Albert Spalding, violinist, who will play here on January 11, at the Grand theater first played the Respighi concerto in this country it was with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston, and this is what one of the leading critics, H. T. Parker, said, in the Boston Transcript:

"Never was applause more certain and not a little of it was of right for Mr. Spalding. He plays concertos [illegible] played Respighi's violin part with a minging of songful sweetness and graver austerity; of reticence without and exaltation within that transfigured the concerto beyond desert. Mr. Spalding studied in Italy and there gained a fine-strung, lustrous sweetness of tone. Mr. Spalding has become a serious, sensitive, studious, finely touched musician. The Spalding of the younger and the elder day met matured in the concerto and to its greater glory."

Warren Storey Smith in the Boston Post:

"Spalding's masterly playing is a feature.

"It is high time Mr. Spalding was hailed as a violinist of the first importance. Indeed, had he first come to us from Russia or from Bohemia it is altogether likely that his name would long ago have been one with which managers might conjure.

"A musician of serious aims and of high ideals, Mr. Spalding has in the main elected to identify himself with unfamiliar music of interest rather than to be party to the ten-millionth performance of a concerto of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Tschaikowsky, or Saint-Saens. Thus on the occasion of his last appearance with our symphony orchestra he introduced to us the concerto of Dohnanyi, while yesterday he was responsible for the Boston premiere of that of Respighi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 6 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Sergei Moussevitzky conducting, will be heard at the Capitol theater February 6, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Nothing save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Mr. Koussevitzky.

Koussevitzy could not rest content with bringing music to the city folk of Russia alone. There lay about him a vast agrarian population, most of whom had never heard a symphony concert. He chartered a large steamer on the Volga river, and taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends, made several voyages along the 25,00 miles of its basin.

In 1909, in partnership with his wife, Koussevitzky inaugurated in Russia what has come to be one of the most important music publishing concerns. In this way there have been published works by such Russian composers as Stravinsky, Rachmaninoff, Prokofieff and Scriabin.

The seat sale for the concert is now in progress at McCoy's Music store, 89 Asylum street. Tickets may also be obtained by calling Frank Sedgwick, 2-2251, who is bringing this musical attraction to Hartford.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 6 1927

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Sergei Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard at the Capitol Theater, February 6, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Nothing, save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Mr. Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, than the circumstances of his career. Koussevitzky could not rest content with bringing music to the city folk of Russia alone. There lay about him a vast agrarian population, most of whom had never heard a symphony concert. He chartered a large steamer on the Volga river, and taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends, made several voyages along the 2,500 miles of its basin.

In 1909, in partnership with his wife, Koussevitzky inaugurated in Russia what has come to be one of the most important of music publishing concerns. In this way there have been published works by such Russian composers as Stravinsky, Rachmaninoff, Prokofieff and Scriabin. Thus, in championing a new score which he believes significant, Koussevitzky can give public performance and publication as well.

The seat sale for the concert is now in progress at McCoy's Music Store, 89 Asylum street. Tickets may also be obtained by calling Frank Sedgwick, 2-2251, who is bringing this musical attraction to Hartford.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN
JAN 7 1927

Boston Symphony Plays New Sibelius Work To-morrow

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's program in Carnegie Hall to-morrow afternoon will consist of a concerto of Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been arranged for string orchestra and a small group of wood wind instruments, especially for Mr. Koussevitzky, by Maximilian Steinberg. The seventh symphony of Sibelius will have its first New York performance at this concert. The symphony is in one movement and is the latest of the Finnish composer. The other numbers will be a suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Firebird," and Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
JAN 7 1927

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. Wanda Landowska, harpsichordist, assisting artist. Program: Mozart, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"; De Falla, Concerto for Harpsichord, Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Violin and Cello; Mozart, Rondo for Harpsichord and Orchestra; Strawinsky, "Le Sacre du Printemps." At Carnegie Hall, last evening.

* * *

A CONCERTO for Harpsichord, Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Violin and Cello, by Manuel De Falla, was revealed for the first time to a New York audience last evening in Carnegie Hall. Preceded by Mozart's familiar "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and followed by the same composer's D major Rondo for Harpsichord and Orchestra, the Concerto enlisted the aid of Mme. Landowska, to whom it was dedicated by the composer, in its performance. The wind and string instrument parts were played by members of the Boston Symphony, and Mr. Koussewitsky conducted. According to information supplied the annotator of the program by Mme. Landowska, De Falla was engaged in the composition of this music from 1923 to 1926, and it may therefore be understood to represent the development of his present style, first heralded in the production of "El Retablo de Maeser Pedro." It is music of distinction and charm, aristocratic of texture, penetrating both in its wit and its sentiment, contrived and scored with the greatest dexterity.

* * *

THE DE FALLA of this Concerto and of the "Retablo" ranks among the more interesting and important of modern masters. It is distinctly difficult to associate these later works with music such as that contained in "Nights in the Gardens of Spain." The transition describes a wide arc. From a talented composer of vivid and colorful program music, De Falla has become an arresting individualist. His later music bears the stamp of an active and daring imagination; it has verve, force, originality. De Falla compels the attention both by what he has to say and the manner in which he says it. He has achieved, for the present, a satisfactory idiom for the expression of his ideas. The Concerto is an admirable work; its significance is perhaps not great, for here De Falla has written music of an intimate nature, music which attempts the expression of no powerful or deeply affecting emotions, but rather music to embody certain lighter moods of gayety and gentle melancholy. The Concerto does not adhere to a fixed tonality. A diversity of keys, or tonalities, is registered in each movement. The initial Allegro opens and ends in B major, its themes—with the exception of a lyric A major phrase for violin and cello in octaves—are treated dissonantly. The second movement is based upon a choral motif of lovely character, first treated in full harmony which lends it an antique color. Later it is used as a straight canon with dignified, medieval effect. This second movement, a lento of quiet gravity, is the gem of the work, though on a first hearing it appears a trifle long. The finale is jocose and spirited, rather trivial, and more markedly modern than the other movements in spirit.

* * *

MME. LANDOWSKA and her associates excellently played this work. But the Concerto should be heard in a smaller auditorium than that of Carnegie Hall, where the delicate and fragile tone of the harpsichord does not sound to advantage. It was in the Mozart Rondo that Mme. Landowska best displayed the unique perfection of her art. Her performance of this rather uninteresting music was a miracle of sympathy, intelligence and skill. The concert opened with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," of which Mr. Koussewitsky gave a thoroughly unappreciative reading. The charm of the music was utterly destroyed by his capricious and irrelevant tempi, for the most part far too fast. Strawinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" followed the intermission. Its performance was one of assertive power and true virtuosity both on the part of

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Springfield welcomes this concert each year with the largest audience that can be accommodated in the Springfield Municipal Auditorium. Sunday will be no exception to this rule.

The Y. M. C. A. is having its usual large demand for admission tickets. Admission is free at the front doors for as many as can be accommodated after the season's subscribers and patrons are admitted. The terrace door opens at 2, the front doors at 2.45, and the concert begins at 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

JAN 5 - 1927

Moments

By SIDNEY

To Whom Announcements a Matters May Be Ad

ON THE CALENDAR.

Jan. 9—Lowell Philharmonic Orchestral Society, Liberty hall, 3 p. m

Next Sunday afternoon in Liberty hall the Lowell Philharmonic Orchestral Society, Julius Woessner conducting, will give the first concert o its second season as one of the city' musical organizations. Varying th instrumental numbers will be an op atic aria and a group of songs b Miss Amey L. French, soprano, with Miss Margaret R. Martin at the pianc for the latter. In the case of one or two of the instruments needed for a satisfactory performance, such as the oboe and bassoon, the orchestra will be supplemented by musicians from Boston. Tickets at 50 cents may be had at the music stores. The program, as Mr. Woessner has arranged it, will be as follows:

March Militaire ..... Schubert
Unfinished Symphony, Allegro Moderato ..... Schubert
Serenata ..... Moskowski

One Fine Day (from Madame Butterfly) ..... Puccini
Miss French, with orchestra.

La Feria, Suite Espagnole..Lacome
(a) Los Toros
(b) La Reja
(c) La Zarguela
Reve Angelique ..... Rubinstein

Bergerettes ..... Arr. Weckerlin
(a) Bergere Legere
(b) Jeunne Fillette
Wings of Night ..... Watts
The Little Red Lark ..... Needham
Miss French, with piano.

Two Guitars ..... Horlick
Skaters' Waltz ..... Waldteufel
Selections from Lucia ..... Donizetti
Tancrede Overture ..... Rossini

It is now two years since a group of the employees of the Lowell Electric Light Corp. voluntarily formed and organized an orchestra.

Weekly rehearsals, lasting for two or three hours, have brought the members into close association musically, resulting in a degree of proficiency that is not very often attained by organizations of a similar character.

Back of the organization has been a three-fold purpose: First, to play for their own pleasure and musical benefit the best music of the best composers; second, to pass on some of that enjoyment and inspiration to their fellow employees; third, to contribute, without competing with commercial or so-called professional orchestras, to the musical enjoyment of the community.

For the first purpose, in some degree, they might have turned to the popular music of the day. They chose rather to cultivate a taste for music of less ephemeral a character, music that would be worth the study and time put into its preparation. The slogan has been and is "To Inspire and Stimulate the Love of Good Music." Hence the weekly rehearsals have been devoted almost exclusively to classical music and concert selections. To this end the members have given their time and effort without pay.

Thus, in the program they played before the Middlesex Women's Club on Monday afternoon they were able to give very genuine pleasure as Mr. John A. Hunnewell led them through such numbers as the Liberty Bell March of Sousa; the first part of the Ballet Egyptienne, by Luigini; Arditi's waltz, Il Bacio; Ase's Death, from Grieg's Peer Gynt Suite, and the Poet and Peasant Overture, by von Suppe.

Rearrangement of the music for the instrumentation of the orchestra seems to have been more than ordinarily successful. The ensemble has learned to subordinate volume to the accom... instrument. There... for young American trained sing... of to... ration of Music Clubs. A jury shade... prominent musicians will decide war... contests, and every trained wom...

Musical

R. FLEET

...d Communications on Musical
...dressed at This Office.

...ith the limitations of its membership and of its instrumentation the orchestra is now capable of giving no little color and character to the music in hand.

Hearing it on Monday, it was easy to understand Mr. Hunnewell's personal interest in a development toward which his own love for good music has undoubtedly contributed in great degree, supplementing the work of the orchestra's capable director and leading violinist, Mr. H. O. Faust.

That the fellow employees of the members have come to take a pride in the orchestra, and that, while in no sense a part of the structure of the Lowell Electric Light Corp., that concern has been glad to encourage it are facts that are not surprising, in view of the painstaking interest of the young men who play in it.

Among the musical organizations of the city in several respects it may be said to have a distinctive place.

Certainly when it is learned that the orchestra is about to take up the study of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, there is encouragement for those who do not believe that music begins and ends with jazz.

On the last day of the month the Chicago Civic Opera Co. will open its annual two-weeks engagement in the Boston Opera House, in the course of which 16 performances with excellent casts are scheduled. Aida will be the opera for the first night.

This week the Boston Symphony orchestra makes one of its musical pilgrimages to New York, so that there will be no concerts at home Friday and Saturday.

John Charles Thomas, baritone, formerly and deservedly a favorite in musical comedy, but who of late has bene singing in grand opera in Brussels, was well received in concert in Boston on Sunday. The reviewers agree that he was especially successful and pleasing in such operatic excerpts as were included in a varied program. After a short concert tour in this country he is to return to Brussels to take his place among the company at La Monnaie Opera.

A daughter was born recently to Mr. and Mrs. Deems Taylor. Mr. Taylor, who once came to Lowell for the production by the Choral Society of his cantata, "he Highwayman, is the composer of a new opera, The King's Henchman, soon to be produced by the Metropolitan Opera Co.

Millo Picco, baritone, well known in Lowell, continues to be one of the most useful members of the Metropolitan Opera Co., judging from the frequency with which his name appears in the announcements of the casts.

There have been reports that the St. Louis Symphony orchestra might be unable to finish its season, owing to a lack of funds. Hopefully musical people of means in that city will be found to come to the rescue. Certainly it would be a pity to abandon the orchestra now that its musical development is so promising.

Marion Talley, whose 20th birthday anniversary was last week Monday, celebrated by signing a new contract with the Metropolitan Opera Co.

The dates of Springfield's annual music festival have been changed to May 2, 3 and 4, when the chorus under the baton of John J. Bishop will give Verdi's Requiem as the chief choral work on the list. The soloists will be Elizabeth Rethberg, Katherine Meisle, Arthur Hackett-Granville and Leon Rothier.

Richard Strauss is reported to be of the opinion that music for the films is one of the most promising mediums for composers. While a number of well known composers have written scores to accompany the filmed drama, the fact that so many of the films pass into oblivion after a short run has discouraged a more general interest in this field of composition. To write music for a movie which holds the screen for an hour and a half requires no little time and effort on the part of the composer. And there is little prospect that the piece will remain in the screen repertory for more than a few months at the most. Whether this condition will be changed by the invention of the vitaphone, synchronizing recorded music with the films, remains to be seen. It seems possible, however, that the development may give wider opportunity for the composer's talent.

The National Opera Club of America is conducting a nation-wide con... for young American trained sing... in conjunction with the National ...ration of Music Clubs. A jury ...rominent musicians will decide ...ontests, and every trained wom... an singer from 20 to 32 years may have part. A prize of $1000 will be awarded the final victor, an audition at the Metropolitan Opera House, an appearance with the San Carlo Opera Co. and launching upon the stage without retainer fee. In addition, the federation voice prize of $500 may be won by the same contestant. Contests will be held first by state, then by district, the final national contest being held in April, 1927. Full particulars upon request to Mrs. E. H. Cahill, chairman of contest committee, 839 West End avenue, New York city.

Within a few days, according to the publishers, the sales of Nevin's best known song, "The Rosary," reached the six million mark. In all, the family of the lamented composer has received $400,000 in royalties for this one song.

Writing in the November number of the Etude on certain details that are often neglected by pianists, Arthur Foote of Boston included the following interesting paragraph:

"It is of value to the pupil to realize how the style of writing (for the pianoforte) at different periods has been influenced by the mechanism of the clavichord, harpischord and the pianoforte of 1826 as well as that of today. When the action of the pianoforte was light, with but a little dip of the keys, and little resistance to the finger tips, the tendency was toward exceedingly rapid passage work and quick tempi, the reverse being the case today. An example of the unmusical rapid tempi that were encouraged by the light pianoforte action of 100 years ago is seen in the metronome marks of Czerny's studies and of his Bach edition. It is odd how a once favorite pianoforte figure (that of repeated notes in quick tempo) has nearly disappeared, owing to its extreme difficulty of performance with our heavier action."

THIS CLIPPING FROM REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
MAR 2 - 1927

THE CAREER OF SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Nothin, save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when comes to Woolsey Hall, March 9, than the circumstances of his career.

He first conducted as a boy of 12, when he led the local theater orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in northern Russia.

Koussevitzky's abilities, were not of the sort to be so confined to a limited field, and from 1909 he devoted all his energies to conducting. He organized his own symphony orchestra in Moscow, which soon came to be considered the finest in Russia.

Koussevitzky could not rest content with bringing music to the city folk of Russia. There lay about him a vast agrarian population, most of whom had never even heard a symphony concert. He chartered a large steamer, on the Volga River, and taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends made several voyages along the 2,500 miles of its basin. The party would port at each town along its bank, and announce a symphony concert in the local town hall. The country folk were of course astonished at this wonderful, new kind of music, but they were also both delighted and moved by it.

In 1909, in partnership with his wife, Koussevitzky inaugurated in Russia what has come to be one of the most important of music publishing concerns. In this way there have been published works by such Russian composers as Stravinsky, Rachmaninoff, Prokofieff, and Scriabin. Thus, in championing a new score which he believes significant, Koussevitzky can give it public performance and publication as well.

The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, but not of his energies. He became conductor of the Russian State Orchestra (formerly the Court Orchestra).

Each Spring, since Koussevitzky became the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924, he has returned at the conclusion of his American season to conduct his Paris and London series, which the European public evidently hold to be an indispensable part of their musical life.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TRIBUNE
TERRE HAUTE, IND.
JAN 6 - 1927

SPALDING WINS ONLY PRAISE FROM CRITICS

When Albert Spalding, violinist, who will play here on January 11, at the Grand theater first played the Respighi concerto in this country it was with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston, and this is what one of the leading critics, H. T. Parker, said, in the Boston Transcript:

"Never was applause more certain and not a little of it was of right for Mr. Spalding. He plays concertos Respighi's violin part with a mingling of songful sweetness and graver austerity of reticence without and exaltation within that transfigured the concerto beyond desert. Mr. Spalding studied in Italy and there gained a fine-strung, lustrous sweetness of tone. Mr. Spalding has become a serious, sensitive, studious, finely touched musician. The Spalding of the younger and the elder day met matured in the concerto and to its greater glory."

Warren Storey Smith in the Boston Post:

"Spalding's masterly playing is a feature.

"It is high time Mr. Spalding was hailed as a violinist of the first importance. Indeed, had he first come to us from Russia or from Bohemia it is altogether likely that his name would long ago have been one with which managers might conjure.

"A musician of serious aims and of high ideals, Mr. Spalding has in the main elected to identify himself with unfamiliar music of interest rather than to be party to the ten-millionth performance of a concerto of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Tschaikowsky, or Saint-Saens. Thus on the occasion of his last appearance with our symphony orchestra he introduced to us the concerto of Dohnanyi, while yesterday he was responsible for the Boston premiere of that of Respighi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 6 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Sergei Moussevitzky conducting, will be heard at the Capitol theater February 6, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Nothing save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Mr. Koussevitzky.

Koussevitzy could not rest content with bringing music to the city folk of Russia alone. There lay about him a vast agrarian population, most of whom had never heard a symphony concert. He chartered a large steamer on the Volga river, and taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends, made several voyages along the 25,00 miles of its basin.

In 1909, in partnership with his wife, Koussevitzky inaugurated in Russia what has come to be one of the most important music publishing concerns. In this way there have been published works by such Russian composers as Stravinsky, Rachmaninoff, Prokofieff and Scriabin.

The seat sale for the concert is now in progress at McCoy's Music store, 89 Asylum street. Tickets may also be obtained by calling Frank Sedgwick, 2-2251, who is bringing this musical attraction to Hartford.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 6 1927

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Sergei Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard at the Capitol Theater, February 6, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Nothing, save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Mr. Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, than the circumstances of his career. Koussevitzky could not rest content with bringing music to the city folk of Russia alone. There lay about him a vast agrarian population, most of whom had never heard a symphony concert. He chartered a large steamer on the Volga river, and taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends, made several voyages along the 2,500 miles of its basin.

In 1909, in partnership with his wife, Koussevitzky inaugurated in Russia what has come to be one of the most important of music publishing concerns. In this way there have been published works by such Russian composers as Stravinsky, Rachmaninoff, Prokofieff and Scriabin. Thus, in championing a new score which he believes significant, Koussevitzky can give public performance and publication as well.

The seat sale for the concert is now in progress at McCoy's Music Store, 89 Asylum street. Tickets may also be obtained by calling Frank Sedgwick, 2-2251, who is bringing this musical attraction to Hartford.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN
JAN 7 1927

Boston Symphony Plays New Sibelius Work To-morrow

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's program in Carnegie Hall to-morrow afternoon will consist of a concerto of Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been arranged for string orchestra and a small group of wood wind instruments, especially for Mr. Koussevitzky, by Maximilian Steinberg. The seventh symphony of Sibelius will have its first New York performance at this concert. The symphony is in one movement and is the latest of the Finnish composer. The other numbers will be a suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Firebird," and Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
JAN 7 1927
22

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. Wanda Landowska, harpsichordist, assisting artist. Program: Mozart, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"; De Falla, Concerto for Harpsichord, Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Violin and Cello; Mozart, Rondo for Harpsichord and Orchestra; Strawinsky, "Le Sacre du Printemps." At Carnegie Hall, last evening.

* * *

A CONCERTO for Harpsichord, Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Violin and Cello, by Manuel De Falla, was revealed for the first time to a New York audience last evening in Carnegie Hall. Preceded by Mozart's familiar "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and followed by the same composer's D major Rondo for Harpsichord and Orchestra, the Concerto enlisted the aid of Mme. Landowska, to whom it was dedicated by the composer, in its performance. The wind and string instrument parts were played by members of the Boston Symphony, and Mr. Koussewitsky conducted. According to information supplied the annotator of the program by Mme. Landowska, De Falla was engaged in the composition of this music from 1923 to 1926, and it may therefore be understood to represent the development of his present style, first heralded in the production of "El Retablo de Maeser Pedro." It is music of distinction and charm, aristocratic of texture, penetrating both in its wit and its sentiment, contrived and scored with the greatest dexterity.

* * *

THE DE FALLA of this Concerto and of the "Retablo" ranks among the more interesting and important of modern masters. It is distinctly difficult to associate these later works with music such as that contained in "Nights in the Gardens of Spain." The transition describes a wide arc. From a talented composer of vivid and colorful program music, De Falla has become an arresting individualist. His later music bears the stamp of an active and daring imagination; it has verve, force, originality. De Falla compels the attention both by what he has to say and the manner in which he says it. He has achieved, for the present, a satisfactory idiom for the expression of his ideas. The Concerto is an admirable work; its significance is perhaps not great, for here De Falla has written music of an intimate nature, music which attempts the expression of no powerful or deeply affecting emotions, but rather music to embody certain lighter moods of gayety and gentle melancholy. The Concerto does not adhere to a fixed tonality. A diversity of keys, or tonalities, is registered in each movement. The initial Allegro opens and ends in B major, its themes—with the exception of a lyric A major phrase for violin and cello in octaves—are treated dissonantly. The second movement is based upon a choral motif of lovely character, first treated in full harmony which lends it an antique color. Later it is used as a straight canon with dignified, medieval effect. This second movement, a lento of quiet gravity, is the gem of the work, though on a first hearing it appears a trifle long. The finale is jocose and spirited, rather trivial, and more markedly modern than the other movements in spirit.

* * *

MME. LANDOWSKA and her associates excellently played this work. But the Concerto should be heard in a smaller auditorium than that of Carnegie Hall, where the delicate and fragile tone of the harpsichord does not sound to advantage. It was in the Mozart Rondo that Mme. Landowska best displayed the unique perfection of her art. Her performance of this rather uninteresting music was a miracle of sympathy, intelligence and skill. The concert opened with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," of which Mr. Koussewitsky gave a thoroughly unappreciative reading. The charm of the music was utterly destroyed by his capricious and irrelevant tempi, for the most part far too fast. Strawinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" followed the intermission. Its performance was one of assertive power and true virtuosity both on the part of

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Springfield welcomes this concert each year with the largest audience that can be accommodated in the Springfield Municipal Auditorium. Sunday will be no exception to this rule.

The Y. M. C. A. is having its usual large demand for admission tickets. Admission is free at the front doors for as many as can be accommodated after the season's subscribers and patrons are admitted. The terrace door opens at 2, the front doors at 2.45, and the concert begins at 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

JAN 5 - 1927

Moments

By SIDNEY

To Whom Announcements a Matters May Be Ad

ON THE CALENDAR.

Jan. 9—Lowell Philharmonic Orchestral Society, Liberty hall, 3 p. m

Next Sunday afternoon in Liberty hall the Lowell Philharmonic Orchestral Society, Julius Woessner conducting, will give the first concert of its second season as one of the city's musical organizations. Varying the instrumental numbers will be an operatic aria and a group of songs by Miss Amey L. French, soprano, with Miss Margaret R. Martin at the piano for the latter. In the case of one or two of the instruments needed for a satisfactory performance, such as the oboe and bassoon, the orchestra will be supplemented by musicians from Boston. Tickets at 50 cents may be had at the music stores. The program, as Mr. Woessner has arranged it, will be as follows:

March Militaire ..... Schubert
Unfinished Symphony, Allegro Moderato ..... Schubert
Serenata ..... Moskowski

One Fine Day (from Madame Butterfly) ..... Puccini
Miss French, with orchestra.

La Feria, Suite Espagnole..Lacome
(a) Los Toros
(b) La Reja
(c) La Zarguela
Reve Angelique ..... Rubinstein

Bergerettes ..... Arr. Weckerlin
(a) Bergere Legere
(b) Jeunne Fillette
Wings of Night ..... Watts
The Little Red Lark ..... Needham
Miss French, with piano.

Two Guitars ..... Horlick
Skaters' Waltz ..... Waldteufel
Selections from Lucia ..... Donizetti
Tancrede Overture ..... Rossini

It is now two years since a group of the employees of the Lowell Electric Light Corp. voluntarily formed and organized an orchestra.

Weekly rehearsals, lasting for two or three hours, have brought the members into close association musically, resulting in a degree of proficiency that is not very often attained by organizations of a similar character.

Back of the organization has been a three-fold purpose: First, to play for their own pleasure and musical benefit the best music of the best composers; second, to pass on some of that enjoyment and inspiration to their fellow employees; third, to contribute, without competing with commercial or so-called professional orchestras, to the musical enjoyment of the community.

For the first purpose, in some degree, they might have turned to the popular music of the day. They chose rather to cultivate a taste for music of less ephemeral a character, music that would be worth the study and time put into its preparation. The slogan has been and is "To Inspire and Stimulate the Love of Good Music." Hence the weekly rehearsals have been devoted almost exclusively to classical music and concert selections. To this end the members have given their time and effort without pay.

Thus, in the program they played before the Middlesex Women's Club on Monday afternoon they were able to give very genuine pleasure as Mr. John A. Hunnewell led them through such numbers as the Liberty Bell March of Sousa; the first part of the Ballet Egyptienne, by Luigini; Arditi's waltz, Il Bacio; Ase's Death, from Grieg's Peer Gynt Suite, and the Poet and Peasant Overture, by von Suppe.

Rearrangement of the music for the instrumentation of the orchestra seems to have been more than ordinarily successful. The ensemble has learned to subordinate volume to the accom[illegible]ment. There [illegible] of tone [illegible] shade [illegible] val[illegible]

(Wagner). Prelude to "The Mas-[illegible]elius), Prelude to "Lohen-
[illegible] Forest Murmurs from "Dusk
[illegible]al March from "Dusk

Within the limitations of its membership and of its instrumentation the orchestra is now capable of giving no little color and character to the music in hand.

Hearing it on Monday, it was easy to understand Mr. Hunnewell's personal interest in a development toward which his own love for good music has undoubtedly contributed in great degree, supplementing the work of the orchestra's capable director and leading violinist, Mr. H. O. Faust.

That the fellow employees of the members have come to take a pride in the orchestra, and that, while in no sense a part of the structure of the Lowell Electric Light Corp., that concern has been glad to encourage it are facts that are not surprising, in view of the painstaking interest of the young men who play in it.

Among the musical organizations of the city in several respects it may be said to have a distinctive place.

Certainly when it is learned that the orchestra is about to take up the study of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, there is encouragement for those who do not believe that music begins and ends with jazz.

On the last day of the month the Chicago Civic Opera Co. will open its annual two-weeks engagement in the Boston Opera House, in the course of which 16 performances with ex-

Musical

R. FLEET

d Communications on Musical dressed at This Office.

cellent casts are scheduled. Aida will be the opera for the first night.

This week the Boston Symphony orchestra makes one of its musical pilgrimages to New York, so that there will be no concerts at home Friday and Saturday.

John Charles Thomas, baritone, formerly and deservedly a favorite in musical comedy, but who of late has bene singing in grand opera in Brussels, was well received in concert in Boston on Sunday. The reviewers agree that he was especially successful and pleasing in such operatic excerpts as were included in a varied program. After a short concert tour in this country he is to return to Brussels to take his place among the company at La Monnaie Opera.

A daughter was born recently to Mr. and Mrs. Deems Taylor. Mr. Taylor, who once came to Lowell for the production by the Choral Society of his cantata, "he Highwayman, is the composer of a new opera, The King's Henchman, soon to be produced by the Metropolitan Opera Co.

Millo Picco, baritone, well known in Lowell, continues to be one of the most useful members of the Metropolitan Opera Co., judging from the frequency with which his name appears in the announcements of the casts.

There have been reports that the St. Louis Symphony orchestra might be unable to finish its season, owing to a lack of funds. Hopefully musical people of means in that city will be found to come to the rescue. Certainly it would be a pity to abandon the orchestra now that its musical development is so promising.

Marion Talley, whose 20th birthday anniversary was last week Monday, celebrated by signing a new contract with the Metropolitan Opera Co.

The dates of Springfield's annual music festival have been changed to May 2, 3 and 4, when the chorus under the baton of John J. Bishop will give Verdi's Requiem as the chief choral work on the list. The soloists will be Elizabeth Rethberg, Katherine Meisle, Arthur Hackett-Granville and Leon Rothier.

Richard Strauss is reported to be of the opinion that music for the films is one of the most promising mediums for composers. While a number of well known composers have written scores to accompany the filmed drama, the fact that so many of the films pass into oblivion after a short run has discouraged a more general interest in this field of composition. To write music for a movie which holds the screen for an hour and a half requires no little time and effort on the part of the composer. And there is little prospect that the piece will remain in the screen repertory for more than a few months at the most. Whether this condition will be changed by the invention of the vitaphone, synchronizing recorded music with the films, remains to be seen. It seems possible, however, that the development may give wider opportunity for the composer's talent.

The National Opera Club of America is conducting a nation-wide contest for young American trained singers in conjunction with the National Federation of Music Clubs. A jury of prominent musicians will decide the contests, and every trained woman singer from 20 to 32 years may have part. A prize of $1000 will be awarded the final victor, an audition at the Metropolitan Opera House, an appearance with the San Carlo Opera Co. and launching upon the stage without retainer fee. In addition, the federation voice prize of $500 may be won by the same contestant. Contests will be held first by state, then by district, the final national contest being held in April, 1927. Full particulars upon request to Mrs. E. H. Cahill, chairman of contest committee, 839 West End avenue, New York city.

Within a few days, according to the publishers, the sales of Nevin's best known song, "The Rosary," reached the six million mark. In all, the family of the lamented composer has received $400,000 in royalties for this one song.

Writing in the November number of the Etude on certain details that are often neglected by pianists, Arthur Foote of Boston included the following interesting paragraph:

"It is of value to the pupil to realize how the style of writing (for the pianoforte) at different periods has been influenced by the mechanism of the clavichord, harpischord and the pianoforte of 1826 as well as that of today. When the action of the pianoforte was light, with but a little dip of the keys, and little resistance to the finger tips, the tendency was toward exceedingly rapid passage work and quick tempi, the reverse being the case today. An example of the unmusical rapid tempi that were encouraged by the light pianoforte action of 100 years ago is seen in the metronome marks of Czerny's studies and of his Bach edition. It is odd how a once favorite pianoforte figure (that of repeated notes in quick tempo) has nearly disappeared, owing to its extreme difficulty of performance with our heavier action."

THIS CLIPPING FROM REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
MAR 2 - 1927

THE CAREER OF SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Nothin, save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when comes to Woolsey Hall, March 9, than the circumstances of his career.

He first conducted as a boy of 12, when he led the local theater orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in northern Russia.

Koussevitzky's abilities, were not of the sort to be so confined to a limited field, and from 1909 he devoted all his energies to conducting. He organized his own symphony orchestra in Moscow, which soon came to be considered the finest in Russia.

Koussevitzky could not rest content with bringing music to the city folk of Russia. There lay about him a vast agrarian population, most of whom had never even heard a symphony concert. He chartered a large steamer, on the Volga River, and taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends made several voyages along the 2,500 miles of its basin. The party would port at each town along its bank, and announce a symphony concert in the local town hall. The country folk were of course astonished at this wonderful, new kind of music, but they were also both delighted and moved by it.

In 1909, in partnership with his wife, Koussevitzky inaugurated in Russia what has come to be one of the most important of music publishing concerns. In this way there have been published works by such Russian composers as Stravinsky, Rachmaninoff, Prokofieff, and Scriabin. Thus, in championing a new score which he believes significant, Koussevitzky can give it public performance and publication as well.

The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, but not of his energies. He became conductor of the Russian State Orchestra (formerly the Court Orchestra).

Each Spring, since Koussevitzky became the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924, he has returned at the conclusion of his American season to conduct his Paris and London series, which the European public evidently hold to be an indispensable part of their musical life.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TRIBUNE
TERRE HAUTE, IND.
JAN 6 - 1927

SPALDING WINS ONLY PRAISE FROM CRITICS

When Albert Spalding, violinist, who will play here on January 11, at the Grand theater first played the Respighi concerto in this country it was with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston, and this is what one of the leading critics, H. T. Parker, said, in the Boston Transcript:

"Never was applause more certain and not a little of it was of right for Mr. Spalding. He plays concertos Respighi's violin part with a mingling of songful sweetness and graver austerity; of reticence without and exaltation within that transfigured the concerto beyond desert. Mr. Spalding studied in Italy and there gained a fine-strung, lustrous sweetness of tone. Mr. Spalding has become a serious, sensitive, studious, finely touched musician. The Spalding of the younger and the elder day met matured in the concerto and to its greater glory."

Warren Storey Smith in the Boston Post:

"Spalding's masterly playing is a feature.

"It is high time Mr. Spalding was hailed as a violinist of the first importance. Indeed, had he first come to us from Russia or from Bohemia it is altogether likely that his name would long ago have been one with which managers might conjure.

"A musician of serious aims and of high ideals, Mr. Spalding has in the main elected to identify himself with unfamiliar music of interest rather than to be party to the ten-millionth performance of a concerto of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Tschaikowsky, or Saint-Saens. Thus on the occasion of his last appearance with our symphony orchestra he introduced to us the concerto of Dohnanyi, while yesterday he was responsible for the Boston premiere of that of Respighi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 6 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Sergei Moussevitzky conducting, will be heard at the Capitol theater February 6, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Nothing save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Mr. Koussevitzky.

Koussevitzy could not rest content with bringing music to the city folk of Russia alone. There lay about him a vast agrarian population, most of whom had never heard a symphony concert. He chartered a large steamer on the Volga river, and taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends, made several voyages along the 25,00 miles of its basin.

In 1909, in partnership with his wife, Koussevitzky inaugurated in Russia what has come to be one of the most important music publishing concerns. In this way there have been published works by such Russian composers as Stravinsky, Rachmaninoff, Prokofieff and Scriabin.

The seat sale for the concert is now in progress at McCoy's Music store, 89 Asylum street. Tickets may also be obtained by calling Frank Sedgwick, 2-2251, who is bringing this musical attraction to Hartford.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 6 1927

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Sergei Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard at the Capitol Theater, February 6, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Nothing, save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Mr. Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, than the circumstances of his career. Koussevitzky could not rest content with bringing music to the city folk of Russia alone. There lay about him a vast agrarian population, most of whom had never heard a symphony concert. He chartered a large steamer on the Volga river, and taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends, made several voyages along the 2,500 miles of its basin.

In 1909, in partnership with his wife, Koussevitzky inaugurated in Russia what has come to be one of the most important of music publishing concerns. In this way there have been published works by such Russian composers as Stravinsky, Rachmaninoff, Prokofieff and Scriabin. Thus, in championing a new score which he believes significant, Koussevitzky can give public performance and publication as well.

The seat sale for the concert is now in progress at McCoy's Music Store, 89 Asylum street. Tickets may also be obtained by calling Frank Sedgwick, 2-2251, who is bringing this musical attraction to Hartford.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN
JAN 7 1927

Boston Symphony Plays New Sibelius Work To-morrow

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's program in Carnegie Hall to-morrow afternoon will consist of a concerto of Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been arranged for string orchestra and a small group of wood wind instruments, especially for Mr. Koussevitzky, by Maximilian Steinberg. The seventh symphony of Sibelius will have its first New York performance at this concert. The symphony is in one movement and is the latest of the Finnish composer. The other numbers will be a suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Firebird," and Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
JAN 7 1927

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. Wanda Landowska, harpsichordist, assisting artist. Program: Mozart, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"; De Falla, Concerto for Harpsichord, Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Violin and Cello; Mozart, Rondo for Harpsichord and Orchestra; Strawinsky, "Le Sacre du Printemps." At Carnegie Hall, last evening.

* * *

A CONCERTO for Harpsichord, Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Violin and Cello, by Manuel De Falla, was revealed for the first time to a New York audience last evening in Carnegie Hall. Preceded by Mozart's familiar "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and followed by the same composer's D major Rondo for Harpsichord and Orchestra, the Concerto enlisted the aid of Mme. Landowska, to whom it was dedicated by the composer, in its performance. The wind and string instrument parts were played by members of the Boston Symphony, and Mr. Koussewitsky conducted. According to information supplied the annotator of the program by Mme. Landowska, De Falla was engaged in the composition of this music from 1923 to 1926, and it may therefore be understood to represent the development of his present style, first heralded in the production of "El Retablo de Maeser Pedro." It is music of distinction and charm, aristocratic of texture, penetrating both in its wit and its sentiment, contrived and scored with the greatest dexterity.

* * *

THE DE FALLA of this Concerto and of the "Retablo" ranks among the more interesting and important of modern masters. It is distinctly difficult to associate these later works with music such as that contained in "Nights in the Gardens of Spain." The transition describes a wide arc. From a talented composer of vivid and colorful program music, De Falla has become an arresting individualist. His later music bears the stamp of an active and daring imagination; it has verve, force, originality. De Falla compels the attention both by what he has to say and the manner in which he says it. He has achieved, for the present, a satisfactory idiom for the expression of his ideas. The Concerto is an admirable work; its significance is perhaps not great, for here De Falla has written music of an intimate nature, music which attempts the expression of no powerful or deeply affecting emotions, but rather music to embody certain lighter moods of gayety and gentle melancholy. The Concerto does not adhere to a fixed tonality. A diversity of keys, or tonalities, is registered in each movement. The initial Allegro opens and ends in B major, its themes—with the exception of a lyric A major phrase for violin and cello in octaves—are treated dissonantly. The second movement is based upon a choral motif of lovely character, first treated in full harmony which lends it an antique color. Later it is used as a straight canon with dignified, medieval effect. This second movement, a lento of quiet gravity, is the gem of the work, though on a first hearing it appears a trifle long. The finale is jocose and spirited, rather trivial, and more markedly modern than the other movements in spirit.

* * *

MME. LANDOWSKA and her associates excellently played this work. But the Concerto should be heard in a smaller auditorium than that of Carnegie Hall, where the delicate and fragile tone of the harpsichord does not sound to advantage. It was in the Mozart Rondo that Mme. Landowska best displayed the unique perfection of her art. Her performance of this rather uninteresting music was a miracle of sympathy, intelligence and skill. The concert opened with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," of which Mr. Koussewitsky gave a thoroughly unappreciative reading. The charm of the music was utterly destroyed by his capricious and irrelevant tempi, for the most part far too fast. Strawinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" followed the intermission. Its performance was one of assertive power and true virtuosity both on the part of

Music

By Olga Samaroff

Boston Symphony Presents New De Falla Work, With Landowska as Soloist

NY EVENING POST JAN 7

THE eminent harpsichordist, Mme. Wanda Landowska, gives an account of de Falla's new harpsichord concerto, played for the first time in New York last night, which seems the best introduction of the work to the reading public. She writes in a letter to Philip Hale, the well-known annotator of the Boston Symphony programs: "The story of De Falla's Concerto is very interesting. Four years ago I spent several days with my friend De Falla in Granada and at the very moment that he was working at his 'Retablo,' a part of which he devoted to the harpsichord, I had my harpsichord with me (being, of course, on a concert tour in Spain), and I was able to play for him a great deal and to speak about the various possibilities of the instrument.

Olga Samaroff

He became more and more interested and after a few days of conversations between us he grew so enthusiastic that he resolved to write a concerto for the harpsichord. He took three years to compose this work, which was finished in September, 1926. But when one becomes acquainted with the music one understands that the master carried with him a long time such a deep work that needed to come to life little by little."

WHEN a creative artist of De Falla's stature has taken three years to write a work and an interpretative artist of Mme. Landowska's caliber appears as its champion, it would seem a very superficial thing for any writer to undertake a final verdict concerning its value after a few hours' acquaintance. I therefore attempt no more than to record my impressions of the concerto at a first hearing.

De Falla has used the harpsichord very successfully in the score of "Retablo," which, in my opinion, is a masterpiece. In the concerto, which is scored for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and violoncello, I could not banish the feeling that the substance of the music was foreign to the instrument.

Being certain that the performance had nothing to do with this impression, for Mme. Landowska's mastery of the harpsichord stands beyond question, I must assume that the way the music itself is written accounts for it.

In spite of the fact that only single instruments of those for which the concerto is scored were used, the harpsichord often sounded impotent and sometimes could not be distinguished at all in tutti passages in spite of the visual assurance that Mme. Landowska was playing. A fashion exists to rob lovely old instruments of the clavecin variety of their inner works and use them as desks and toilet tables. Without in the least wishing to compare De Falla's music with a desk or a toilet table, I must admit that this thought crossed my mind during the performance as the impression deepened that the harpsichord was being used in a way foreign to its real nature.

FROM a purely musical standpoint a first hearing gave me the feeling that De Falla's musical inventiveness in this work is infinitely weaker than in "Retablo" or even in the "Nights in the Gardens of Spain." Side by side with ideas of a certain rather sentimental beauty, there are bare stretches of inconsequential writing which could only be redeemed—as they often are in uninspired works—by intriguing sonority effects. But De Falla either does not try or does not succeed in achieving these in spite of the interesting group of instruments he has selected as his medium. Mme. Landowska claims qualities for the work in her commentary to which her greater acquaintance with the music lends authority, but it is hard to believe that the score, the structure of which seems quite clear, holds hidden profundities only to be realized after long acquaintance. I doubt whether the Concerto will take an ultimate place among De Falla's major works. The public received it politely but without enthusiasm.

The concert began with a spirited and finely polished performance of Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and the de Falla Concerto was followed by the same master's Rondo for harpsichord and orchestra, in which the solo part was enchantingly played by Mme. Landowska. Here the harpsichord reigned in a realm where it is supreme and against the background of a finely adjusted accompaniment Mme. Landowska and her beloved instrument spoke to us of another age with ingratiating charm and a sonority of ravishing beauty.

The second half of the program was devoted to "Le Sacre du Printemps" of Stravinsky. Profound understanding both musical and emotional, and virtuosity in conducting combined in Mr. Koussewitzky's reading of this remarkable work to make for a memorable performance.

The sureness with which Stravinsky has written every note of this score is amazing. If he ever hesitated or changed a thing, every vestige of such a process is obliterated. The music pours forth with torrential spontaneity, compelling, ruthless, at times strangely beautiful, at others relentlessly ugly, but always breathing the power of a real creative force. If Stravinsky had never written anything else he would, in my opinion, rank as a great composer. A chain may be as strong as its weakest link, but this principle does not apply to creative art. We do not measure Beethoven by the Waterloo Symphony or Konig Stefan. The man who has given us the "Sacre," "Les Noces," "Rossignol," "The Fire-Bird" and "Petruschka" has already won his place among the immortals.

[illegible] twang [illegible] it did not shine with any brilliance except in the last movement, the "Vivace flessibile scherzando." This was superbly done by both Mme. Landowska and her accompanying instruments.

The delights of Mozart were not denied. Wanda Landokska came in once more to delight the audience with the delicate tones of her instrument, reminiscent of the scenes brought to life by the Guitry or elsewhere on Broadway. The ugly stage of the hall, made uglier still by the empty chairs standing about, was peopled with visions in satins and crinolines. That the audience was not averse to these lighter moods of the composer was made evident by the ringing round of applause.

But the tour de force of the evening was the brilliant rendition of Koussevitsky and his orchestra of the famous work of Stravinsky, "Sacre du Printemp." The sheer brute force of its contrasting rhythms and sinister blaring woodwind effects was powerfully brought out by the conductor. I heard Koussevitsky. It was the Russian Koussevitsky at his best. Even Stravinsky was not as great when he conducted here two years ago. Last night's was a great performance.

N. Z.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAPH
JAN 7 1927

SYMPHONY PLAYS EPICURE'S MUSIC

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitsky, was given last night at Carnegie Hall. It was a curious concert, consisting as it did, of the lightest sort of fine spun music in the beginning, and of the stunning atavistic barbarism of the Slavic iconclast, Stravinsky.

Mozart's serenade for string orchestra, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" gave Koussevitsky a chance to show off the light prancing paces of his orchestra, and to have the audience whispering audibly all over the concert hall, "How delightful!" as is its wont. But it was music for the epicure, and it seemed as if Carnegie Hall was full last night of those who appreciate the canary tongues of music.

The much-touted piece of De Falla's, dedicated to Wanda Landowska did not seem to me serious music by the master who had written "Retblo" and the famous piano works. It was an extravaganza of [illegible] church music and light tango [illegible] heard a radio [illegible] suite [illegible] performance last night, with an intensity and a dramatic sweep that make its longeurs seem imaginary and heighten extraordinarily its tragic poignancy and its elemental power.

"He caused us inded, to ask ourselves last evening, if this is not, after all, Beethoven at his most superb; if this symphony is not the greatest of the nine."

Hartford music lovers, as anticipated, have not failed to show their appreciation to Mr. Sedgwick who is responsible for bringing the distinguished organization here. As expected, the capacity of the Capitol theater will be taxed on the date of the concert, February 6. Reservations may be obtained by calling Mr. Sedgwick at McCoy's Music Store, 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN
JAN 7 1927

The Boston Sym

Mme. Landowska, Fea Soloist, Plays De

By W. J. HENDE

The Boston Symphony Orc Carnegie Hall last night was a Mme. Wanda Landowska as so follows: Mozart's "Eine Kleine Falla's concerto for harpsichor cello, a rondo of Mozart for ha Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Prin to illustrate the difference betw manners of music.

De Falla's concerto is new and is dedicated to the exceptional artist who performed the clavier part. Four years ago, she has informed us, she was working with the composer on the harpsichord part of his "El Retablo," which she afterward played, and as she unfolded to him the possibilities of her chosen instrument he grew so enthusiastic that he determined to write a concerto for it. Three years later he had completed the work heard last evening, and it was produced at the de Falla festival in Barcelona on November 5, 1926, with Mme. Landowska at the keyboard.

Much has been written about this composition. The most illuminating article, perhaps, is that of Juan Thomas in the December Chesterian. To summarize, the concerto is "an effort of rhythmic-tonal modernity." There is nothing iconoclastic. "Rhythm, tonality, melodic and harmonic development follow traditional lines," yet it is all as novel as Stravinsky. The classic form evolves naturally. The themes of the first movement come from Catalonian-Andalusian folk lore and the coloring is romantic and mediæval. The show movement is essentially mediæval. The finale is a lively one, with the freedom of the eighteenth century.

Mme. Landowska, herself a writer of literary skill and imaginative charm and an authority on the music of the elder day, has contributed the following two glowing paragraphs on the possibilities of the harpsichord in modern music.

"The harpsichord, basis of the orchestra of the seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries, that 'column on which rested the entire ensemble, whose harmonious and rippling sound produced an infinitely beautiful effect on the chorus,' appears to-day for the first time in a modern work. It will not try to reproduce the effects or manners of the ancients. The 'king of instruments,' brought back to life and lending an attentive and benevolent ear to the nostalgic seeking of the young, will gladly yield for them the unexplored riches of its sonorities.

"It will set everything on fire with its rhythmic lightnings; it will spread abroad the flamboyant shower of its radiant timbres. With its ready double keyboard—now a mysterious organ, now a hyperbolic guitar—it will enliven through its ecstasy or its voluptuous bitings the somewhat blase body of the orchestra. Covering the latter with a fine, firm grill-work, glittering tremulous, vibrant, it will liberate from its resounding strings the perceived, the fantastic and the unforeseen."

All of which may be true—but not in Carnegie Hall. Why Mme. Landowska elected to introduce her friend's concerto in the midst of the great open spaces is inconceivable. Assuredly none of the rhapsodies we have read were written after such a futile performance as that of last evening. Doubtless the music was excellently played, but it did not sound. It is a chamber music composition and should be gently delivered under the sheltering wings of the League of Composers in the educational precincts of the Town Hall.

But even there its fate would be doubtful. Perhaps this work breathes the soul of Spain, but much of it was dressed with imported Russian salad sauce. Mahomet remarked in the eighth Sura, "The infidels lend one another mutual aid," but the infidels who scoff at old fas[illegible] music and make strange sounds unto the newer glory of art get all their help from a now exhausted Russian, who himself seeks salvation at the foot of the throne of Bach.

De Falla may perhaps eventually free himself from the bondage of Stravinsky, but he has not done so in this concerto. It may be all that the brethren have asserted that it is, but in Carnegie Hall last night it drooped damply through a limp quarter of an hour, a gelatinous and wabbling substance adrift on the yet uncharted sea of so called modernism. Mme. Landowska's exquisite art was smothered by the voices of the few instruments associated with the harpsichord and it was beyond question that the audience was glad when she was actually heard in the rondo from the D major concerto of Mozart, music made long ago indeed, but not yet old fashioned.

She played her part charmingly and her hearers applauded warmly. After the de Falla number they were coldly polite. The other music on the program does not demand discussion at this time. The conviction is slowly forming that Stravinsky completed his message to his time with the "Rites of Spring" and there is a growing suspicion that he had nothing to say to posterity. But it is too soon to talk about that; and anyhow it is posterity's affair, not ours.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
JAN 7 1927

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The novelty of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall was the performance, for the first time in this city, of Manuel de Falla's concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and violoncello. The player of the harpsichord was Mme. Wanda Landowska, who also appeared as solist in the performance of the last movement of Mozart's D major concerto for that instrument and orchestra. The purely orchestra pieces were Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik" and Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps."

De Falla's concerto was the result of conferences with Mme. Landowska at the composer's home in Granada four years ago, when he was at work upon his music for "El Retablo." In the score of "El Retablo" de Falla used a harpsichord. Mme. Landowska, then touring Spain, was able to extend the composers knowledge of the capacities of her favorite instrument. De Falla decided to write a concerto for harpsichord. He was three years in completing it, and the first performance took place at Barcelona, on last Nov. 5, with Pablo Casals conducting, and Mme. Landowska as soloist.

The concerto is in three movements. The work follows loosely established forms, but there is considerable freedom in tonal relations and harmonic effects, which ill conceal the cloven hoof of Igor Stravinsky. It is not easy, and it would not be fair, to estimate this concerto after a performance in Carnegie Hall. Its proper place is elsewhere. It is not a symphonic work, but a chamber composition. The harpischord was at times barely audible and seldom effective in the spaces of the big auditorium. It was interesting to observe that although de Falla employed only five instruments to balance the one of wires and keys, the harpsichord was not as effective as it was in the Rondo of the concerto of Mozart, who used with it a small orchestra.

This in itself is not determinative of the value of the music or the expertness of the scoring. De Falla had other things in mind than display passages for the harpsichord. He makes it an integral part, and usually a modest one, of his ensemble. He combines tone colors in a manner that is often intentionally archaic, and intimately related to his formal design. Words of Mme. Landowska are appropriate here.

"This new music is a composite of Hispano-Castillian elements rather than an echo of Andalusia or another Spanish province. It is extremely important to stress this point because naturally every concertgoer, and even a musician, expects and rejoices in advance at the thought of hearing in the new de Falla concerto some languishing motifs of the Alhambra accompanied by arpeggios imitating the guitar."

The middle movement of the concerto was last night the most striking. The finale has some gay, open-air melodies of brighter hue, but in the slow movement there is a fine austerity and dignity of utterance. Whether the music would possess more virility and potency of invention if it were heard under the intimate conditions of a small concert hall cannot be computed here. Let us hope that an opportunity for a hearing of this carefully wrought composition in more advantageous surroundings may soon be forthcoming.

In Mozart's finale Mme. Landowska was enabled to display her crisp and elegant technic of the harpsichord, her musicianship and profound knowledge of the style of the eighteenth century, her spirit as a player. The pleasure of hearing Mozart so performed was the greater for the self-conscious art which had preceded. In the succeeding [illegible] the harpsichord was more in place than [illegible] modern piece [illegible] of the interpreter the better realized. There was hearty applause for Mme. Landowska, and even some for Mozart.

Mozart had received a measure of his due earlier in the evening. The performance of the "Nachtmusik" was one of exemplary clarity, balance, sensitiveness and finish. Speed was never incompatible with delicacy, or poetry with the careful observance of the comporer's marks of expression. And this is one of Mozart's most charming creations in the lighter vein—four little pieces, full of beauty and wit and genius. The audience was delighted.

It is plain that Mr. Koussevitsky as never before has his orchestra trained and in his hand. Mr. Monteux gave a memorable performance of the "Sacre du printemps" three seasons ago, which was the occasion of the introduction of Stravinsky's iconoclastic music in this city. The performance last night had all the regard for detail of Mr. Monteaux, and for the greater part of the time something more—a sense of primitive ceremonial and mystery, an energy apparently cataclysmic; although, as a matter of fact, it was always controlled.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
JAN 7 1927

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

New York premieres, which used to be as scarce as hen's teeth, are now too plentiful to excite any undue interest, even when the composer has the reputation of De Falla, whose Concerto for harpischord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and violoncello was the novelty of the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall last night. However, in this case the audience had good reason to expect something handsome from the pen of the talented Spaniard whom Mme. Landowska respectfully calls "the master," which makes us wonder what she calls Beethoven or Bach. De Falla is an excellent musician but not a great one, and his election to the immortals reminds one of Lytton Strachey's plaintive inquiry in his essay on the poetry of Blake: "If Mr. F.'s aunt was a woman of genius, what are we to say of Hamlet?"

In a program note the exponent of the harpsichord who officiated as soloist last night informs us that the "master" took three years to compose the concerto. The wonder is that he composed it at all. For the strange little work shows De Falla altogether out of his element, forsaking the inns and dance halls of his native towns which resounded with the spirited or languid folk tunes of Spain for the dubious sensations of the hot-house academies of the ultra-modernists. The piece is a patchwork of dull fragments stitched over an assortment of deliberately contrived rhythms according to the present fashion. The tunes may have had their origin in the sources of Spanish music, but the composer's treatment of them must have dissipated their national flavor, since, with the exception of parts of the last movement, the music as a whole is of the international variety to be heard at the concerts of the International Composers' League.

Mme. Landowska tinkled away at the muddy harmonies allotted to her ancient instrument, but the harpsichord is as much suited to this music as it would be to the repertoire of a brass band. Upon the conclusion of the new concerto the gifted soloist, quite unconscious of her cruelty to the "master," plunged into the last movement of Mozart's Concerto in D, which babbled vivaciously of charming trifles for the expression of which the harpsichord is the ideal medium. But a mere jest of Mozart's seemed closer to a modern audience than De Falla's cryptic solemnities, and last night's crowded house was not slow to choose between unclouded vitality and the very latest moribund introspection.

Mr. Koussevitzky opened the program with an exquisitely delicate interpretation of Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," the best performance of that delightful work I have heard in local halls for some time. The second half of the concert was dedicated to "Le Sacre du Printemps," Stravinsky's once shocking exposition of certain cosmic matters not usually mentioned in respectable concert halls. I venture to believe that without advance information the piece might mean anything at all, and to test my theory I put from me all thoughts of the supposedly intriguing Rites of Spring and listened to the Sacre in all innocence. But the only image formed in my mind by the first section of the piece was the morning awakening of the feathered inhabitants of a barnyard. "Le Sacre" may be an excellent ballet, but torn from its proper pantomine it seems to me a series of brilliant but unrelated orchestrated sensations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
JAN 7 1927

Music Notes

Boston Symphony in Brooklyn To-night.

The season's second concert in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be held at the Academy of Music to-night. The programme includes:

[illegible] D (C. P. E. Bach, ar

Music : By Olga Samaroff

Boston Symphony Presents New De Falla Work, With Landowska as Soloist

NY EVENING POST JAN 7

THE eminent harpsichordist, Mme. Wanda Landowska, gives an account of de Falla's new harpsichord concerto, played for the first time in New York last night, which seems the best introduction of the work to the reading public. She writes in a letter to Philip Hale, the well-known annotator of the Boston Symphony programs: "The story of De Falla's Concerto is very interesting. Four years ago I spent several days with my friend De Falla in Granada and at the very moment that he was working at his 'Retablo,' a part of which he devoted to the harpsichord, I had my harpsichord with me (being, of course, on a concert tour in Spain), and I was able to play for him a great deal and to speak about the various possibilities of the instrument.

Olga Samaroff

He became more and more interested and after a few days of conversations between us he grew so enthusiastic that he resolved to write a concerto for the harpsichord. He took three years to compose this work, which was finished in September, 1926. But when one becomes acquainted with the music one understands that the master carried with him a long time such a deep work that needed to come to life little by little."

WHEN a creative artist of De Falla's stature has taken three years to write a work and an interpretative artist of Mme. Landowska's caliber appears as its champion, it would seem a very superficial thing for any writer to undertake a final verdict concerning it's value after a few hours' acquaintance. I therefore attempt no more than to record my impressions of the concerto at a first hearing.

De Falla has used the harpsichord very successfully in the score of "Retablo," which, in my opinion, is a masterpiece. In the concerto, which is scored for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and violoncello, I could not banish the feeling that the substance of the music was foreign to the instrument.

Being certain that the performance had nothing to do with this impression, for Mme. Landowska's mastery of the harpsichord stands beyond question, I must assume that the way the music itself is written accounts for it.

In spite of the fact that only single instruments of those for which the concerto is scored were used, the harpsichord often sounded impotent and sometimes could not be distinguished at all in tutti passages in spite of the visual assurance that Mme. Landowska was playing. A fashion exists to rob lovely old instruments of the clavecin variety of their inner works and use them as desks and toilet tables. Without in the least wishing to compare De Falla's music with a desk or a toilet table, I must admit that this thought crossed my mind during the performance as the impression deepened that the harpsichord was being used in a way foreign to its real nature.

FROM a purely musical standpoint a first hearing gave me the feeling that De Falla's musical inventiveness in this work is infinitely weaker than in "Retablo" or even in the "Nights in the Gardens of Spain." Side by side with ideas of a certain rather sentimental beauty, there are bare stretches of inconsequential writing which could only be redeemed—as they often are in uninspired works—by intriguing sonority effects. But De Falla either does not try or does not succeed in achieving these in spite of the interesting group of instruments he has selected as his medium. Mme. Landowska claims qualities for the work in her commentary to which her greater acquaintance with the music lends authority, but it is hard to believe that the score, the structure of which seems quite clear, holds hidden profunditie only to be realized after long acquaintance. I doubt whether the Concerto will take an ultimate place among De Falla's major works. The public received it politely but without enthusiasm.

The concert began with a spirited and finely polished performance of Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and the de Falla Concerto was followed by the same master's Rondo for harpsichord and orchestra, in which the solo part was enchantingly played by Mme. Landowska. Here the harpsichord reigned in a realm where it is supreme and against the background of a finely adjusted accompaniment Mme. Landowska and her beloved instrument spoke to us of another age with ingratiating charm and a sonority of ravishing beauty.

The second half of the program was devoted to "Le Sacre du Printemps" of Stravinsky. Profound understanding both musical and emotional, and virtuosity in conducting combined in Mr. Roussewitzky's reading of this remarkable work to make for a memorable performance.

The sureness with which Stravinsky has written every note of this score is amazing. If he ever hesitated or changed a thing, every vestige of such a process is obliterated. The music pours forth with torrential spontaneity, compelling, ruthless, at times strangely beautiful, at others relentlessly ugly, but always breathing the power of a real creative force. If Stravinsky had never written anything else he would, in my opinion, rank as a great composer. A chain may be as strong as its weakest link, but this principle does not apply to creative art. We do not measure Beethoven by the Waterloo Symphony or Konig Stefan. The man who has given us the "Sacre," "Les Noces," "Rossignol," "The Fire-Bird" and "Petruschka" has already won his place among the immortals.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAPH
JAN 7 1927

SYMPHONY PLAYS EPICURE'S MUSIC

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitsky, was given last night at Carnegie Hall. It was a curious concert, consisting as it did, of the lightest sort of fine spun music in the beginning, and of the stunning atavistic barbarism of the Slavic iconclast, Stravinsky.

Mozart's serenade for string orchestra, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" gave Koussevitsky a chance to show off the light prancing paces of his orchestra, and to have the audience whispering audibly all over the concert hall, "How delightful!" as is its wont. But it was music for the epicure, and it seemed as if Carnegie Hall was full last night of those who appreciate the canary tongues of music.

The much-touted piece of De Falla's, dedicated to Wanda Landowska did not seem to me serious music by the master who had written "Retblo" and the famous piano works. It was an extravaganza of [illegible] church music and light tango [illegible] heard a radio hour [illegible] suite [illegible] performance last night, with an intensity and a dramatic sweep that make its longeurs seem imaginary and heighten extraordinarily its tragic poignancy and its elemental power.

"He caused us inded, to ask ourselves last evening, if this is not, after all, Beethoven at his most superb; if this symphony is not the greatest of the nine."

Hartford music lovers, as anticipated, have not failed to show their appreciation to Mr. Sedgwick who is responsible for bringing the distinguished organization here. As expected, the capacity of the Capitol theater will be taxed on the date of the concert, February 6. Reservations may be obtained by calling Mr. Sedgwick at McCoy's Music Store, 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN
JAN 7 1927

The Boston Sym

Mme. Landowska, Fea Soloist, Plays De

By W. J. HENDE

The Boston Symphony Orc Carnegie Hall last night was a Mme. Wanda Landowska as so follows: Mozart's "Eine Kleine Falla's concerto for harpsichor cello, a rondo of Mozart for ha Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Prin to illustrate the difference betw manners of music.

De Falla's concerto is new and is dedicated to the exceptional artist who performed the clavier part. Four years ago, she has informed us, she was working with the composer on the harpsichord part of his "El Retablo," which she afterward played, and as she unfolded to him the possibilities of her chosen instrument he grew so enthusiastic that he determined to write a concerto for it. Three years later he had completed the work heard last evening, and it was produced at the de Falla festival in Barcelona on November 5, 1926, with Mme. Landowska at the keyboard.

Much has been written about this composition. The most illuminating article, perhaps, is that of Juan Thomas in the December Chesterian. To summarize, the concerto is "an effort of rhythmic-tonal modernity." There is nothing iconoclastic. "Rhythm, tonality, melodic and harmonic development follow traditional lines," yet it is all as novel as Stravinsky. The classic form evolves naturally. The themes of the first movement come from Catalonian-Andalusian folk lore and the coloring is romantic and mediæval. The show movement is essentially mediæval. The finale is a lively one, with the freedom of the eighteenth century.

Mme. Landowska, herself a writer of literary skill and imaginative charm and an authority on the music of the elder day, has contributed the following two glowing paragraphs on the possibilities of the harpsichord in modern music.

"The harpsichord, basis of the orchestra of the seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries, that 'column on which rested the entire ensemble, whose harmonious and rippling sound produced an infinitely beautiful effect on the chorus,' appears to-day for the first time in a modern work. It will not try to reproduce the effects or manners of the ancients. The 'king of instruments,' brought back to life and lending an attentive and benevolent ear to the nostalgic seeking of the young, will gladly yield for them the unexplored riches of its sonorities.

"It will set everything on fire with its rhythmic lightnings; it will spread abroad the flamboyant shower of its radiant timbres. With its ready double keyboard—now a mysterious organ, now a hyperbolic guitar—it will enliven through its ecstasy or its voluptuous bitings the somewhat blase body of the orchestra. Covering the latter with a fine, firm grillwork, glittering tremulous, vibrant, it will liberate from its resounding strings the perceived, the fantastic and the unforeseen."

All of which may be true—but not in Carnegie Hall. Why Mme. Landowska elected to introduce her friend's concerto in the midst of the great open spaces is inconceivable. Assuredly none of the rhapsodies we have read were written after such a futile performance as that of last evening. Doubtless the music was excellently played, but it did not sound. It is a chamber music composition and should be gently delivered under the sheltering wings of the League of Composers in the educational precincts of the Town Hall.

But even there its fate would be doubtful. Perhaps this work breathes the soul of Spain, but much of it was dressed with imported Russian salad sauce. Mahomet remarked in the eighth Sura, "The infidels lend one another mutual aid," but the infidels who scoff at old fas[illegible] music and make strange sound[illegible] unto the newer glory of art get all their help from a now exhausted Russian, who himself seeks salvation at the foot of the throne of Bach.

De Falla may perhaps eventually free himself from the bondage of Stravinsky, but he has not done so in this concerto. It may be all that the brethren have asserted that it is, but in Carnegie Hall last night it drooped damply through a limp quarter of an hour, a gelatinous and wabbling substance adrift on the yet uncharted sea of so called modernism. Mme. Landowska's exquisite art was smothered by the voices of the few instruments associated with the harpsichord and it was beyond question that the audience was glad when she was actually heard in the rondo from the D major concerto of Mozart, music made long ago indeed, but not yet old fashioned.

She played her part charmingly and her hearers applauded warmly. After the de Falla number they were coldly polite. The other music on the program does not demand discussion at this time. The conviction is slowly forming that Stravinsky completed his message to his time with the "Rites of Spring" and there is a growing suspicion that he had nothing to say to posterity. But it is too soon to talk about that; and anyhow it is posterity's affair, not ours.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
JAN 7 1927

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The novelty of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall was the performance, for the first time in this city, of Manuel de Falla's concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and violoncello. The player of the harpsichord was Mme. Wanda Landowska, who also appeared as solist in the performance of the last movement of Mozart's D major concerto for that instrument and orchestra. The purely orchestra pieces were Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik" and Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps."

De Falla's concerto was the result of conferences with Mme. Landowska at the composer's home in Granada four years ago, when he was at work upon his music for "El Retablo." In the score of "El Retablo" de Falla used a harpsichord. Mme. Landowska, then touring Spain, was able to extend the composers knowledge of the capacities of her favorite instrument. De Falla decided to write a concerto for harpsichord. He was three years in completing it, and the first performance took place at Barcelona, on last Nov. 5, with Pablo Casals conducting, and Mme. Landowska as soloist.

The concerto is in three movements. The work follows loosely established forms, but there is considerable freedom in tonal relations and harmonic effects, which ill conceal the cloven hoof of Igor Stravinsky. It is not easy, and it would not be fair, to estimate this concerto after a performance in Carnegie Hall. Its proper place is elsewhere. It is not a symphonic work, but a chamber composition. The harpischord was at times barely audible and seldom effective in the spaces of the big auditorium. It was interesting to observe that although de Falla employed only five instruments to balance the one of wires and keys, the harpsichord was not as effective as it was in the Rondo of the concerto of Mozart, who used with it a small orchestra.

This in itself is not determinative of the value of the music or the expertness of the scoring. De Falla had other things in mind than display passages for the harpsichord. He makes it an integral part, and usually a modest one, of his ensemble. He combines tone colors in a manner that is often intentionally archaic, and intimately related to his formal design. Words of Mme. Landowska are appropriate here.

"This new music is a composite of Hispano-Castillian elements rather than an echo of Andalusia or another Spanish province. It is extremely important to stress this point because naturally every concertgoer, and even a musician, expects and rejoices in advance at the thought of hearing in the new de Falla concerto some languishing motifs of the Alhambra accompanied by arpeggios imitating the guitar."

The middle movement of the concerto was last night the most striking. The finale has some gay, open-air melodies of brighter hue, but in the slow movement there is a fine austerity and dignity of utterance. Whether the music would possess more virility and potency of invention if it were heard under the intimate conditions of a small concert hall cannot be computed here. Let us hope that an opportunity for a hearing of this carefully wrought composition in more advantageous surroundings may soon be forthcoming.

In Mozart's finale Mme. Landowska was enabled to display her crisp and elegant technic of the harpsichord, her musicianship and profound knowledge of the style of the eighteenth century, her spirit as a player. The pleasure of hearing Mozart so performed was the greater for the self-conscious art which had preceded. In these circumstances the harpsichord was more in place than [illegible] modern piano[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 7 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Lawrence Gilman of the New York Herald-Tribune, in reviewing the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, said:

"Mr. Koussevitzky, as we perceive him, exudes sincerity. He strikes us as almost agonizingly genuine—a simple man, passionately and undissuadably convinced that he plays Beethoven meant this and that by his "Eroica." We think that he plays Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony [illegible] twang [illegible] it did n[illegible] shine with any brilliance except in t[illegible] last movement, the "Vivace flessibi[illegible] scherzando." This was superbly done b[illegible] both Mme. Landowska and her accon[illegible] panying instruments.

The delights of Mozart were not don[illegible] Wanda Landokska came in once more t[illegible] delight the audience with the delicat[illegible] tones of her instrument, reminiscent [illegible] the scenes brought to life by the Guitry[illegible] elsewhere on Broadway. The ugly stag[illegible] of the hall, made uglier still by the empt[illegible] chairs standing about, was peopled wit[illegible] visions in satins and crinolines. Tha[illegible] the audience was not averse to these light[illegible] er moods of the composer was made ev[illegible] dent by the ringing round of applause.

But the tour de force of the evenin[illegible] was the brilliant rendition of Koussevit[illegible] sky and his orchestra of the famous worl[illegible] of Stravinsky, "Sacre du Printemp." Th[illegible] sheer brute force of its contrastin[illegible] rhythms and sinister blaring woodwin[illegible] effects was powerfully brought out b[illegible] the conductor. I heard Koussevitsky. I[illegible] was the Russian Koussevitsky at his[illegible] best. Even Stravinsky was not as grea[illegible] when he conducted here two years ago[illegible] Last night's was a great performance.

N. Z.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
JAN 7 1927

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

New York premieres, which used to be as scarce as hen's teeth, are now too plentiful to excite any undue interest, even when the composer has the reputation of De Falla, whose Concerto for harpischord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and violoncello was the novelty of the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall last night. However, in this case the audience had good reason to expect something handsome from the pen of the talented Spaniard whom Mme. Landowska respectfully calls "the master," which makes us wonder what she calls Beethoven or Bach. De Falla is an excellent musician but not a great one, and his election to the immortals reminds one of Lytton Strachey's plaintive inquiry in his essay on the poetry of Blake: "If Mr. F.'s aunt was a woman of genius, what are we to say of Hamlet?"

In a program note the exponent of the harpsichord who officiated as solo-ist last night informs us that the "master" took three years to compose the concerto. The wonder is that he composed it at all. For the strange little work shows De Falla altogether out of his element, forsaking the inns and dance halls of his native towns which resounded with the spirited or languid folk tunes of Spain for the dubious sensations of the hot-house academics of the ultra-modernists. The piece is a patchwork of dull fragments stitched over an assortment of deliberately contrived rhythms according to the present fashion. The tunes may have had their origin in the sources of Spanish music, but the composer's treatment of them must have dissipated their national flavor, since, with the exception of parts of the last movement, the music as a whole is of the international variety to be heard at the concerts of the International Composers' League.

Mme. Landowska tinkled away at the muddy harmonies allotted to her ancient instrument, but the harpsichord is as much suited to this music as it would be to the repertoire of a brass band. Upon the conclusion of the new concerto the gifted soloist, quite unconscious of her cruelty to the "master," plunged into the last movement of Mozart's Concerto in D, which babbled vivaciously of charming trifles for the expression of which the harpsichord is the ideal medium. But a mere jest of Mozart's seemed closer to a modern audience than De Falla's cryptic solemnities, and last night's crowded house was not slow to choose between unclouded vitality and the very latest moribund introspection.

Mr. Koussevitzky opened the program with an exquisitely delicate interpretation of Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," the best performance of that delightful work I have heard in local halls for some time. The second half of the concert was dedicated to "Le Sacre du Printemps," Stravinsky's once shocking exposition of certain cosmic matters not usually mentioned in respectable concert halls. I venture to believe that without advance information the piece might mean anything at all, and to test my theory I put from me all thoughts of the supposedly intriguing Rites of Spring and listened to the Sacre in all innocence. But the only image formed in my mind by the first section of the piece was the morning awakening of the feathered inhabitants of a barnyard. "Le Sacre" may be an excellent ballet, but torn from its proper pantomine it seems to me a series of brilliant but unrelated orchestrated sensations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
JAN 7 1927

Music Notes

Boston Symphony in Brooklyn To-night.

The season's second concert in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be held at the Academy of Music to-night. The programme includes:

[illegible] in D (C. P. E. Bach, ar[illegible]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Music

By Olga Samaroff

Boston Symphony Presents New De Falla Work, With Landowska as Soloist

NY EVENING POST JAN 7

THE eminent harpsichordist, Mme. Wanda Landowska, gives an account of de Falla's new harpsichord concerto, played for the first time in New York last night, which seems the best introduction of the work to the reading public. She writes in a letter to Philip Hale, the well-known annotator of the Boston Symphony programs: "The story of De Falla's Concerto is very interesting. Four years ago I spent several days with my friend De Falla in Granada and at the very moment that he was working at his 'Retablo,' a part of which he devoted to the harpsichord, I had my harpsichord with me (being, of course, on a concert tour in Spain), and I was able to play for him a great deal and to speak about the various possibilities of the instrument.

Olga Samaroff

He became more and more interested and after a few days of conversations between us he grew so enthusiastic that he resolved to write a concerto for the harpsichord. He took three years to compose this work, which was finished in September, 1926. But when one becomes acquainted with the music one understands that the master carried with him a long time such a deep work that needed to come to life little by little."

WHEN a creative artist of De Falla's stature has taken three years to write a work and an interpretative artist of Mme. Landowska's caliber appears as its champion, it would seem a very superficial thing for any writer to undertake a final verdict concerning its value after a few hours' acquaintance. I therefore attempt no more than to record my impressions of the concerto at a first hearing.

De Falla has used the harpsichord very successfully in the score of "Retablo," which, in my opinion, is a masterpiece. In the concerto, which is scored for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and violoncello, I could not banish the feeling that the substance of the music was foreign to the instrument.

Being certain that the performance had nothing to do with this impression, for Mme. Landowska's mastery of the harpsichord stands beyond question, I must assume that the way the music itself is written accounts for it.

In spite of the fact that only single instruments of those for which the concerto is scored were used, the harpsichord often sounded impotent and sometimes could not be distinguished at all in tutti passages in spite of the visual assurance that Mme. Landowska was playing. A fashion exists to rob lovely old instruments of the claveciri variety of their inner works and use them as desks and toilet tables. Without in the least wishing to compare De Falla's music with a desk or a toilet table, I must admit that this thought crossed my mind during the performance as the impression deepened that the harpsichord was being used in a way foreign to its real nature.

FROM a purely musical standpoint a first hearing gave me the feeling that De Falla's musical inventiveness in this work is infinitely weaker than in "Retablo" or even in the "Nights in the Gardens of Spain." Side by side with ideas of a certain rather sentimental beauty, there are bare stretches of inconsequential writing which could only be redeemed—as they often are in uninspired works—by intriguing sonority effects. But De Falla either does not try or does not succeed in achieving these in spite of the interesting group of instruments he has selected as his medium. Mme. Landowska claims qualities for the work in her commentary to which her greater acquaintance with the music lends authority, but it is hard to believe that the score, the structure of which seems quite clear, holds hidden profundities only to be realized after long acquaintance. I doubt whether the Concerto will take an ultimate place among De Falla's major works. The public received it politely but without enthusiasm.

The concert began with a spirited and finely polished performance of Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and the de Falla Concerto was followed by the same master's Rondo for harpsichord and orchestra, in which the solo part was enchantingly played by Mme. Landowska. Here the harpsichord reigned in a realm where it is supreme and against the background of a finely adjusted accompaniment Mme. Landowska and her beloved instrument spoke to us of another age with ingratiating charm and a sonority of ravishing beauty.

The second half of the program was devoted to "Le Sacre du Printemps" of Stravinsky. Profound understanding both musical and emotional, and virtuosity in conducting combined in Mr. Roussewitzky's reading of this remarkable work to make for a memorable performance.

The sureness with which Stravinsky has written every note of this score is amazing. If he ever hesitated or changed a thing, every vestige of such a process is obliterated. The music pours forth with torrential spontaneity, compelling, ruthless, at times strangely beautiful, at others relentlessly ugly, but always breathing the power of a real creative force. If Stravinsky had never written anything else he would, in my opinion, rank as a great composer. A chain may be as strong as its weakest link, but this principle does not apply to creative art. We do not measure Beethoven by the Waterloo Symphony or Konig Stefan. The man who has given us the "Sacre," "Les Noces," "Rossignol," "The Fire-Bird" and "Petruschka" has already won his place among the immortals.

[illegible] twang [illegible] it did not shine with any brilliance except in the last movement, the "Vivace flessibile scherzando." This was superbly done by both Mme. Landowska and her accompanying instruments.

The delights of Mozart were not denied. Wanda Landokska came in once more to delight the audience with the delicate tones of her instrument, reminiscent of the scenes brought to life by the Guitry's elsewhere on Broadway. The ugly stage of the hall, made uglier still by the empty chairs standing about, was peopled with visions in satins and crinolines. That the audience was not averse to these lighter moods of the composer was made evident by the ringing round of applause.

But the tour de force of the evening was the brilliant rendition of Koussevitsky and his orchestra of the famous work of Stravinsky, "Sacre du Printemp." The sheer brute force of its contrasting rhythms and sinister blaring woodwind effects was powerfully brought out by the conductor. I heard Koussevitsky. It was the Russian Koussevitsky at his best. Even Stravinsky was not as great when he conducted here two years ago. Last night's was a great performance.

N. Z.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAPH
JAN 7 1927

SYMPHONY PLAYS EPICURE'S MUSIC

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitsky, was given last night at Carnegie Hall. It was a curious concert, consisting as it did, of the lightest sort of fine spun music in the beginning, and of the stunning atavistic barbarism of the Slavic iconclast, Stravinsky.

Mozart's serenade for string orchestra, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" gave Koussevitsky a chance to show off the light prancing paces of his orchestra, and to have the audience whispering audibly all over the concert hall, "How delightful!" as is its wont. But it was music for the epicure, and it seemed as if Carnegie Hall was full last night of those who appreciate the canary tongues of music.

The much-touted piece of De Falla's, dedicated to Wanda Landowska did not seem to me serious music by the master who had written "Retblo" and the famous piano works. It was an extravaganza of [illegible] church music and light tango [illegible] in railroad advertising. The other [illegible] New York, I heard a radio hour by [illegible] suite from "The Love for Three performance last night, with an intensity and a dramatic sweep that make its longeurs seem imaginary and heighten extraordinarily its tragic poignancy and its elemental power.

"He caused us inded, to ask ourselves last evening, if this is not, after all, Beethoven at his most superb; if this symphony is not the greatest of the nine."

Hartford music lovers, as anticipated, have not failed to show their appreciation to Mr. Sedgwick who is responsible for bringing the distinguished organization here. As expected, the capacity of the Capitol theater will be taxed on the date of the concert, February 6. Reservations may be obtained by calling Mr. Sedgwick at McCoy's Music Store, 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING SUN
JAN 7 1927

The Boston Sym

Mme. Landowska, Fea Soloist, Plays De

By W. J. HENDE

The Boston Symphony Orches Carnegie Hall last night was ador Mme. Wanda Landowska as solo follows: Mozart's "Eine Kleine Falla's concerto for harpsichord cello, a rondo of Mozart for ha Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Prin to illustrate the difference betw manners of music.

De Falla's concerto is new and is dedicated to the exceptional artist who performed the clavier part. Four years ago, she has informed us, she was working with the composer on the harpsichord part of his "El Retablo," which she afterward played, and as she unfolded to him the possibilities of her chosen instrument he grew so enthusiastic that he determined to write a concerto for it. Three years later he had completed the work heard last evening, and it was produced at the de Falla festival in Barcelona on November 5, 1926, with Mme. Landowska at the keyboard.

Much has been written about this composition. The most illuminating article, perhaps, is that of Juan Thomas in the December Chesterian. To summarize, the concerto is "an effort of rhythmic-tonal modernity." There is nothing iconoclastic. "Rhythm, tonality, melodic and harmonic development follow traditional lines," yet it is all as novel as Stravinsky. The classic form evolves naturally. The themes of the first movement come from Catalonian-Andalusian folk lore and the coloring is romantic and mediæval. The show movement is essentially mediæval. The finale is a lively one, with the freedom of the eighteenth century.

Mme. Landowska, herself a writer of literary skill and imaginative charm and an authority on the music of the elder day, has contributed the following two glowing paragraphs on the possibilities of the harpsichord in modern music.

"The harpsichord, basis of the orchestra of the seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries, that 'column on which rested the entire ensemble, whose harmonious and rippling sound produced an infinitely beautiful effect on the chorus,' appears to-day for the first time in a modern work. It will not try to reproduce the effects or manners of the ancients. The 'king of instruments,' brought back to life and lending an attentive and benevolent ear to the nostalgic seeking of the young, will gladly yield for them the unexplored riches of its sonorities.

"It will set everything on fire with its rhythmic lightnings; it will spread abroad the flamboyant shower of its radiant timbres. With its ready double keyboard—now a mysterious organ, now a hyperbolic guitar—it will enliven through its ecstasy or its voluptuous bitings the somewhat blase body of the orchestra. Covering the latter with a fine, firm grillwork, glittering tremulous, vibrant, it will liberate from its resounding strings the perceived, the fantastic and the unforeseen."

All of which may be true—but not in Carnegie Hall. Why Mme. Landowska elected to introduce her friend's concerto in the midst of the great open spaces is inconceivable. Assuredly none of the rhapsodies we have read were written after such a futile performance as that of last evening. Doubtless the music was excellently played, but it did not sound. It is a chamber music composition and should be gently delivered under the sheltering wings of the League of Composers in the educational precincts of the Town Hall.

But even there its fate would be doubtful. Perhaps this work breathes the soul of Spain, but much of it was dressed with imported Russian salad sauce. Mahomet remarked in the eighth Sura, "The infidels lend one another mutual aid," but the infidels who scoff at old fa[illegible] music and make strange sounds unto the newer glory of art get all their help from a now exhausted Russian, who himself seeks salvation at the foot of the throne of Bach.

De Falla may perhaps eventually free himself from the bondage of Stravinsky, but he has not done so in this concerto. It may be all that the brethren have asserted that it is, but in Carnegie Hall last night it drooped damply through a limp quarter of an hour, a gelatinous and wabbling substance adrift on the yet uncharted sea of so called modernism. Mme. Landowska's exquisite art was smothered by the voices of the few instruments associated with the harpsichord and it was beyond question that the audience was glad when she was actually heard in the rondo from the D major concerto of Mozart, music made long ago indeed, but not yet old fashioned.

She played her part charmingly and her hearers applauded warmly. After the de Falla number they were coldly polite. The other music on the program does not demand discussion at this time. The conviction is slowly forming that Stravinsky completed his message to his time with the "Rites of Spring" and there is a growing suspicion that he had nothing to say to posterity. But it is too soon to talk about that; and anyhow it is posterity's affair, not ours.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
JAN 7 1927

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The novelty of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall was the performance, for the first time in this city, of Manuel de Falla's concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and violoncello. The player of the harpsichord was Mme. Wanda Landowska, who also appeared as solist in the performance of the last movement of Mozart's D major concerto for that instrument and orchestra. The purely orchestra pieces were Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik" and Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps."

De Falla's concerto was the result of conferences with Mme. Landowska at the composer's home in Granada four years ago, when he was at work upon his music for "El Retablo." In the score of "El Retablo" de Falla used a harpsichord. Mme. Landowska, then touring Spain, was able to extend the composers knowledge of the capacities of her favorite instrument. De Falla decided to write a concerto for harpsichord. He was three years in completing it, and the first performance took place at Barcelona, on last Nov. 5, with Pablo Casals conducting, and Mme. Landowska as soloist.

The concerto is in three movements. The work follows loosely established forms, but there is considerable freedom in tonal relations and harmonic effects, which ill conceal the cloven hoof of Igor Stravinsky. It is not easy, and it would not be fair, to estimate this concerto after a performance in Carnegie Hall. Its proper place is elsewhere. It is not a symphonic work, but a chamber composition. The harpischord was at times barely audible and seldom effective in the spaces of the big auditorium. It was interesting to observe that although de Falla employed only five instruments to balance the one of wires and keys, the harpsichord was not as effective as it was in the Rondo of the concerto of Mozart, who used with it a small orchestra.

This in itself is not determinative of the value of the music or the expertness of the scoring. De Falla had other things in mind than display passages for the harpsichord. He makes it an integral part, and usually a modest one, of his ensemble. He combines tone colors in a manner that is often intentionally archaic, and intimately related to his formal design. Words of Mme. Landowska are appropriate here.

"This new music is a composite of Hispano-Castillian elements rather than an echo of Andalusia or another Spanish province. It is extremely important to stress this point because naturally every concertgoer, and even a musician, expects and rejoices in advance at the thought of hearing in the new de Falla concerto some languishing motifs of the Alhambra accompanied by arpeggios imitating the guitar."

The middle movement of the concerto was last night the most striking. The finale has some gay, open-air melodies of brighter hue, but in the slow movement there is a fine austerity and dignity of utterance. Whether the music would possess more virility and potency of invention if it were heard under the intimate conditions of a small concert hall cannot be computed here. Let us hope that an opportunity for a hearing of this carefully wrought composition in more advantageous surroundings may soon be forthcoming.

In Mozart's finale Mme. Landowska was enabled to display her crisp and elegant technic of the harpsichord, her musicianship and profound knowledge of the style of the eighteenth century, her spirit as a player. The pleasure of hearing Mozart so performed was the greater for the self-conscious art which had preceded. In these circumstances the harpsichord was more in place than [illegible] modern piano[illegible] of the interpreter the better realized. There was hearty applause for Mme. Landowska, and even some for Mozart.

Mozart had received a measure of his due earlier in the evening. The performance of the "Nachtmusik" was one of exemplary clarity, balance, sensitiveness and finish. Speed was never incompatible with delicacy, or poetry with the careful observance of the comporer's marks of expression. And this is one of Mozart's most charming creations in the lighter vein—four little pieces, full of beauty and wit and genius. The audience was delighted.

It is plain that Mr. Koussevitsky as never before has his orchestra trained and in his hand. Mr. Monteux gave a memorable performance of the "Sacre du printemps" three seasons ago, which was the occasion of the introduction of Stravinsky's iconoclastic music in this city. The performance last night had all the regard for detail of Mr. Monteaux, and for the greater part of the time something more—a sense of primitive ceremonial and mystery, an energy apparently cataclysmic; although, as a matter of fact, it was always controlled.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
JAN 7 1927

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

New York premieres, which used to be as scarce as hen's teeth, are now too plentiful to excite any undue interest, even when the composer has the reputation of De Falla, whose Concerto for harpischord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and violoncello was the novelty of the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall last night. However, in this case the audience had good reason to expect something handsome from the pen of the talented Spaniard whom Mme. Landowska respectfully calls "the master," which makes us wonder what she calls Beethoven or Bach. De Falla is an excellent musician but not a great one, and his election to the immortals reminds one of Lytton Strachey's plaintive inquiry in his essay on the poetry of Blake: "If Mr. F.'s aunt was a woman of genius, what are we to say of Hamlet?"

In a program note the exponent of the harpsichord who officiated as solo-ist last night informs us that the "master" took three years to compose the concerto. The wonder is that he composed it at all. For the strange little work shows De Falla altogether out of his element, forsaking the inns and dance halls of his native towns which resounded with the spirited or languid folk tunes of Spain for the dubious sensations of the hot-house academies of the ultra-modernists. The piece is a patchwork of dull fragments stitched over an assortment of deliberately contrived rhythms according to the present fashion. The tunes may have had their origin in the sources of Spanish music, but the composer's treatment of them must have dissipated their national flavor, since, with the exception of parts of the last movement, the music as a whole is of the international variety to be heard at the concerts of the International Composers' League.

Mme. Landowska tinkled away at the muddy harmonies allotted to her ancient instrument, but the harpsichord is as much suited to this music as it would be to the repertoire of a brass band. Upon the conclusion of the new concerto the gifted soloist, quite unconscious of her cruelty to the "master," plunged into the last movement of Mozart's Concerto in D, which babbled vivaciously of charming trifles for the expression of which the harpsichord is the ideal medium. But a mere jest of Mozart's seemed closer to a modern audience than De Falla's cryptic solemnities, and last night's crowded house was not slow to choose between unclouded vitality and the very latest moribund introspection.

Mr. Koussevitzky opened the program with an exquisitely delicate interpretation of Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," the best performance of that delightful work I have heard in local halls for some time. The second half of the concert was dedicated to "Le Sacre du Printemps," Stravinsky's once shocking exposition of certain cosmic matters not usually mentioned in respectable concert halls. I venture to believe that without advance information the piece might mean anything at all, and to test my theory I put from me all thoughts of the supposedly intriguing Rites of Spring and listened to the Sacre in all innocence. But the only image formed in my mind by the first section of the piece was the morning awakening of the feathered inhabitants of a barnyard. "Le Sacre" may be an excellent ballet, but torn from its proper pantomine it seems to me a series of brilliant but unrelated orchestrated sensations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 7 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Lawrence Gilman of the New York Herald-Tribune, in reviewing the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, said:

"Mr. Koussevitzky, as we perceive him, exudes sincerity. He strikes us as almost agonizingly genuine—a simple man, passionately and undissuadably convinced that he plays Beethoven meant this and that by his "Eroica." We think that he plays Beethoven's "Eroica". Symphony to [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
JAN 7 1927

Music Notes

Boston Symphony in Brooklyn To-night.

The season's second concert in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be held at the Academy of Music to-night. The programme includes:

[illegible] in D (C. P. E. Bach, 17[illegible]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
JAN 7 1927

Bostonian Jubilations.

Koussevitzky Brings Us Mozart, de Falla and Stravinsky, with Wanda Landowska.

By Pitts Sanborn.

Journeying for the second time this season from the Universal Hub to New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its magnetic leader, Serge Koussevitzky, last evening regaled an audience that packed Carnegie Hall with a program which richly deserved its attention and looked well calculated to evoke applause.

The music listed comprised Mozart's enchanting serenade for string orchestra entitled "Eine kleine Nachtmusik"; Manuel de Falla's new concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and cello (a "first time in New York"); the concluding rondo from Mozart's E major concerto (K. 451) for harpsichord (or piano) and orchestra, and Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps."

The soloist was that renowned, that vigorous artist of the harpsichord, Wanda Landowska, who made on this occasion her first local appearance since last spring.

The concerto which was introduced to us yesterday Senor de Falla is said to have composed out of appreciation for Mme. Landowska's kind consenting to play the harpsichord part in his miniature opera "El Retablo de Maese Pedro." His composing was by no means a hurried process. He spent three years upon it. The work reached completion only last September, and its "world premiere" was a feature of the de Falla Festival held at Barcelona on November 5, of course, with Mme. Landowska as the harpsichordist. The American "premiere" took place in Boston a week ago today.

Though there is nothing specifically revolutionary about this concerto, it is acridly modern in its harmonic substance and pungently modish in its instrumental dress. At the same time its form suggests the concerto grosso of the period of Bach and Handel. The first movement is the most enigmatic, the hardest of the three to penetrate. It is said to stem from a folk root, and the coloring is described as "entirely romantic and mediaeval." But these definitions scarcely account for the shameless emergence of the "Habanera" from "Carmen." In the second movement, sombrely religious, we discover the Spain of Torquemada and the Inquisition, the Spain of fanatical faith and exorbitant pride, the Spain that conceived the Escorial and placed within it Philip II. The finale is less strenuous matter, especially when it echoes Wagner's "Meistersinger." But even the gayety of Spain is not without its recollection of the headsman and the stake.

The performance by Mme. Landowska and members of the orchestra of this singular sextet—some might call it chamber music and deplore its presentation in a hall so large as Carnegie—was all that the most exacting hearer could imagine, and still more. After it the great Polonaise played Mozart as only she can, or does. And what a very miracle of grace this rondo! Joyous, mocking, volatile, fleet, it races in an ethereal morris through transparences of rose and azure, shattering the sunlit spaces into Jovian showers of Danae's gold.

Can it be that the "Sacre du printemps" so soon has run into the sere and yellow leaf of autumn? This once terrifying "rite of spring" seemed last evening about as alarming as a rural Sunday school picnic and decidedly more decorous. The audience received the first half of the work in silence. After the second half there was some applause. But nobody hissed; nobody walked out! What a disheartening record for the "Sacre du printemps" in our tight little island!

Perhaps the real fault lies with Mr. Koussevitzky—his deliberate and searching analysis of pages once deemed cryptic, unspeakable; his blandly reassuring air, as of one who says:—"Now follow me, children. There is nothing to be afraid of. No tiger ever inhabited the china closet. There isn't any boa constrictor curled up in the grandfather clock. I've got a powerful searchlight. We'll move forward slowly. And when we've investigated every corner and you understand how silly all your fears were you shall have stacks of bread and jelly and nice hot cambric tea."

Here and there, to be sure—especially in certain pages of the first section—Stravinsky held the whip hand over Mr. Koussevitzky. The sheer force of the music got by the anxious analyst and, willy nilly, imparted the thrill that is in it. In revenge Mr. Koussevitzky's slow-paced exposition showed up as never before how repetitious of itself this score is and how much its author owed in writing it to his compatriot Rimsky-Korsakoff and the Frenchman Debussy. It was a very different experience, this performance, from that burning projection of the "Sacre" under the baton of Pierre Monteux, in the same hall, by the same band, almost exactly three years ago.

The audience last evening, besides its apathy toward the "Sacre," rewarded De Falla, with more of chatter and cackling than of applause. But it received Mme. Landowska like a returned empress and after the Mozart rondo it recalled her again and again with grateful enthusiasm.

Distinctly the concert was to Mozart and his prophetess Landowska.

Proof of the pudding.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
JAN 7 1927

Brilliant Aud
Boston Sym

By Richard L.

THE harpsichord's fine, swift rain of ear at Carnegie Hall last night wi bite of a needle spray. This instrument of delicate chime, a forbear of the piano, was haled once more from museum to public rostrum by the devoted Mme. Wanda Landowska, who appeared as soloist at the second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Thursday evening concerts in this city, under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky.

She assisted in the Rondo of Mozart's Concerto in D Major (Koechel 451), and in a concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and violoncello, by Manuel de Falla, which was presented for the first time in New York. On the program, in addition were Mozart's serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," for string orchestra, and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

Symphony concerts at present—witness likewise Mr. Stokowski's program of Tuesday evening—are exhibiting a tendency towards chamber music which makes for variety and information but is inconsistent with the dimensions of auditoriums like Carnegie Hall. In the Stravinsky ballet alone did Mr. Koussevitzky deploy his full orchestra. For Mozart's Rondo the band was diminished to thirty, and for the new concerto to a melancholy half dozen.

The gulf between professional and dilettante has not often been so distinct as in the writing of Mozart and De Falla for the harpsichord. The former played the instrument; the latter encountered it only through Mme. Landowska. Mozart knew what it could and could not do, and Senor De Falla is apparently aware of neither.

On account of its frail and fleeting tone, the harpsichord's idiom is the most expeditious and brilliant passage work. Mozart composed for it accordingly. The modern Spaniard with the piano no doubt in mind often set it to playing chords, at which task it is little superior to a guitar. Mozart took care to use the instrument generally in repartee with the orchestra; consequently, the harpsichord part of his Rondo is invariably transparent and outstanding, although the orchestra includes kettledrum and trumpets. With only five string and woodwind instruments against the harpsichord, De Falla very frequently permitted it to be drowned—an eclipse which a single violoncello is indeed capable of effecting.

There are other differences between these composers, among them the trifling distinction of genius and incompetency. No juxtaposition could have been quite so murderous. On the one hand, unity of style, pellucid thinking, incomparable science. On the other, muddling, bewilderment and barbarous method. One may be pardoned for regarding as barbarous a work in which are mingled Spanish dance airs, mediaeval modes and eighteenth century dances—and all of them deranged by an admixture of modernistic dissonance.

If perfunctory applause is evidence the sextet made anything but a favorable impression on the audience. The relief afforded by the ensuing Mozart Rondo was palpable. Mme. Landowska played with characteristic virtuosity—that is, if virtuosity is quite the term for an art which, according to the nature of the instrument, has nothing to do with touch but only with speed of finger, which is insignificant of dynamics and has as resource of expression mere contrasts of pace and the shadowy difference in tone color between quill and leather plectrums.

Mr. Stravinsky's ballet is by now familiar. His pictures of pagan Russia, which irresistibly recalls the "Salambo" of Flaubert. Both are works which achieve a sensational impact at first reading or hearing, and which one then lays aside forever. "Le Sacre du Printemps" is really in worse estate than "Salambo," as it was written for choregraphic and not concert performance. Only half the intention is present when dancers and scenery are lacking.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra gave a sterling account of themselves—one much superior to that of their opening concert at Carnegie Hall. The fourth movement of Mozart's serenade was something of a marvel in grace and daintiness, and the director flung forth Stravinsky's music with demoniacal fury.

By GRENA BENNETT.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, presented a programme of old and new music to a brilliant audience at Carnegie Hall last evening. It was well that the ancient melodious works of Mozart dovetailed with the modern expressions of De Falla and Stravinsky. These oases of content gave the auditors a chance to smooth wrinkled and questioning brows.

The evening's novelty was De Falla's concerto for harpsichord, violin, 'cello, flute and clarinet. The programme stated that its first public performance took place November 5, 1926.

The three movements are described as an allegro, taken from Catalan-Andalusian folklore (much better to have left it undisturbed in the limbo of the neglected); Lento, in colors of the Middle Ages intensified (with much noble suggestion of sacred airs), and Vivace, in eighteenth century spirit (and having the saving grace of clear-cut characteristic rhythm).

The composition, coming from the pen of so scholarly an author, is one of skillful and adroit workmanship, whose architecture is far more interesting than its matter.

Mme. Landowska, to whom the work is dedicated, played the harpsichord part with all sincerity. Her incomparable art was more happily illustrated in the Mozart Rondo that immediately followed.

"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," by Mozart, was a delightful opening number, and Stravinsky's exotic "Rite of Spring" ended the programme.

* * *

Last night's fourth performance of "Lohengrin" at the Metropolitan Opera House brought two changes in the cast. Florence Easton sang Elsa, her predecessors in the role this year being Mmes. Rethberg, Jeritza and Roeseler. That she sang well was a foregone conclusion, for the music that Wagner allotted to that mystic heroine is admirably fitted to Miss Eas-

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK JOURNAL
JAN 7 1927

LANDOWSKA A FEATURE WITH BOSTON BAND

An interesting, though somewhat curiously ill-assorted choice of music was made by Serge Koussevitzky (assisted by Wanda Landowska, the harpsichordist) for the concert of the Boston Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. There was the quite old and the extremely new side by side—Mozart on the one hand and Manuel de Falla, the contemporary Spaniard and Igor Stravinsky, on the other.

THIS CLIPPING FROM YORK AMERICAN
JAN 7 1927

ience Hears phony Concert

The second newcomer was Frederich Schorr, whose superb voice made one feel forgiving toward the villainies of Telramund. Curt Taucher, as Lohengrin, sang with great beauty and eloquence. His impersonation was convincingly subtle and remote as the Swan Knight should rightly be. And, with Mr. Taucher in mind, it must be commented upon how persistently the opera house "jinx" has pursued him ever since his joining the Metropolitan.

His latest bad luck occured Wednesday afternoon when he was returning to his hotel in the subway after listening to a special opera matinee. His pocket was picked, the thief stealing his wallet that contained several hundred dollars, his passport and other valuable papers.

Others in last night's cast were Margaret Matzenauer, William Gustafson and Lawrence Tibbett. Mr. Bodanzky conducted.

* * *

Ruth Breton, the young Louisville violinist, who made a creditable debut in this city two years ago, gave a recital at Aeolian Hall last night. Her powers of technic and interpretation were tested in a sonata by Vivaldi, programmed as "first time in New York"; the D minor concerto, by Wieniawski, and a new "Poem of a Girl of Sanluca," by Turina. Besides these she played a Rondo and Andante by Mozart; Waltz Rondo by Callahan, and Paganini's "La Campanella.

Development and intelligence have set their seal on Miss Breton's skill. Her musical instinct, well restrained and as well disclosed, shows marked progress in the seasons that have passed since her first appearance.

Phyllis Kraeuter is one of this season's winners of the Naumberg Foundation offer, the prize being a gift recital. That event took place last evening at the Town Hall, when the gifted young 'cellist was heard in music by Eccles, Saint-Saens, Moor, Jeral, Goldmark and Faure.

The Saint-Saens number found responsively nimble fingers and finely broad phrasing in its numerous brilliant episodes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JAN 7 1927

Music

Boston Symphony Presen New De Falla Work, With Landowska as Soloist

THE eminent harpsichordist, Mr Wanda Landowska, gives an accou of de Falla's new harpsichord concer played for the first time in New York last night, which seems the best introduction of the work to the reading public. She writes in a letter to Philip Hale, the well-known annotator of the Boston Symphony programs: "The story of De Falla's Concerto is very interesting. Four yea ago I spent several days with m friend De Falla in Granada and at t very moment that he was working his 'Retablo,' a part of which he d voted to the harpsichord, I had t harpsichord with me (being, of cours on a concert tour in Spain), and was able to play for him a great de and to speak about the various poss bilities of the instrument.

Olga Samaroff

He became more and more interes and after a few days of conversatio between us he grew so enthusiastic th he resolved to write a concerto for the harpsichord. He took three years to compose this work, which was finished in September, 1926. But when one becomes acquainted with the music one understands that the master carried with him a long time such a deep work that needed to come to life little by little."

WHEN a creative artist of De Falla's stature has taken three years to write a work and an interpretative artist of Mme. Landowska's caliber appears as its champion, it would seem a very superficial thing for any writer

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

74 its value after a few hours' acquaintance. I therefore attempt no more than to record my impressions of the concerto at a first hearing.

De Falla has used the harpsichord very successfully in the score of "Retablo," which, in my opinion, is a masterpiece. In the concerto, which is scored for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and violoncello, I could not banish the feeling that the substance of the music was foreign to the instrument.

Being certain that the performance had nothing to do with this impression, for Mme. Landowska's mastery of the harpsichord stands beyond question, I must assume that the way the music itself is written accounts for it.

In spite of the fact that only single instruments of those for which the concerto is scored were used, the harpsichord often sounded impotent and sometimes could not be distinguished at all in tutti passages in spite of the visual assurance that Mme. Landowska was playing. A fashion exists to rob lovely old instruments of the clavecini variety of their inner works and use them as desks and toilet tables. Without in the least wishing to compare De Falla's music with a desk or a

AMUSEMENTS

By
Olga Samaroff

toilet table, I must admit that this thought crossed my mind during the performance as the impression deepened that the harpsichord was being used in a way foreign to its real nature.

FROM a purely musical standpoint a first hearing gave me the feeling that De Falla's musical inventiveness in this work is infinitely weaker than in "Retablo" or even in the "Nights in the Gardens of Spain." Side by side with ideas of a certain rather sentimental beauty, there are bare stretches of inconsequential writing which could only be redeemed—as they often are in uninspired works—by intriguing sonority effects. But De Falla either does not try or does not succeed in achieving these in spite of the interesting group of instruments he has selected as his medium. Mme. Landowska claims qualities for the work in her commentary to which her greater acquaintance with the music lends authority, but it is hard to believe that the score, the structure of which seems quite clear, holds hidden profundities only to be realized after long acquaintance. I doubt whether the Concerto will take an ultimate place among De Falla's major works. The public received it politely but without enthusiasm.

The concert began with a spirited and finely polished performance of Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and the de Falla Concerto was followed by the same master's Rondo for harpsichord and orchestra, in which the solo part was enchantingly played by Mme. Landowska. Here the harpsichord reigned in a realm where it is supreme, and against the background of a finely adjusted accompaniment Mme. Landowska and her beloved instrument spoke to us of another age with ingratiating charm and a sonority of ravishing beauty.

The second half of the program was devoted to "Le Sacre du Printemps" of Stravinsky. Profound understanding, both musical and emotional, and virtuosity in conducting combined in Mr. Roussewitzky's reading of this remarkable work to make for a memorable performance.

The sureness with which Stravinsky has written every note of this score is amazing. If he ever hesitated or changed a thing, every vestige of such a process is obliterated. The music pours forth with torrential spontaneity, compelling, ruthless, at times strangely beautiful, at others relentlessly ugly, but always breathing the power of a real creative force. If Stravinsky had never written anything else he would, in my opinion, rank as a great composer. A chain may be as strong as its weakest link, but this principle does not apply to creative art. We do not measure Beethoven by the Waterloo Symphony or Konig Stefan. The man who has given us the "Sacre," "Les Noces," "Rossignol," "The Fire-Bird" and "Petruschka" has already won his place among the immortals.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 7 1927

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Landowska Plays a Modern Concerto for the Harpsichord

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting; soloist, Wanda Landowska, harpsichordist.

PROGRAM

1. Eine Kleine Nachtmusik.....Mozart
2. Concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and cello.....De Falla (First time in New York)
3. Rondo for harpsichord and orchestra.....Mozart
   Mme. Landowska
4. Le Sacre du Printemps.....Stravinsky

MME. LANDOWSKA has a genius for making music seem better than it is. She can make ordinary music sound exquisite, and fine music sound superlative. She does this not only by her consummate art as a musician, but by her singular skill as a writer about music—for she is a critic and commentator of exceptional gifts and dangerous persuasiveness. Dangerous, because she is generous as well as persuasive, and sometimes praises with dulcet and golden speech a work which does not deserve extolling and is falsely exalted thereby.

Read, for example, these words of hers concerning a recent work composed for her special instrument, the harpsichord:

"This music is full of an austere and aristocratic beauty, suggesting in its character certain passionate and sombre Castilian landscapes. I should like to stress particularly the austerity of the concerto. This austerity proceeds from the essential purity and nobility of de Falla's aesthetic nature. I have the impression that his art is becoming more and more crystallized, evolving toward a new phase."

* * *

Would you not expect, after reading that, to find in the music that Landowska was discussing a work of extraordinary power and distinction? That certainly was our expectation; and we went to hear de Falla's new concerto for harpsichord at last night's Boston Symphony concert with the liveliest anticipations.

* * *

Concertos for the harpsichord do not grow upon every bush these days; indeed, we can recall no modern concerto for that ancient instrument besides the one by Manuel de Falla which Mme. Landowska set before us last night, assisted by Mr. Koussevitzky and five solo players of the admirable Boston band—a flute, an oboe, a clarinet, a violin and a 'cello. For this concerto is more obviously recognizable as a piece of chamber music. It is, so far as its apparatus is concerned, a sextet; and must be a singularly welcome addition to any orchestra's repertoire—for it permits the band as a whole to spend a sybaritic half hour in the smoking-room or at some nearby cinema.

It is in three short movements, an opening Allegro and a final Vivace separated by a "Lento giubiloso." Spanish folk-music is drawn upon, so say the analysts; and the mediæval church-modes color the music, especially in the slow movement. The work is concise, spare of musical flesh, tightly-woven, the product of a well-bred musical mind

* * *

But we suspect that Mme. Landowska (for whom this concerto was written, and to whom it is dedicated) has mistaken the quality of well-bred aloofness for the quality of what she so handsomely calls "aristocratic beauty." Aristocratic beauty is a phrase not lightly to be used. Few music-makers have deserved it—the greater of the Elizabethan composers, for instance; Bach; Wagner; Debussy; and some others. But hardly De Falla. We should call him genteel rather than aristocratic; and the fugitive charm and the tortured prettiness of this music is a long way from the passionate and sombre beauty, austere and deeply sprung, which Mme. Landowska's benignant praise had fixed in our anticipations.

* * *

This concerto is meagre and undernourished music, curiously futile—a short-winded and anemic little work, pale and costive and rather pitiful. There are some original color effects, and certain pages of the Finale are engaging. Also, it should be said for De Falla that he is less under the thumb of Debussy's influence than he was in his "Nights in the Gardens of Spain." But it is hard to realize that this music was written by the composer of that authentic masterpiece, El Retablo de Maese Pedro," in which pathos and fantasy and beauty are summoned with so delicate and sure a touch.

* * *

Mme. Landowska performed expertly of course, her part in the work—an ungrateful one, at best. She did not come into her own until she played the solo part in the next number on the program, the final Rondo from Mozart's clavier concerto in D major (No. 451 in Köchel's catalogue). Here she was her insurpassable, exquisite self, ravishing in the sweet limpidity and the riant loveliness of her playing—the incomparable mistress of her instrument.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky found a shrewdly contrasted close for his concert in that grizzled classic, Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," which, for all its familiarity and its acquired respectability, still shakes us by its enormous intensity, its sombre and savage power, and its imaginative truth.

Wanda Landowska

Soloist at last night's Boston Symphony Concert in de Falla's new concerto for harpsichord

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
JAN 8 1927

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting. Program: C. P. E. Bach, Concerto in D major (transcribed by Steinberg); Sibelius, Seventh Symphony (first time in New York); Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin," Funeral Music from "Goetterdaemmerung," Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried" and Overture to "Die Meistersinger." At the Academy of Music last evening.

* * *

FOLLOWING a nobly proportioned and beautifully played performance of the Bach-Steinberg Concerto in D major, Mr. Koussewitsky turned last evening to the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius. Completed and published in 1925 as its composer's Op. 105, this Symphony had its first hearing in Copenhagen. It was brought to America by Leopold Stokowski, who conducted it in Philadelphia last season. Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Symphony recently gave the work in Boston and under their auspices it was introduced to New York last evening.

* * *

THIS Symphony, which may be said to be, roughly, in the key of C major, is an extraordinary and fascinating work. Cast in one movement, it aims, apparently, to project a single mood with an ever-increasing and climacteric intensity. The form is that of a great crescendo toward a climax at once vehement and constrained. A peculiar and indefinable exaltation pervaded the entire score, to which no programmatic clue has been attached. It is absolute music and the nature of its mysterious yet compelling beauty can only be revealed through study and familiarity with what is undoubtedly one of the strangest, most individual and perhaps one of the most important creative efforts of a genius. Perhaps the secret lies in its nobility, its restraint, in the profound and stirring passion that lies, not quite hidden, at its heart.

* * *

FOUR themes provide the greater part of the material from which the Symphony is built. The texture of the music is closely knit and sustained; the scoring is simple, characteristic of Sibelius in its originality and paucity of color. A single radiance steeps the entire movement; there is no effort to provide striking contrast of any sort, and yet the music carries no hint of monotony. It is wholly convincing. The performance under Mr. Koussewitsky was notable for clarity and coherence. There appears this season a marked improvement in the string tone of the Boston Orchestra; it has gained depth, richness and unanimity. This was shown not alone in the Symphony but in the Bach D major Concerto, with which the program began. After the intermission Mr. Koussewitsky devoted the evening to excerpts from the Wagnerian music dramas.

OTHER MUSIC.

OTTO KLEMPERER made his first appearance this season a guest conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening. His program enbraced music by Strauss, Debussy, Ravel and Brahms. Further comment will be made following the repetition concert on Sunday afternoon.

At the Opera House "Aida" was given with Mmes. Rethberg and Bourskaya, and Messrs. Martinelli and Danise in the principal roles. Pullio Serafin conducted.

Boston Symphony Offers New Work By Jan Sibelius

N.Y. HERALD TRIBUNE

Seventh Symphony of Finnish Composer on Carnegie Hall Matinee Program; Koussevitsky Leads

JAN 9

The feature of yesterday's Boston Symphony matinee at Carnegie Hall was the first performance in New York of the Seventh Symphony of Jan Sibelius. This symphony, published in 1925, was introduced to America last spring by Mr. Stokowski, who played it in Philadelphia, but did not bring it with him on any of his visits to Carnegie Hall. Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed the symphony to Boston a month ago.

The work is in one movement; and like all the major symphonic writing of Sibelius, it is intricate in form and subtle in its handling of material. It is closely woven, as well as closely packed. Sibelius handles with uncommon mastery the system of thematic evolution which Beethoven set as the difficult model for all future symphonists; and his application of the principle is conspicuous in this new score. Thematic motives which seem bare and unpromising are made to yield astonishing richness and variety of tonal speech—as the scale passages and the successions of major thirds which are so characteristic of his later works.

The symphony has no key signature, though its allegiance to C major and its relatives is obvious enough. The score has no title, no program, no literary or dramatic background, at least none that is avowed. But the music is concerned with the expression of spiritual history must be evident to any sympathetic hearer. It begins in twilight, sombrely, drastically, and passes through phases of conflict and crisis. There are variations of mood and pace; but the darkly passionate color of the music is never really lightened. Whether the change for the solo trombone of which so much is made in the music is a song of faith or a defiance of destiny it would be rash to say. But there is the impression that this deeply felt music is the utterance of a noble dreamer, a heroic spirit unterrified by life.

Sibelius is often somber and tragical; but he is never lachrymose; no for him is the "cosmos draped in crepe," as for Tchaikovsky. The work of Sibelius is often gray with mist or swirling with wind and rain; but he faces it grimly with tight lips. He is a man of the North, and its harsh winds have steeled his spirit.

This symphony is less original in its musical substance than the Fifth. Sibelius has succumbed at times to the great enchanter of Bayreuth; he has even sent his soul to Paris and has yielded to the persuasive magic of Debussy. Yet this symphony in its finer moments is moving and impressive music—music that is not easy to forget. Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra played it superbly, with an eloquence which must have done full justice to the music.

The remainder of the program consisted of familiar items—the D major Concerto for orchestra of Emanuel Bach, which Mr. Koussevitzky introduced here two seasons ago; Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite, and Ravel's "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
JAN 8 1927

Music Events

By HAROLD A. S

Mr. Klemperer Returns

With accustomed vigor and energy Otto Klemperer last night took up with the Symphony Society where he had left off last spring. Returning for his second season as guest conductor of the Damrosch orchestra, Mr. Klemperer launched into the Strauss "Don Juan" for his initial offering and then followed this with the movement "Fetes" from Debussy's "Nocturnes."

The conservative German then entered the realms of the moderns, choosing Ravel's "Alborada del gracioso" but returned to those fields he knows the best for his closing, Brahm C Minor symphony.

Mr. Klemperer has evidently not yet had sufficient time to get in tune with his orchestra. The Strauss was read carefully and with minute attention, but it came forth from the band slightly rough and uneven in spots. In the French section, however, the conductor and orchestra became more closely united and the Debussy earned him several recalls.

In the Brahms the guest conductor was at his best during the evening. He slightly varied the tempo in the third movement, but this did naught but make it more sprightly and more vivid. In fact in the entire symphony the reading was one of enthusiasm.

The program of last night will be repeated tomorrow in Mecca Auditorium.

Other Music

At Aeolian Hall Charles Naegele presented his second recital of the season, opening with a conservative group and then wandering among the lesser known moderns. He is a sincere artist and although rarely arouses his auditors to enthusiasm, always entertains them with an interesting presentation.

Sandu Albu, Roumanian violinist, made his debut at Steinway Hall with Karel Leitner at the piano. The newcomer showed technical ability that was commendable and a clear, fluent tone.

THE BOSTON RETURNS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Brooklyn last night for its second concert of the season, presenting a program composed for the most part of the works of Richard Wagner, for the delectation of a crowded house that gave Mr. Koussevitzky a tumultuous welcome.

The Wagner works comprised the entire second half of the program. Mr. Koussevitzky chose from the great store of the master's compositions with circumspection, and began spoke with an utterance that seemed to typify all the dreaminess, intense sentiment and lonely tragedy of the Norse temperament. He arrived at a time when symphonic creation seemed to have ended with Brahms and Tschaikowsky, and that made the welcome to Sibelius a warm and universal one. He deserved it richly, too, on the basis of individual merit

As the years wore on, however, Sibelius sang his song over and over. He found no new note, no variety of expression, no vitally compelling subjects or forms. One grew accustomed to his music, admitted always that it was dignified and well-made, but the novelty and thrill of the Sibelius pages no longer exercised their earlier fascinations.

The Seventh Symphony is just some more composing by Sibilius It has isolated moments of nobility, of charm, of glowing passion, and consistently it shows the practised hand of a symphonic expert, but the work as a whole lacks sustained interest and cumulative power. At times there is even the effect of monotony, as in the slow movement, with its Wagnerian imitations, and its "linked sweetness, long-drawn out."

MESSAGE DELIVERED.

Sibelius will have his important place in the musical lexicon, but it will be based on nothing that he has done of late years. His message was delivered long ago.

Koussevitzky led the piece with fine fervor, and his men played it marvelously well.

C. P. E. Bach was on the programme with an orchestral concerto in D major, a clarified and graceful work, delivered perfectly. In his day this son of the great Bach was considered a better musician than the father. Did C. P. E. ever, in his own self-contemplation, feel like Siegfried? Wagner, also a composing son of an immortal master, said to the present writer:

"I resemble my father only in the fact that I bear his name."

The "Fire Bird" suite by Stravinsky was a highly brillian tpiece of conducting yesterday, aided by a kindling response from the players. Ravel's "La Valse" closed the programme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JAN 8 1927

OURTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT IN CITY JAN. 18

Programme for Affair to be Announced Soon.

The last visit but one of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city, will take place at the Albee Theatre Tuesday evening, Jan. 18.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now midway in a season in every way remarkable. The orchestra is completing a successful visit to New York.

There will be a guest conductor this week in Boston, in Alfredo Casella, distinguished composer and pianist, who will there produce his recent scores, "Partita" and his ballet suite, "The Jar."

The programme for the Providence concert will be announced soon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 8 1927

FOURTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT IN CITY JAN. 18

Programme for Affair to be Announced Soon.

The last visit but one of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city, will take place at the Albee Theatre Tuesday evening, Jan. 18.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now midway in a season in every way remarkable. The orchestra is completing a successful visit to New York.

There will be a guest conductor this week in Boston, in Alfredo Casella, distinguished composer and pianist, who will there produce his recent scores, "Partita" and his ballet suite, "The Jar."

The programme for the Providence concert will be announced soon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 8

Boston Symphony

"Mr. Koussevitzky, as we perceive him, exudes sincerity. He strikes us as almost agonizingly genuine—a simple man, passionately and undissuadably convinced that Beethoven meant this and that by his "Eroica." We think that he plays Beethoven's "Eroica," Symphony, to judge by his performance last night, with an intensity and a dramatic sweep that make its longuers seem imaginary and heigten extraordinarily its tragic poignancy and its elemental power.

"He caused us indeed, to ask ourselves last evening, if this is not, after all Beethoven at his most superb; if this sybphony is not the greatest of the nine."

Thus did Lawrence Gilman, the "New York Herald-Tribune" reviewer, write.

Hartford music lovers, as anticipated, have not failed to show their appreciation to Mr. Sedgwick who is responsible for bringing the distinguished organization here. It is expected the capacity of the Capitol [illegible] be taxed on the date of

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERIC
JAN 9 1927

NEW SIBELINS COMPOSITION PLAYED HERE

Finn's Symphony Shows Usua High Standard, but Fail to Convey Fresh Messag

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

Some one remarked several year go that Richard Strauss "is a ttal nted composer who used to be a enius."

Much the same estimate now falls nto the mind when contemplating he case of Jan Sibelius, whose new eventh symphony was performed or the first time in New York) yes rday afternoon at Carnegie Hall y the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

RRIVAL NOTABLE.

When Sibelius, of Finland, first

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 7 1927

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Landowska Plays a Modern Concerto for the Harpsichord

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting; soloist, Wanda Landowska, harpsichordist.

PROGRAM

1. Eine Kleine Nachtmusik.....Mozart
2. Concerto for harpsichord, flute, oboe, clarinet, violin and cello.....De Falla (First time in New York)
3. Rondo for harpsichord and orchestra.....Mozart
   Mme. Landowska
4. Le Sacre du Printemps.....Stravinsky

MME. LANDOWSKA has a genius for making music seem better than it is. She can make ordinary music sound exquisite, and fine music sound superlative. She does this not only by her consummate art as a musician, but by her singular skill as a writer about music—for she is a critic and commentator of exceptional gifts and dangerous persuasiveness. Dangerous, because she is generous as well as persuasive, and sometimes praises with dulcet and golden speech a work which does not deserve extolling and is falsely exalted thereby.

Read, for example, these words of hers concerning a recent work composed for her special instrument, the harpsichord:

"This music is full of an austere and aristocratic beauty, suggesting in its character certain passionate and sombre Castilian landscapes. I should like to stress particularly the austerity of the concerto. This austerity proceeds from the essential purity and nobility of de Falla's aesthetic nature. I have the impression that his art is becoming more and more crystallized, evolving toward a new phase."

* * *

Would you not expect, after reading that, to find in the music that Landowska was discussing a work of extraordinary power and distinction? That certainly was our expectation; and we went to hear de Falla's new concerto for harpsichord at last night's Boston Symphony concert with the liveliest anticipations.

* * *

Concertos for the harpsichord do not grow upon every bush these days; indeed, we can recall no modern concerto for that ancient instrument besides the one by Manuel de Falla which Mme. Landowska set before us last night, assisted by Mr. Koussevitzky and five solo players of the admirable Boston band—a flute, an oboe, a clarinet, a violin and a 'cello. For this concerto is more obviously recognizable as a piece of chamber music. It is, so far as its apparatus is concerned, a sextet; and must be a singularly welcome addition to any orchestra's repertoire—for it permits the band as a whole to spend a sybaritic half hour in the smoking-room or at some nearby cinema.

It is in three short movements, an opening Allegro and a final Vivace separated by a "Lento giubiloso." Spanish folk-music is drawn upon, so say the analysts; and the mediæval church-modes color the music, especially in the slow movement. The work is concise, spare of musical flesh, tightly-woven, the product of a well-bred musical mind

* * *

But we suspect that Mme. Landowska (for whom this concerto was written, and to whom it is dedicated) has mistaken the quality of well-bred aloofness for the quality of what she so handsomely calls "aristocratic beauty." Aristocratic beauty is a phrase not lightly to be used. Few music-makers have deserved it—the greater of the Elizabethan composers, for instance; Bach; Wagner; Debussy; and some others. But hardly De Falla. We should call him genteel rather than aristocratic; and the fugitive charm and the tortured prettiness of this music is a long way from the passionate and sombre beauty, austere and deeply sprung, which Mme. Landowska's benignant praise had fixed in our anticipations.

* * *

This concerto is meagre and undernourished music, curiously futile—a short-winded and anemic little work, pale and costive and rather pitiful. There are some original color effects, and certain pages of the Finale are engaging. Also, it should be said for De Falla that he is less under the thumb of Debussy's influence than he was in his "Nights in the Gardens of Spain." But it is hard to realize that this music was written by the composer of that authentic masterpiece, El Retablo de Maese Pedro," in which pathos and fantasy and beauty are summoned with so delicate and sure a touch.

* * *

Mme. Landowska performed expertly of course, her part in the work—an ungrateful one, at best. She did not come into her own until she played the solo part in the next number on the program, the final Rondo from Mozart's clavier concerto in D major (No. 451 in Köchel's catalogue). Here she was her insurpassable, exquisite self, ravishing in the sweet limpidity and the riant loveliness of her playing—the incomparable mistress of her instrument.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky found a shrewdly contrasted close for his concert in that grizzled classic, Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," which, for all its familiarity and its acquired respectability, still shakes us by its enormous intensity, its sombre and savage power, and its imaginative truth.

Wanda Landowska

Soloist at last night's Boston Symphony Concert in de Falla's new concerto for harpsichord

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EAGLE
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
JAN 8 1927

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting. Program: C. P. E. Bach, Concerto in D major (transcribed by Steinberg); Sibelius, Seventh Symphony (first time in New York); Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin," Funeral Music from "Goetterdaemmerung," Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried" and Overture to "Die Meistersinger." At the Academy of Music last evening.

* * *

FOLLOWING a nobly proportioned and beautifully played performance of the Bach-Steinberg Concerto in D major, Mr. Koussewitsky turned last evening to the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius. Completed and published in 1925 as its composer's Op. 105, this Symphony had its first hearing in Copenhagen. It was brought to America by Leopold Stokowski, who conducted it in Philadelphia last season. Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Symphony recently gave the work in Boston and under their auspices it was introduced to New York last evening.

* * *

THIS Symphony, which may be said to be, roughly, in the key of C major, is an extraordinary and fascinating work. Cast in one movement, it aims, apparently, to project a single mood with an ever-increasing and climacteric intensity. The form is that of a great crescendo toward a climax at once vehement and constrained. A peculiar and indefinable exaltation pervaded the entire score, to which no programmatic clue has been attached. It is absolute music and the nature of its mysteries out yet compelling beauty can only be revealed through study and familiarity with what is undoubtedly one of the strangest, most individual and perhaps one of the most important creative efforts of a genius. Perhaps the secret lies in its nobility, its restraint, in the profound and stirring passion that lies, not quite hidden, at its heart.

* * *

FOUR themes provide the greater part of the material from which the Symphony is built. The texture of the music is closely knit and sustained; the scoring is simple, characteristic of Sibelius in its originality and paucity of color. A single radiance steeps the entire movement; there is no effort to provide striking contrast of any sort, and yet the music carries no hint of monotony. It is wholly convincing. The performance under Mr. Koussewitsky was notable for clarity and coherence. There appears this season a marked improvement in the string tone of the Boston Orchestra; it has gained depth, richness and unanimity. This was shown not alone in the Symphony but in the Bach D major Concerto, with which the program began. After the intermission Mr. Koussewitsky devoted the evening to excerpts from the Wagnerian music dramas.

OTHER MUSIC.

OTTO KLEMPERER made his first appearance this season a guest conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening. His program en-braced music by Strauss, Debussy, Ravel and Brahms. Further comment will be made following the repetition concert on Sunday afternoon.

At the Opera House "Aida" was given with Mmes. Rethberg and Bourskaya, and Messrs. Martino and Danise in the principal roles. Pullio Serafin conducted.

Boston Symphony Offers New Work By Jan Sibelius

N.Y. HERALD TRIBUNE

Seventh Symphony of Finnish Composer on Carnegie Hall Matinee Program; Koussevitsky Leads

JAN 9

The feature of yesterday's Boston Symphony matinee at Carnegie Hall was the first performance in New York of the Seventh Symphony of Jan Sibelius. This symphony, published in 1925, was introduced to America last spring by Mr. Stokowski, who played it in Philadelphia, but did not bring it with him on any of his visits to Carnegie Hall. Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed the symphony to Boston a month ago.

The work is in one movement; and like all the major symphonic writing of Sibelius, it is intricate in form and subtle in its handling of material. It is closely woven, as well as closely packed. Sibelius handles with uncommon mastery the system of thematic evolution which Beethoven set as the difficult model for all future symphonists; and his application of the principle is conspicuous in this new score. Thematic motives which seem bare and unpromising are made to yield an astonishing richness and variety of tonal speech—as the scale passages and the successions of major thirds which are so characteristic of his later works.

The symphony has no key signature, though its allegiance to C major and its relatives is obvious enough. The score has no title, no program, no literary or dramatic background, at least none that is avowed. But the music is concerned with the expression of spiritual history must be evident to any sympathetic hearer. It begins in twilight, sombrely, drastically, and passes through phases of conflict and crisis. There are variations of mood and pace; but the darkly passionate color of the music is never really lightened. Whether the chance for the solo trombone of which so much is made in the music is a song of faith or a defiance of destiny it would be rash to say. But there is the impression that this deeply felt music is the utterance of a noble dreamer, a heroic spirit unterrified by life.

Sibelius is often somber and tragical; but he is never lachrymose; not for him is the "cosmos draped in crepe," as for Tchaikovsky. The world of Sibelius is often gray with mist or swirling with wind and rain; but he faces it grimly with tight lips. He is a man of the North, and its harsh winds have steeled his spirit.

This symphony is less original in its musical substance than the Fifth. Sibelius has succumbed at times to the great enchanter of Bayreuth; he has even sent his soul to Paris and has yielded to the persuasive magic of Debussy. Yet this symphony in its finest moments is moving and impressive music—music that is not easy to forget. Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra played it superbly, with an eloquence which must have done full justice to the music.

The remainder of the program consisted of familiar items—the D major Concerto for orchestra of Emanuel Bach, which Mr. Koussevitzky introduced here two seasons ago; Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite, and Ravel's "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
JAN 8 1927

Music Events

By HAROLD A. S

Mr. Klemperer Returns

With accustomed vigor and energy Otto Klemperer last night took up with the Symphony Society where he had left off last spring. Returning for his second season as guest conductor of the Damrosch orchestra, Mr. Klemperer launched into the Strauss "Don Juan" for his initial offering and then followed this with the movement "Fetes" from Debussy's "Nocturnes."

The conservative German then entered the realms of the moderns, choosing Ravel's "Alborada del gracioso" but returned to those fields he knows the best for his closing, Brahm C Minor symphony.

Mr. Klemperer has evidently not yet had sufficient time to get in tune with his orchestra. The Strauss was read carefully and with minute attention, but it came forth from the band slightly rough and uneven in spots. In the French section, however, the conductor and orchestra became more closely united and the Debussy earned him several recalls.

In the Brahms the guest conductor was at his best during the evening. He slightly varied the tempo in the third movement, but this did naught but make it more sprightly and more vivid. In fact in the entire symphony the reading was one of enthusiasm.

The program of last night will be repeated tomorrow in Mecca Auditorium.

Other Music

At Aeolian Hall Charles Naegele presented his second recital of the season, opening with a conservative group and then wandering among the lesser known moderns. He is a sincere artist and although rarely arouses his auditors to enthusiasm, always entertains them with an interesting presentation.

Sandu Albu, Roumanian violinist, made his debut at Steinway Hall with Karel Leitner at the piano. The newcomer showed technical ability that was commendable and a clear, fluent tone.

THE BOSTON RETURNS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Brooklyn last night for its second concert of the season, presenting a program composed for the most part of the works of Richard Wagner, for the delectation of a crowded house that gave Mr. Koussevitzky a tumultuous welcome.

The Wagner works comprised the entire second half of the program. Mr. Koussevitzky chose from the great store of the master's compositions with circumspection, and began spoke with an utterance that seemed to typify all the dreaminess, intense sentiment and lonely tragedy of the Norse temperament. He arrived at a time when symphonic creation seemed to have ended with Brahms and Tschaikowsky, and that made the welcome to Sibelius a warm and universal one. He deserved it richly, too, on the basis of individual merit.

As the years wore on, however, Sibelius sang his song over and over. He found no new note, no variety of expression, no vitally compelling subjects or forms. One grew accustomed to his music, admitted always that it was dignified and well-made, but the novelty and thrill of the Sibelius pages no longer exercised their earlier fascinations.

The Seventh Symphony is just some more composing by Sibilius It has isolated moments of nobility, of charm, of glowing passion, and consistently it shows the practised hand of a symphonic expert, but the work as a whole lacks sustained interest and cumulative power. At times there is even the effect of monotony, as in the slow movement, with its Wagnerian imitations, and its "linked sweetness, long-drawn out."

MESSAGE DELIVERED.

Sibelius will have his important place in the musical lexicon, but it will be based on nothing that he has done of late years. His message was delivered long ago.

Koussevitzky led the piece with fine fervor, and his men played it marvelously well.

C. P. E. Bach was on the programme with an orchestral concerto in D major, a clarified and graceful work, delivered perfectly. In his day this son of the great Bach was considered a better musician than the father. Did C. P. E. ever, in his own self-contemplation, feel like Siegfried? Wagner, also a composing son of an immortal master, said to the present writer:

"I resemble my father only in the fact that I bear his name."

The "Fire Bird" suite by Stravinsky was a highly brillian tpiece of conducting yesterday, aided by a kindling response from the players. Ravel's "La Valse" closed the programme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 8 1927

OURTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT IN CITY JAN. 18

Programme for Affair to be Announced Soon.

The last visit but one of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city, will take place at the Albee Theatre Tuesday evening, Jan. 18.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now midway in a season in every way remarkable. The orchestra is completing a successful visit to New York.

There will be a guest conductor this week in Boston, in Alfredo Casella, distinguished composer and pianist, who will there produce his recent scores, "Partita" and his ballet suite, "The e programme for the Providence cert will be announced soon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

JAN 8 1927

FOURTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT IN CITY JAN. 18

Programme for Affair to be Announced Soon.

The last visit but one of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city, will take place at the Albee Theatre Tuesday evening, Jan. 18.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now midway in a season in every way remarkable. The orchestra is completing a successful visit to New York.

There will be a guest conductor this week in Boston, in Alfredo Casella, distinguished composer and pianist, who will there produce his recent scores, "Partita" and his ballet suite, "The Jar."

The programme for the Providence concert will be announced soon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 8

Boston Symphony

"Mr. Koussevitzky, as we perceive him, exudes sincerity. He strikes us as almost agonizingly genuine—a simple man, passionately and undissuadably convinced that Beethoven meant this and that by his "Eroica." We think that he plays Beethoven's "Eroica," Symphony, to judge by his performance last night, with an intensity and a dramatic sweep that make its longuers seem imaginary and heigten extraordinarily its tragic poignancy and its elemental power.

"He caused us indeed, to ask ourselves last evening, if this is not, after all Beethoven at his most superb; if this sybphony is not the greatest of the nine."

Thus did Lawrence Gilman, the "New York Herald-Tribune" reviewer, write.

Hartford music lovers, as anticipated, have not failed to show their appreciation to Mr. Sedgwick who is responsible for bringing the distinguished organization here. It is expected the capacity of the Capitol [illegible] be taxed on the date of

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERIC
JAN 9-1927

NEW SIE
COMPOS ou
PLAYED e

Finn's Symphony Shows Usua High Standard, but Fail to Convey Fresh Messag

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

Some one remarked several years ago that Richard Strauss "is a talented composer who used to be a genius."

Much the same estimate now falls into the mind when contemplating the case of Jan Sibelius, whose new seventh symphony was performed (for the first time in New York) yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

ARRIVAL NOTABLE.

When Sibelius, of Finland, first

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
JAN 9 1927

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Seventh Symphony of Jean Sibelius was heard for the first time in New York at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Like Sibelius's Sixth Symphony, which has not yet been heard here, the Seventh is in one movement. Like all of the Sibelius symphonies since the grim and fantastical Fourth, a comparatively small orchestra is used, and the instrumentation is very simple. In the late symphonies Libelius has become intensely personal. In the earlier ones he was in part a magnificent landscape painter. It was then as if the wild north, the stretches of forest and lake and plain, had induced the moods of a creative artist. In the late symphonies nature is seen through that artist's eyes, and her moods, for him, are a reflex of his inner being.

The Seventh Symphony is noble music. There are reminders of the Fourth and Fifth Symphonies, but the work heard yesterday seems more organic than the eirlier ones—partly owing to its single movement—more concentrated and of a greater majesty. The opening motive, in the form of an ascending scale, is not very promising, but it leads to great pages and other themes, such as the sustained singing theme of the violas and 'celli and the short but impressive phrase given the solo trombone provide sufficient contrast and physiognom.y

The Seventh Symphony is less fragmentary in mood, as well as material, than the Fifth, which Mr. Stokowsky has made familiar here. It is sombre, passionately introspective, but it is strong and contained. There is an inner process in the score akin to growth from the soil. The final majestic climax is not reached through nervous excitement or the effect of some hurrying rhythm. The end grows broader and not faster—an inevitable ripening, as it were, from deep, powerful roots. The harmony is simpler than in other of the more recent compositions of sim Sibleius, but it si not less impressive. The sustained pull of voice against voice, the power of chords at odds with each other, but moving firmly and certainly through a series of dissonance to their consummation, is superbly expressive and as sure, as unhurriedly in their simplicity, as the mountains and the sea.

Mr. Koussevitsky had prepared this performance with much care and insight into its music. The symphony made an excellent impression.

The remainder of the program consisted of Philip Emmanuel Bach's concerto for orchestra in D major, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg; the first of the two orchestral suites that Stravinsky arranged from his ballet, "The Bird of Fire," and Ravel's "choregraphic poem," "La Valse." The Bach concerto would of course have profited by performance by a smaller orchestra, as would most of the compositions of his day. The performance was in excellent rhythm and style. Not much more is required by the first and last movements. The second movement is another matter. It is one of the many beautiful slow movements that this Bach left behind him; it might be added, one of the beautiful slow movements which appeared in considerable profusion in his period. In these movements the composers do not seem to have labored at their task. They seem to have welcomed the slow tempo which is terror and often failure to the nervous modern, and to have found in such quiet tempos opportunity for the expression of their dreams. Bach comes back to earth in his cheerful but rather ordinary finale, but in his slow movement which was played very beautifully by the orchestra, he soars high and far.

Why Mr. Koussevitsky chose to omit the Berceuse eand Finale from the "Oiseu de Feu" suite is known to him. It would not have greatly extended the program, and for many these pages number among the most beautiful and poetic of the score. We can still see the glamourous spectacle presented by the Diaghileff ballet, as, at the end of the action, as the solo horn intones softly a Russian folk theme, a nd that melody swells and unfolds in a manner utterly Slavic, while, to harmonies which are as the joyous ringing of bells, the Prince and his fairy Princess come into their own. A pity to go without this music yesterday. The performance ended with the air-dance of the magician Kotschei and his train. The performance of the opening pages of the suite was the most imaginative we had heard. The music was heavy with enchantment. Strange and exquisite sounds emanated from the gardens of the sorcerer—sounds so beautiful and so evocative that they suggested a momentous silence! In the "Dance of the Princesses" there was the moment of finicking and whittling at trifles which was the one and momentary defect of the "Sacre du printemps" performance two evenings previous. In this way Mr. Koussevitsky, who sometimes seems to distrust his own temperament, may lose the current of an interpretation. Thus the effect of the suite was a little incomplete. But what beautiful music! This may be early Stravinsky, it may be in part derived from other composers, but he has yet to write with as much heart, with as warm and glowing fancy, as in this evocation of a fairy tale. There is one parallel in Russian art for this music: the poetry of Pushkin.

Firebird" admirably. But it seemed to me he missed something of the tragic quality in Ravel's "La Valse." This extraordinary piece is no fantasy on the old-fashioned Viennese waltz. It is a danse macabre, a waltz danced over a smouldering crater, and the Boston conductor to my mind did not altogether evoke the terror that underlies the lilting measures.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
JAN 9 1927

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

AT CARNEGIE HALL
BOSTON SYMPHONY

Concerto in D.....C. P. E. Bach-Steinb
"Fire Bird" suite.....Stravin
Symphony No. 7.....Sibe
"La Valse".....R

Sibelius

The feature of the Boston Symphony's matinee at Carnegie Hall yesterday was the first New York performance of Sibelius's Seventh Symphony. The work was published in 1925 and received its American premiere last April in Philadelphia under Stokowski.

If there ever was a musician whose creative energies were moulded entirely by his immediate environment it is Sibelius. Born in Finland, he is the child of his native land in the completest sense. If his gaze ever wanders it is toward farther north. He is enthralled by the bleakness of his heritage and cannot admit to himself the existence of softer regions where the sun is more solicitous for the warmth of the trees and fields and people. He looks down upon. Life for him is a reflection of the physical austerity of the land of his nativity and he embraces with a noble ardor its sunless brilliance and unavailing grandeur.

There is in his music the feeling of patrician aloofness, an implied sense of superiority in his isolation, of one who regards the optimism and sensuousness of lands farther south only as an illusion, bearing little relation to reality.

In his latest symphony, written in one movement, the noted composer is more passionately sombre than ever before. No ray of joy seems to break through the bleak light that permeates his scene, an illumination as hopeless as the lighting in El Greco's "Crucifixion." A solo trombone enunciates a theme as forbidding and impersonal as a foghorn through an impenetrable sea. The orchestra plays stern progressions, a simple, unemotional folk tune is heard unexplained, pauses occur and the thing ends up quite suddenly on a C major chord with the effect of an unanswered question.

The plausible conjecture is that Sibelius has followed the course of some secret mood, leaving the listener to understand as best he might. The only things this listener could grasp were the strength and twilight passion of the strange music.

Mr. Koussevitzky played the symphony, the concerto of Carl. Philip Emanuel Bach and the Stravinsky

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 9 1927

Boston Symphony Offers New Work By Jan Sibelius

Seventh Symphony of Finnish Composer on Carnegie Hall Matinee Program; Koussevitsky Lead

The feature of yesterday's Boston Symphony matinee at Carnegie Hall was the first performance in New York of the Seventh Symphony of Jan Sibelius. This symphony, published in 1925, was introduced to America last spring by Mr. Stokowski, who played it in Philadelphia, but did not bring it with him on any of his visits to Carnegie Hall. Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed the symphony to Boston a month ago.

The work is in one movement; and like all the major symphonic writing of Sibelius, it is intricate in form and subtle in its handling of material. It is closely woven, as well as closely packed. Sibelius handles with uncommon mastery the system of thematic evolution which Beethoven set as the difficult model for all future symphonists; and his application of the principle is conspicuous in this new score. Thematic motives which seem bare and unpromising are made to yield an astonishing richness and variety of tonal speech—as the scale passages and the successions of major thirds which are so characteristic of his later works.

The symphony has no key signature though its allegiance to C major and its relatives is obvious enough. The score has no title, no program, no literary or dramatic background, at least none that is avowed. But that the music is concerned with the expression of spiritual history must be evident to any sympathetic hearer. It begins in twilight, sombrely, drastically, and passes through phases of conflict and crisis. There are variations of mood and pace; but the darkly passionate color of the music is never really lightened. Whether the chant for the solo trombone of which so much is made in the music is a song of faith or a defiance of destiny it would be rash to say. But there is the impression that this deeply felt music is the utterance of a noble dreamer, a heroic spirit unterrified by life.

Sibelius is often somber and tragical; but he is never lachrymose; not for him is the "cosmos draped in crepe," as for Tchaikovsky. The world of Sibelius, is often gray with mist or swirling with wind and rain; but he faces it grimly with tight lips. He is a man of the North, and its harsh winds have steeled his spirit.

This symphony is less original in its musical substance than the Fifth. Sibelius has succumbed at times to the great enchanter of Bayreuth; he has even sent his soul to Paris and has yielded to the persuasive magic of Debussy. Yet this symphony in its finest moments is moving and impressive music—music that is not easy to forget. Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra played it superbly, with an eloquence which must have done full justice to the music.

The remainder of the program consisted of familiar items—the D major Concerto for orchestra of Emanuel Bach, which Mr. Koussevitzky introduced here two seasons ago; Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite, and Ravel's "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS
JAN 9 1927

Boston Orchestra Will Honor Beethoven Today

Famous Fifth Symphony to Be Played at Annual Local Concert in Recognition of Centennial of Composer's Death—Modern Music Also

The Boston Symphony orchestra concert at the Auditorium this afternoon will be as usual, the highlight of the midwinter musical season. Again the music lovers of the city have the Young Men's Christian association to thank for its goodwill and community spirit in bringing this orchestra to the city in a program of the very best type, at little or no cost to those who attend.

Since the centennial of Beethoven's death will be celebrated on March 26 of this year, it is fitting that the orchestra should choose a Beethoven symphony for the principal number on its program. The celebrated Fifth Symphony in C minor, Op. 47 has been chosen, probably not only for its marvellously beautiful music, but because ith sa always been the most popular, and when an orchestra only appears in a city once in a whole season, it must, perforce, please most of its audience. For those who prefer modern music, the suite from Prokofieff's opera, "Love for Three Oranges" will provide at least a taste of that type of composition. The Berlioz overture, "La Carnaval Romaine" and the Wagner numbers, "Prelude" to "Lohengrin" and the "Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried," are always welcome on a symphony program. Conductor Serge Koussevitzky is sure to give these familiar pieces new meaning, and there will be undoubtedly new thrills in his management of the symphony itself.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony has four movements, an allegro con brio, andante con mot. allegro-trio and allegro. He sketched motives of the allegro, andante and scherzo as early as 1799 and 1801. We know from sketches that while he was at work on "Fidelio" and the piano forte concerto in G major in 1804-1806 he fas also busied with this symphony which he put aside to compose the fourth symphony, that in B flat. The fifth symphony was finished in the neihgborhood of Heligenstadt in 1807 and dedicated to the Pripce von Lobkowitb and tht Count Rasmoffsky, it was published in April, 1809.

This symphony was first performed at the Theater am der Wien, Vienna on December 22, 1808. It was described on the program as "A symphony entitled 'Reflections of Life in the Country.'" The symphony is scored for the flutes, wo oboes, two clarinets, two bassaans, two horns, two trumpets, kettledrums, strings and in the last movement, piccolo, double bassoon and hree rmbnes are added..

Hector Berlioz wrote of thi symphony: "The syaphony in C minor, seems to come directly and solely from the genius of Beethoven; he develops in it his own intimate thought; his secret sorrovs, his concentrated rage, his reveries charged with a dejection, oh, so sad, his visions at night, his burst of enthusiasm—these furnish him the subject and the forms of melody, harmony, rhythm, and orchestration are displayed as essentially individual—and now, as they are powerful and noble.

The first performance in this country of this symphony was in Boston, November 27, 1841.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 9 1927

The last visit but one of the season, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will take place at the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Jan. 18.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now midway in a season in every way remarkable. The orchestra has just returned from a most successful visit to New York.

There will be a guest conductor this week in Boston, in Alfredo Casella, distinguished Italian composer and pianist, who will there produce his recent scores, "Partita" and his ballet suite, "The Jar."

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 9 1927

The Boston Symphony orches... be with us for its single visit of the year today, and although slippery sidewalks and pavements will prevent music lovers from dancing in the streets to celebrate the red-letter musical event of the midwinter season, there is no doubt that there will be an enthusiastic throng within the Auditorium. Right here it may be well to state again that the concert is to begin at 3 sharp. Doors for season and patron ticket holders will open at 2, and at 2.45 all seats remaining may be had by those holding the little free slips issued for this concert alone. Mr Koussevitzky is to give us a program well worth hearing. The Beethoven "Fifth Symphony," while it is the most familiar to music students, is probably the finest symphonic work of the composer whose centennial we are celebrating this year. Recent years have not known a performance of this work in the city. The modernists will be delighted by the choice of Prokokieff's orchestral suite from his opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," and one ventures to say that this will prove a delight to the entire audience, as it is not too dissonant and intricate to be understood by the average auditor. The Wagner numbers on the program are always welcome, and the Berlioz overture, a large florid piece, will make an enlivening start for the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
JAN 10 1927

Brief and Fine.

Quite without premeditation or design Serge Koussevitzky stole a march on Otto Klemperer last Saturday when he took occasion at the Boston Symphony matinee in Carnegie Hall to acquaint this community with the seventh and latest symphonic adventure of Jan Sibelius. The illustrious and beetling German, who first made known this Nordic opus to his countrymen in September, will have his innings on Thursday next. But in point of fact both Philadelphia (last April) and Boston (last month) got ahead of Manhattan with respect to this two-year-old—or older—symphony, although for better or worse the ambitious radio bore it from Huntington avenue into dim and vasty distances.

The symphony is in one movement, continuous of texture and made up of sections contrasted yet interdependent of mood and organism. Sibelius has wrought with economy and signal concentration. Fifteen minutes or so suffice unto his say. There are no lengths and no monotonies. The symphony is a fine, strong work, whose process is elemental and scorns the prescribings of showy or utilitarian effect. It will compensate those who were dishcartened by the meagre fare of "Tapiola." On the other hand, it is not so drastically epoch-making as to add manifold cubits to its creator's stature or to menace with cataclysm the underpinnings of the universe.

The work bears the immemorial Sibelius profile, with all which that cannotes of sombre enigma, brooding and unanswered. It has intensity and fancy and elevation. It is music of noble mien. Its affinities are rather to the fifth symphony than to the stark grandeurs and sable immensities of the fourth. The composer, whose later manner eschews the broad spanning, wide arched themes of his earlier and more fertile period, accomplishes much with the seemingly unpromising and unplastic material of scale passages, successions of thirds and square toed subjects, as well as a comparatively simple instrumental scheme. One grows conscious in this music of a curious Beethoven kinship. Mr. Gilman very properly detected in a scherzando episode a similarity of mood and matter to the "Eroica." And shortly after the A minor opening there comes a broad and bardic song in the strings which, as it mounts and unfolds in almost religious mood, discovers some of the very spirit and essential quality of the later Beethoven adagios.

Only in those passages that do the office of a scherzo can the firmness of the musical texture be said to relax. The popular note affirms itself in a section in triple time, where Sibelius becomes, as he has in other works, a type of Berserker Smetana. The close is reached intensely but without postures, without encompassed philosophies. It leaves things where it found them.

The performance of this brave, engaging work was to all appearances entirely admirable. The rest of the program was occupied by Philip Emmanuel Bach's D major concerto, Stravinsky's "Firebird" suite and Ravel's "La Valse."

H. F. P.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Famous Russian Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Which Will Be Heard This Afternoon at the Auditorium in Y. M. C. A. Series. Likeness Shown Was Caught Recently on Deck of Ship Bringing Director Back for the Season.

Music Notes and Comment

76

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
JAN 9 1927

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Seventh Symphony of Jean Sibelius was heard for the first time in New York at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Like Sibelius's Sixth Symphony, which has not yet been heard here, the Seventh is in one movement. Like all of the Sibelius symphonies since the grim and fantastical Fourth, a comparatively small orchestra is used, and the instrumentation is very simple. In the late symphonies Libelius has become intensely personal. In the earlier ones he was in part a magnificent landscape painter. It was then as if the wild north, the stretches of forest and lake and plain, had induced the moods of a creative artist. In the late symphonies nature is seen through that artist's eyes, and her moods, for him, are a reflex of his inner being.

The Seventh Symphony is noble music. There are reminders of the Fourth and Fifth Symphonies, but the work heard yesterday seems more organic than the eirlier ones—partly owing to its single movement—more concentrated and of a greater majesty. The opening motive, in the form of an ascending scale, is not very promising, but it leads to great pages and other themes, such as the sustained singing theme of the violas and 'celli and the short but impressive phrase given the solo trombone provide sufficient contrast and physiognom.y

The Seventh Symphony is less fragmentary in mood, as well as material, than the Fifth, which Mr. Stokowsky has made familiar here. It is sombre, passionately introspective, but it is strong and contained. There is an inner process in the score akin to growth from the soil. The final majestic climax is not reached through nervous excitement or the effect of some hurrying rhythm. The end grows broader and not faster—an inevitable ripening, as it were, from deep, powerful roots. The harmony is simpler than in other of the more recent compositions of sim Sibleius, but it si not less impressive. The sustained pull of voice against voice, the power of chords at odds with each other, but moving firmly and certainly through a series of dissonance to their consummation, is superbly expressive and as sure, as unhurriedly in their simplicity, as the mountains and the sea.

Mr. Koussevitsky had prepared this performance with much care and insight into its music. The symphony made an excellent impression.

The remainder of the program consisted of Philip Emmanuel Bach's concerto for orchestra in D major, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg; the first of the two orchestral suites that Stravinsky arranged from his ballet, "The Bird of Fire," and Ravel's "choregraphic poem," "La Valse." The Bach concerto would of course have profited by performance by a smaller orchestra, as would most of the compositions of his day. The performance was in excellent rhythm and style. Not much more is required by the first and last movements. The second movement is another matter. It is one of the many beautiful slow movements that this Bach left behind him; it might be added, one of the beautiful slow movements which appeared in considerable profusion in his period. In these movements the composers do not seem to have labored at their task. They seem to have welcomed the slow tempo which is terror and often failure to the nervous modern, and to have found in such quiet tempos opportunity for the expression of their dreams. Bach comes back to earth in his cheerful but rather ordinary finale, but in his slow movement which was played very beautifully by the orchestra, he soars high and far.

Why Mr. Koussevitsky chose to omit the Berceuse eand Finale from the "Oiseu de Feu" suite is known to him. It would not have greatly extended the program, and for many these pages number among the most beautiful and poetic of the score. We can still see the glamourous spectacle presented by the Diaghileff ballet, as, at the end of the action, as the solo horn intones softly a Russian folk theme, a nd that melody swells and unfolds in a manner utterly Slavic, while, to harmonies which are as the joyous ringing of bells, the Prince and his fairy Princess come into their own. A pity to go without this music yesterday. The performance ended with the air-dance of the magician Kotschei and his train. The performance of the opening pages of the suite was the most imaginative we had heard. The music was heavy with enchantment. Strange and exquisite sounds emanated from the gardens of the sorcerer—sounds so beautiful and so evocative that they suggested a momentous silence! In the "Dance of the Princesses" there was the moment of finicking and whittling at trifles which was the one and momentary defect of the "Sacre du printemps" performance two evenings previous. In this way Mr. Koussevitsky, who sometimes seems to distrust his own temperament, may lose the current of an interpretation. Thus the effect of the suite was a little incomplete. But what beautiful music! This may be early Stravinsky, it may be in part derived from other composers, but he has yet to write with as much heart, with as warm and glowing fancy, as in this evocation of a fairy tale. There is one parallel in Russian art for this music: the poetry of Pushkin.

Firebird" admirably. But it seemed o me he missed something of the ragic quality in Ravel's "La Valse." This extraordinary piece is no fantasy on the old-fashioned Viennese waltz. It is a danse macabre, a waltz danced over a smouldering crater, and the Boston conductor to my mind did not altogether evoke the terror that underlies the lilting measures.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
JAN 9 1927

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

AT CARNEGIE HALL
BOSTON SYMPHONY

Concerto in D.....C. P. E. Bach-Steinb
"Fire Bird" suite.....Stravin
Symphony No. 7.....Sibe
"La Valse".....R

Sibelius

The feature of the Boston Symphony's matinee at Carnegie Hall yesterday, was the first New York performance of Sibelius's Seventh Symphony. The work was published in 1925 and received its American premiere last April in Philadelphia under Stokowski.

If there ever was a musician whose creative energies were moulded entirely by his immediate environment it is Sibelius. Born in Finland, he is the child of his native land in the completest sense. If his gaze ever wanders, it is toward farther north. He is enthralled by the bleakness of his heritage and cannot admit to himself the existence of softer regions where the sun is more solicitous for the warmth of the trees and fields and people it looks down upon. Life for him is a reflection of the physical austerity of the land of his nativity and he embraces with a noble ardor its sunless brilliance and unavailing grandeur.

There is in his music the feeling patrician aloofness, an implied sense superiority in his isolation, of one wh regards the optimism and sensuousnes of lands farther south only as an illu sion, bearing little relation to reality.

In his latest symphony, written one movement, the noted composer more passionately sombre than eve before. No ray of joy seems to brea through the bleak light that permeat his scene, an illumination as hopeles as the lighting in El Greco's "Crucifi ion." A solo trombone enunciates theme as forbidding and impersonal a foghorn through an impenetrab sea. The orchestra plays stern progre sions, a simple, unemotional folk tun is heard unexplained, pauses occu and the thing ends up quite sudden on a C major chord with the effe of an unanswered question.

The plausible conjecture is that S belius has followed the course of som secret mood, leaving the listener to un derstand as best he might. The on things this listener could grasp we the strength and twilight passion the strange music.

Mr. Koussevitzky played the sym phony, the concerto of Carl Philip Emanuel Bach and the Stravinsk

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
ERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 9 1927

Boston Symphony Offers New Work By Jan Sibelius

Seventh Symphony of Finnish Composer on Carnegie Hall Matinee Program; Koussevitsky Leads

The feature of yesterday's Boston Symphony matinee at Carnegie Hall was the first performance in New York of the Seventh Symphony of Jan Sibelius. This symphony, published in 1925, was introduced to America last spring by Mr. Stokowski, who played it in Philadelphia, but did not bring it with him on any of his visits to Carnegie Hall. Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed the symphony to Boston a month ago.

The work is in one movement; and, like all the major symphonic writing of Sibelius, it is intricate in form and subtle in its handling of material. It is closely woven, as well as closely packed. Sibelius handles with uncommon mastery the system of thematic evolution which Beethoven set as the difficult model for all future symphonists; and his application of the principle is conspicuous in this new score. Thematic motives which seem bare and unpromising are made to yield an astonishing richness and variety of tonal speech—as the scale passages and the successions of major thirds, which are so characteristic of his later works.

The symphony has no key signature though its allegiance to C major and its relatives is obvious enough. The score has no title, no program, no literary or dramatic background, at least none that is avowed. But that the music is concerned with the expression of spiritual history must be evident to any sympathetic hearer. It begins in twilight, sombrely, drastically, and passes through phases of conflict and crisis. There are variations of mood and pace; but the darkly passionate color of the music is never really lightened. Whether the chant for the solo trombone of which so much is made in the music is a song of faith or a defiance of destiny it would be rash to say. But there is the impression that this deeply felt music is the utterance of a noble dreamer, an heroic spirit unterrified by life.

Sibelius is often somber and tragical; but he is never lachrymose; not for him is the "cosmos draped in creepe," as for Tchaikovsky. The world of Sibelius is often gray with mist or swirling with wind and rain; but he faces it grimly with tight lips. He is a man of the North, and its harsh winds have steeled his spirit.

This symphony is less original in its musical substance than the Fifth. Sibelius has succumbed at times to the great enchanter of Bayreuth; he has even sent his soul to Paris and has yielded to the persuasive magic of Debussy. Yet this symphony in its finest moments is moving and impressive music—music that is not easy to forget. Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra played it superbly, with an eloquence which must have done full justice to the music.

The remainder of the program consisted of familiar items—the D major Concerto for orchestra of Emanuel Bach, which Mr. Koussevitzky introduced here two seasons ago; Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite, and Ravel's "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 9 1927

The last visit but one of the season, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will take place at the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Jan. 18.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now midway in a season in every way remarkable. The orchestra has just returned from a most successful visit to New York.

There will be a guest conductor this week in Boston, in Alfredo Casella, distinguished Italian composer and pianist, who will there produce his recent scores, "Partita" and his ballet suite, "The Jar."

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 9 1927

The Boston Symphony orches... be with us for its single visit of the year today, and although slippery sidewalks and pavements will prevent music lovers from dancing in the streets to celebrate the red-letter musical event of the midwinter season, there is no doubt that there will be an enthusiastic throng within the Auditorium. Right here it may be well to state again that the concert is to begin at 3 sharp. Doors for season and patron ticket holders will open at 2, and at 2.45 all seats remaining may be had by those holding the little free slips issued for this concert alone. Mr Koussevitzky is to give us a program well worth hearing. The Beethoven "Fifth Symphony," while it is the most familiar to music students, is probably the finest symphonic work of the composer whose centennial we are celebrating this year. Recent years have not known a performance of this work in the city. The modernists will be delighted by the choice of Prokokieff's orchestral suite from his opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," and one ventures to say that this will prove a delight to the entire audience, as it is not too dissonant and intricate to be understood by the average auditor. The Wagner numbers on the program are always welcome, and the Berlioz overture, a large florid piece, will make an enlivening start for the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS
JAN 9 1927

Orchestra Will or Beethoven Today

hony to Be Played at Annual Loca ognition of Centennial of Compos Modern Music Also the garter manu- visits the whole- latter is "edu- special agent

The Boston Symphony orchestra concert at the Auditorium this afternoon will be as usual, the highlight of the midwinter musical season. Again the music lovers of the city have the Young Men's Christian association to thank for its goodwill and community spirit in bringing this orchestra to the city in a program of the very best type, at little or no cost to those who attend.

Since the centennial of Beethoven's death will be celebrated on March 26 of this year, it is fitting that the orchestra should choose a Beethoven symphony for the principal number on its program. The celebrated Fifth Symphony in C minor, Op. 47 has been chosen, probably not only for its marvellously beautiful music, but because ith sa always been the most popular, and when an orchestra only appears in a city once in a whole season, it must, perforce, please most of its audience. For those who prefer modern music, the suite from Prokofieff's opera, "Love for Three Oranges" will provide at least a taste of that type of composition. The Berlioz overture, "La Carnaval Romaine" and the Wagner numbers, "Prelude" to "Lohengrin" and the "Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried," are always welcome on a symphony program. Conductor Serge Koussevitzky is sure to give these familiar pieces new meaning, and there will be undoubtedly new thrills in his management of the symphony itself.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony has four movements, an allegro con brio, andante con mot. allegro-trio and allegro. He sketched motives of th allegro, andante and scherzo a early as 1899 and 1801. We know from sketches that while he was a work on "Fidelio" and the piano forte concerto in G major in 1804-1806 he fas also busied with this symphon which he put aside to compose th fourth symphony, that in B flat. The fifth symphony was finished in th neihgborhood of Heligenstadt in 180 and dedicated to the Pripce von Lob kowitb and tht Count Rasmoffsky, i was published in April, 1809.

This symphony was first performe at the Theater am der Wien, Vienna on December 22, 1808. It was de scribed on the program as "A sym phony entitled 'Reflections of Life in the Country.'" The symphony is scored for the flutes, wo oboes, two clarinets, two bassaons, two horns, two trumpets, kettledrums, strings and in the last movement, piccolo, double bassoon and hree rmbnes are added..

Hector Berlioz wrote of thi symphony: "The symphony in C minor, seems to come directly and solely from the genius of Beethoven; he develops in it his own intimate thought; his secret sorrovs, his concentrated rage, his reverie charged with a dejection, oh, so sad, his visions at night, his burst of enthusiasm—these furnish him the subject and the forms of melody, harmony, rhythm, and orchestration are displayed as essentially individual—and now, as they are powerful and noble.

The first performance in this country of this symphony was in Boston, November 27, 1841.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Famous Russian Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra. Which Will Be Heard This Afternoon at the Auditorium in Y. M. C. A. Series. Likeness Shown Was Caught Recently on Deck of Ship Bringing Director Back for the Season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
JAN 10 1927

Brief and Fine.

Quite without premeditation or design Serge Koussevitzky stole a march on Otto Klemperer last Saturday when he took occasion at the Boston Symphony matinee in Carnegie Hall to acquaint this community with the seventh and latest symphonic adventure of Jan Sibelius. The illustrious and beetling German, who first made known this Nordic opus to his countrymen in September, will have his innings on Thursday next. But in point of fact both Philadelphia (last April) and Boston (last month) got ahead of Manhattan with respect to this two-year-old—or older—symphony, although for better or worse the ambitious radio bore it from Huntington avenue into dim and vasty distances.

The symphony is in one movement, continuous of texture and made up of sections contrasted yet interdependent of mood and organism. Sibelius has wrought with economy and signal concentration. Fifteen minutes or so suffice unto his say. There are no lengths and no monotonies. The symphony is a fine, strong work, whose process is elemental and scorns the prescribings of showy or utilitarian effect. It will compensate those who were disheartened by the meagre fare of "Tapiola." On the other hand, it is not so drastically epoch-making as to add manifold cubits to its creator's stature or to menace with cataclysm the underpinnings of the universe.

The work bears the immemorial Sibelius profile, with all which that cannotes of sombre enigma, brooding and unanswered. It has intensity and fancy and elevation. It is music of noble mien. Its affinities are rather to the fifth symphony than to the stark grandeurs and sable immensities of the fourth. The composer, whose later manner eschews the broad spanning, wide arched themes of his earlier and more fertile period, accomplishes much with the seemingly unpromising and unplastic material of scale passages, successions of thirds and square toed subjects, as well as a comparatively simple instrumental scheme. One grows conscious in this music of a curious Beethoven kinship. Mr. Gilman very properly detected in a scherzando episode a similarity of mood and matter to the "Eroica." And shortly after the A minor opening there comes a broad and hardie song in the strings which, as it mounts and unfolds in almost religious mood, discovers some of the very spirit and essential quality of the later Beethoven adagios.

Only in those passages that do the office of a scherzo can the firmness of the musical texture be said to relax. The popular note affirms itself in a section in triple time, where Sibelius becomes, as he has in other works, a type of Berserker Smetana. The close is reached intensely but without postures, without encompassed philosophies. It leaves things where it found them.

The performance of this brave, engaging work was to all appearances entirely admirable. The rest of the program was occupied by Philip Emmanuel Bach's D major concerto, Stravinsky's "Firebird" suite and Ravel's "La Valse."

H. F. P.

Music Notes and Comment

76

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JAN 10 1927

Music :

By Olga Samaroff

Sibelius, Casals and Gabrilowitsch—Henderson Asks Question

THE Boston Symphony programs seldom lack some item of especial interest. On Saturday Mr. Koussewitzky presented for the first time in New York (although it was already performed last April by the enterprising Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia) the Seventh Symphony, in one movement, of Sibelius. It would be interesting if new works could occasionally be performed without title, name of composer or analytical notes. Not that I underestimate the value of the latter. Quite the contrary. But the suggested experiment would prove how much we are influenced by preconceived ideas. I believe that if I had heard Sibelius's Seventh Symphony without knowing what it was, I should have received the impression that it was the work of a composer with an individual gift but not one of the first magnitude.

Olga Samaroff

I should have believed him to show in a measure the influence of Wagner—perhaps coming by way of Bruckner. A certain romantic spirituality of mood in this particular symphony brought Bruckner to my mind, as well as the chorale-like melodic lines allotted to the brasses, including a short but effective trombone solo and certain features of harmonic texture. I do not think I would have found anything Nordic in the symphony, although I have found (or thought I did) such an atmosphere in earlier works of Sibelius. But it seems to me this newest symphony can scarcely be called racial music in any sense. It gives rather an impression of eclecticism without approaching plagiarism. I enjoyed listening to it without being in any way profoundly stirred.

GOOD music, well played, it was, in my opinion, and for such we must be thankful. It was preceded on the program by an interesting if not very important three-movement Concerto for Orchestra in D major by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach and the Suite (somewhat curtailed) from Starvinsky's "L'oiseau de Feu." It was followed by Ravel's charming "Waltz," which I did not hear, as I could not resign myself to miss Casals's entire recital. Having successfully overcome all obstacles between Fifty-sixth street and Town Hall, I arrived breathless but in time to enjoy the great cellist's supremely beautiful playing of the A major Sonata of Beethoven.

Casals's art is a precious thing. An artist who can bring great music to life in the way he does is a factor without which all the creative genius which goes into the composition of music becomes in a sense impotent. The composer gives a musical work its being, but the interpretive musician must give it its sound, without which it is an inert, lifeless collection of marks on paper. This obvious truth is perhaps the answer to a question asked by Mr. W. J. Henderson in his weekly article on music published Saturday in the New York Evening Sun.

After likening the musical composer, the musician interpreter and the public to the farmer, the middleman and the consumer, Mr. Henderson asks "Why should the middleman get all the profit?" The purely material reward of the artistic "middleman" may well seem disproportionate, but it cannot be forgotten that while the commercial middleman is a convenience the musical interpreter is a necessity. The public, if it wished to take the time and trouble to go forth into the land and buy its own eggs, grain and vegetables, could do so.

BUT it cannot hear a Brahms Symphony, a Bach Mass or a Wagner opera unless these works are performed. Perhaps Mr. Henderson can, through the sole medium of his eyes in reading a musical score, realize its content. So can I. But, barring the usually modest possibilities of the amateur in the direction of making music for himself, the public which gives the artistic "middleman" his "profit" cannot; and at best the purely visual reading of a score is no complete fulfillment of the composer's intention. These truths are the foundation upon which the importance of the musician-interpreter rests.

Artists of the caliber of Mr. Casals, or of Mr. Gabrilowitsch, whose piano recital yesterday afternoon was a sheer delight, certainly deserve all the "profit" that those who wish to hear musical compositions through a perfect medium can bestow upon them. Mr. Gabrilowitsch's program included the Prelude of the A minor English Suite of J. S. Bach, a Rondo Espressivo of Carl Philip Emanuel Bach, an Allegro of Haydn, the Appassionata Sonata of Beethoven, three Chopin pieces, the Jeux d'Eau of Ravel and "L'Isle Joyeuse" of Debussy.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch enjoyed his usual success with a large audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 10 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE CONCERT

Koussevitzky Waves Masterly Baton Over Rendition of Beethoven's and Russian's Works

By FRANCIS REGAL

The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, gave its annual concert in the Y. M. C. A. Sunday afternoon series at the Auditorium yesterday, and the size and enthusiasm of the audience refuted the croakers who had thought that broadcasting the orchestra's Boston concerts would impair interest in its visits to Springfield. To some extent it probably works the other way, for many must have been present yesterday who had not before attended these concerts and were eager to see how their actual playing compared with the broadcast version. What is heard by radio, to be sure, is variable depending not only on the broadcasting but on the individual receiving set and its manipulation, so that comparison is an individual matter, but so brilliant a performance as that of yesterday, in a hall acoustically so perfect gave an excellent standard for comparison.

That a sensation of brilliance should be left by a concert made up mainly of music by no means brilliant may seem paradoxical, and the concert might have been more perfectly satisfying if the subject matter had all been more in harmony with the spirit of the hour. The crisp air gave the strings that high resonance which is admirable for some music but not so mellow or sympathetic as goes with a softer day, and conductor and musicians were keyed up to the keen bright wintry weather. It fitted very well with the bright orchestral coloring of the "Roman Carnival" by Berlioz, and was ideal for the piquant effects of Prokofieff's suite, "The Love for Three Oranges." It was not entirely in harmony with the slow and gradual unfolding the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin." The climax when it came, was stirring, but the protracted harmonic evolutions of the violins, while done with admirable perfection, lacked something of the shimmering beauty of tone that makes each change in the harmony enchant the ear.

Beautiful Opening

It was not that the orchestra lacked delicacy, for there could hardly be a more delicate pianissimo than in the beautiful soft opening of Wagner's "Forest Murmurs"—the least bit less and the tone would have faded out. Mr Koussevitzky likes strong effects, but he also likes strong contrasts, going from as near absolute zero as possible to an extreme of sonority considerably beyond that sanctioned by most of his predecessors. In Boston his critics have called him noisy, but this is hardly fair, since he merely enlarges the dynamic scale, and few conductors seem so solicitous to give every passage its exact weight—at no point is his conducting negative or perfunctory.

These qualities, so admirable in themselves and often yielding admirable results, led almost to artistic disaster in Beethoven's C minor symphony, which closed the program. This majestic work, most sublime of all symphonies, no conductor can spoil so long as he refrains from doing too much; Mr Koussevitzky was constantly in danger of doing too much. For the Boston veterans it is almost enough to mark the time; their collective musical sense would create a strong and moving interpretation. This symphony does not need to be "fussed up"; it is too massive and too profound for artistic trimmings. There were times when the conductor interposed himself needlessly between composer and audience; times when he himself seemed ill at ease as though he had failed to shift quickly enough from the facile posturings of Prokofieff to the four-square dignity of Beethoven.

Henry James tells how his novels did not greatly please Mr Koussezitzky's compatriot Turguenieff, who found them too much ornamented "with bow-knots." Beethoven's music needs no decoration of little bow-knots, and a simpler, less sophisticated reading would have been more impressive. Yet in this symphony there is an inherent force which will have its way in defiance of the worst conductor—or the best. With the scherzo, in which the basses rattled off their famous virtuoso passages with prodigious skill, thing began to mend, and when the symphony broke into the thrilling theme of the finale the great genius of Beethoven had mastered all—players, conductor and auditors. And this stood out as the great moment of the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 11 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A rustle and perusal of programs—a friendly discussion and exchange of views—an appreciative applause as the conductor appears on the stage—an appreciative hush as the conductor raises his baton. With one accord all eyes are focused on the leader. A faint shimmer of violins—a rise and fall of violin bows—a precise beating of padded hammers on the kettle drums—the concert has begun!

Those who were fortunate enough to listen in on the concerts of the Boston Symphony this fall which were broadcasted through the generosity of Mr. Quinby of Boston will have the opportunity of hearing the orchestra in real life and seeeing them in action and watching the wonderful conducting of Mr. Koussevitzky.

The program for the Hartford concert has been announced and appears to be one of the most attractive program ever played in Hartford.

The seat sale is now in progress at McCoy's and it is advising to make early reservations by 'phoning to Frank A. Sedgwick, 2-6147.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 11 1927

Boston Symphony

It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard as a conductor in western Europe. He is also invited annually to conduct a series as the guest of Sir Henry Wood's Orchestra in London. Principally through these concerts and by virtue of his operatic performances in London and elsewhere, Koussevitzky has come to be regarded as the most brilliant inspired and inspiring conductor in that part of the world. America's admiration of Koussevitzky need scarcely be pointed out. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's sensitive response as one man to his least gesture bespeaks the leader of command and authority. The fine clarity with which he presents the music of the older masters, his inspired eloquence with the "romantics," his discernment in choosing and his brilliance in performing the significant music of our own day; these things reveal an extraordinary range of artistic sympathy. The sale of seats is now well advanced for the concert to be held in Hartford, February 6, at the Capitol Theater. It is advisable to obtain reservations promptly by calling Frank Sedgwick at McCoy's music store, 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 10 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard as a conductor in western Europe. He is also invited annually to conduct a series as guest of Sir Henry Wood's orchestra in London. Principally through these concerts and by virtue of his operatic performances in London and elsewhere, Koussevitzky has come to be regarded as the most brilliant, inspired and inspiring conductor in that part of the world.

America's admiration of Koussevitzky need scarcely be pointed out. The Boston Symphony orchestra's sensitive response as one man to his least gesture bespeaks the leader of command and authority. The fine clarity with which he presents the music of the older masters, in his inspired eloquence with the "romantics," his discernment in choosing and his brilliance in performing the significant music of our own day. These things reveal an extraordinary range of artistic sympathy. And not least, there are qualities of illumining imagination in his performance which are said to be quite without equal.

The sale of seats is now in progress and well advanced for the concert to be held in Hartford, February 6, at the Capitol theater. It is advisable to obtain reservations promptly by calling Frank Sedgwick at McCoy's Music store, 2-2251.

CROWD APPLAUDS

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Y. EVENING SUN
JAN 10 1927

Boston Symphony Plays Novelty

Orchestra Presents Seventh Symphony of Sibelius for First Time.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its matinee concert on Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall and entrained for its home town. The program consisted of Emmanuel Bach's D major concerto for orchestra (the Steinberg arrangement), the Stravinsky "L'Oiseau de Feu" suite, the seventh symphony of Sibelius and Ravel's "La Valse." The Sibelius composition was heard for the first time here.

It was published in 1925 and had its first American performance by the Philadelphia Orchestra at home in April of last year. Mr. Stokowski did not bring it to New York.

But Mr. Klemperer announces it for the Symphony Society concert of Thursday. Thus it will have had two New York interpretations within a week. The conductors are indeed busy again. Mengelberg goes hence and Toscanini, like Wotan, is heralded by a glow of light. The doings of these visitors will be observed with interest and doubtless the columns of the papers will swell with laudatory adjectives.

It is "all to the good." For whatever incites people to discussion of pros and cons in musical art must lead to enlightenment, to broader vision, and to opinions founded on firmer ground. Opinions will differ and that is as it should be. Meanwhile it may be noted that the seventh symphony of Sibelius, his opus 105, is in no particular key, but begins in A minor and ends in the relative major C. It is continuous, though there are clearly defined movements. In his program notes for the Philadelphia production Lawrence Gilman called it an "enigmatic, puissant and strangly moving work."

There may be more to say about it after the towering Mr. Klemperer waves the Symphony musicians through its mazes. For the present it may suffice to note that it made a serious impression. It is one of Sibelius's characteristic creations, combining the moods of the northern country with the profound introspection of the man. It has breadth of style and nobility of expression and it will probably improve on further acquaintance.

Yesterday Mr. Klemperer was engaged in the Mecca Auditorium repeating his Friday program, while Mr. Mengelberg in Carnegie Hall was conducting the Philharmonic for the last time this season. It was a varied list that he placed before the Sabbath devotees. It began with Johann Christian Bach's B flat symphony arranged by Stein, the prelude to the second act of Chabrier's "Gwendoline," the dance of Salome from Strauss's opera all about that dangerous young person, and the fifth symphony of Beethoven.

Beethoven of course was Mr. Mengelberg's final choice, for one must departing leave a few footprints on the sands of time. The "Salome" dance was performed with gusto. Mr. Mengelberg is one of the chosen exponents of Strauss, who is less in need of exposition how than he was twenty years ago, when some music lovers believed him to be headed for a madhouse. He seems very simple to-day, and yet he contrives to remain a rather tall figure in the musical field.

Walter Damrosch bade forewell to his infant class at the children's concert of Saturday morning in Carnegie Hall. He told his audience that he had received many letters from children calling him "Uncle Walter" and begging him not to desert them. He confessed that he could not do that and would continue with them. His explanatory remarks on the program of the morning were received with more than the usual amount of applause.

And thus the magicians of the orchestral wand come and go. Each has his bag of tricks, each his astonishing feat. The world stops, looks, listens and wonders. And the more it wonders the larger the salaries. It is a grand show.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
JAN 12 1927

The annual concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Springfield Mass., has been sponsored for several seasons by the Y. M. C. A. Moreover, it appears to be the established custom to open it with prayer. Incidentally it is noticed that in

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
JAN 12 1927

New Achron Violin Concerto

Joseph Achron, Russian compos living in New York, has written a co certo built on old Hebrew music m tives, and its first hearing has bee arranged by Mr. Koussevitzky of th Boston Symphony, who has invited Mr Achron to play his composition with the orchestra in Boston on January 24. Mr. Achron's concerto is in two parts, the first half being built on old Hebrew chants and the second part using as thematic material two Palestinian tunes. Mr. Achron will make his debut as a concert artist in this country when he appears with the Boston Symphony, and the occasion recalls that he was an Auer pupil simultaneously with Elman and Zimbalist. "Salome Dance," Mr. Achron's experiment in composing for vocal orchestra with percussion, presented at the Metropolitan with the Stony Point Ensemble, and danced by Maud Allen, is his previous work given in this country. The concerto is to bear the simple identification, Opus 60.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
JAN 12 1927

To the Boston Symphony concerts this week Friday and Saturday will come as guest conductor the distinguished Italian musician, Mr. Casella. There will also be as assisting artist, Mr. Gieseking, pianist, who will play in Mr. Casella's Partita for Piano and Orchestra, patterned after the ancient style, and also in Mozart's Concerto in C major. The program will include the Concerto Grosso in A minor, for strings, by Vivaldi; and a Suite from Mr. Casella's ballet, "The Jar."

The management of the orchestra announces that the visit of Mr. Respighi as guest-conductor has now been set for Feb. 18 and 19.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 12 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The New York Herald Tribune of last unday comments on the new work of an Sibelius offered by the Boston ymphony: "The feature of yesterday's Boston Symphony matinee at Carnegie all was the first performance in New ork of the Seventh Symphony of Jan Sibelius. This symphony published in 1925 was introduced to America last spring by Mr. Stokowski, who played it in Philadelphia, but did not bring it with him on any of his visits to Carnegie hall. Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed the symphony to Boston a month ago.

"This symphony in its finest movements is moving and impressive music—music that is not easily forgotten. Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra played it superbly, with an eloquence which must have done full justice to the music."

The work of Jan Sibelius will be represented by Finlandia Symphonic Poem, Op. 26, No. 7, in the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Capitol theater, February 6. Tickets may be secured by calling Frank Sedgwick at McCoy's 2-2251.

In the same city there is a movement to have the meetings of the City Council prefaced by a similar prelude, which leads one of the newspapers to suggest that it might be well to follow the Scriptural injunction and have the prayer offered in executive session.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.

JAN 1 0 1927

Music :

By Olga Samaroff

Sibelius, Casals and Gabrilowitsch—Henderson Asks Question

THE Boston Symphony programs seldom lack some item of especial interest. On Saturday Mr. Koussewitzky presented for the first time in New York (although it was already performed last April by the enterprising Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia) the Seventh Symphony, in one movement, of Sibelius. It would be interesting if new works could occasionally be performed without title, name of composer or analytical notes. Not that I underestimate the value of the latter. Quite the contrary. But the suggested experiment would prove how much we are influenced by preconceived ideas. I believe that if I had heard Sibelius's Seventh Symphony without knowing what it was, I should have received the impression that it was the work of a composer with an individual gift but not one of the first magnitude.

Olga Samaroff

I should have believed him to show in a measure the influence of Wagner—perhaps coming by way of Bruckner. A certain romantic spirituality of mood in this particular symphony brought Bruckner to my mind, as well as the chorale-like melodic lines allotted to the brasses, including a short but effective trombone solo and certain features of harmonic texture. I do not think I would have found anything Nordic in the symphony, although I have found (or thought I did) such an atmosphere in earlier works of Sibelius. But it seems to me this newest symphony can scarcely be called racial music in any sense. It gives rather an impression of eclecticism without approaching plagiarism. I enjoyed listening to it without being in any way profoundly stirred.

GOOD music, well played, it was, in my opinion, and for such we must be thankful. It was preceded on the program by an interesting if not very important three-movement Concerto for Orchestra in D major by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach and the Suite (somewhat curtailed) from Starvinsky's "L'oiseau de Feu." It was followed by Ravel's charming "Waltz," which I did not hear, as I could not resign myself to miss Casals's entire recital. Having successfully overcome all obstacles between Fifty-sixth street and Town Hall, I arrived breathless but in time to enjoy the great cellist's supremely beautiful playing of the A major Sonata of Beethoven.

Casals's art is a precious thing. An artist who can bring great music to life in the way he does is a factor without which all the creative genius which goes into the composition of music becomes in a sense impotent. The composer gives a musical work its being, but the interpretive musician must give it its sound, without which it is an inert, lifeless collection of marks on paper. This obvious truth is perhaps the answer to a question asked by Mr. W. J. Henderson in his weekly article on music published Saturday in the New York Evening Sun.

After likening the musical composer, the musician interpreter and the public to the farmer, the middleman and the consumer, Mr. Henderson asks "Why should the middleman get all the profit?" The purely material reward of the artistic "middleman" may well seem disproportionate, but it cannot be forgotten that while the commercial middleman is a convenience the musical interpreter is a necessity. The public, if it wished to take the time and trouble to go forth into the land and buy its own eggs, grain and vegetables, could do so.

BUT it cannot hear a Brahms Symphony, a Bach Mass or a Wagner opera unless these works are performed. Perhaps Mr. Henderson can, through the sole medium of his eyes in reading a musical score, realize its content. So can I. But, barring the usually modest possibilities of the amateur in the direction of making music for himself, the public which gives the artistic "middleman" his "profit" cannot; and at best, the purely visual reading of a score is no complete fulfillment of the composer's intention. These truths are the foundation upon which the importance of the musician-interpreter rests.

Artists of the caliber of Mr. Casals, or of Mr. Gabrilowitsch, whose piano recital yesterday afternoon was a sheer delight, certainly deserve all the "profit" that those who wish to hear musical compositions through a perfect medium can bestow upon them. Mr. Gabrilowitsch's program included the Prelude of the A minor English Suite of J. S. Bach, a Rondo Espressivo of Carl Philip Emanuel Bach, an Allegro of Haydn, the Appassionata Sonata of Beethoven, three Chopin pieces, the Jeux d'Eau of Ravel and "L'Isle Joyeuse" of Debussy.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch enjoyed his usual success with a large audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 1 0 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE CONCERT

Koussevitzky Waves Masterly Baton Over Rendition of Beethoven's and Russian's Works

By FRANCIS REGAL

The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, gave its annual concert in the Y. M. C. A. Sunday afternoon series at the Auditorium yesterday, and the size and enthusiasm of the audience refuted the croakers who had thought that broadcasting the orchestra's Boston concerts would impair interest in its visits to Springfield. To some extent it probably works the other way, for many must have been present yesterday who had not before attended these concerts and were eager to see how their actual playing compared with the broadcast version. What is heard by radio, to be sure, is variable depending not only on the broadcasting but on the individual receiving set and its manipulation, so that comparison is an individual matter, but so brilliant a performance as that of yesterday, in a hall acoustically so perfect gave an excellent standard for comparison.

That a sensation of brilliance should be left by a concert made up mainly of music by no means brilliant may seem paradoxical, and the concert might have been more perfectly satisfying if the subject matter had all been more in harmony with the spirit of the hour. The crisp air gave the strings that high resonance which is admirable for some music but not so mellow or sympathetic as goes with a softer day, and conductor and musicians were keyed up to the keen bright wintry weather. It fitted very well with the bright orchestral coloring of the "Roman Carnival" by Berliz, and was ideal for the piquant effects of Prokofieff's suite, "The Love [illegible] taxed on the [illegible] entirely in harmony with the slow and gradual unfolding the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin." The climax when it came, was stirring, but the protracted harmonic evolutions of the violins, while done with admirable pe-fection, lacked something of the shimmering beauty of tone that makes each change in the harmony enchant the ear.

Beautiful Opening

It was not that the orchestra lacked delicacy, for there could hardly be a more delicate pianissimo than in the beautiful soft opening of Wagner's "Forest Murmurs"—the least bit less and the tone would have faded out. Mr Koussevitzky likes strong effects, but he also likes strong contrasts, going from as near absolute zero as possible to an extreme of sonority considerably beyond that sanctioned by most of his predecessors. In Boston his critics have called him noisy, but this is hardly fair, since he merely enlarges the dynamic scale, and few conductors seem so solicitous to give every passage its exact weight—at no point is his conducting negative or perfunctory.

These qualities, so admirable in themselves and often yielding admirable results, led almost to artistic disaster in Beethoven's C minor symphony, which closed the program. This majestic work, most sublime of all symphonies, no conductor can spoil so long as he refrains from doing too much; Mr Koussevitzky was constantly in danger of doing too much. For the Boston veterans it is almost enough to mark the time; their collective musical sense would create a strong and moving interpretation. This symphony does not need to be "fussed up"; it is too massive and too profound for artistic trimmings. There were times when the conductor interposed himself needlessly between composer and audience; times when he himself seemed ill at ease as though he had failed to shift quickly enough from the facile posturings of Prokofieff to the four-square dignity of Beethoven.

Henry James tells how his novels did not greatly please Mr Koussezitzky's compatriot Turguenieff, who found them too much ornamented "with bow-knots." Beethoven's music needs no decoration of little bow-knots, and a simpler, less sophisticated reading would have been more impressive. Yet in this symphony there is an inherent force which will have its way in defiance of the worst conductor—or the best. With the scherrzo, in which the basses rattled off their famous virtuoso passages with prodigious skill, thing began to mend, and when the symphony broke into the thrilling theme of the finale the great genius of Beethoven had mastered all—players, conductor and auditors. And this stood out as the great moment of the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 1 1 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A rustle and perusal of programs—a friendly discussion and exchange of views—an appreciative applause as the conductor appears on the stage—an appreciative hush as the conductor raises his baton. With one accord all eyes are focused on the leader. A faint shimmer of violins—a rise and fall of violin bows—a precise beating of padded hammers on the kettle drums—the concert has begun!

Those who were fortunate enough to listen in on the concerts of the Boston Symphony this fall which were broadcasted through the generosity of Mr. Quinby of Boston will have the opportunity of hearing the orchestra in real life and seeeing them in action and watching the wonderful conducting of Mr. Koussevitzky.

The program for the Hartford concert has been announced and appears to be one of the most attractive program ever played in Hartford.

The seat sale is now in progress at McCoy's and it is advising to make early reservations by 'phoning to Frank A. Sedgwick, 2-6147.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 1 1 1927

Boston Symphony

It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard as a conductor in western Europe. He is also invited annually to conduct a series as guest of Sir Henry Wood's Orchestra in London. Principally through these concerts and by virtue of his operatic performances in London and elsewhere, Koussevitzky has come to be regarded as the most brilliant inspired and inspiring conductor in that part of the world. America's admiration of Koussevitzky need scarcely be pointed out. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's sensitive response as one man to his least gesture bespeaks the leader of command and authority. The fine clarity with which he presents the music of the older masters, his inspired eloquence with the "romantics," his discernment in choosing and his brilliance in performing the significant music of our own day; these things reveal an extraordinary range of artistic sympathy. The sale of seats is now well advanced for the concert to be held in Hartford, February 6, at the Capitol Theater. It is advisable to obtain reservations promptly by calling Frank Sedgwick at McCoy's music store, 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JAN 1 0 1927

CROWD APPLAUDS

BOSTON SYMPHONY

It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard as a conductor in western Europe. He is also invited annually to conduct a series as guest of Sir Henry Wood's orchestra in London. Principally through these concerts and by virtue of his operatic performances in London and elsewhere, Koussevitzky has come to be regarded as the most brilliant, inspired and inspiring conductor in that part of the world.

America's admiration of Koussevitzky need scarcely be pointed out. The Boston Symphony orchestra's sensitive response as one man to his least gesture bespeaks the leader of command and authority. The fine clarity with which he presents the music of the older masters, in his inspired eloquence with the "romantics," his discernment in choosing and his brilliance in performing the significant music of our own day. These things reveal an extraordinary range of artistic sympathy. And not least, there are qualities of illumining imagination in his performance which are said to be quite without equal.

The sale of seats is now in progress and well advanced for the concert to be held in Hartford, February 6, at the Capitol theater. It is advisable to obtain reservations promptly by calling Frank Sedgwick at McCoy's Music store, 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Y. EVENING SUN

JAN 1 0 1927

Boston Symphony Plays Novelty

Orchestra Presents Seventh Symphony of Sibelius for First Time.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its matinee concert on Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall and entrained for its home town. The program consisted of Emmanuel Bach's D major concerto for orchestra (the Steinberg arrangement), the Stravinsky "L'Oiseau de Feu" suite, the seventh symphony of Sibelius and Ravel's "La Valse." The Sibelius composition was heard for the first time here.

It was published in 1925 and had its first American performance by the Philadelphia Orchestra at home in April of last year. Mr. Stokowski did not bring it to New York.

But Mr. Klemperer announces it for the Symphony Society concert of Thursday. Thus it will have had two New York interpretations within a week. The conductors are indeed busy again. Mengelberg goes hence and Toscanini, like Wotan, is heralded by a glow of light. The doings of these visitors will be observed with interest and doubtless the columns of the papers will swell with laudatory adjectives.

It is "all to the good." For whatever incites people to discussion of pros and cons in musical art must lead to enlightenment, to broader vision, and to opinions founded on firmer ground. Opinions will differ and that is as it should be. Meanwhile it may be noted that the seventh symphony of Sibelius, his opus 105, is in no particular key, but begins in A minor and ends in the relative major C. It is continuous, though there are clearly defined movements. In his program notes for the Philadelphia production Lawrence Gilman called it an "enigmatic, puissant and strangly moving work."

There may be more to say about it after the towering Mr. Klemperer waves the Symphony musicians through its mazes. For the present it may suffice to note that it made a serious impression. It is one of Sibelius's characteristic creations, combining the moods of the northern country with the profound introspection of the man. It has breadth of style and nobility of expression and it will probably improve on further acquaintance.

Yesterday Mr. Klemperer was engaged in the Mecca Auditorium repeating his Friday program, while Mr. Mengelberg in Carnegie Hall was conducting the Philharmonic for the last time this season. It was a varied list that he placed before the Sabbath devotees. It began with Johann Christian Bach's B flat symphony arranged by Stein, the prelude to the second act of Chabrier's "Gwendoline," the dance of Salome from Strauss's opera all about that dangerous young person, and the fifth symphony of Beethoven.

Beethoven of course was Mr. Mengelberg's final choice, for one must departing leave a few footprints on the sands of time. The "Salome" dance was performed with gusto. Mr. Mengelberg is one of the chosen exponents of Strauss, who is less in need of exposition now than he was twenty years ago, when some music lovers believed him to be headed for a madhouse. He seems very simple to-day, and yet he contrives to remain a rather tall figure in the musical field.

Walter Damrosch bade forewell to his infant class at the children's concert of Saturday morning in Carnegie Hall. He told his audience that he had received many letters from children calling him "Uncle Walter" and begging him not to desert them. He confessed that he could not do that and would continue with them. His explanatory remarks on the program of the morning were received with more than the usual amount of applause.

And thus the magicians of the orchestral wand come and go. Each has his bag of tricks, each his astonishing feat. The world stops, looks, listens and wonders. And the more it wonders the larger the salaries. It is a grand show.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

JAN 12 1927

The annual concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Springfield Mass., has been sponsored for several seasons by the Y. M. C. A. Moreover, it appears to be the established custom to open it with prayer. Incidentally it is noticed that in [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVENING POST
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.

JAN 1 2 1927

New Achron Violin Concerto

Joseph Achron, Russian compos living in New York, has written a co certo built on old Hebrew music m tives, and its first hearing has bee arranged by Mr. Koussevitzky of th Boston Symphony, who has invited Mr Achron to play his composition with the orchestra in Boston on January 24. Mr. Achron's concerto is in two parts, the first half being built on old Hebrew chants and the second part using as thematic material two Palestinian tunes. Mr. Achron will make his debut as a concert artist in this country when he appears with the Boston Symphony, and the occasion recalls that he was an Auer pupil simultaneously with Elman and Zimbalist. "Salome Dance," Mr. Achron's experiment in composing for vocal orchestra with percussion, presented at the Metropolitan with the Stony Point Ensemble, and danced by Maud Allen, is his previous work given in this country. The concerto is to bear the simple identification, Opus 60.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

JAN 12 1927

To the Boston Symphony concerts this week Friday and Saturday will come as guest conductor the distinguished Italian musician, Mr. Casella. There will also be as assisting artist, Mr. Giesecking, pianist, who will play in Mr. Casella's Partita for Piano and Orchestra, patterned after the ancient style, and also in Mozart's Concerto in C major. The program will include the Concerto Grosso in A minor, for strings, by Vivaldi; and a Suite from Mr. Casella's ballet, "The Jar."

The management of the orchestra announces that the visit of Mr Respighi as guest-conductor has now been set for Feb. 18 and 19.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 12 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The New York Herald Tribune of last unday comments on the new work of an Sibelius offered by the Boston ymphony: "The feature of yesterday's Boston Symphony matinee at Carnegie all was the first performance in New ork of the Seventh Symphony of Jan Sibelius. This symphony published in 1925 was introduced to America last spring by Mr. Stokowski, who played it in Philadelphia, but did not bring it with him on any of his visits to Carnegie hall. Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed the symphony to Boston a month ago.

"This symphony in its finest movements is moving and impressive music—music that is not easily forgotten. Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra played it superbly, with an eloquence which must have done full justice to the music."

The work of Jan Sibelius will be represented by Finlandia Symphonic Poem, Op. 26, No. 7, in the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Capitol theater, February 6. Tickets may be secured by calling Frank Sedgwick at McCoy's 2-2251.

the same city there is a [illegible] to have the meetings of the City Council prefaced by a similar prelude, which leads one of the newspapers to suggest that it might be well to follow the Scriptural injunction and have the prayer offered in executive session.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JAN 12 1927

SYMPHONY TO GIVE FOURTH CONCERT HERE ON TUESDAY

Schumann, Stravinsky and Bach Included in Programme at Albee Theatre.—"Concerto for Orchestra in D Major" Opening Number.

Schumann, Stravinsky and the "Berlin" Bach are on the programme for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series at the E. F. Albee Theatre in this city Tuesday night at 8:15 o'clock.

The opening number will be Bach's "Concerto for Orchestra in D. Major." Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, son of the mighty Johann, lived from 1714 to 1788. "In my opinion," he once said, "the grand object of music is to touch the heart; and this end can never be obtained by mere noise, drumming and arpeggios—at all events not by me." His personality and technique had much influence on the musicians of his day; even Haydn acknowledged a great debt to this younger Bach.

Stravinsky follows with his Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Fire-Bird"). One of the most interesting of modern composers, Stravinsky with his dramatic, lively ballet music will add a modern touch to the programme in strong contrast with the concerto.

The programme fittingly closes with Schumann's Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38. His contribution represents, chronologically, a third distinct period in the selections offered by the orchestra, falling as it does in the 19th century midway between Bach and Stravinsky. Schumann was born in 1810 and took up music as a career in opposition to the wishes of his parents, who wanted him to study law. He is one of the few composers who first won recognition in the musical world as a critic. His reviews were important factors in bringing the work of Schubert, Mendelssohn and Gade to the attention of the musical world, and he is said to have practically introduced Berlioz.

The programme follows:

Bach, C. P. E. Concerto for Orchestra in D major.
(Arranged by Mixmillian Steinberg)
I. Allegro moderato
II. Andante lento molto
III. Allegro
Stravinsky, Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Fire-Bird") A Danced Legend
a. Introduction; Katschei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird
b. Supplication of the Fire-Bird
c. The Princesses Play with the Golden Apples
e. Infernal Dance of all the Subjects of Katschei
Schumann, Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38
I. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace
II. Larghetto
III. Scherzo; Molto vivace. Trio I; Molto piu vivace; Trio II.
IV. Allegro animato e grazioso
Mason and Hamlin Pianoforte

There will be an intermission of ten minutes before the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MAIL
TORONTO, CAN.
JAN 12 1927

MUSIC IN N

TWO NEW COMPOSITIONS.

Special to The Mail and Empire.

New York, Jan. 11.—If last week New York had no visiting orchestras, this week there were concerts by our most distinguished visitors, the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia orchestra. There were also concerts by our local symphonic bodies.

Mr. Koussevitzky, at his Thursday concert, presented a program of extraordinary interest, the contrast being very marked. Fancy commencing an evening with Mozart's charming, lacey "Kleine Nachtmusisk" and ending it with Stravinsky's appalling "Sacre du Printempts"! In between these two were works old and new which necessitated the harpischord, De Falla's Concerto for harpischord, flute, oboe, clarinet and violin, and Mozart's lightning-like Rondo for harpischord and orchestra.

New Spanish Number.

Incidents and Prospects
TRANS JAN 13

Dividing his Mondays, this season, between the current week, spent in New York, and a week to come in February, Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, Jan. 21 and 22. At them he will produce for the first time anywhere a Suite for Orchestra written by Monsieur Roussel, the singular and sometimes perplexing Parisian composer. He undertook the piece at Mr. Koussevitzky's suggestion, for performance in Boston this winter and in Paris next spring. Handel's Concerto Grosso for Strings, in B minor, will begin the concerts; Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," memorably played at the conductor's début in Boston, will end them. Evidently with Skriabin in the nineteen-twenties, Mr. Koussevitzky is like Carl Bergmann, sometime conductor of the New York Philharmonic Society, with Wagner in the nineteen-seventies. Not a few of his hearers had a fear for the great Richard and protested "I'll play him till you like him," they hoped out the old man with an oath.

Mr. Monteux, conducting in Amsterdam for the absent Mengelberg, remains as faithful to Arthur Bliss as he was when he made known to Boston the Englishman's "Color Symphony." Lately he played to the Hollanders Mr. Bliss's new "Hymn to Apollo." Soon he will carry it to London where he is to be guest conductor at a Philharmonic Concert.

Mme. Povla Frijsh's concert at Jordan Hall, originally announced for Wednesday evening, Jan. 26, is deferred to Thursday evening, Feb. 17, to suit the convenience of an accompanist whom the singer finds indispensable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 13 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Sergei Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra has the sole distinction of having been a virtuoso of the double bass. Circumstances of his early choice are these. When as a boy of fourteen he entered the Moscow conservatory, he was required by the rules of the institution to study, for orchestral class, either a bass instrument or the doublebass. Koussevitzky chose the latter and later became a pupil of the celebrated Rambaussec.

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY.

Secure reservations for the concert on February 6 at the Capitol theater by calling Frank Sedgwick at McCoy's 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 14 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The characteristics of Sergei Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, are interestingly revealed in the reminiscences of his friend and fellow pupil in Russia in the days when he was first prominent as a doublebass virtuoso. The following excerpt of the description was contributed to the New York Times by Vladimir Dubinsky, previous to Koussevitzky's New York debut:

"The engagement of Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra brings to me many memories of the days of our youth. They are concerned mostly with Koussevitzky as the wonderful bass player I knew him to be, for it was long before anyone, even Koussevitzky himself conceived the idea of taking up the baton. Of Koussevitzky as the conductor and orchestra organizer, I learned while I was already in this country. I am conversant with the fact that the press has acclaimed him wherever he appeared at the head of an orchestra. I can say only this much; that if he directs the orchestra the way he played the bass violin when I knew him, he must be a remarkable orchestra leader."

Hartford music lovers who desire an opportunity to attend the Boston Symphony orchestra, February 6, may obtain reservations by calling Frank Sedgwick at McCoy's Music store, 2-2251.

BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 13 1927

FLOOD OF LETTERS FOR BROADCASTING CONCERTS URGED

Mrs. Misch Wants to Have Symphony Programmes Put on Air by Providence Station. Hopes to Show There is Real Demand for Them.

Persons in this city and surrounding districts who are desirous of enjoying the Boston Symphony concerts over the radio are letting the opportunity glide through their fingers by neglecting to make their wishes known, Mrs. Caesar Misch, President of the Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs, declared last night.

Mrs. Misch said that W. S. Quinby, sponsor of the symphony, had shown interest in her complaint that Providence radio users were unable to get the concerts plainly from Station WBZA, Boston. He assured her that if she could give concrete proof that people were appreciative of the symphony, he would make every effort to have the concerts brought to Providence over the air, although it is a difficult problem.

Present arrangements of Mr. Quinby call for broadcasting of the symphony through the Boston station, which is connected with Symphony Hall by telegraph wires. When Mrs. Misch approached the Shepard Stores about having the concerts relayed from their station in Boston to WEAN, Providence, it was learned that the connections between the two stations were by phone wire. The telephone company, she was informed, would have nothing to do with a system using telegraph connections. Directors of the Shepard stations stated that, although they would like to broadcast the concerts, it would be too expensive to lay telegraph lines between the two cities for that purpose.

Two weeks time was given Mrs. Misch to secure letters from radio fans wanting the concerts. She began solicitations last Sunday, but to date has received only 50 letters and about the same number of telephone calls.

"A regular avalanche of letters will be necessary in order to convince Mr. Quinby that there is a genuine demand for the symphony music," Mrs. Misch said. "All persons writing have uniformly agreed that they were unable to get the concerts from station WBZA, even with a six-tube set, without the music fading away, and they were most anxious about having a local broadcasting station.

"The big difficulty is lack of numbers," Mrs. Misch said, "for my plea will carry little weight unless I can say that requests have come in by the hundreds. I am confident that people here are interested in the concerts only they are not aware of the need of saying so."

Jean Bedetti
Cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Who Will be Soloist at the University Glee Club Concert Friday Night at Memorial Hall

TRANS JAN 14

CASELLA CONDUCTOR: MOZART FULL-SCALED, STRAVINSKY CLOWNING

HIS OWN "GIARA" CARRIES ALL BEFORE IT

A Discovering Audience at Cambridge—The Returning Figure — Tame Vivaldi and a New-Old Way with the Symphony in G Minor—"Pulcinella" and a Ballet-Suite Sounding Like a Stage-Show

DISTINCTLY, last evening, the elect of the university and its city discovered Alfredo Casella. After his habit, he slipped upon the stage of Sanders Theater so unobtrusively that for the moment the audience was uncertain whether it looked upon one more player in the Symphony Orchestra, or upon the guest-conductor and composer. Consequently, the merest ripple of applause. An hour and three-quarters later, when the wooden walls of Sanders had rung to the slithering, pounding rhythms of "The Jar," the exuberant clatter, the unloosed jollities, all and sundry, well-nigh matched them with clapping. Time and again they called back the composer-conductor to make his rigid and impassive bow from the waist; then, with brightening face and expanding gesture, to turn to the orchestra as though the plaudits were his, to it.

The evening through, the concert had gone in crescendo. Vivaldi's Concerto, in A minor, for Strings, is hardly an eighteenth-century masterpiece, and was temperately received. Mr. Casella's version of Mozart's Symphony in G minor, was understanding and adept, graphic and sympathetic; but it more interested than ravished listening ears and clapping hands. With the two Ballet-Suites—one from Stravinsky's "Pulcinella," the other from Mr. Cassella's own "Giara"—pleasure waxed. True, a distinguished listener, unable to endure more, withdrew conspicuously, when Stravinsky's double-basses, bassoons and trombones fell to baiting each other; but for the majority the comic zest, the lusty vigors, the darting unexpectedness of the music was altogether amusing. Mr. Casella, moreover, was conducting as musician, comedian and master of the ballet—all in one. Then ensued "La Giara," and, as one audience discovered in Boston this afternoon and another will learn on Saturday, "La Giara" is irresistible.

For the few to whom Mr. Casella had a past as well as a present, it was a pleasure to salute again this manifold musician, now upon Europe, again upon America, bestowing these days of prime. Mr. Casella is a composer of parts, a pianist of distinction, a conductor of merit, a scholarly, keen-witted, persuasive writer about music, an editor both studious and alert, an organizer of good causes, counsellor and friend to proved and aspiring talents. From the work-table he passes to the concert-hall and is abundant and at ease; to the theater he goes, where directors, singers, dancers, heed his sense of the lyric or the choreographic stage. He is cosmopolite by choice, cultivated man of the world by breeding, inclination and habit—the Admirable Crichton of music in this second decade of the twentieth century. No genius, be it agreed, since such come seldom; no "master," and therefore never a bore; but a figure in high relief upon his musical time and no small influence within it.

His three-and-forty years have dealt kindly with Mr. Casella—the programbook had no need to assure us that he was "now living"; but his face is beginning to wear the antique Roman cast into which occasional Italians mature. His manner in the concert-room remains reticence itself. Conducting, he is no less sparing. A clear, firm, economical beat with the right arm; an occasional play of the left as though to lift from the orchestra the tone he would gain; a finger occasionally at lips for moderation, and the deed is done. No picture-writing upon the air, no nervous harrying of the players, neither exaction nor relaxation—only mutual understanding, confidence and regard. True, Mr. Casella's body often swayed to the rhythms of "La Giara," as though he would have the orchestra outfling them yet more vigorously. Under such impetus, the rest of us, had we not been cribbed in pews, might have been in like case. Austere dowagers were plainly observable—with uneasy hands.

Being a good modernist, as we all should be if we live in the world around us, Mr. Casella shaped his program accordingly—for first part, the eighteenth century of Vivaldi and Mozart; for second the twentieth of Stravinsky and himself. Upon a single hearing, Vivaldi's Concerto seemed no remarkable specimen of the kind. The slow movement, for example, courts no ascendant curve; less deepens than extends the melody. The linear development, the interplay of parts, the sober harmonies please—within a narrow scope; but the sentiment—not least of Vivaldi's tools of trade—runs constricted and dry. The enfolding Allegros are lustrous. Sharpened rhythm, quick givings and takings, meetings and partings, contrasting voices, solo-instruments for the moment upspringing—all animate it. Clearly, Mr. Casella, good modernist again, prefers his strings incisive. As plainly, rhythm is his conductor's virtue.

With the Symphony in G minor, the conductor was all for an ample Mozart, keeping the orchestra full-bodied and the tone robust, preferring propulsive motion to lingering refinement. At the outset and in the finale, his pace was relatively quick; while vigor of accent, creadth of phrase, firm but not rigid progress gave the music unusual dignity. For once, as it seemed, Mozart was writing in the grand manner, abounding in musical fertility, touched by musical emotion. Stirring to hear were the whipping strings of the first movement, giving way that the wind choir might sing its contrasts. To the Andante Mr. Casella gave a rhythmic motion that throughout charactered it, as of Mozart grave, intent, soliloquizing as he walked, but resolutely unsentimental. The Minuet went free-traced and firm-footed. The quick mind of the conductor did not overlook the upspringing of the Finale from the Trio; swept it forward large-voiced and striding—the antithesis of the light and racing Mozartean rondos. In his days, at Munich, of miscellaneous conducting Strauss used to contend that this Symphony in G minor must be played amply, darkly, even "grandly." Out of deepened mood and means enlarged, Mozart was evoking and sustaining music. For once the classic hand obeyed the romantic heart. Not even the Jupiter Symphony of these final years was designed more largely or more amply freighted. Seemingly, Mr. Casella is like-minded with Strauss.

With Part Second and the First Suite from "Pulcinella," the evening's sport began. "Pulcinella," needless to recall, is a ballet of Neapolitan folk-humors, frank, abrupt, rowdy, "a gallimaufry of gambols." Stravinsky set it to music—both dance and song—more or less of the eighteenth-century Pergolesi, quite as much of his twentieth-century self; scored it, finally, for small orchestra, winds in pairs, diminished strings, trumpet and trombone, but neither kettle-drum nor any instrument of percussion. Diaghilev and Massine staged it; London and Paris took pleasure in it; while not far behind last evening lagged Harvard Square. For Mr. Casella has the rarest of conductor's powers with ballet-music shifted to the concert-hall. He transfuses it with sense of the theater; he sets in play upon it hearty Italian humors. Answering to a stage, not merely sounding from a concert-platform, went this Pulcinella. His black mask and long nose capered across the scene; cronies attended him; there were also "skirts." Not polite was the fun-making.

At first Stravinsky is dutiful to a fault, merely re-pointing Pergolesi's measures with sharper-edged harmonies, keener or warmer instrumental voices. The old Adam—or rather, the new Igor—soon wills out. The orchestra, small though it be, twitches and snaps, slithers and whirls with changeful rhythms. Instruments join or oppose voices in obviously comic conjunction. Bassoons bray in their throats; oboes shrill in their noses; the double-basses will not be comforted and make tonal faces at the trombones. A short toccata tries to be stately; a brief gavotte somehow generates variations—but before the one or the other has drawn a long breath grotesquerie chokes them. Only a tarantella gets a "fair show."

These fooleries are as hearty as they are adept. Here at last is music forgetting to be stately, pompous, sentimental, cerebral, pure, good and uplifting, what not, after nineteenth-century shibboleths and formulas. It is out for a good time with its pockets well lined; it has it—and the audience joins in. It is in order that this Suite from "Pulcinella" pass into the repertory of Symphony Hall. Between "Le Sacre" for power and "The "Fire-Bird" for beauty we have nearly forgotten Stravinsky clowning it, lustily, abundantly, with finger to nose and quite as roughly as need be—in Naples, a city unlike dear Cambridge. . . . As for "La Giara" at least one more audience must hear it before it is meet to sing Mr. Casella's praises. Not Prokofiev himself has better "gone and done it." Imagine Sanders Theater become playhouse of Sicilian peasants, as drunk as they make 'em.

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
JAN 15 1927

Guest Conductor Will Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra From WBZ

The 12th Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, scheduled for 8:10 o'clock this evening, is unique in that the orchestra will play under direction of a great conductor, Alfredo Casella, and will be assisted by two renowned soloists, Walter Gieseking, pianist, and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor. After an absence from the air of two weeks, during which the orchestra was on tour, listeners-in will find an exceptionally interesting programme prepared for the broadcast from Station WBZ.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 14 1927

CASELLA GUEST CONDUCTOR BOSTON SYMPHONY SATURDAY

Broadcast of 12th Concert of Series Will Present German Pianist of Note and Tenor Soloist of Merit

The 12th Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, scheduled for 8.10 tomorrow evening, is unique in that the orchestra will play under direction of a guest conductor, Alfredo Casella, and will be assisted by two renowned soloists, Walter Gieseking, pianist, and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor. After an absence from the air of two weeks, during which the orchestra was on tour, listeners-in will find an exceptionally interesting program prepared for the broadcast from Station WBZ.

Mr Casella will conduct two of his own compositions, in the first of which, Partita for pianoforte and orchestra, the solo portions will be played by Walter Gieseking. Mr Gieseking, who has been in this country for only a year, has already won a high place.

The final number of the program, another of the works of Mr Casella, will introduce to the symphony audience, Rulon Y. Robison, a lyric tenor of exceptional merit. The work is an orchestral suite from the ballet "La Giara" and Mr Robison will be heard in the opening selection of the suite. He has been the leading soloist of the English Opera company for two seasons, and has made successful appearances in Messiah performances with the Handel and Haydn society of Boston and with the Portland Memorial choir in Portland, Me.

During the intermission in the concert of tonight and just prior to each program number, Prof John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston university and Holy Cross college, will be heard in illustrative talks concerning the numbers. In these remarks he will have the assistance of Miss Marjorie Pesselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist.

Just before the concert Prof Marshall will describe the Vivaldi Concerto, which is to be played for the first time by the Boston Symphony orchestra, also the piano Concerto of Mozart, in which Mr Gieseking is to appear as soloist. During the intermission Prof Marshall will tell the listening audience some interesting information regarding Alfredo Masella's works obtained from the composer himself, and will also relate some interesting incidents in the life of the composer, who appears as the guest conductor. The complete program follows:—

Concerto in A minor for string orchestra, Vivaldi (arranged by Sam Francko)
Allegro maestoso
Largo
Allegro
Concerto in C major, for pianoforte and orchestra (Koechel No 467).....Mozart
Allegro
Andante
Allegro vivace assai
Partita for pianoforte and orchestra, Casella
Sinfonia
Passacaglia
Burlesca
Orchestra suite from the ballet, "La Giara" (after Pirandello) .....Casella
Prelude, Sicilian dance; tenor solo by Rulon Y. Robison
Nocturne; dance of Nela; entrance of the peasants; brindisi; general dance; finale
Soloist, Walter Gieseking

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 14 1927

Boston Symphony

The characteristics of Sergei Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are interestingly revealed in the reminiscences of his friend and fellow pupil in Russia in the days when he was first prominent as a double bass virtuoso. The following description was contributed to the "New York Times" by Vladimir Dubinsky, previous to Koussevitzky's New York debut:

"In my opinion, no matter what instrument he had studied he would have attained the same great results he reached on the bass viol. There were no limitations for him. Listening to Koussevitzky one would forget that he was playing a bass; it wasn't a bass at all, it was some instrument between a 'cello and a bass of unusual beauty. He possessed everything that makes a great artist—tone, technical equipment, temperament, repose, a keen sense of rhythm and fine conception."

Hartford music lovers who desire an opportunity to attend the Boston Symphony Concert on February sixth may obtain reservations by calling Mr. Frank Sedgwick at McCoy's Music Store, 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
JAN 15 1927

Schumann Symphony at Albee on Tuesday

The last visit but one of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra and Serge Koussekitzky will take place next Tuesday, Jan. 18, at a concert in the Albee Theatre, at 8:15. The Russian conductor will then present a concerto by Philip Emanuel Bach, the illustrious son of Johann Sebastian Bach, which has been rescored by Maximilian Steinberg for string orchestra with a small wind choir.

A modern score of high repute, which is then to have its first performance in Providence, is the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird." The music describes a fairy tale of the Russian folk. Composed in 1909, the music is replete with charm and melody. Resplendent with masterful use of orchestral color, it has some of the daring but not all of the harshness of the later Stravinsky.

The symphony of the evening will be the first of Schumann in B flat [illegible]. This, known as the "Spring

MONDAY SYMPHONY

At the Monday Symphony concert on January 24 Joseph Achron, noted violinist and composer, will appear with the orchestra and play his own violin concerto. The program will also include Schumann's "Spring Symphony," and two works of living English composers, the "Portsmouth Point" overture by Walton, and "First Norfolk Rhapsody by Vaughan Williams.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 15 1927

MUCH INTEREST SHOWN IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

Music lovers will enjoy a rare treat on January 31 when they will have an opportunity to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will appear on that date at the Shubert Playhouse under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association. Mrs. William N. Bannard is now taking orders for seats and will continue to do so until the tickets are placed on sale at the box office a few days before the concert.

The superlative performance of the Boston Symphony are indeed a thing to wonder at. But just how and why this organization has come to be one of the very greatest in the world leaves little room for speculation or debate.

In 1881, the late Major Harry L. Higginsan realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston a full-sized symphony orchestra—a rare phenomenon in those days. This noted musician-soldier, financier and public spirited citizen believed that there was a musical public for such an undertaking. Sparing no expense he engaged the finest musicians then available in Europe to fill up its ranks and brought to this country one after another of the world's greatest conductors to lend their genius to the cumulative improvement of the orchestra, which in its original form had only 60 players.

The present conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, first crossed the Atlantic to assume that position in 1924, preceded by many reports of his remarkable qualities as a leader and an artist.

Expectations have been more than fulfilled and with such a combination of great artists and a great leader, it is not surprising that a Boston Symphony concert is regarded as one of the finest achievements in the musical performance of our day. There are waiting lists for every subscription series and seats are usually at a premium. Wilmington is awaiting the orchestra's first appearance here with interest.

CASELLA CONDUCTS SYMPHON

Offers Old and O Music and Delight Audience

POST JAN 15

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Alfredo Casella, outstanding figure among what still passes for the younger generation of Italian composers, already known to Boston both as pianist and as conductor of his own music, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon; Walter Gieseking, most distinguished of the newer pianists, was the soloist, and the concert, which offered music by Vivaldi, Mozart and Casella, was as full of good things as a Christmas pudding.

LIST CHOSEN WITH SKILL

To head the list that Mr. Casella had so judiciously prepared came a Concerto in A minor, for string orchestra, by Vivaldi, previously unheard here. For his contribution Mr. Gieseking played first a Mozart Concerto in C major and next a Partita of Mr. Casella's, for pianoforte and orchestra, the latter new to Boston, as was the concluding number, the Suite drawn from Mr. Casella's ballet "La Giara" (the Jar).

Gossip of the tuning room has it that the music of the Vivaldi Concerto arrived too late to permit of very thorough rehearsing. Technically the performance of this ancient work seemed unexceptionable, yet it was possible to feel that more might have been made of it on the interpretative side. The performance was, in short, a bit stilted and precise.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
JAN 15 1927

CASELLA GUEST CONDUCTOR

Renowned German Pianist and Tenor Soloist With Boston Symphony.

The twelfth Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled for 8:10 o'clock this evening, is unique in that the orchestra will play under direction of a guest conductor, Alfredo Casella, and will be assisted by two renowned soloists, Walter Gieseking, pianist, and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor.

Mr. Casella will conduct two of his own compositions, in the first of [illegible] and Mr. Robison will be heard in the opening selection of the suite. He has been the leading soloist of the English Opera Company for two seasons, and has made successful appearances in Messiah performances with the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston and with the Portland Memorial Choir in Portland, Maine.

But if Vivaldi's music did not quit come to full release, that of Mozar was treated by pianist, conductor an orchestra with such beguiling grac such bewitching delicacy, such limp clarity and, in the Andante, such sou ful tenderness, that the oldest concer goer must have been hard put to reca Mozart-playing that came closer to a solute perfection.

Not to stress a contrast but to di close an ancestry did Mr. Casella pr cede his own Partita by music of t 18th century. Like others of the mo progressive spirits among contemp rary composers, Mr. Casella has late perceived that the only way out of t harmonic chaos into which the ton world was fast drifting consists in t return to fixed tonality and structur solidity. The essence of this ne classicism was well exemplified by t piano concertos of Stravinsky and Prokofieff, recently heard here wit their respective composers as pianist And Mr. Casella's is, if anything, still more convincing proof that th old and the new ways of music may b reconciled.

Of Strength and Beauty

The "futurist" Casella of a few year ago might well have been accused o having forfeited his Italian birthrigh of melody and lucidity. The Casell of this Partita is the true heir of Vi valdi, Corelli and the younger Scar latti, while the Casella of "La Giara stems from Rossini and the Verdi o "Falstaff," with an infusion of Nea politan folk-song.

The Partita is, in fact, music of un common strength and beauty, economi cally but most tellingly orchestrated and ornamentally rather than funda mentally dissonant. It received yes terday from all concerned a brillian and compelling performance. Franke more obvious in character, the musi of the ballet proved a riot of color enough of modern harmony to spic and savor the whole. The incidenta tenor solo, the voice of a peasant sing ing a folk-song, falls in this week' performances to Rulon Robison, wh brought to it yesterday a luscious ton and becoming Italianate fervor Throughout the afternoon the audienc was uncommonly warm in its expres sions of approval.

which, Partita for pianoforte and orchestra, the solo portions will be played by Walter Gieseking.

The final number of the program, another of the works of Mr. Casella will introduce to the symphony audience, Rulon Y. Robison, a lyric tenor of exceptional merit. The work is an orchestral suite from the ballet "La

CASELLA COMPOSER; GIESEKING PIANIST, MEMORABLE CONCERT

FRANS—JAN 15

HIGH TENSION FOR ORCHESTRA AND AUDIENCE

The Wise Policy of Guests—A "Partita" Alive with Interest—A Ballet-Suite Forthright and Irresistible—A New Art of Piano-Playing Laid upon Mozart to Miracle

NOT ONLY does Mr. Koussevitzky earn a holiday; he also does good service to the public and the orchestra of the Symphony Concerts when he takes it. In his stead come guest-conductors, often composers as well. At first, they were too familiar, like Mr. Hadley, or too mediocre, like Mr. Press, to make much impression. Next, Mr. Goossens let in the light of ability and individuality, gathering interest and applause. This year, by grace of trustees growing wise in choice, the guests are Mr. Casella at the concerts of this week, Mr. Respighi at the concerts of Feb. 18 and 19—composers, conductors, pianists both, men of parts and personality. Italian twins, if the bystander likes that school-girls' whimsy, though one happens to be tall and spare, the other, short and full. Last winter Mr. Goossens was a "guest of honor," as the pretty verbiage of "society columns" has it. In Sanders Theater on Thursday, in Symphony Hall yesterday, Mr Casella was warmly received. The composer, first of The Fountains, then of The Pines, of Rome, will not lack welcome. Already gossip heralds Mr. Casals as conductor—not violoncellist—a year hence.

Habits grow by what they feed on, and there is now no doubt that these passing guests give pleasure and whet interest among the frequenters of Symphony Hall. They had heard much about the "new" English composers and conductors. When Mr. Goossens came, they looked upon one such with the eye of the body and heard him with both physical and mental ear. Less conspicuously, Mr. Casella was guest at a pair of concerts in Mr. Monteux's day; once upon a time was pianist by himself in Jordan Hall. Subsequently, one and another of his pieces pleased and passed. Now he traverses again the platform of Symphony Hall as ripened conductor and enlarged composer, with a Partita and a Suite of Ballet-Music in his wallet. Mr. Respighi—it is safe to predict—will come not less well-furnished. The audience hears the orchestra under a different hand; looks upon a visiting eminence; gossips about him; gains the fillip that a composer's presence—if not always his own conducting—lends to novel pieces: awaits refreshed the return of Mr. Koussevitzky and his routine—of the unexpected.

The band makes a new acquaintance; works under a new guidance; in the case of Mr. Casella, happens to enjoy the experience. (Behind and beside, as well as before him, crackled the applause of yesterday.) Two pairs of twenty-four coupled Symphony Concerts wear an unusual air; while some frequenting them discover that the world of music is a sizeable place, containing a number of interesting men and things, not always bound Bostonward. The Trustees have remarked some of these and directed their course hither. Not the least desirable of such new policies for a new generation is this annual summoning of guest-conductors Once more, the old order changes—for the better. If only that same public would go to hear visiting orchestras, it could snap its fingers at self-complacency.

As composer rather than conductor, Mr. Casella yesterday occupied his hearers. Those that had ventured on Thursday as far as Cambridge knew by this time his alert, sure-handed and sympathetic control of the orchestra, quick ear for clarity, balance, euphony and significant tone; his sense of animating rhythm and energizing progress; feeling for line, color and every musical attribute; his projecting and characterizing warmths. For further merit on Friday, there was only to observe the smoother and richer voice that he drew from the strings in the Concerto of Vivaldi and the finer skill with which he—and they—proportioned the piece. Besides, leading the orchestra through Mozart's Concerto in C major, he was at one with Mr. Gieseking, the pianist—ear and hand, mind and spirit. Flawlessly went meetings and partings, contrasts and blendings, the moments of the conductor, the virtuoso and of Mozart as well. From the pair the diminished band, jointly and severally, took cue. A rapt audience listened in rare delight. Here went music to crystal perfections.

At Cambridge but one piece of Mr. Casella stood on the program, the Suite from his ballet, "La Giara" or "The Jar," now in preparation at the Metropolitan Opera House for performance in March. To it was added in Boston, the Partita for Piano and Orchestra, which he counts, in composition, the flowering of his present years. Susceptible to his environment from "Italia" onward, he follows the trend of the hour. That is to say. he fills an ancient form with modern matter, treats both now anciently and again modernly; would restore to the music of our time molds and procedures that the ninetenth century left to books and pedagogues. Attempting and accomplishing these things, Mr. Casella does not follow a fashion and flounder along the way. Still less does he produce a half-baked cake of ancient flour and modern frosting, both adulterated and "quasi"—the faux bon, in the happy French phrase, of not a few in these days. Still less does he wizen—as his friend, Mr. Stravinsky, might profitably and quietly note—into a wiry composer by right of birth and blood. Mr. Casella neither chokes this melodic instinct, as does Malipiero, nor cries it across the market-place as did Puccini. He takes it for granted like the color of his hair or the shape of his hands. Yet with it, he prefers to be choice.

There is also a Finale (Burlesca) rhythmically riotous, alive with gayety, prickling with humors, turning here, twisting there, as light as it is fleet—high spirits running a tireless race, not forgetting an occasional shout. Naturally ebullient, wholesomely wanton, goes this smiling, chattering music, in good modernist fashion. Mr. Casella also remembers—here, there and everywhere in the Partita—that a piano is an honest instrument of percussion with a timbre of its own, not a false-faced instrument masked into sustained song. Mr. Gieseking, playing the piano-part in ensemble or in single voice, understood entirely.

The ballet-music from "La Giara" is a horse of another color, a shorter horse sooner curried critically. Once upon a time, Pirandello told in print a tale of Sicilian peasants, not without flavor of the Arabian Nights. (Saracens crossed Sicily, as sooner or later, in mediæval Europe, crossed nearly every one else.) Don Lollò, of whose morals and courses the less said the better, had a monumental and beautiful jar. Upon a day a clumsy clodhopper broke it. Old Uncle Dima undertook to mend it and climbed within. Having made the repairs, he stuck, since the hump on his bent shoulders barred the way. The peasantry seized the occasion for nocturnal merriment, with Nela, like unto Lollò her father, for leader. In time, the fun became so fast and furious that the jar rolled down the hill, smashed to bits against a tree, released Dima to the general rejoicing. Remember that Sicilian peasants do not come from "refined homes" but are prone to liquor, noise and jollity. "Rude and savage, orgiastic and brutal" are Mr. Casella's adjectives in the stage-directions. In "La Giara" and elsewhere, Pirandello has not drawn a pretty picture.

Remember also that Mr. Casella is writing a music for the twentieth-century theater where "treatment is everything"; that he accepts the ways of Stravinsky and even Prokofiev as the common stock of music in our time; that he finds Sicilian folk-tunes ready to his hand, and calling. Behind him is the ancient music that he knows through and through; while beside him is a serviceable package of twentieth-century polytonality. A prelude says "once upon a time" and seems to evoke the Sicilian scene limpid, pastoral, remote, occasionally turbulent. A Sicilian dance whirls in the dramatis personae. Old Dima sets to his task and is prisoned in the egregious jar. He smokes a pipe and dozes. The Sicilian night is lustrous velvet; it is time for Mr. Casella's "Nocturne" with a tenor-peasant singing in the distance, reedy, melodious, Italianate. Mr. Rulon Robison, back of the orchestra, caught the vein.

The daughter of Lollò will not have it so. She dances around the jar; stirs the peasants to wine, a drinking song, general and particular sound and fury. Out of an immense confusion bursts the end. "Treatment is everything"—and Mr. Casella spares not. Rhythms whip and hammer; instrumental figures circle, collide and shower like rockets; color flares; dissonances scream; the orchestra calls heaven and earth to witness in keys triply jangled. "Giocoso, virile, fortissimo," the brass blares out a drinking song, with the drums pouncing upon each period. By this time every listener would be up and doing—in the dance and with shouts. As it is, he may only clap wild hands for a breathless orchestra and Mr. Casella trying to act as though nothing mattered. None the less, "giocoso, virile, fortissimo," rhythmically, polytonally and with a sure sense of the dancing theater, he has done a good job. Many-sidedness is the wonder of him.

Yet for not a few the memory that will linger longest out of a manifold and engrossing concert is that of Mozart's Concerto in C major from pianist, lessened orchestra and conductor. Ah yes! these concertos that Mozart "turned off" as a journalist does his stint seem such simple things—measures of development and figuration; further onward measures of pure instrumental melody; virtuoso-passages, as virtuosity went in the seventeen-eighties; orchestral euphonies and chiming tutti; the first Allegro well worked; the middle movement pensive and songful; the fleet and fanciful Finale; always the graceful pattern, be it as delicate as lace-work, or both sinewy and plastic. Within this envelope lurks a beauty that once in years of listening, a pianist and a conductor may draw forth and as a magic from the air, rather than from mortal men and material instruments, lay in spell upon every ear.

The fineness of Mr. Gieseking's technical skill begins where that of the elder generation of pianists ended. The limpid loveliness of his tone, its grace of motion, its soft luminosity, its crystalline tints and half-tints, continue where they cannot follow. At his touch upsprings in quintessence the rarefied beauty of musical sound from the piano proceeding. The longest recollection may not recall its fellow. To guide and control it, the surest and subtlest of musical divination, the quickest of musical sensibility, go interlocked. Line, color, pace, rhythm, modulation, formal sense, stylistic sense, each to perfection come at their call. As it seemed yesterday, Mr. Gieseking has created a new art of piano-playing in a new voice for instrument and music. It illuminates composers; it transfigures sound; upon listeners it falls like an illusion that a single stir would break. With this touch and to this sonority, Mr. Gieseking played Mozart's Concerto; for the while, by a singular transfusion of intent and understanding, ways and means, conductor and orchestra were as so many Gieserkings, Mozart similarly upon their finger-tips and lips. For once the sentence shall be written in faith and favor: a genius of the piano comes again.

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 14 1927

CASELLA GUEST CONDUCTOR BOSTON SYMPHONY SATURDAY

Broadcast of 12th Concert of Series Will Present German Pianist of Note and Tenor Soloist of Merit

The 12th Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, scheduled for 8.10 tomorrow evening, is unique in that the orchestra will play under direction of a guest conductor, Alfredo Casella, and will be assisted by two renowned soloists, Walter Gieseking, pianist, and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor. After an absence from the air of two weeks, during which the orchestra was on tour, listeners-in will find an exceptionally interesting program prepared for the broadcast from Station WBZ.

Mr Casella will conduct two of his own compositions, in the first of which, Partita for pianoforte and orchestra, the solo portions will be played by Walter Gieseking. Mr Gieseking, who has been in this country for only a year, has already won a high place.

The final number of the program, another of the works of Mr Casella, will introduce to the symphony audience, Rulon Y. Robison, a lyric tenor of exceptional merit. The work is an orchestral suite from the ballet "La Giara" and Mr Robison will be heard in the opening selection of the suite. He has been the leading soloist of the English Opera company for two seasons, and has made successful appearances in Messiah performances with the Handel and Haydn society of Boston and with the Portland Memorial choir in Portland, Me.

During the intermission in the concert of tonight and just prior to each program number, Prof John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston university and Holy Cross college, will be heard in illustrative talks concerning the numbers. In these remarks he will have the assistance of Miss Marjorie Pesselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist.

Just before the concert Prof Marshall will describe the Vivaldi Concerto, which is to be played for the first time by the Boston Symphony orchestra, also the piano Concerto of Mozart, in which Mr Gieseking is to appear as soloist. During the intermission Prof Marshall will tell the listening audience some interesting information regarding Alfredo Maselia's works obtained from the composer himself, and will also relate some interesting incidents in the life of the composer, who appears as the guest conductor. The complete program follows:—

Concerto in A minor for string orchestra, Vivaldi (arranged by Sam Francko)
Allegro maestoso
Largo
Allegro
Concerto in C major, for pianoforte and orchestra (Koechel No 467).....Mozart
Allegro
Andante
Allegro vivace assai
Partita for pianoforte and orchestra, Casella
Sinfonia
Passacaglia
Burlesca
Orchestra suite from the ballet, "La Giara" (after Pirandello) .....Casella
Prelude, Sicilian dance; tenor solo by Rulon Y. Robison
Nocturne; dance of Nela; entrance of the peasants; brindisi; general dance; finale
Soloist, Walter Gieseking

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 14 1927

Boston Symphony

The characteristics of Sergei Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are interestingly revealed in the reminiscences of his friend and fellow pupil in Russia in the days when he was first prominent as a double bass virtuoso. The following description was contributed to the "New York Times" by Vladimir Dubinsky, previous to Koussevitzky's New York debut:

"In my opinion, no matter what instrument he had studied he would have attained the same great results he reached on the bass viol. There were no limitations for him. Listening to Koussevitzky one would forget that he was playing a bass; it wasn't a bass at all, it was some instrument between a 'cello and a bass of unusual beauty. He possessed everything that makes a great artist—tone, technical equipment, temperament, repose, a keen sense of rhythm and fine conception."

Hartford music lovers who desire an opportunity to attend the Boston Symphony Concert on February sixth may obtain reservations by calling Mr. Frank Sedgwick at McCoy's Music Store, 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
JAN 15 1927

Schumann Symphony at Albee on Tuesday

The last visit but one of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra and Serge Koussekitzky will take place next Tuesday, Jan. 18, at a concert in the Albee Theatre, at 8:15. The Russian conductor will then present a concerto by Philip Emanuel Bach, the illustrious son of Johann Sebastian Bach, which has been rescored by Maximilian Steinberg for string orchestra with a small wind choir.

A modern score of high repute, which is then to have its first performance in Providence, is the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird." The music describes a fairy tale of the Russian folk. Composed in 1909, the music is replete with charm and melody. Resplendent with masterful use of orchestral color, it has some of the daring but not all of the harshness of the later Stravinsky.

The symphony of the evening will be the first of Schumann in B flat major. This, known as the "Spring

MONDAY SYMPHONY

At the Monday Symphony concert on January 24 Joseph Achron, noted violinist and composer, will appear with the orchestra and play his own violin concerto. The program will also include Schumann's "Spring Symphony," and two works of living English composers, the "Portsmouth Point" overture by Walton, and "First Norfolk Rhapsody by Vaughan Williams.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 15 1927

MUCH INTEREST SHOWN IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

Music lovers will enjoy a rare treat on January 31 when they will have an opportunity to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will appear on that date at the Shubert Playhouse under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association. Mrs. William N. Bannard is now taking orders for seats and will continue to do so until the tickets are placed on sale at the box office a few days before the concert.

The superlative performance of the Boston Symphony are indeed a thing to wonder at. But just how and why this organization has come to be one of the very greatest in the world leaves little room for speculation or debate.

In 1881, the late Major Harry L. Higginsen realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston a full-sized symphony orchestra—a rare phenomenon in those days. This noted musician-soldier, financier and public spirited citizen believed that there was a musical public for such an undertaking. Sparing no expense he engaged the finest musicians then available in Europe to fill up its ranks and brought to this country one after another of the world's greatest conductors to lend their genius to the cumulative improvement of the orchestra, which in its original form had only 60 players.

The present conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, first crossed the Atlantic to assume that position in 1924, preceded by many reports of his remarkable qualities as a leader and an artist.

Expectations have been more than fulfilled and with such a combination of great artists and a great leader, it is not surprising that a Boston Symphony concert is regarded as one of the finest achievements in the musical performance of our day. There are waiting lists for every subscription series and seats are usually at a premium. Wilmington is awaiting the orchestra's first appearance here with interest.

CASELLA CONDUCTS SYMPHON

Offers Old and O Music and Delight Audience

POST JAN 15

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Alfredo Casella, outstanding figure among what still passes for the younger generation of Italian composers, already known to Boston both as pianist and as conductor of his own music, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon; Walter Gieseking, most distinguished of the newer pianists, was the soloist, and the concert, which offered music by Vivaldi, Mozart and Casella, was as full of good things as a Christmas pudding.

LIST CHOSEN WITH SKILL

To head the list that Mr. Casella had so judiciously prepared came a Concerto in A minor, for string orchestra, by Vivaldi, previously unheard here. For his contribution Mr. Gieseking played first a Mozart Concerto in C major and next a Partita of Mr. Casella's, for pianoforte and orchestra, the latter new to Boston, as was the concluding number, the Suite drawn from Mr. Casella's ballet "La Giara" (the Jar).

Gossip of the tuning room has it that the music of the Vivaldi Concerto arrived too late to permit of very thorough rehearsing. Technically the performance of this ancient work seemed unexceptionable, yet it was possible to feel that more might have been made of it on the interpretative side. The performance was, in short, a bit stilted and precise.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
JAN 15 1927

CASELLA GUEST CONDUCTOR

Renowned German Pianist and Tenor Soloist With Boston Symphony.

The twelfth Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled for 8:10 o'clock this evening, is unique in that the orchestra will play under direction of a guest conductor, Alfredo Casella, and will be assisted by two renowned soloists, Walter Gieseking, pianist, and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor.

Mr. Casella will conduct two of his own compositions, in the first of [illegible] and Mr. Robison will be heard in the opening selection of the suite. He has been the leading soloist of the English Opera Company for two seasons, and has made successful appearances in Messiah performances with the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston and with the Portland Memorial Choir in Portland, Maine.

But if Vivaldi's music did not quit come to full release, that of Mozart was treated by pianist, conductor an orchestra with such beguiling grac such bewitching delicacy, such limpi clarity and, in the Andante, such song ful tenderness, that the oldest concer goer must have been hard put to reca Mozart-playing that came closer to a solute perfection.

Not to stress a contrast but to di close an ancestry did Mr. Casella pr cede his own Partita by music of t 18th century. Like others of the mo progressive spirits among contemp rary composers, Mr. Casella has late perceived that the only way out of t harmonic chaos into which the ton world was fast drifting consists in t return to fixed tonality and structur solidity. The essence of this ne classicism was well exemplified by t piano concertos of Stravinsky and Prokofieff, recently heard here wit their respective composers as pianist And Mr. Casella's is, if anything, still more convincing proof that th old and the new ways of music may b reconciled.

Of Strength and Beauty

The "futurist" Casella of a few years ago might well have been accused o having forfeited his Italian birthrigh of melody and lucidity. The Casell of this Partita is the true heir of Vi valdi, Corelli and the younger Scar latti, while the Casella of "La Giara" stems from Rossini and the Verdi "Falstaff," with an infusion of Nea politan folk-song.

The Partita is, in fact, music of un common strength and beauty, economi cally but most tellingly orchestrated and ornamentally rather than funda mentally dissonant. It received yes terday from all concerned a brillian and compelling performance. Franke more obvious in character, the musi of the ballet proved a riot of color enough of modern harmony to spic and savor the whole. The incidenta tenor solo, the voice of a peasant sing ing a folk-song, falls in this week' performances to Rulon Robison, wh brought to it yesterday a luscious ton and becoming Italianate fervor Throughout the afternoon the audienc was uncommonly warm in its expres sions of approval.

which, Partita for pianoforte and orchestra, the solo portions will be played by Walter Gieseking.

The final number of the program, another of the works of Mr. Casella will introduce to the symphony audience, Rulon Y. Robison, a lyric teno of exceptional merit. The work is an orchestral suite from the ballet "La

CASELLA COMPOSER; GIESEKING PIANIST, MEMORABLE CONCERT

FRANS—JAN 15

HIGH TENSION FOR ORCHESTRA AND AUDIENCE

The Wise Policy of Guests—A "Partita" Alive with Interest—A Ballet-Suite Forthright and Irresistible—A New Art of Piano-Playing Laid upon Mozart to Miracle

NOT ONLY does Mr. Koussevitzky earn a holiday; he also does good service to the public and the orchestra of the Symphony Concerts when he takes it. In his stead come guest-conductors, often composers as well. At first, they were too familiar, like Mr. Hadley, or too mediocre, like Mr. Press, to make much impression. Next, Mr. Goossens let in the light of ability and individuality, gathering interest and applause. This year, by grace of trustees growing wise in choice, the guests are Mr. Casella at the concerts of this week, Mr. Respighi at the concerts of Feb. 18 and 19—composers, conductors, pianists both, men of parts and personality. Italian twins, if the bystander likes that school-girls' whimsy, though one happens to be tall and spare, the other, short and full. Last winter Mr. Goossens was a "guest of honor," as the pretty verbiage of "society columns" has it. In Sanders Theater on Thursday, in Symphony Hall yesterday, Mr Casella was warmly received. The composer, first of The Fountains, then of The Pines, of Rome, will not lack welcome. Already gossip heralds Mr. Casals as conductor—not violoncellist—a year hence.

Habits grow by what they feed on, and there is now no doubt that these passing guests give pleasure and whet interest among the frequenters of Symphony Hall. They had heard much about the "new" English composers and conductors. When Mr. Goossens came, they looked upon one such with the eye of the body and heard him with both physical and mental ear. Less conspicuously, Mr. Casella was guest at a pair of concerts in Mr. Monteux's day; once upon a time was pianist by himself in Jordan Hall. Subsequently, one and another of his pieces pleased and passed. Now he traverses again the platform of Symphony Hall as ripened conductor and enlarged composer, with a Partita and a Suite of Ballet-Music in his wallet. Mr. Respighi—it is safe to predict—will come not less well-furnished. The audience hears the orchestra under a different hand; looks upon a visiting eminence; gossips about him; gains the fillip that a composer's presence—if not always his own conducting—lends to novel pieces; awaits refreshed the return of Mr. Koussevitzky and his routine—of the unexpected.

The band makes a new acquaintance; works under a new guidance; in the case of Mr. Casella, happens to enjoy the experience. (Behind and beside, as well as before him, crackled the applause of yesterday.) Two pairs of twenty-four coupled Symphony Concerts wear an unusual air; while some frequenting them discover that the world of music is a sizeable place, containing a number of interesting men and things, not always bound Bostonward. The Trustees have remarked some of these and directed their course hither. Not the least desirable of such new policies for a new generation is this annual summoning of guest-conductors Once more, the old order changes—for the better. If only that same public would go to hear visiting orchestras, it could snap its fingers at self-complacency.

As composer rather than conductor, Mr. Casella yesterday occupied his hearers. Those that had ventured on Thursday as far as Cambridge knew by this time his alert, sure-handed and sympathetic control of the orchestra, quick ear for clarity, balance, euphony and significant tone; his sense of animating rhythm and energizing progress; feeling for line, color and every musical attribute; his projecting and characterizing warmths. For further merit on Friday, there was only to observe the smoother and richer voice that he drew from the strings in the Concerto of Vivaldi and the finer skill with which he—and they—proportioned the piece. Besides, leading the orchestra through Mozart's Concerto in C major, he was at one with Mr. Gieseking, the pianist—ear and hand, mind and spirit. Flawlessly went meetings and partings, contrasts and blendings, the moments of the conductor, the virtuoso and of Mozart as well. From the pair the diminished band, jointly and severally, took cue. A rapt audience listened in rare delight. Here went music to crystal perfections.

At Cambridge but one piece of Mr. Casella stood on the program, the Suite from his ballet, "La Giara" or "The Jar," now in preparation at the Metropolitan Opera House for performance in March. To it was added in Boston, the Partita for Piano and Orchestra, which he counts, in composition, the flowering of his present years. Susceptible to his environment from "Italia" onward, he follows the trend of the hour. That is to say. he fills an ancient form with modern matter, treats both now anciently and again modernly; would restore to the music of our time molds and procedures that the nineteenth century left to books and pedagogues. Attempting and accomplishing these things, Mr. Casella does not follow a fashion and flounder along the way. Still less does he produce a half-baked cake of ancient flour and modern frosting, both adulterated and "quasi"—the faux bon, in the happy French phrase, of not a few in these days. Still less does he wizen—as his friend, Mr. Stravinsky, might profitably and quietly note—into a wiry composer by right of birth and blood. Mr. Casella neither chokes this melodic instinct, as does Malipiero, nor cries it across the market-place as did Puccini. He takes it for granted like the color of his hair or the shape of his hands. Yet with it, he prefers to be choice.

There is also a Finale (Burlesca) rhythmically riotous, alive with gayety, prickling with humors, turning here, twisting there, as light as it is fleet—high spirits running a tireless race, not forgetting an occasional shout. Naturally ebullient, wholesomely wanton, goes this smiling, chattering music, in good modernist fashion. Mr. Casella also remembers—here, there and everywhere in the Partita—that a piano is an honest instrument of percussion with a timbre of its own, not a false-faced instrument masked into sustained song. Mr. Gieseking, playing the piano-part in ensemble or in single voice, understood entirely.

The ballet-music from "La Giara" is a horse of another color, a shorter horse sooner curried critically. Once upon a time, Pirandello told in print a tale of Sicilian peasants, not without flavor of the Arabian Nights. (Saracens crossed Sicily, as sooner or later, in mediæval Europe, crossed nearly every one else.) Don Lollò, of whose morals and courses the less said the better, had a monumental and beautiful jar. Upon a day a clumsy clodhopper broke it. Old Uncle Dima undertook to mend it and climbed within. Having made the repairs, he stuck, since the hump on his bent shoulders barred the way. The peasantry seized the occasion for nocturnal merriment, with Nela, like unto Lollò her father, for leader. In time, the fun became so fast and furious that the jar rolled down the hill, smashed to bits against a tree, released Dima to the general rejoicing. Remember that Sicilian peasants do not come from "refined homes" but are prone to liquor, noise and jollity. "Rude and savage, orgiastic and brutal" are Mr. Casella's adjectives in the stage-directions. In "La Giara" and elsewhere, Pirandello has not drawn a pretty picture.

Remember also that Mr. Casella is writing a music for the twentieth-century theater where "treatment is everything"; that he accepts the ways of Stravinsky and even Prokofiev as the common stock of music in our time; that he finds Sicilian folk-tunes ready to his hand, and calling. Behind him is the ancient music that he knows through and through; while beside him is a serviceable package of twentieth-century polytonality. A prelude says "once upon a time" and seems to evoke the Sicilian scene limpid, pastoral, remote, occasionally turbulent. A Sicilian dance whirls in the dramatis personae. Old Dima sets to his task and is prisoned in the egregious jar. He smokes a pipe and dozes. The Sicilian night is lustrous velvet; it is time for Mr. Casella's "Nocturne" with a tenor-peasant singing in the distance, reedy, melodious, Italianate. Mr. Rulon Robison, back of the orchestra, caught the vein.

The daughter of Lollò will not have it so. She dances around the jar; stirs the peasants to wine, a drinking song, general and particular sound and fury. Out of an immense confusion bursts the end. "Treatment is everything"—and Mr. Casella spares not. Rhythms whip and hammer; instrumental figures circle, collide and shower like rockets; color flares; dissonances scream; the orchestra calls heaven and earth to witness in keys triply jangled. "Giocoso, virile, fortissimo," the brass blares out a drinking song, with the drums pouncing upon each period. By this time every listener would be up and doing—in the dance and with shouts. As it is, he may only clap wild hands for a breathless orchestra and Mr. Casella trying to act as though nothing mattered. None the less, "giocoso, virile, fortissimo," rhythmically, polytonally and with a sure sense of the dancing theater, he has done a good job. Many-sidedness is the wonder of him.

Yet for not a few the memory that will linger longest out of a manifold and engrossing concert is that of Mozart's Concerto in C major from pianist, lessened orchestra and conductor. Ah yes! these concertos that Mozart "turned off" as a journalist does his stint seem such simple things—measures of development and figuration; further onward measures of pure instrumental melody; virtuoso-passages, as virtuosity went in the seventeen-eighties; orchestral euphonies and chiming tutti; the first Allegro well worked; the middle movement pensive and songful; the fleet and fanciful Finale; always the graceful pattern, be it as delicate as lace-work, or both sinewy and plastic. Within this envelope lurks a beauty that once in years of listening, a pianist and a conductor may draw forth and as a magic from the air, rather than from mortal men and material instruments, lay in spell upon every ear.

The fineness of Mr. Gieseking's technical skill begins where that of the elder generation of pianists ended. The limpid loveliness of his tone, its grace of motion, its soft luminosity, its crystalline tints and half-tints, continue where they cannot follow. At his touch upsprings in quintessence the rarefied beauty of musical sound from the piano proceeding. The longest recollection may not recall its fellow. To guide and control it, the surest and subtlest of musical divination, the quickest of musical sensibility, go interlocked. Line, color, pace, rhythm, modulation, formal sense, stylistic sense, each to perfection come at their call. As it seemed yesterday, Mr. Gieseking has created a new art of piano-playing in a new voice for instrument and music. It illuminates composers; it transfigures sound; upon listeners it falls like an illusion that a single stir would break. With this touch and to this sonority, Mr. Gieseking played Mozart's Concerto; for the while, by a singular transfusion of intent and understanding, ways and means, conductor and orchestra were as so many Giesekings, Mozart similarly upon their finger-tips and lips. For once the sentence shall be written in faith and fervor: a genius of the piano comes again.

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 14 1927

CASELLA GUEST CONDUCTOR BOSTON SYMPHONY SATURDAY

Broadcast of 12th Concert of Series Will Present German Pianist of Note and Tenor Soloist of Merit

The 12th Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, scheduled for 8.10 tomorrow evening, is unique in that the orchestra will play under direction of a guest conductor, Alfredo Casella, and will be assisted by two renowned soloists, Walter Gieseking, pianist, and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor. After an absence from the air of two weeks, during which the orchestra was on tour, listeners-in will find an exceptionally interesting program prepared for the broadcast from Station WBZ.

Mr Casella will conduct two of his own compositions, in the first of which, Partita for pianoforte and orchestra, the solo portions will be played by Walter Gieseking. Mr Gieseking, who has been in this country for only a year, has already won a high place.

The final number of the program, another of the works of Mr Casella, will introduce to the symphony audience, Rulon Y. Robison, a lyric tenor of exceptional merit. The work is an orchestral suite from the ballet "La Giara" and Mr Robison will be heard in the opening selection of the suite. He has been the leading soloist of the English Opera company for two seasons, and has made successful appearances in Messiah performances with the Handel and Haydn society of Boston and with the Portland Memorial choir in Portland, Me.

During the intermission in the concert of tonight and just prior to each program number, Prof John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston university and Holy Cross college, will be heard in illustrative talks concerning the numbers. In these remarks he will have the assistance of Miss Marjorie Pesselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist.

Just before the concert Prof Marshall will describe the Vivaldi Concerto, which is to be played for the first time by the Boston Symphony orchestra, also the piano Concerto of Mozart, in which Mr Gieseking is to appear as soloist. During the intermission Prof Marshall will tell the listening audience some interesting information regarding Alfredo Masella's works obtained from the composer himself, and will also relate some interesting incidents in the life of the composer, who appears as the guest conductor. The complete program follows:—

Concerto in A minor for string orchestra, Vivaldi (arranged by Sam Francko)
Allegro maestoso
Largo
Allegro
Concerto in C major, for pianoforte and orchestra (Koechel No 467).....Mozart
Allegro
Andante
Allegro vivace assai
Partita for pianoforte and orchestra, Casella
Sinfonia
Passacaglia
Burlesca
Orchestra suite from the ballet, "La Giara" (after Pirandello) .....Casella
Prelude, Sicilian dance; tenor solo by Rulon Y. Robison
Nocturne; dance of Nela; entrance of the peasants; brindisi; general dance; finale
Soloist, Walter Gieseking

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 14 1927

Boston Symphony

The characteristics of Sergei Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are interestingly revealed in the reminiscences of his friend and fellow pupil in Russia in the days when he was first prominent as a double bass virtuoso. The following description was contributed to the "New York Times" by Vladimir Dubinsky, previous to Koussevitzky's New York debut:

"In my opinion, no matter what instrument he had studied he would have attained the same great results he reached on the bass viol. There were no limitations for him. Listening to Koussevitzky one would forget that he was playing a bass; it wasn't a bass at all, it was some instrument between a 'cello and a bass of unusual beauty. He possessed everything that makes a great artist—tone, technical equipment, temperament, repose, a keen sense of rhythm and fine conception."

Hartford music lovers who desire an opportunity to attend the Boston Symphony Concert on February sixth may obtain reservations by calling Mr. Frank Sedgwick at McCoy's Music Store, 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
JAN 15 1927

Schumann Symphony at Albee on Tuesday

The last visit but one of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra and Serge Koussekitzky will take place next Tuesday, Jan. 18, at a concert in the Albee Theatre, at 8:15. The Russian conductor will then present a concerto by Philip Emanuel Bach, the illustrious son of Johann Sebastian Bach, which has been rescored by Maximilian Steinberg for string orchestra with a small wind choir.

A modern score of high repute, which is then to have its first performance in Providence, is the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird." The music describes a fairy tale of the Russian folk. Composed in 1909, the music is replete with charm and melody. Resplendent with masterful use of orchestral color, it has some of the daring but not all of the harshness of the later Stravinsky.

The symphony of the evening will be the first of Schumann in B flat major. This, known as the "Spring

MONDAY SYMPHONY ADV.
tray, Oblong Extension Cabinet, Host Chair and $122. You may buy less

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 15 1927

MUCH INTEREST SHOWN IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

Music lovers will enjoy a rare treat on January 31 when they will have an opportunity to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will appear on that date at the Shubert Playhouse under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association. Mrs. William N. Bannard is now taking orders for seats and will continue to do so until the tickets are placed on sale at the box office a few days before the concert.

The superlative performance of the Boston Symphony are indeed a thing to wonder at. But just how and why this organization has come to be one of the very greatest in the world leaves little room for speculation or debate.

In 1881, the late Major Harry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston a full-sized symphony orchestra—a rare phenomenon in those days. This noted musician-soldier, financier and public spirited citizen believed that there was a musical public for such an undertaking. Sparing no expense he engaged the finest musicians then available in Europe to fill up its ranks and brought to this country one after another of the world's greatest conductors to lend their genius to the cumulative improvement of the orchestra, which in its original form had only 60 players.

The present conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, first crossed the Atlantic to assume that position in 1924, preceded by many reports of his remarkable qualities as a leader and an artist.

Expectations have been more than fulfilled and with such a combination of great artists and a great leader, it is not surprising that a Boston Symphony concert is regarded as one of the finest achievements in the musical performance of our day. There are waiting lists for every subscription series and seats are usually at a premium. Wilmington is awaiting the orchestra's first appearance here with interest.

CASELLA CONDUCTS SYMPHON

Offers Old and O Music and Delight Audience

POST JAN 15

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Alfredo Casella, outstanding figure among what still passes for the younger generation of Italian composers, already known to Boston both as pianist and as conductor of his own music, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon; Walter Gieseking, most distinguished of the newer pianists, was the soloist, and the concert, which offered music by Vivaldi, Mozart and Casella, was as full of good things as a Christmas pudding.

LIST CHOSEN WITH SKILL

To head the list that Mr. Casella had so judiciously prepared came a Concerto in A minor, for string orchestra, by Vivaldi, previously unheard here. For his contribution Mr. Gieseking played first a Mozart Concerto in C major and next a Partita of Mr. Casella's, for pianoforte and orchestra, the latter new to Boston, as was the concluding number, the Suite drawn from Mr. Casella's ballet "La Giara" (the Jar).

Gossip of the tuning room has it that the music of the Vivaldi Concerto arrived too late to permit of very thorough rehearsing. Technically the performance of this ancient work seemed unexceptionable, yet it was possible to feel that more might have been made of it on the interpretative side. The performance was, in short, a bit stilted and precise.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
JAN 15 1927

CASELLA GUEST CONDUCTOR

Renowned German Pianist and Tenor Soloist With Boston Symphony.

The twelfth Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled for 8:10 o'clock this evening, is unique in that the orchestra will play under direction of a guest conductor, Alfredo Casella, and will be assisted by two renowned soloists, Walter Gieseking, pianist, and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor.

Mr. Casella will conduct two of his own compositions, in the first of Hiara and Mr. Robison will be heard in the opening selection of the suite. He has been the leading soloist of the English Opera Company for two seasons, and has made successful appearances in Messiah performances with the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston and with the Portland Memorial Choir in Portland, Maine.

But if Vivaldi's music did not quit come to full release, that of Mozar was treated by pianist, conductor an orchestra with such beguiling grac such bewitching delicacy, such limpi clarity and, in the Andante, such song ful tenderness, that the oldest concer goer must have been hard put to reca Mozart-playing that came closer to a solute perfection.

Not to stress a contrast but to di close an ancestry did Mr. Casella pr cede his own Partita by music of t 18th century. Like others of the mo progressive spirits among contemp rary composers, Mr. Casella has late perceived that the only way out of t harmonic chaos into which the ton world was fast drifting consists in t return to fixed tonality and structur solidity. The essence of this ne classicism was well exemplified by t piano concertos of Stravinsky and Prokofieff, recently heard here wit their respective composers as pianist And Mr. Casella's is, if anything, still more convincing proof that th old and the new ways of music may b reconciled.

Of Strength and Beauty

The "futurist" Casella of a few year ago might well have been accused o having forfeited his Italian birthrigh of melody and lucidity. The Casell of this Partita is the true heir of Vi valdi, Corelli and the younger Scar latti, while the Casella of "La Giara" stems from Rossini and the Verdi o "Falstaff," with an infusion of Nea politan folk-song.

The Partita is, in fact, music of un common strength and beauty, economi cally but most tellingly orchestrated and ornamentally rather than funda mentally dissonant. It received yes terday from all concerned a brillian and compelling performance. Frankel more obvious in character, the musi of the ballet proved a riot of color enough of modern harmony to spic and savor the whole. The incidenta tenor solo, the voice of a peasant sing ing a folk-song, falls in this week' performances to Rulon Robison, wh brought to it yesterday a luscious ton and becoming Italianate fervor Throughout the afternoon the audienc was uncommonly warm in its expres sions of approval.

which, Partita for pianoforte and orchestra, the solo portions will be played by Walter Gieseking.

The final number of the program, another of the works of Mr. Casella will introduce to the symphony audience, Rulon Y. Robison, a lyric tenor of exceptional merit. The work is an orchestral suite from the ballet "La

CASELLA COMPOSER; GIESEKING PIANIST, MEMORABLE CONCERT

FRANS—JAN 15

HIGH TENSION FOR ORCHESTRA AND AUDIENCE

The Wise Policy of Guests—A "Partita" Alive with Interest—A Ballet-Suite Forthright and Irresistible—A New Art of Piano-Playing Laid upon Mozart to Miracle

NOT ONLY does Mr. Koussevitzky earn a holiday; he also does good service to the public and the orchestra of the Symphony Concerts when he takes it. In his stead come guest-conductors, often composers as well. At first, they were too familiar, like Mr. Hadley, or too mediocre, like Mr. Press, to make much impression. Next, Mr. Goossens let in the light of ability and individuality, gathering interest and applause. This year, by grace of trustees growing wise in choice, the guests are Mr. Casella at the concerts of this week, Mr. Respighi at the concerts of Feb. 18 and 19—composers, conductors, pianists both, men of parts and personality. Italian twins, if the bystander likes that school-girls' whimsy, though one happens to be tall and spare, the other, short and full. Last winter Mr. Goossens was a "guest of honor," as the pretty verbiage of "society columns" has it. In Sanders Theater on Thursday, in Symphony Hall yesterday, Mr Casella was warmly received. The composer, first of The Fountains, then of The Pines, of Rome, will not lack welcome. Already gossip heralds Mr. Casals as conductor—not violoncellist—a year hence.

Habits grow by what they feed on, and there is now no doubt that these passing guests give pleasure and whet interest among the frequenters of Symphony Hall. They had heard much about the "new" English composers and conductors. When Mr. Goossens came, they looked upon one such with the eye of the body and heard him with both physical and mental ear. Less conspicuously, Mr. Casella was guest at a pair of concerts in Mr. Monteux's day; once upon a time was pianist by himself in Jordan Hall. Subsequently, one and another of his pieces pleased and passed. Now he traverses again the platform of Symphony Hall as ripened conductor and enlarged composer, with a Partita and a Suite of Ballet-Music in his wallet. Mr. Respighi—it is safe to predict—will come not less well-furnished. The audience hears the orchestra under a different hand; looks upon a visiting eminence; gossips about him; gains the fillip that a composer's presence—if not always his own conducting—lends to novel pieces; awaits refreshed the return of Mr. Koussevitzky and his routine—of the unexpected.

The band makes a new acquaintance; works under a new guidance; in the case of Mr. Casella, happens to enjoy the experience. (Behind and beside, as well as before him, crackled the applause of yesterday.) Two pairs of twenty-four coupled Symphony Concerts wear an unusual air; while some frequenting them discover that the world of music is a sizeable place, containing a number of interesting men and things, not always bound Bostonward. The Trustees have remarked some of these and directed their course hither. Not the least desirable of such new policies for a new generation is this annual summoning of guest-conductors Once more, the old order changes—for the better. If only that same public would go to hear visiting orchestras, it could snap its fingers at self-complacency.

As composer rather than conductor, Mr. Casella yesterday occupied his hearers. Those that had ventured on Thursday as far as Cambridge knew by this time his alert, sure-handed and sympathetic control of the orchestra, quick ear for clarity, balance, euphony and significant tone; his sense of animating rhythm and energizing progress; feeling for line, color and every musical attribute; his projecting and characterizing warmths. For further merit on Friday, there was only to observe the smoother and richer voice that he drew from the strings in the Concerto of Vivaldi and the finer skill with which he—and they—proportioned the piece. Besides, leading the orchestra through Mozart's Concerto in C major, he was at one with Mr. Gieseking, the pianist—ear and hand, mind and spirit. Flawlessly went meetings and partings, contrasts and blendings, the moments of the conductor, the virtuoso and of Mozart as well. From the pair the diminished band, jointly and severally, took cue. A rapt audience listened in rare delight. Here went music to crystal perfections.

At Cambridge but one piece of Mr. Casella stood on the program, the Suite from his ballet, "La Giara" or "The Jar," now in preparation at the Metropolitan Opera House for performance in March. To it was added in Boston, the Partita for Piano and Orchestra, which he counts, in composition, the flowering of his present years. Susceptible to his environment from "Italia" onward, he follows the trend of the hour. That is to say. he fills an ancient form with modern matter, treats both now anciently and again modernly; would restore to the music of our time molds and procedures that the nineteenth century left to books and pedagogues. Attempting and accomplishing these things, Mr. Casella does not follow a fashion and flounder along the way. Still less does he produce a half-baked cake of ancient flour and modern frosting, both adulterated and "quasi"—the faux bon, in the happy French phrase, of not a few in these days. Still less does he wizen—as his friend, Mr. Stravinsky, might profitably and quietly note—into a wiry composer by right of birth and blood. Mr. Casella neither chokes this melodic instinct, as does Malipiero, nor cries it across the market-place as did Puccini. He takes it for granted like the color of his hair or the shape of his hands. Yet with it, he prefers to be choice.

There is also a Finale (Burlesca) rhythmically riotous, alive with gayety, prickling with humors, turning here, twisting there, as light as it is fleet—high spirits running a tireless race, not forgetting an occasional shout. Naturally ebullient, wholesomely wanton, goes this smiling, chattering music, in good modernist fashion. Mr. Casella also remembers—here, there and everywhere in the Partita—that a piano is an honest instrument of percussion with a timbre of its own, not a false-faced instrument masked into sustained song. Mr. Gieseking, playing the piano-part in ensemble or in single voice, understood entirely.

The ballet-music from "La Giara" is a horse of another color, a shorter horse sooner curried critically. Once upon a time, Pirandello told in print a tale of Sicilian peasants, not without flavor of the Arabian Nights. (Saracens crossed Sicily, as sooner or later, in mediæval Europo, crossed nearly every one else.) Don Lollò, of whose morals and courses the less said the better, had a monumental and beautiful jar. Upon a day a clumsy clodhopper broke it. Old Uncle Dima undertook to mend it and climbed within. Having made the repairs, he stuck, since the hump on his bent shoulders barred the way. The peasantry seized the occasion for nocturnal merriment, with Nela, like unto Lollò her father, for leader. In time, the fun became so fast and furious that the jar rolled down the hill, smashed to bits against a tree, released Dima to the general rejoicing. Remember that Sicilian peasants do not come from "refined homes" but are prone to liquor, noise and jollity. "Rude and savage, orgiastic and brutal" are Mr. Casella's adjectives in the stage-directions. In "La Giara" and elsewhere, Pirandello has not drawn a pretty picture.

Remember also that Mr. Casella is writing a music for the twentieth-century theater where "treatment is everything"; that he accepts the ways of Stravinsky and even Prokofiev as the common stock of music in our time; that he finds Sicilian folk-tunes ready to his hand, and calling. Behind him is the ancient music that he knows through and through; while beside him is a serviceable package of twentieth-century polytonality. A prelude says "once upon a time" and seems to evoke the Sicilian scene limpid, pastoral, remote, occasionally turbulent. A Sicilian dance whirls in the dramatis personae. Old Dima sets to his task and is prisoned in the egregious jar. He smokes a pipe and dozes. The Sicilian night is lustrous velvet; it is time for Mr. Casella's "Nocturne" with a tenor-peasant singing in the distance, reedy, melodious, Italianate. Mr. Rulon Robison, back of the orchestra, caught the vein.

The daughter of Lollò will not have it so. She dances around the jar; stirs the peasants to wine, a drinking song, general and particular sound and fury. Out of an immense confusion bursts the end. "Treatment is everything"—and Mr. Casella spares not. Rhythms whip and hammer; instrumental figures circle, collide and shower like rockets; color flares; dissonances scream; the orchestra calls heaven and earth to witness in keys triply jangled. "Giocoso, virile, fortissimo," the brass blares out a drinking song, with the drums pouncing upon each period. By this time every listener would be up and doing—in the dance and with shouts. As it is, he may only clap wild hands for a breathless orchestra and Mr. Casella trying to act as though nothing mattered. None the less, "giocoso, virile, fortissimo," rhythmically, polytonally and with a sure sense of the dancing theater, he has done a good job. Many-sidedness is the wonder of him.

Yet for not a few the memory that will linger longest out of a manifold and engrossing concert is that of Mozart's Concerto in C major from pianist, lessened orchestra and conductor. Ah yes! these concertos that Mozart "turned off" as a journalist does his stint seem such simple things—measures of development and figuration; further onward measures of pure instrumental melody; virtuoso-passages, as virtuosity went in the seventeen-eighties; orchestral euphonies and chiming tutti; the first Allegro well worked: the middle movement pensive and songful; the fleet and fanciful Finale; always the graceful pattern, be it as delicate as lace-work, or both sinewy and plastic. Within this envelope lurks a beauty that once in years of listening, a pianist and a conductor may draw forth and as a magic from the air, rather than from mortal men and material instruments, lay in spell upon every ear.

The fineness of Mr. Gieseking's technical skill begins where that of the elder generation of pianists ended. The limpid loveliness of his tone, its grace of motion, its soft luminosity, its crystalline tints and half-tints, continue where they cannot follow. At his touch upsprings in quintessence the rarefied beauty of musical sound from the piano proceeding. The longest recollection may not recall its fellow. To guide and control it, the surest and subtlest of musical divination, the quickest of musical sensibility, go interlocked. Line, color, pace, rhythm, modulation, formal sense, stylistic sense, each to perfection come at their call. As it seemed yesterday, Mr. Gieseking has created a new art of piano-playing in a new voice for instrument and music. It illuminates composers: it transfigures sound; upon listeners it falls like an illusion that a single stir would break. With this touch and to this sonority, Mr. Gieseking played Mozart's Concerto; for the while, by a singular transfusion of intent and understanding, ways and means, conductor and orchestra were as so many Giesekings, Mozart similarly upon their finger-tips and lips. For once the sentence shall be written in faith and fervor: a genius of the piano comes again.

H. T. P.

and sterile eccentricity.

The Partita, especially in the P caglia which is second movement, marvel of scholarly background, ad tion and invention. An intricate f an exacting procedure, both easily coming unfruitful, both taxing eve
Bach or a Brahms, follow new cou gain fresh voice; are translated into present stream of music. Here are st ture, development, inversions, cross-tions, "ostinati," technical feat upon demic stroke, until pedants turn g with envy and scholars blow hot with miration. Yet for the lay hearer t are rhythm to give the Passacaglia color to enrich and diversify it; moo work illusion upon the imagination.
beginning arrests the ear by min vigor and fertility; few of the variat merely tread tonal water or revolv their own intricacy; most bear clear instant suggestion; the end touche somber beauty fructified.

There is a first movement (Sinfo as well. Two themes—one much div —give it birth. The instrumental vo —strings, wood-winds less the shri flutes, trumpets, tympani and piano—treated once and again in seventee and eighteenth-century fashion solo-attributes. Mr. Casella return old forms and ancient procedures; tilizes them at will with an adept m ernism. And lo! what lingers most memory from this same Sinfonia? N ing less than measures of frank singing melody, brief, warm, unasha
So sang the ancients when their co terpoint seems thickest, their fig most stencilled. So also sang and sing, world without end, every Ita

MONITOR SAN 15

Casella and Boston Symphony Orchestra

Alfredo Casella, as guest conductor, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall in the twelfth concert of the current Friday afternoon series. Walter Gieseking, pianist, and Rulon Robison, tenor, were the soloists, the latter singing the folk song which occurs in Casella's ballet suite. The program comprised Vivaldi's Concerto in A minor for String Orchestra (aranged by Sam Franko), Mozart's Concerto in C major for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Casella's Partita for Pianoforte and Orchestra, and Casella's Orchestral Suite from the ballet "La Giara." The Mozart alone had been heard in Boston on previous occasions; the others had their first performance here.

It is almost four years since Mr. Casella led the Boston Orchestra, so for many he was a newcomer. The audience received him in anticipatory mood, since guest conductors are rare with this orchestra. Appreciative applause followed the Vivaldi and the Mozart. But enthusiasm ran high only when Mr. Casella's own compositions were completed. For a striking difference of approach manifested itself in the conductor's methods with the eighteenth century works and with his own. In the Vivaldi he pursued a precise, exact course. It was almost as if he were making a mosaic of the music he traversed. Phrase by phrase it went, cleanly rhythmed, sharply approached. Patterns traced themselves deftly. Lines of melody crossed each other in carefully marshaled array. Dissonances were stressed according to the current fashion. But everything progressed as by plan. The listener might analyze and consider and assimilate.

The Mozartian music, again, plainly revealed Mr. Casella's guiding hand. Here was Mozart modernized, with brass sharp-edged and biting rather than played with the mellowness tradition ascribes to the "classical" manner. Rhythms were bouncing and jubilant rather than restrained and clarified. The melodies waxed full and expressive. Mozart rejuvenated and rediscovered, as well as modernized, was the final outcome of the conductor's manner. To the Mozart Mr. Gieseking, as the soloist, also brought his persuasive powers. The grace and finish and luster he revealed in Boston a year ago again were in evidence. Delicate runs and trills well deserving of the old-fashioned adjective "pearly" decorated the finely wrought music. Form and outline stood forth clearly. And since Mr. Gieseking is as much a modernist as is Mr. Casella, the cadenzas of the soloist betrayed flashing linear dissonances and snatches of brilliant coloring.

Eighteenth century music has doubtless inspired Mr. Casella as it has inspired many others, but he and his music bear every mark of present-day tendencies. One could no more mistake his compositions for those of another generation than one could ascribe the radio to the nineties. It is brilliant, commanding, swift-moving, vigorous and always interesting. Like it or not, one must listen as the Casellan music flashes by. And again, there is more influence of recent composers than there is of anything two centuries removed. No musician worthy of consideration could escape the influence of Debussy and Strauss and Stravinsky. Mr. Casella has not been beyond their scope. Yet his Partita is completely his own. The impact and urge of the first movement, the dreamy spaces of the second, and the boisterous freedoms and humors of the third, these are evidence of purposeful and coherent writing.

A more evident originality manifests itself in the suite Mr. Casella has drawn from his Sicilian ballet "La Giara." It teems with rhythmic vitality and surging melodic under-

CASELLA CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Walter Gieseking Heard as Soloist

Globe Jan 15

Alfredo Casella, noted Italian composer-pianist, conducted yesterday's Boston Symphony concert, allowing Mr Koussevitzky a mid-season rest. The soloist was Walter Gieseking, noted German pianist, whose first recital here last season showed him to be an artist of the highest rank. Mr Gieseking chose a Mozart concerto, in C major, in place of the Liszt originally announced. This substitution, otherwise a fortunate one, was to be regretted since it deprived the audience of Mozart's G-minor Symphony.

The program as played yesterday and to be played tonight runs as follows: Concerto in A minor for string orchestra, Vivaldi; Concerto in C major for pianoforte (K 467), Mozart; Partina for pianoforte and orchestra, and suite from the ballet "La Giara," Casella.

Mr Gieseking again showed himself a remarkably fine pianist and an admirable musician. The audience applauded him with an extraordinary cordiality too seldom extended at these concerts to newcomers. His phenomenal technique made it possible for him to play Mozart's music with the utmost finesse, with the most exquisite nuances. Both he and Mr Casella have, however, too much musical intelligence to fall into the common error of assuming that Mozart wrote without vitality and intensity of feeling. The first allegro of the concerto played yesterday is designated "maestoso," and has in fact something of the majesty of many Beethoven first movements. Mr Gieseking here achieved the difficult feat of playing "maestoso" without coarseness of tone or of style.

Demands Great Skill

Mr Casella's Partita is a little suite composed of a sinfonia, a passacaglia and a burlesca. The term "partita" has been seldom used since Bach. In his music it signifies either a suite of dances or a set of variations. The pianoforte part, which demands great skill of the player, is not written for display, but as though the instrument were a leading member of the orchestra granted an occasional solo passage. There is much ingenious treatment in modern guise of the forms of early 18th century music in the first two movements. The final "burlesca" is a lively and frankly tuneful piece influenced by the Italian masters of comedy music, such as Rossini, for whose work Casella professes great admiration.

The suite from the ballet "The Jar," based on a story by Pirandello, illustrates, like the Partita, many of the current fashions among the musical intelligentsia. Italian folk tunes are treated in it much as Stravinsky has frequently treated Russian folk tunes. But the two pieces are not mere cerebral music, but lively and agreeable, though without marked originality.

Casella has fine taste, considerable erudition and not a little facility as a composer. He is quick to adapt to his own imaginative purposes the procedures of other and, one feels, far greater contemporary composers, like Stravinsky. Casella is at his best when as, in his early rhapsody, "Italia," and in much of "La Giara," his melodic inspiration is drawn from Italian popular music.

Fine Musicianship

As a conductor Mr Casella's fine musicianship is somewhat hampered by what seemed yesterday imperfect technical equipment. He did not always convey to the orchestra authoritatively and promptly his musical wishes. There were, therefore, occasional bungled attacks, and other failures to secure precision of ensemble. Yet at times the orchestra played with zest and skill.

The Vivaldi concerto, arranged by Sam Franko, did not sound especially noteworthy. There were too many strings to permit the main body of players to equal the fineness of playing of the grouped soloists in the so-called concertino.

Next week Mr Koussevitzky will conduct, according to present plans, a program including Handel's B Minor Concerto Grosso, No. 12; a new suite by Roussel, and Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy."

P. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHRONICLE
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
JAN 16 1927

During the two weeks' winter vacation of Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is being led by two guests, Alfredo Casella and Ottorino Respighi, both of them Italian composers and directors.

SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 16 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky will be broadcast by WJZ and WBZ at 8.30 o'clock Saturday night. This concert will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, and the pick-up made by the engineering staff of

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILMINGTON, DEL.
STAR

JAN 16 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER STARTED AT 1

While interest is keen in the first cal appearance of the Boston Sympho
Orchestra, which will be at the Shub Playhouse on January 31, under auspices of the Delaware Musical sociation, the celebrated leader, Se Koussevitsky, comes in for a goo share of that interest.

Mr. Koussevitsky first conducted as a boy of twelve when he led the local theatre orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver in northern Russia. Attending the conservatory at Moscow, he was required to study an instrument. He chose the doublebars, and the noted master, Ramboussac, was his teacher. His proficiency upon this unusual instrument became so extraordinary that he toured al' of Europe and became famous before . e was even known as a conductor.

Koussevitzky's abilities, indeed were not of the sort to be so confined to a limited field and from 1909 he devoted all his energies to conducting. He or ganized his own symphony orchestra i Moscow, which soon came to be consid ered the finest in Russia. In Moscow and Petrograd he conducted the classic gave Beethoven, Bach Tchaikovsky Rimsky-Korsakov and other festival each season, and championed works b young composers then unknown bu since accepted.

Each spring since Koussevitzky be came the conductor of the Boston Sym phony Orchestra in 1924, he has returne at the conclusion of his American sea son to conduct in Paris and Londo America's admiration for him nee scarcely be pointed out. The Bosto Symphony's sensitive response as on man to his least gesture bespeaks th leader of command and authority. Th fine clarity with which he presents th music of the older masters, his inspire eloquence with the "romantics", his di cernment in choosing and his brilliand in performing the significant music our own day; these things reveal a extraordinary range of artistic syn pathy. And, not least, there are qua ities of illuming imagination in his pe formance which are said to be qui without equal.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 16 1927

Boston Symphony To Be Heard Saturday

The concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will be broadcast by WJZ and WBZ at 8:30 o'clock, Saturday. This concert will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, and the pick-up made by the engineering staff of WBZ and relayed to WJZ by wire line.

Professor John P. Marshall, the head of the department of music at Boston University and Holy Cross College, will interpret the symphony program for the benefit of the radio audience. Profesor Marshall's experience along musical lines renders him particularly fitted for this important work. He was organist with the Boston Symphony orchestra from 1909 to 1918 and during the World War he served as musical aide to the commanding general of the northeastern and western departments of the United States Army, and was later appointed assistant director of camp music of the entire army. With such an excellent musical background, Professor Marshall is well qualified for the task of interpreting the symphony programs to radio listeners, and his broadcasts are certain to make the symphony program more valuable and appreciated by the listeners.

SYMPHONY TO PLAY NEW ROUSSEL WORK

ADV JAN 16

Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" will be played at the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Serge Koussevitzky will then also give the first performance of a new suite by Albert Roussel, which the French composer especially wrote for this conductor and orchestra. The opening number will be Handel's B minor "Concerto Grosso," for string orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
ZANESVILLE, OHIO

JAN 15 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY FOR SATURDAY NIGHT

The concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will be broadcast by WJZ and WBZ at 8.30 o'clock, Saturday night. This concert will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, and the pick-up made by the Engineering staff of WBZ and relayed to WJZ by wire line.

Professor John P. Marshall, the head of the Department of Music at college, will interpret the symphony program for the benefit of the radio audience. Professor Marshall was organist with the Boston Symphony orchestra from 1909 to 1918 and during the World War he served as musical aide to the commanding general of the Northeastern and Western Departments of the United States Army, and was later appointed assistant director of camp music of the entire army. With such an excellent musical background, Professor Marshall is well qualified for the task of interpreting the symphony programs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 16 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Next Tuesday evening, Jan. 18, in the Albee Theatre at 8:15, Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make their last appearance but one of the present season in Providence. For this occsion the Russian conductor announces Schumann's First Symphony in B-flat major. Stravinsky's Suite from "The Fire-Bird" which is to have its first performance in Providence, and Concerto by Philip Emanuel Bach.

This Concerto by the most talented s of Johann Sebastian Bach has been pecially arranged for Mr. Koussevits by Maxmilian Steinberg, the talent nephew of Rimsky-Korsakov. Steinb has used a string orchestra with a sm choir of wind instruments. His scor is not in strict accordance with the riod, since he gives much of the melo of the slow movement to the Engl horn, an instrument of modern usa In spirit, however Steinberg's treatm is considered by no means irrever or anachronistic.

Schumann wrote his "Spring S phony" in his 31st year, in the ter ardor of his then recent marriage v his beloved Clara (which proved one the most ideal conjugal unions in annals of music). The feeling of sp also possessed him as he worked u this, his first large orchestral score, fresh vernal impulse is felt in the s ful themes. Schumann thus wrote Wilhelm Taubert, who was to con the first performance: "Could you in into your orchestra in the perform a sort of longing for the spring, whi had chiefly in mind when I wrot February, 1841? The first entrance trumpets, this I should like to sounded as though it were from above, like onto a call to awaken and then I should like reading bet the lines, in the rest of the introduc how everywhere it begins to grow gr how a butterfly takes wing; and, in Allegro, how little by little all th come that in any way belong to spi True, these are fantastic thoug which came to me after my work finished; only, I tell you this about finale, that I thought it as the good of spring."

Although Stravinsky's Ballet, Fire-Bird" numbers among his ea works, having been composed in 1909 10, many consider it as likely to su the Russian composer's later and daring music. Stravinsky choose Russian legend of Katschei, the mortal fiend of fairy folk-lore, turned heroes into stone. The Ivan seeks to defeat Katschei and disenchant the victims. He catches spares the life of a beautiful bird flaming golden plumage, and in gra the bird gives hime one of her fea which protects him from the mag Katschei. Thus armed, he destroys schei and his legions. The Ench Garden, Dance of the Fire Bird, Princesses who play with golden a and the Infernal Dance of Katsche his subjects, constitute this orch suite. The music is replete with c and melody, resplendent with mast use of orchestra color. It has so the daring but little of the hars of the later Stravinsky.

NOTED TENOR TO ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 16 1927

Boston Symphony Comes Here Feb. 6 With Koussevitzky

Liberal Concert Program to Be Headed by Beethoven's 'Eroica' which represents the foremost achievements of symphonic music, has been made by Serge Koussevitzky for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 108 musicians, to Hartford, in the Capitol Theater, Sunday afternoon, February 6, at 3 o'clock.

The principal number on the program will be Beethoven's third symphony, "Eroica." Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra plan to observe the centennial anniversary of the master's death next spring with a series of performances of his principal works. Prominent in this festival will be the mighty Eroica symphony, and its performance in Hartford will also be in the nature of a tribute to Beethoven. A notable novelty on this program will be a suite from Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." This talented young Russian composer is perhaps best known by the opera which was produced by the Chicago Opera Company several seasons ago, and this season in Germany, with conspicuous success. The remaining numbers will be Debussy's Nocturne, "Fetes" ("Festivals"), the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," and to close, the symphonic poem, "Finlandia," by Sibelius.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will come here under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. Tickets are now on sale at McCoy's Music Store, No. 89 Asylum street. For reservations phone 2-2251.

80

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 16 1927

$6000 IN PLEDGES NEEDED TO ASSURE CONCERTS IN 1928

One Thousand Dollars Already Promised Toward Fund for Appearance of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Albee Again Next Year.

At the final symphony concert of the season last night, it was announced that Providence can enjoy the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in the Albee Theatre again next year, provided $6000 is pledged as a guarantee fund to cover possible financial loss, as was done this year.

The voluntary symphony concert committee gave out this information at the concert last night on printed slips inserted in the programs. Along with the slips were pledge cards, to be filled out and sent to the Treasurer of the Providence Journal, who, at the request of the committee, has consented to act as recipient. No cash or checks should be sent as yet, as the pledges are not payable until Sept. 15.

The committee further announced that a pledge of $1000 had already been received from Mrs. George St. J. Sheffield.

Former plans to hold the concerts in the auditorium of the new Masonic Temple were cancelled when it was learned that the new hall will not be ready until 1928. From the season of 1928-1929 on it is expected that the concerts will be given there.

Incorporated in last night's program was a message of thanks from the orchestra trustees to E. F. Albee for the use of his theatre; to the voluntary committee comprising Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, honorary chairman, Mme. Avis Bliven Charbonnel, Albert Fenner, Mrs. William Gammel, Jr., Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, Mrs. George St. J. Sheffield and William L. Sweet "who raised a fund to 'buy out' five performances at this theatre," and to the Providence citizens "who generously responded to their appeal."

"The unprecedented interest in the concerts of the season now closing has amply justified their efforts," the message states.

"Mr. Albee has again offered his theatre, and the same committee is endeavoring to secure the necessary guarantee fund. If the five Tuesday evenings for next season are thus arranged, detailed announcements with an invitation for renewal will be mailed immediately to each subscriber."

Expressing pleasure at the success of the concerts this year and the developing musical taste and appreciation of Providence, Dr. Faunce pointed out, in a statement yesterday that "it is clear that concerts of such quality cannot be wholly self-supporting."

"The present season," he said, "has been made possible only by the generous gifts of certain individuals. A group of Masons contributed $3000 toward the expense of the concerts this winter—a gift which cannot be repeated. Others have given sums ranging from $10 to $1000. It is to be hoped that the response to our new plea will be just as enthusiastic."

Dr. Faunce was deeply appreciative of Mr. Albee's renewed offer to place his theatre at the disposal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the citizens of Providence for five Tuesday evenings next winter and declared "especially gratifying this season that so large a number of seats has been available for music students at moderate prices—an arrangement that we hope may continue next year."

"The financial proceeds of the current season," he concluded, "will enable the committee to return to the guarantors possibly one-third of the sum guaranteed."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 16 1927

The second big event of the week is the fourth concert, this season, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be given Tuesday evening at 8:15 at the Albee Theatre, Serge Koussevitsky conducting.

The programme arranged by Mr. Koussevitsky is unusual in its combination of old and more modern works. It is as follows:

Bach, C. P. E., Concerto for orchestra in D-major (arranged by Maximilian Steinberg) I, Allegro moderato; II., Andante lento moto; III., Allegro; Stravinsky, suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Fire-Bird"),a dance legend, (a), introduction. Katschei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird, (b), Supplication of the Fire-Bird, (c), The Princesses Play with the Golden Apples, (d), Dance of the Princesses, (e), Infernal Dance of all the Subjects of Katschei; Schumann, Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38, I, Andante unpoco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace; II, Larghetto; III., Scherzo: Molto vivace. Trio I: molto piu vivace; Trio II; IV., Allegro animato e grazioso.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 16 1927

Strong Contrasts Boston Symph

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

During his first season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—that is to say, in 1924-25—Mr. Koussevitzky introduced to Boston, Providence and other cities an arrangement by Maxmilian Steinberg of a Concerto of Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach. Not long ago he repeated this work in Boston, whereupon it strengthened the deep impression it had already made, and with it he begins the programme that he had planned for the concert in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening.

Hearing this Concerto played by a quintet of strings at a concert of the Society of Ancient Instruments in Paris, Mr. Koussevitzky was captivated by its grace and beauty and straightway commissioned Mr. Steinberg, a distinguished Russian composer known in this country chiefly as the editor of Rimsky-Korsakov's posthumous treatise on orchestration, to make an arrangement for small orchestra. Mr. Steinberg's modest but telling score calls for flute, two oboes, bassoon, horn and strings, and remains faithful to the 18th century spirit while at the same time giving full support to the younger Bach's pronounced leanings toward the music of a later day. Particularly in the deeply-felt second movement the "Hamburg Bach," as he is often called, has written music surprisingly modern in its harmonic texture.

Only two other pieces stand on Tuesday's programme, the Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird," hitherto unplayed by the Boston Orchestra in Providence, and the First Symphony of Schumann, which Mr. Monteaux last conducted in this city in February, 1922.

To those who know Stravinsky only as the composer of the boldly dissonant "Rite of Spring," bane of many a conservative concert-goer, the frequently entrancing music of the earlier ballet will come as a revelation. The "Fire-Bird," too, has its rasping dissonances, particularly in the "Infernal Dance" of the subjects of Katschei, the Evil One of Russian mythology, but they are incidental and ornamental rather than fundamental and integral as in the "Rite of Spring." The young man of 27 who with this "Fire-Bird" first attracted widespread recognition revealed himself as a composer of extraordinary gifts, but he had not yet spoken with a voice that was altogether his own. The influence of Debussy is here and there discernible, notably in the charming Berceuse, and both in spirit and in texture this score as a whole shows the influence of Rimsky-Korsakov's operas of Russian folk-legend. But Stravinsky begins, so to speak, where his great teacher left off; his is a far greater harmonic and orchestral daring. It is related that while the "Fire-Bird" was in process of composition Stravinsky played to the elder composer some fragments of the score. At first the worthy Rimsky was baffled by the young man's harmonies, but at length he broke out: "Stop playing that, I am beginning to like it!"

From Stravinsky to Schumann is, in one way, a far cry. The Russian is one of the outstanding masters of orchestration, in the royal line of Berlioz, Wagner, Rimsky-Korsakov, Tchaikovsky, Strauss and Debussy. Schumann, on the other hand, never learned to handle the orchestra with dependable skill; a few lucky strokes of coloring hardly offset his pre[illegible] ing ineptitude. As sheer sound, t[illegible] the Schumann symphonies seldom caress the ear, while now and again they even distress it, so thick-textured and opaque is the scoring. Indeed, played in a four-hand arrangement upon the pianoforte they may sound clearer and more persuasive than in their orchestral dress, a thing that is never true of the work of your composer who thinks, as the expression goes, "orchestrally."

No, despite an occasional felicitous procedure it is not as an orchestrator that one should listen to Schumann of the four symphonies, but as a tone-poet who sought to express through this severe and formidable medium the most intimate personal emotions. Above all, one should hear him as a lyricist. Thematic development as Beethoven and Brahms understood it Schumann never fully mastered. But he could, and did, write melodies. And this Symphony in B-flat, composed—save for the orchestral investment—in four days, towards the end of the winter of 1841, and inspired by the thought of the coming of spring, abounds in tunes; tunes lively and tunes sentimental, tunes vigorous and tunes light-heartedly gay. It is for this melodic exuberance that the average concert-goer still cherishes this "Spring" Symphony, and so far as he is concerned the academic "higher criticism" of structural and orchestral defects can well "go hang."

in Programme of ony Orchestra

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE HAVERHILL
Mass.
JAN 17 1927
ISSUE OF
Gazette

Koussevitzky to Remain With Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Jan. 17 (AP) — Two more years of direction of the Boston symphony orchestra by Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor, appears to be assured. It is understood that Mr. Koussevitzky, whose contract is flexible, has agreed to remain until May, 1929. The symphony concerts have prospered under his baton.

Wood of Gettysburg to

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LYNN
MASS.
ISSUE OF
JAN 17 1927

KUSSEVITZKY WILL REMAIN IN BOSTON

BOSTON, Jan. 17, 1927.—(AP)Two years more of directing of the Boston Symphony orchestra by Serge Koussevitsky, the Russian conductor, appears to be assured. tI is understood that Mr. Koussevitsky, whose contract is flexible, has agreed to remain until May, 1929. The symphony concerts have prospered under his baton.

KOUSSEVITZKY TO RENEW CONTRACT

Serge Koussevitzky, under whose leadership Boston Symphony Orchestra has prospered, will serve as director for two more years, it was reported today.

Koussevitzky's present contract is a flexible one, and today's report has it that he has agreed to stay on as conductor of Symphonw until May, 1929.

The conductor could not be reached to confirm or deny the report, but those close touch with the affairs of Symphony management, agreed that the report decision of Koussevitzky was ex-

TRANSCRIPT JAN 17

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 18 1927

VILL BE 0 MORE YEARS

duct Until May, 1929, ported.

17.—(AP)—Two years more tion of the Boston Symphon stra by Serge Koussevitzky, sian conductor, appears to be a ed. It is understood that Mr. Koussevitzky, whose contract is flexible, has agreed to remain until May, 1929. The symphony concerts have prospered under his baton.

PPING FROM GRAM
ER, MASS.
8 1927

BOSTON, Jan. 17 (A. P.)—Two years more of direction of the Boston Symphony ochestra by Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor, appears to be assured. It is understood that Mr. Koussevitzky, whose contract is flexible, has agreed to remain until May, 1929. The symphony concerts have prospered under his baton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 18 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

At Capitol Theater February 6, Under Sedgwick Management.

Serge Koussevitzky, with the Boston Symphony orchestra, will present music from Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," at the coming Hartford concert at the Capitol theater, Sunday afternoon, February 6, at 3 o'clock.

"The Love for Three Oranges," was produced by the Chicago Opera company in Chicago, on December 30, 1921, and at the Manhattan Opera house, in New York, on February 14, 1922. The opera has been mounted in Cologne last season and in Berlin this season. It is announced for early performance by other German Opera houses. The suite is made up of five numbers which have been edited by Albert Spalding. They include "Les Ridicules," March, Scherzo, The Prince and the Princess, and The Flight. The opera is based on Carlo Gozzi's Italian satirical fairy tale of the eighteenth century.

When the opera was about to be produced in New York, The Times thus described the plot:

"In current Manhattan programs it is related that the 'three oranges' of the opera's title are Brobdignagian, not to say Burkankian, affairs, occupied by three Princesses who have been thus imprisoned by a sorceress. To release them is the aim of a young Prince who, to the dismay of his father and court, is suffering from acute melancholia. Physicians declare that to make him laugh is the only cure for the Prince, but as he has no sense of humor, this appears impossible. Comic gymnastics and mad masquerades are prepared for his amusement, but only provoke him to tears until, by accident and design, the sorceress who plans his undoing is forced into an involuntary somersault, which caused him to burst into loud laughter.

The king of the imaginary kingdom, and all his court, delighted with the outcome, indulge in wild dancing, until checked by the furious sorceress, who condemns the prince to be obsessed with love for the three oranges. The prince starts out in search of the bewitched oranges in spite of the opposition of his father and the appeals of the courtiers, saying, 'Good-bye, father; think if I remained here I should become as melancholy as ever.' On his expedition he meets with all sorts of fantastic experiences, in which appear a magician, a devil, and a cook as formidable as the one encountered by Alice in Wonderland.

The seat sale is now in progress at McCoy's, Asylum street, and reservations may be made through Frank A. Sedgwick, telephone 2-2251.

Post GOOD NEWS Jan. 18, '27

That the present unexampled prosperity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is very largely due to the personal popularity of Serge Koussevitzky is a fact that admits of no dispute. Under these circumstances the trustees of the orchestra could hardly have entertained any plan other than that of retaining the distinguished Russian as conductor, always provided that he wished to remain. And that he would be so retained was more or less taken for granted. Nevertheless, until a day or so ago there had been no public expression of the trustees' wishes or of the conductor's willingness to accede to them.

Now the matter is settled, and it is announced, semi-officially, that Mr. Koussevitzky's contract will run through May, 1929. As to plans beyond that date neither trustees nor conductor are at present willing to commit themselves. In the meantime it is assured that Mr. Koussevitzky's first term will be at least the five years allotted to his predecessor, nor is this any too long a time in which to afford a conductor opportunity to give full expression to his ideas and ideals. And that this agreement should have been reached and published will not only create the feeling of stability so essential to the successful progress of the orchestra, it should also prove a source of gratification to the overwhelming majority of its subscribers and supporters.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 18 1927

Koussevitzky to Remain With Boston Symphony 2 More Years

BOSTON, Jan. 17 (AP).—Two years more of direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor, appears to be assured. It is understood that Mr. Koussevitzky, whose contract is flexible, has agreed to remain until May, 1929. The Symphony concerts have prospered under his baton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FREE PRESS
BURLINGTON, VT.
JAN 18 1927

BOSTON, Jan. 17. (AP).—Two years more of direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Zerge Koussevitsky, the Russian conductor, appears to be assured. It is understood that Mr. Koussevitsky, whose contract is flexible, has agreed to remain until May, 1929. The symphony concerts have prospered under his baton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 18 1927

GOOD ADVANCE SALE FOR BOSTON SYMPHON

Mrs. William N. Bannard, business manager for the Delaware Musical Association, under whose auspices the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear for the first time in Wilmington at the Shubert Play house on the evening of January 2[illegible] reports a very satisfactory advance sale of seats.

Interest in this unusual attraction has been very marked, and it was deemed expedient to have a preliminary sale to avoid the inevitable rush at the last minute. Mrs. Bannard will continue to take orders until the tickets are placed on sale at the box office a few days before the concert.

The orchestra, which is made up of 108 trained musicians of the highest rank, will be under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, the world-famous Russ'an conductor, whose record of achievement is as fine as that of the orchestra itself.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
JAN 18 1927

know but don't go acting suspicious."

Koussevitsky to Stay as Director of Boston Symphony for Two Years

BOSTON, Jan. 18 (AP)—Two years more of direction of the Boston Symphony orchestra by Serge Koussevitsky, the Russian conductor, appears to be assured. It is understood that Mr. Koussevitsky, whose contract is flexible, has agreed to remain until May, 1929. The symphony concerts have prospered under his baton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GAZETTE
TAUNTON, MASS.
JAN 17 1927
JAN 15 1929

TO LEAD SYMPHONY

(By The Associated Press.)

BOSTON, Jan. 17.—Two years more of direction of the Boston Symphony orchestra by Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor, appears to be assured. It is understood that Mr. Koussevitzky, whose contract is flexible, has agreed to remain until May, 1929. The symphony concerts have prospered under his baton.

Transcript Jan. 17, '27

For Two Years More

Mr. Koussevitzy Remains at Symphony Hall Till May of 1929

IT IS understood (as the phrase goes) that Mr. Koussevitzky, whose contract with the Symphony Orchestra is flexible, has agreed to continue as conductor through two seasons more—until May of 1929. Beyond that time neither he nor the Trustees care to look—from this distance. Since the conductor has restored the orchestra to former rank and place; kept the concerts interest-

[illegible] enlightened and alive by choice of pieces as well as his own merits; drawn to them audiences that fill Symphony and Carnegie Halls, there is no more to ask of him. For his own part, now that he has settled, for eight months of the year, into work and life in Boston and, at intervals, in New York, he finds both pleasurable and stimulating. Since the unclouded years of Dr. Muck, the Boston Orchestra has enjoyed no such high fortunes. With reason, the Trustees would keep the author.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 18 1927

CONDUCTOR PROVES HIS WORTH

The name of Serge Koussevitzky means more to the public at large than it used to, chiefly because of a Boston merchant's advertising stunt, coupled with an idea that the public appreciates good music, which has enabled radio fans to listen to the Boston Symphony orchestra in a series of 12 concerts. So the news that Mr Koussevitzky is to continue as conductor of that orchestra will be more generally acclaimed than would have been the case, had the announcement come six months ago.

Under this conductor's leadership, Boston Symphony has prospered and improved. He is not only popular with the public, but also with his players, which does much to explain the improvement noted in the orchestra's work under his guidance. It was taken for granted that the trustees would re-engage him if he were willing, but it was not until a day or so ago that actual expression of the trustee's wishes were given to the public, or the conductor's willingness to accede to them. Now it is announced that Mr Koussevitzky will continue with the Boston orchestra two more years, and surely it is welcome news to all followers of this organization of musicians and its music-loving public.

When he completes his present contract in May, 1929, Mr Koussevitzky will have wielded the baton with the Boston Symphony for five years—none too long a time in which to afford any conductor an opportunity in which to inculcate his ideas and expressions in his workers. One may expect the Boston Symphony to continue its improvement and maintain the high place in the music would that it has occupied.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
JAN 17 1927

BOSTON, Jan. 17.—(AP)—Two years more of direction of the Boston Symphony orchestra by Serge Koussevitsky, the Russian conductor, appears to be assured. It is understood that Mr. Koussevitsky, whose contract is flexible, has agreed to remain until May, 1929. The symphony concerts have prospered under his baton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 17 1927

Boston Symphony

Sergei Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present music from the Prokofieff opera, "The Love for Three Oranges" at their coming Hartford concert in the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 6, at 3 o'clock.

"The Love for Three Oranges" was produced at the Chicago Opera Company in Chicago December 30, 1921. The suite is made up of five numbers which have been edited by Albert Spalding. However, the principal number on the program will be Beethoven's third symphony, "Eroica." Sergei and his orchestra plan to observe the centennial anniversary of the master's death next spring. Reservations may be secured by calling McCoy's, 2-2251 Frank A. Sedgwick's management.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 17 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Much will happen, musically speaking, at the coming concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra under its famous nings next winter and declared "especially gratifying this season that so large a number of seats has been available for music students at moderate prices—an arrangement that we hope may continue next year."

"The financial proceeds of the current season," he concluded, "will enable the committee to return to the guarantors possibly one-third of the sum guaranteed."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 16 1927

The second big event of the week is the fourth concert, this season, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be given Tuesday evening at 8:15 at the Albee Theatre, Serge Koussevitsky conducting.

The programme arranged by Mr. Koussevitsky is unusual in its combination of old and more modern works. It is as follows:

Bach, C. P. E., Concerto for orchestra in D-major (arranged by Maximilian Steinberg) I, Allegro moderato; II., Andante lento moto; III., Allegro; Stravinsky, suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Fire-Bird"),a dance legend, (a), introduction, Katschei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird, (b), Supplication of the Fire-Bird, (c), The Princesses Play with the Golden Apples, (d), Dance of the Princesses, (e), Infernal Dance of all the Subjects of Katschei; Schumann, Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38, I, Andante unpoco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace; II, Larghetto; III., Scherzo: Molto vivace. Trio I: molto piu vivace; Trio II; IV., Allegro animato e grazioso.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 16 1927

Strong Contrasts Boston Symph

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

During his first season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—that is to say, in 1924-25—Mr. Koussevitzky introduced to Boston, Providence and other cities an arrangement by Maxmilian Steinberg of a Concerto of Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach. Not long ago he repeated this work in Boston, whereupon it strengthened the deep impression it had already made, and with it he begins the programme that he had planned for the concert in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening.

Hearing this Concerto played by a quintet of strings at a concert of the Society of Ancient Instruments in Paris, Mr. Koussevitzky was captivated by its grace and beauty and straightway commissioned Mr. Steinberg, a distinguished Russian composer known in this country chiefly as the editor of Rimsky-Korsakov's posthumous treatise on orchestration, to make an arrangement for small orchestra. Mr. Steinberg's modest but telling score calls for flute, two oboes, bassoon, horn and strings, and remains faithful to the 18th century spirit while at the same time giving full support to the younger Bach's pronounced leanings toward the music of a later day. Particularly in the deeply-felt second movement the "Hamburg Bach," as he is often called, has written music surprisingly modern in its harmonic texture.

Only two other pieces stand on Tuesday's programme, the Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird," hitherto unplayed by the Boston Orchestra in Providence, and the First Symphony of Schumann, which Mr. Monteaux last conducted in this city in February, 1922.

To those who know Stravinsky only as the composer of the boldly dissonant "Rite of Spring," bane of many a conservative concert-goer, the frequently entrancing music of the earlier ballet will come as a revelation. The "Fire-Bird," too, has its rasping dissonances, particularly in the "Infernal Dance" of the subjects of Katschei, the Evil One of Russian mythology, but they are incidental and ornamental rather than fundamental and integral as in the "Rite of Spring." The young man of 27 who with this "Fire-Bird" first attracted widespread recognition revealed himself as a composer of extraordinary gifts, but he had not yet spoken with a voice that was altogether his own. The influence of Debussy is here and there discernible, notably in the charming Berceuse, and both in spirit and in texture this score as a whole shows the influence of Rimsky-Korsakov's operas of Russian folk-legend. But Stravinsky begins, so to speak, where his great teacher left off; his is a far greater harmonic and orchestral daring. It is related that while the "Fire-Bird" was in process of composition Stravinsky played to the elder composer some fragments of the score. At first the worthy Rimsky was baffled by the young man's harmonies, but at length he broke out: "Stop playing that, I am beginning to like it!"

From Stravinsky to Schumann is, in one way, a far cry. The Russian is one of the outstanding masters of orchestration, in the royal line of Berlioz, Wagner, Rimsky-Korsakov, Tchaikovsky, Strauss and Debussy. Schumann, on the other hand, never learned to handle the orchestra with dependable skill; a few lucky strokes of coloring hardly offset his pre[illegible] ing ineptitude. As sheer sound, t[illegible] the Schumann symphonies seldom caress the ear, while now and again they even distress it, so thick-textured and opaque is the scoring. Indeed, played in a four-hand arrangement upon the pianoforte they may sound clearer and more persuasive than in their orchestral dress, a thing that is never true of the work of your composer who thinks, as the expression goes, "orchestrally."

No, despite an occasional felicitous procedure it is not as an orchestrator that one should listen to Schumann of the four symphonies, but as a tone-poet who sought to express through this severe and formidable medium the most intimate personal emotions. Above all, one should hear him as a lyricist. Thematic development as Beethoven and Brahms understood it, Schumann never fully mastered. But he could, and did, write melodies. And this Symphony in B-flat, composed—save for the orchestral investment—in four days, towards the end of the winter of 1841, and inspired by the thought of the coming of spring, abounds in tunes; tunes lively and tunes sentimental, tunes vigorous and tunes light-heartedly gay. It is for this melodic exuberance that the average concert-goer still cherishes this "Spring" Symphony, and so far as he is concerned the academic "higher criticism" of structural and orchestral defects can well "go hang."

in Programme of ony Orchestra

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE HAVERHILL
MASS.
JAN 17 1927
ISSUE OF

Koussevitzky to Remain With Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Jan. 17 (AP) — Two more years of direction of the Boston symphony orchestra by Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor, appears to be assured. It is understood that Mr. Koussevitzky, whose contract is flexible, has agreed to remain until May, 1929. The symphony concerts have prospered under his baton.

Wood of Gettysburg to

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LYNN
MASS.
ISSUE OF
JAN 17 1927

KUSSEVITZKY WILL REMAIN IN BOSTON

BOSTON, Jan. 17, 1927.—(AP)Two years more of directing of the Boston Symphony orchestra by Serge Koussevitsky, the Russian conductor, appears to be assured. tI is understood that Mr. Koussevitsky, whose contract is flexible, has agreed to remain until May, 1929. The symphony concerts have prospered under his baton.

KOUSSEVITZKY TO RENEW CONTRACT

Serge Koussevitzky, under whose leadership Boston Symphony Orchestra has prospered, will serve as director for two more years, it was reported today.

Koussevitzky's present contract is a flexible one, and today's report has it that he has agreed to stay on as conductor of Symphonw until May, 1929.

The conductor could not be reached to confirm or deny the report, but those in close touch with the affairs of the symphony management, agreed that the report decision of Koussevitzky was ex-
TRAVELLER JAN 17

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 18 1927

VILL BE 0 MORE YEARS

tract Until May, 1929, ported.

17.—(AP)—Two years more[illegible]tion of the Boston Symphon[illegible]stra by Serge Koussevitzky, [illegible]ssian conductor, appears to be [illegible]ed. It is understood that Mr. Koussevitzky, whose contract is flexible, has agreed to remain until May, 1929. The symphony concerts have prospered under his baton.

PPING FROM GRAM
ER, MASS.
18 1927

BOSTON, Jan. 17 (A. P.)—Two years more of direction of the Boston Symphony ochestra by Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor, appears to be assured. It is understood that Mr. Koussevitzky, whose contract is flexible, has agreed to remain until May, 1929. The symphony concerts have prospered under his baton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 18 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

At Capitol Theater February 6, Under Sedgwick Management.

Serge Koussevitzky, with the Boston Symphony orchestra, will present music from Prokofieff's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," at the coming Hartford concert, at the Capitol theater, Sunday afternoon, February 6, at 3 o'clock.

"The Love for Three Oranges," was produced by the Chicago Opera company in Chicago, on December 30, 1921, and at the Manhattan Opera house, in New York, on February 14, 1922. The opera has been mounted in Cologne last season and in Berlin this season. It is announced for early performance by other German Opera houses. The suite is made up of five numbers which have been edited by Albert Spalding. They include "Les Ridicules," March, Scherzo, The Prince and the Princess, and The Flight. The opera is based on Carlo Gozzi's Italian satirical fairy tale of the eighteenth century.

When the opera was about to be produced in New York, The Times thus described the plot:

"In current Manhattan programs it is related that the 'three oranges' of the opera's title are Brobdignagian, not to say Burkankian, affairs, occupied by three Princesses who have been thus imprisoned by a sorceress. To release them is the aim of a young Prince who, to the dismay of his father and court, is suffering from acute melancholia. Physicians declare that to make him laugh is the only cure for the Prince, but as he has no sense of humor, this appears impossible. Comic gymnastics and mad masquerades are prepared for his amusement, but only provoke him to tears until, by accident and design, the sorceress who plans his undoing is forced into an involuntary somersault, which caused him to burst into loud laughter.

The king of the imaginary kingdom, and all his court, delighted with the outcome, indulge in wild dancing, until checked by the furious sorceress, who condemns the prince to be obsessed with love for the three oranges. The prince starts out in search of the bewitched oranges in spite of the opposition of his father and the appeals of the courtiers, saying, 'Good-bye, father: think if I remained here I should become as melancholy as ever.' On his expedition he meets with all sorts of fantastic experiences, in which appear a magician, a devil, and a cook as formidable as the one encountered by Alice in Wonderland.

The seat sale is now in progress at McCoy's, Asylum street, and reservations may be made through Frank A. Sedgwick, telephone 2-2251.

Post GOOD NEWS Jan. 18, '27

That the present unexampled prosperity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is very largely due to the personal popularity of Serge Koussevitzky is a fact that admits of no dispute. Under these circumstances the trustees of the orchestra could hardly have entertained any plan other than that of retaining the distinguished Russian as conductor, always provided that he wished to remain. And that he would be so retained was more or less taken for granted. Nevertheless, until a day or so ago there had been no public expression of the trustees' wishes or of the conductor's willingness to accede to them.

Now the matter is settled, and it is announced, semi-officially, that Mr. Koussevitzky's contract will run through May, 1929. As to plans beyond that date neither trustees nor conductor are at present willing to commit themselves. In the meantime it is assured that Mr. Koussevitzky's first term will be at least the five years allotted to his predecessor, nor is this any too long a time in which to afford a conductor opportunity to give full expression to his ideas and ideals. And that this agreement should have been reached and published will not only create the feeling of stability so essential to the successful progress of the orchestra, it should also prove a source of gratification to the overwhelming majority of its subscribers and supporters.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 18 1927

Koussevitzky to Remain With Boston Symphony 2 More Years

BOSTON, Jan. 17 (AP).—Two years more of direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor, appears to be assured. It is understood that Mr. Koussevitzky, whose contract is flexible, has agreed to remain until May, 1929. The Symphony concerts have prospered under his baton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FREE PRESS
BURLINGTON, VT.
JAN 18 1927

BOSTON, Jan. 17. (AP).—Two years more of direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Zerge Koussevitsky, the Russian conductor, appears to be assured. It is understood that Mr. Koussevitsky, whose contract is flexible, has agreed to remain until May, 1929. The symphony concerts have prospered under his baton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 18 1927

GOOD ADVANCE SALE FOR BOSTON SYMPHON

Mrs. William N. Bannard, business manager for the Delaware Musical Association, under whose auspices the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear for the first time in Wilmington at the Shubert Play house on the evening of January 3 reports a very satisfactory advance sale of seats.

Interest in this unusual attraction has been very marked, and it was deemed expedient to have a preliminary sale to avoid the inevitable rush at the last minute. Mrs. Bannard will continue to take orders until the tickets are placed on sale at the box office a few days before the concert.

The orchestra, which is made up of 108 trained musicians of the highest rank, will be under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, the world-famous Russian conductor, whose record of achievement is as fine as that of the orchestra itself.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
JAN 18 1927

know but don't go acting suspicious."

Koussevitsky to Stay as Director of Boston Symphony for Two Years

BOSTON, Jan. 18 (AP)—Two years more of direction of the Boston Symphony orchestra by Serge Koussevitsky, the Russian conductor, appears to be assured. It is understood that Mr. Koussevitsky, whose contract is flexible, has agreed to remain until May, 1929. The symphony concerts have prospered under his baton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GAZETTE
TAUNTON, MASS.
JAN 17 1927
JAN 15 1927

TO LEAD SYMPHONY

(By The Associated Press.)

BOSTON, Jan. 17.—Two years more of direction of the Boston Symphony orchestra by Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor, appears to be assured. It is understood that Mr. Koussevitzky, whose contract is flexible, has agreed to remain until May, 1929. The symphony concerts have prospered under his baton.

Transcript Jan. 17, '27

For Two Years More

Mr. Koussevitzy Remains at Symphony Hall Till May of 1929

IT IS understood (as the phrase goes) that Mr. Koussevitzky, whose contract with the Symphony Orchestra is flexible, has agreed to continue as conductor through two seasons more—until May of 1929. Beyond that time neither he nor the Trustees care to look—from this distance. Since the conductor has restored the orchestra to former rank and place; kept the concerts interest-

[illegible] enlightened and alive by choice of pieces as well as his own merits; drawn to them audiences that fill Symphony and Carnegie Halls, there is no more to ask of him. For his own part, now that he has settled, for eight months of the year, into work and life in Boston and, at intervals, in New York, he finds both pleasurable and stimulating. Since the unclouded years of Dr. Muck, the Boston Orchestra has enjoyed no such high fortunes. With reason, the Trustees would keep the author.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 18 1927

CONDUCTOR PROVES HIS WORTH

The name of Serge Koussevitzky means more to the public at large than it used to, chiefly because of a Boston merchant's advertising stunt, coupled with an idea that the public appreciates good music, which has enabled radio fans to listen to the Boston Symphony orchestra in a series of 12 concerts. So the news that Mr Koussevitzky is to continue as conductor of that orchestra will be more generally acclaimed than would have been the case, had the announcement come six months ago.

Under this conductor's leadership, Boston Symphony has prospered and improved. He is not only popular with the public, but also with his players, which does much to explain the improvement noted in the orchestra's work under his guidance. It was taken for granted that the trustees would re-engage him if he were willing, but it was not until a day or so ago that actual expression of the trustee's wishes were given to the public, or the conductor's willingness to accede to them. Now it is announced that Mr Koussevitzky will continue with the Boston orchestra two more years, and surely it is welcome news to all followers of this organization of musicians and its music-loving public.

When he completes his present contract in May, 1929, Mr Koussevitzky will have wielded the baton with the Boston Symphony for five years—none too long a time in which to afford any conductor an opportunity in which to inculcate his ideas and expressions in his workers. One may expect the Boston Symphony to continue its improvement and maintain the high place in the music would that it has occupied.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
JAN 17 1927

BOSTON, Jan. 17.—(AP)—Two years more of direction of the Boston Symphony orchestra by Serge Koussevitsky, the Russian conductor, appears to be assured. It is understood that Mr. Koussevitsky, whose contract is flexible, has agreed to remain until May, 1929. The symphony concerts have prospered under his baton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 17 1927

Boston Symphony

Sergei Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present music from the Prokofieff opera, "The Love for Three Oranges" at their coming Hartford concert in the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 6, at 3 o'clock.

"The Love for Three Oranges" was produced at the Chicago Opera Company in Chicago December 30, 1921. The suite is made up of five numbers which have been edited by Albert Spalding. However, the principal number on the program will be Beethoven's third symphony, "Eroica." Sergei and his orchestra plan to observe the centennial anniversary of the master's death next spring. Reservations may be secured by calling McCoy's, 2-2251 Frank A. Sedgwick's management.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 17 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Much will happen, musically speaking, at the coming concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra under its famous

INFORMATION OBSCURED

In addition to the mighty "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, which will occupy half of the program, and the suite in the modern vein of Prokofieff from his opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," Mr. Koussevitzky will perform three other numbers from Germany, France and Finland, respectively —Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin," Debussy's Nocturne, "Fetes," and Sibelius' "Finlandia.' Each of these is considered to have a particularly fine and eloquent performance at the hands of Koussevitzky. Debussys Nocturne, "Fetes" ("Festivals"), distinctly reveals this master as an impressionist painter, and the fact that he painted in tones instead of in pigments, makes the classification all the more striking. It is in the nature of a professional and is more brilliant and outspoken than the Debussy one usually meets.

The seat sale is now in progress at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Reservations may be made through Frank A. Sedgwick, 'phone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 17 1927

SYMPHONY TO GIVE CONCERTO BY BACH

Boston Orchestra Will Appear Here To-morrow Night in the Albee.

KOUSSEVITZKY TO CONDUCT

Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, Also on Programme, Will Have First Performance in Providence

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will take place at 8:15 o'clock to-morrow night, in the Albee Theatre. The Russian conductor will then present a concerto by Philip Emanuel Bach, son of Johann Sebastian Bach, which Maximilian Steinberg has rescored for string orchestra with a small wind choir added.

Emanuel Bach is one of the most remarkable figures in the transitional period between J. S. Bach and Hayden. He was remarkable for his general culture in a period when elegance was regarded as the ideal, "when the potent word was taste." However, in spite of the restrictions of his age, he became such a moulder of artistic form that his works surpass those of his contemporaries. His music is shallow, but is cheerful, and not without charm.

A modern score of high repute, which is then to have its first performance in Providence, is the Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, the Fire-Bird. The music presents a fiery tale of the Russian folk. Composed in 1909, it is replete with charm and melody. Resplendent with masterful use of orchestral color, it has some of the daring but not all of the harshness of the later Stravinsky. Perhaps its true place lies somewhere between the encomia of its many admirers and this somewhat pessimistic outlook of Daniel Gregory Mason: "Anyone who tries nowadays to write more music—expressive of emotion through beauty—is more than ever a commonplace person. The person of parts are those who give it the quaint local color of folk-songs, like Percy Grainger; or who make it an agreeable accessory of dance or stage picture, like Ravel and Stravinsky, or of colored lights and perfumes, like Scriabine; or who spin it into mathematical formulae as a spider spins web, like Roger; or who use it as a vehicle for a priori intellectual theories, like Schoenberg, or as a noise for a nerve stimulant, like Leo Ornstein."

The symphony of the evening wil be the first of Schumann, in B fla major, opus 38. Schuman said that h wrote this symphony "while the firs breath of spring was in the air." T those on the lookout for titles this ha suggested "Spring Symphony." H wrote it in the year that followed hi marriage with Clara Wieck, who late served him so well as interpreter o his pianoforte works.

According to the composer's "pro gramme," the opening phrase of the symphony, B flat major, andante, un poco Maestoso, given out by trumpets and horns and repeated and developed by the whole orchestra, is "a summons from on high to which the gentle zephyrs blowing softly to and fro respond. Everywhere the dormant forces of nature awake and make their way to the light."

Then in the Allegro "the spring comes laughing in, in the full beauty of youth." This is the significance of the introductory section, and the succeeding Alegro molto vivace, B-flat, 2-4 time. The very vital theme, full of buoyancy and fervor, is developed with great consistency. The second figure, in the nature of a contrast, makes a masterly use of the "woodwinds." The development follows, scholarly and vigorous. After "recapitulation" the movement closes with a coda.

The second movement, E-flat major, Larghetto, 3-8 time, consists of varied treatment of one theme. "This movement, so full of romantic suggestion, yet tempered by a reserve well-nigh classic, is one of Schumann's most genial conceptions, and fully justifies the assertion that of all the post-Beethoven symphonists he stands pre-eminent.

The Scherzo follows, hinted at in the close of the Larghetto. The principal theme—G-minor, molto vivace, three-quarters time—is most Schumannesque in its syncopations, offset by trios 1 and 11, the first suggesting Beethoven in the alternation of chords between "strings" and "woodwind." After the trios come the Scherzo proper and a coda.

The principal theme of the Finale—B-flat, allegro animato e grazioso alla breve—in its strength, directness, and vigor of rhythm, reflects the opening of the symphony. It fairly pulsates and scintillates with life. And with its animation it has, besides, all that grazioso suggests.

The second theme suggests Mendelssohn—with a difference.

It is said that Schumann wrote this symphony with a steel pen found on the grave of Schubert. What a theme for the sentimental writer of quasi-biography.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 17 1927

SYMPHONY TO GIVE CONCERT BY BACH TO-MORROW NIGHT

Boston Orchestra Will Appear at Albee Theatre.—Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet on Programme.—Koussevitzky to Be Conductor.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will take place at 8:15 o'clock to-morrow night, in the Albee Theatre. The Russian conductor will then present a concerto by Philip Emanuel Bach, son of Johann Sebastian Bach, which Maximilian Steinberg has rescored for string orchestra with a small wind choir added.

Emanuel Bach is one of the most remarkable figures in the transitional period between J. S. Bach and Hayden. He was remarkable for his general culture in a period when elegance was regarded as the ideal, "when the potent word was taste." However, in spite of the restrictions of his age, he became such a moulder of artistic form that his works surpass those of his contemporaries. His music is shallow, but is cheerful, and not without charm.

A modern score of high repute, which is then to have its first performance in Providence, is the Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, the Fire-Bird. The music presents a fiery tale of the Russian folk. Composed in 1909, it is replete with charm and melody. Resplendent with masterful use of orchestral color, it has some of the daring but not all of the harshness of the later Stravinsky. Perhaps its true place lies somewhere between the encomia of its many admirers and this somewhat pessimistic outlook of Daniel Gregory Mason: "Anyone who tries nowadays to write more music—expressive of emotion through beauty—is more than ever a commonplace person. The person of parts are those who give it the quaint local color of folk-songs, like Percy Grainger; or who make it an agreeable accessory of dance or stage picture, like Ravel and Stravinsky, or of colored lights and perfumes, like Scriabine; or who spin it into mathematical formulae as a spider spins web, like Roger; or who use it as a vehicle for a priori intellectual theories, like Schoenberg, or as a noise for a nerve stimulant, like Leo Ornstein."

The symphony of the evening will be the first of Schumann, in B flat major, opus 38. Schuman said that he wrote this symphony "while the first breath of spring was in the air." To those on the lookout for titles this has suggested "Spring Symphony." He wrote it in the year that followed his marriage with Clara Wieck, who later served him so well as interpreter of his pianoforte works.

According to the composer's "programme," the opening phrase of the symphony, B flat major, andante, un poco Maestoso, given out by trumpets and horns and repeated and developed by the whole orchestra, is "a summons from on high to which the gentle zephyrs blowing softly to and fro respond. Everywhere the dormant forces of nature awake and make their way to the light."

Then in the Allegro "the spring comes laughing in, in the full beauty of youth." This is the significance of the introductory section, and the succeeding Alegro molto vivace, B-flat, 2-4 time. The very vital theme, full of buoyancy and fervor, is developed with great consistency. The second figure, in the nature of a contrast, makes a masterly use of the "woodwinds." The development follows, scholarly and vigorous. After "recapitulation" the movement, closes with a coda.

The second movement, E-flat major, Larghetto, 3-8 time, consists of varied treatment of one theme. "This movement, so full of romantic suggestion, yet tempered by a reserve well-nigh classic, is one of Schumann's most genial conceptions, and fully justifies the assertion that of all the post-Beethoven symphonists he stands pre-eminent.

The Scherzo follows, hinted at in the close of the Larghetto. The principal theme—G-minor, molto vivace, three-quarters time—is most Schumannesque in its syncopations, offset by trios 1 and 11, the first suggesting Beethoven in the alternation of chords between "strings" and "woodwind." After the trios come the Scherzo proper and a coda.

The principal theme of the Finale—B-flat, allegro animato e grazioso alla breve—in its strength, directness, and vigor of rhythm, reflects the opening of the symphony. It fairly pulsates and scintillates with life. And with its animation it has, besides, all that grazioso suggests.

The second theme suggests Mendelssohn—with a difference.

It is said that Schumann wrote this symphony with a steel pen found on the grave of Schubert. What a theme for the sentimental writer of quasi-biography.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 19 1927

FINE CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Serge Koussvitzky at His Brilliant Best at Albee Theatre Last Evening

While the audience sat enthralled at the Albee last evening Serge Koussevitzky revelled in the bars and passages of Stravinsky's suite from "The Fire-Bird." It was Koussevitzky at his brilliant best, the forceful, vigorous Koussevitzky, threatening, entreating, now appearing to thrust and jab and punch the color and flame of the Russian dance legend from his assembled artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And the orchestra was willing under the lash of its conductor's imperious will.

Perhaps the most effective passage of the suite as presented by Koussevitzky last evening was "The Infernal Dance of Katschi's Subjects." With the audience swaying back and forth in their seats as Ivan swings the magic egg to and fro, finally to crash it to the ground. Koussevitzky interpreted the crash as Koussevitzky would, much to the consternation of some who had succumbed to the swaying rythym and were dozing in their seats.

The program last evening opened with Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, in B minor, which was substituted for Bach's Concerto in D major. Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, the "Spring Symphony," was selected to close the program. Even though it followed the vivid musical picture of "The Fire-Bird," those who heard it were able to readjust themselves to catch something of the plaintive longing for the coming of spring which Schumann felt when he composed the opening movement.

The program:

Handel...Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12.
Largo—Allegro—Larghetto e piano—Largo—Allegro.

Stravinsky...Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Fire-Bird"), A Danced Legend.
a. Introduction; Katschei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird.
b. Supplication of the Fire-Bird.
c. The Princesses Play with the Golden Apples.
d. Dance of the Princesses.
e. Infernal Dance of all the Subjects of Katschei.

Schumann..Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38.
1. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 19 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A program of exceeding brilliance, which represents the foremost achievements of symphonic music, has been made by Serge Koussevitzky for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians, to Hartford, in the Capitol theater, Sunday afternoon, February 6, at 3 o'clock.

The Russian conductor is now in his third season in America and at the head of this famous orchestra. Once the foremost figure in the orchestral concerts of Russia and later in Paris, London and western Europe, this leader has likewise succeeded in America in no uncertain fashion. His brilliant and magnetic personality, his intense artistic vision and sincerity, his exacting command as a leader have all made their impress upon the performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra. This organization, long known as one of the very finest in the world, has in general opinion never sounded more eloquent than under Koussevitzky's direction. The principal number on the program will be Beethoven's Third Symphony, "Eroica." Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra plan to observe the centennial anniversary of the master's death next spring with a series of performances of his principal works.

Seats are now selling at McCoy's Music store, Asylum street. Reservations may be made through Manager Frank Sedgwick, 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 19 1927

Boston Symphony

Last evening at the Albee Theatre, under the wand of Serge Koussevitsky, Stravinsky's opportunity came to let his light shine, and the naughty playboy made quite an illumination. Long ago he had scrapped Debussy's clouds and impressions and reflections, and had cast the fragments out on the junk pile in his Corybantian back yard; and had made the Debussy dreamland and the French Impressionism look like a Cloud-Cuckoo Town left all topsy-turvy by the winged Hound of Heaven.

He was introduced by Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, in minor, No. 12; for, not to dull the edge of expectancy, Mr. Koussevitsky substituted this number for the Emanuel Bach concerto, which appeared in the programme. The first movement of this concerto was interesting from the point of view of a string quartet played by the principals of the string choirs, interrupted at regular intervals by rather gruff comment from the entire string orchestra. In this movement the basses seemed at times heavy enough to spoil the fine effect of a perfect balance in the ensemble. The simplicity of the whole work and the vivid melody of the Allegro offered just the right material to set against the startling contrast that followed.

Glory be to the Fire-Bird, if not honor. It gave poor Handel quite a shock—tore his lace and tousled his wig; and cast obloquy likewise on Schumann, the distiller of spring perfumes, because he did not use the right sort of atomizer. And moreover it revealed the richness of its own panoply—the audacity of the woodwind, the ravishing note of the reeds, the heartthrob of the strings, and the frigid incisiveness of the harp. The princesses playing with apples in the garden were not unlike Greek princesses playing ball on the seashore, but the music of their dance brought slight inspiration. On the other hand, the Infernal Dance was quite engaging. There the Russian seems at his best. But his demons were rather dainty and unterrifying—nothing to frighten Heracles nor even Dionysius. But the piece as a whole is by no means an antidote for tense nerves. It tends to make one feel like

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
JAN 19 1927

82

Symphony Pleases Audience at Albee

Koussevitzky's penchant for the modern in music was demonstrated at the Albee Theatre last night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under his masterly direction, presented "The Fire Bird," a suite from a composition by Stravinsky.

The instrumentation was faultless, but the melody was not comparable with that of the first number, Handel's "Concerto Grosso in B minor." An Oriental influence pervades this work, a Russian folk tale set to music and the result was bizarre to an Occidental. By a long stretch of the imagination one could conceive of Princesses playing in an enchanted garden but the music was not of the spirited dance tempo which one generally associates with fairies of terpsichore. The final movement, "The Infernal Dance," of the lackeys of the Russian Cetibos, was not at all infernal, for its awe inspiring qualities faded under the glare of the arc lights.

Handel's Concerto was a pleasing introduction to the programme. Opening with a movement in which the principals of the string groups engaged in some pleasing instrumentations, it was interpolated by the deeper strings, which at times threatened to exclude the more lighter passages. The selection which was substituted for the Concerto in D major by Bach was a pleasing exchange.

The orchestra was at its best in Schumann's Symphony in B flat major. The heavy and drawn passages which have come to be accepted as parts of many symphonies are in this supplanted to a major degree by the lyrical tones which permeate the symphony and carry it, to a degree, from the beaten path of symphonies. It has a peculiar charm, all its own, and was capably interpreted by Koussevitsky and his musicians.

THIS CLIPPING FROM EVERY EVENING
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 19 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE JANUARY 31

The preliminary seat sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will make its first appearance in Wilmington in The Shubert Playhouse on the evening of January 31, under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association, is under direction of Mrs. William N. Bannard, who will continue to take orders until the tickets are placed on sale at the box office a few days before the concert.

The interest which the forthcoming engagement has aroused occasions no surprise. The Delaware Musical Association officials say that in booking the Boston Symphony Orchestra they have secured the finest attraction it has thus far been able to offer the association's friends and patrons.

The Boston Symphony combines a force of 108 musicians, each of whom is a trained and accomplished artist, with a leader whose record is one of outstanding achievement. This is Serge Koussevitzky, who had been its director since 1924. Born in 1874 in Tver, North Russia, he became a conductor at the age of 12.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 19 1927

Boston Symphony

"Prokofieff's opera, from which his Suite is derived, is based on Gozzi's satirical fairy play, which might well excite the imagination of any composer. "This is the comment of Philip Hale in the "Boston Herald."

"A remarkable man this Serge Prokofieff, to us the most original, the most imaginative, and the best equipped composer now creating music. With the hearing of each work by him our admiration for him waxes stronger.

"There is no need in this instance of restating the old saw: 'This music is for the stage and suffers when it is transferred to the concert hall,' for the movements are interesting, yes, delightful, as absolute music. One feels throughout the suite the honesty of Prokofieff. Thus he thought; so he expressed himself; and how well it!"

This suite will be played w Boston Symphony appears Feb at the Capitol Theater. Seats ing at McCoy's. Reservations, Frank A. Sedgwick, management

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 20 1927

Boston Symphony

Two eminent names joined together for one purpose when Serge Koussevitzky came to America and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924. The fact that a conductor about whom almost incredible reports were heard from Europe was to direct one of the finest and oldest orchestras in the world, put our public in a state of expectancy.

Two seasons of Boston Symphony concerts under Koussevitzky's leadership have exceeded the most sanguine expectations. The hundred and eight musicians respond as a single, rare instrument to Koussevitzky's slightest gesture. In a word, it continues to be the orchestra whose name is traditionally associated with perfection in symphonic performance.

Even before Koussevitzky first arrived in America, all places for the Boston Symphony concerts were taken for the season. There are now waiting lists for each series in Boston, New York, and elsewhere. The coming concert here offers an opportunity which is not available to non-subscribers in the orchestra's own city.

Seats now selling at McCoy's for the Hartford concert February 6. Phone for reservations 2-2251 Management Frank A. Sedgwick.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 20 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Two eminent names joined together for one purpose when Serge Koussevitzky came to America and the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1924. The fact that a conductor about whom almost incredible reports were heard from Europe was to direct one of the finest and oldest orchestras in the world, put our public in a state of expectancy.

Two seasons of Boston Symphony concerts under Koussevitzky's leadership have exceeded the most sanguine expectations. When the great orchestra begins to play, there is evidence in every bar of the exacting, yet persuasive hand of the born commander. The hundred and eight musicians respond as a single, rare instrument to Koussevitzky's slightest gesture. In a word, it continues to be the orchestra whose name is traditionally associated with perfection in symphonic performance.

Seats are now selling at McCoy's for the Hartford concert on February 6, Phone for reservations, 2-2251, Frank A. Sedgwick, manager.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

In addition to the mighty "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, which will occupy half of the program, and the suite in the modern vein of Prokofieff from his opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," Mr. Koussevitzky will perform three other numbers from Germany, France and Finland, respectively —Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin," Debussy's Nocturne, "Fetes," and Sibelius' "Finlandia.' Each of these is considered to have a particularly fine and eloquent performance at the hands of Koussevitzky. Debussys Nocturne, "Festivals"), distinctly reveals this master as an impressionist painter, and the fact that he painted in tones instead of in pigments, makes the classification all the more striking. It is in the nature of a professional and is more brilliant and outspoken than the Debussy one usually meets.

The seat sale is now in progress at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Reservations may be made through Frank A. Sedgwick, 'phone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 17 1927

SYMPHONY TO GIVE CONCERTO BY BACH

Boston Orchestra Will Appear Here To-morrow Night in the Albee.

KOUSSEVITZKY TO CONDUCT

Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, Also on Programme, Will Have First Performance in Providence

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will take place at 8:15 o'clock to-morrow night, in the Albee Theatre. The Russian conductor will then present a concerto by Philip Emanuel Bach, son of Johann Sebastian Bach, which Maximilian Steinberg has rescored for string orchestra with a small wind choir added.

Emanuel Bach is one of the most remarkable figures in the transitional period between J. S. Bach and Hayden. He was remarkable for his general culture in a period when elegance was regarded as the ideal, "when the potent word was taste." However, in spite of the restrictions of his age, he became such a moulder of artistic form that his works surpass those of his contemporaries. His music is shallow, but is cheerful, and not without charm.

A modern score of high repute, which is then to have its first performance in Providence, is the Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, the Fire-Bird. The music presents a fiery tale of the Russian folk. Composed in 1909, it is replete with charm and melody. Resplendent with masterful use of orchestral color, it has some of the daring but not all of the harshness of the later Stravinsky. Perhaps its true place lies somewhere between the encomia of its many admirers and this somewhat pessimistic outlook of Daniel Gregory Mason: "Anyone who tries nowadays to write more music—expressive of emotion through beauty—is more than ever a commonplace person. The person of parts are those who give it the quaint local color of folk-songs, like Percy Grainger; or who make it an agreeable accessory of dance or stage picture, like Ravel and Stravinsky, or of colored lights and perfumes, like Scriabine; or who spin it into mathematical formulae as a spider spins web, like Roger; or who use it as a vehicle for a priori intellectual theories, like Schoenberg, or as a noise for a nerve stimulant, like Leo Ornstein."

The symphony of the evening will be the first of Schumann, in B flat major, opus 38. Schuman said that he wrote this symphony "while the first breath of spring was in the air." To those on the lookout for titles this has suggested "Spring Symphony." He wrote it in the year that followed his marriage with Clara Wieck, who later served him so well as interpreter of his pianoforte works.

According to the composer's "programme," the opening phrase of the symphony, B flat major, andante, un poco Maestoso, given out by trumpets and horns and repeated and developed by the whole orchestra, is "a summons from on high to which the gentle zephyrs blowing softly to and fro respond. Everywhere the dormant forces of nature awake and make their way to the light."

Then in the Allegro "the spring comes laughing in, in the full beauty of youth." This is the significance of the introductory section, and the succeeding Alegro molto vivace, B-flat, 2-4 time. The very vital theme, full of buoyancy and fervor, is developed with great consistency. The second figure, in the nature of a contrast, makes a masterly use of the "woodwinds." The development follows, scholarly and vigorous. After "recapitulation" the movement closes with a coda.

The second movement, E-flat major, Larghetto, 3-8 time, consists of varied treatment of one theme. "This movement, so full of romantic suggestion, yet tempered by a reserve well-nigh classic, is one of Schumann's most genial conceptions, and fully justifies the assertion that of all the post-Beethoven symphonists he stands pre-eminent.

The Scherzo follows, hinted at in the close of the Larghetto. The principal theme—G-minor, molto vivace, three-quarters time—is most Schumannesque in its syncopations, offset by trios 1 and 11, the first suggesting Beethoven in the alternation of chords between "strings" and "woodwind." After the trios come the Scherzo proper and a coda.

The principal theme of the Finale—B-flat, allegro animato e grazioso alla breve—in its strength, directness, and vigor of rhythm, reflects the opening of the symphony. It fairly pulsates and scintillates with life. And with its animation it has, besides, all that grazioso suggests.

The second theme suggests Mendelssohn—with a difference.

It is said that Schumann wrote this symphony with a steel pen found on the grave of Schubert. What a theme for the sentimental writer of quasi-biography.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 17 1927

SYMPHONY TO GIVE CONCERT BY BACH TO-MORROW NIGHT

Boston Orchestra Will Appear at Albee Theatre.—Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet on Programme.—Koussevitzky to Be Conductor.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will take place at 8:15 o'clock to-morrow night, in the Albee Theatre. The Russian conductor will then present a concerto by Philip Emanuel Bach, son of Johann Sebastian Bach, which Maximilian Steinberg has rescored for string orchestra with a small wind choir added.

Emanuel Bach is one of the most remarkable figures in the transitional period between J. S. Bach and Hayden. He was remarkable for his general culture in a period when elegance was regarded as the ideal, "when the potent word was taste." However, in spite of the restrictions of his age, he became such a moulder of artistic form that his works surpass those of his contemporaries. His music is shallow, but is cheerful, and not without charm.

A modern score of high repute, which is then to have its first performance in Providence, is the Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, the Fire-Bird. The music presents a fiery tale of the Russian folk. Composed in 1909, it is replete with charm and melody. Resplendent with masterful use of orchestral color, it has some of the daring but not all of the harshness of the later Stravinsky. Perhaps its true place lies somewhere between the encomia of its many admirers and this somewhat pessimistic outlook of Daniel Gregory Mason: "Anyone who tries nowadays to write more music—expressive of emotion through beauty—is more than ever a commonplace person. The person of parts are those who give it the quaint local color of folk-songs, like Percy Grainger; or who make it an agreeable accessory of dance or stage picture, like Ravel and Stravinsky, or of colored lights and perfumes, like Scriabine; or who spin it into mathematical formulae as a spider spins web, like Roger; or who use it as a vehicle for a priori intellectual theories, like Schoenberg, or as a noise for a nerve stimulant, like Leo Ornstein."

The symphony of the evening will be the first of Schumann, in B flat major, opus 38. Schuman said that he wrote this symphony "while the first breath of spring was in the air." To those on the lookout for titles this has suggested "Spring Symphony." He wrote it in the year that followed his marriage with Clara Wieck, who later served him so well as interpreter of his pianoforte works.

According to the composer's "programme," the opening phrase of the symphony, B flat major, andante, un poco Maestoso, given out by trumpets and horns and repeated and developed by the whole orchestra, is "a summons from on high to which the gentle zephyrs blowing softly to and fro respond. Everywhere the dormant forces of nature awake and make their way to the light."

Then in the Allegro "the spring comes laughing in, in the full beauty of youth." This is the significance of the introductory section, and the succeeding Alegro molto vivace, B-flat, 2-4 time. The very vital theme, full of buoyancy and fervor, is developed with great consistency. The second figure, in the nature of a contrast, makes a masterly use of the "woodwinds." The development follows, scholarly and vigorous. After "recapitulation" the movement closes with a coda.

The second movement, E-flat major, Larghetto, 3-8 time, consists of varied treatment of one theme. "This movement, so full of romantic suggestion, yet tempered by a reserve well-nigh classic, is one of Schumann's most genial conceptions, and fully justifies the assertion that of all the post-Beethoven symphonists he stands pre-eminent.

The Scherzo follows, hinted at in the close of the Larghetto. The principal theme—G-minor, molto vivace, three-quarters time—is most Schumannesque in its syncopations, offset by trios 1 and 11, the first suggesting Beethoven in the alternation of chords between "strings" and "woodwind." After the trios come the Scherzo proper and a coda.

The principal theme of the Finale—B-flat, allegro animato e grazioso alla breve—in its strength, directness, and vigor of rhythm, reflects the opening of the symphony. It fairly pulsates and scintillates with life. And with its animation it has, besides, all that grazioso suggests.

The second theme suggests Mendelssohn—with a difference.

It is said that Schumann wrote this symphony with a steel pen found on the grave of Schubert. What a theme for the sentimental writer of quasi-biography.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 19 1927

FINE CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Serge Koussvitzky at His Brilliant Best at Albee Theatre Last Evening

While the audience sat enthralled at the Albee last evening Serge Koussevitzky revelled in the bars and passages of Stravinsky's suite from "The Fire-Bird." It was Koussevitzky at his brilliant best, the forceful, vigorous Koussevitzky, threatening, entreating, now appearing to thrust and jab and punch the color and flame of the Russian dance legend from his assembled artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And the orchestra was willing under the lash of its conductor's imperious will.

Perhaps the most effective passage of the suite as presented by Koussevitzky last evening was "The Infernal Dance of Katschi's Subjects." With the audience swaying back and forth in their seats as Ivan swings the magic egg to and fro, finally to crash it to the ground. Koussevitzky interpreted the crash as Koussevitzky would, much to the consternation of some who had succumbed to the swaying rythym and were dozing in their seats.

The program last evening opened with Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, in B minor, which was substituted for Bach's Concerto in D major. Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, the "Spring Symphony," was selected to close the program. Even though it followed the vivid musical picture of "The Fire-Bird," those who heard it were able to readjust themselves to catch something of the plaintive longing for the coming of spring which Schumann felt when he composed the opening movement.

The program:

Handel...Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12.
Largo—Allegro—Larghetto e piano—Largo—Allegro.

Stravinsky...Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Fire-Bird"), A Danced Legend.
a. Introduction; Katschei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird.
b. Supplication of the Fire-Bird.
c. The Princesses Play with the Golden Apples.
d. Dance of the Princesses.
e. Infernal Dance of all the Subjects of Katschei.

Schumann..Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38.
1. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 19 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A program of exceeding brilliance, which represents the foremost achievements of symphonic music, has been made by Serge Koussevitzky for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians, to Hartford, in the Capitol theater, Sunday afternoon, February 6, at 3 o'clock.

The Russian conductor is now in his third season in America and at the head of this famous orchestra. Once the foremost figure in the orchestral concerts of Russia and later in Paris, London and western Europe, this leader has likewise succeeded in America in no uncertain fashion. His brilliant and magnetic personality, his intense artistic vision and sincerity, his exacting command as a leader have all made their impress upon the performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra. This organization, long known as one of the very finest in the world, has in general opinion never sounded more eloquent than under Koussevitzky's direction. The principal number on the program will be Beethoven's Third Symphony, "Eroica." Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra plan to observe the centennial anniversary of the master's death next spring with a series of performances of his principal works.

Seats are now selling at McCoy's Music store, Asylum street. Reservations may be made through Manager Frank Sedgwick, 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 19 1927

Boston Symphony

Last evening at the Albee Theatre, under the wand of Serge Koussevitsky, Stravinsky's opportunity came to let his light shine, and the naughty playboy made quite an illumination. Long ago he had scrapped Debussy's clouds and impressions and reflections, and had cast the fragments out on the junk pile in his Corybantian back yard; and had made the Debussy dreamland and the French Impressionism look like a Cloud-Cuckoo Town left all topsy-turvy by the winged Hound of Heaven.

He was introduced by Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, in B minor, No. 12; for, not to dull the edge of expectancy, Mr. Koussevitsky substituted this number for the Emanuel Bach concerto, which appeared in the programme. The first movement of this concerto was interesting from the point of view of a string quartet played by the principals of the string choirs, interrupted at regular intervals by rather gruff comment from the entire string orchestra. In this movement the basses seemed at times heavy enough to spoil the fine effect of a perfect balance in the ensemble. The simplicity of the whole work and the vivid melody of the Allegro offered just the right material to set against the startling contrast that followed.

Glory be to the Fire-Bird, if not honor It gave poor Handel quite a shock—tore his lace and tousled his wig; and cast obloquy likewise on Schumann, the distiller of spring perfumes, because he did not use the right sort of atomizer And moreover it revealed the richness of its own panoply—the audacity of the woodwind, the ravishing note of the reeds, the heartthrob of the strings, and the frigid incisiveness of the harp. The princesses playing with apples in the garden were not unlike Greek princesses playing ball on the seashore, but the music of their dance brought slight inspiration. On the other hand, the Infernal Dance was quite engaging. There the Russian seems at his best. But his demons were rather dainty and unterrifying—nothing to frighten Heracles nor even Dionysius. But the piece as a whole is by no means an antidote for tense nerves. It tends to make one feel like

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
JAN 19 1927

82 usual manner.

Symphony Pleases Audience at Albee

Koussevitzky's penchant for the modern in music was demonstrated at the Albee Theatre last night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under his masterly direction, presented "The Fire Bird," a suite from a composition by Stravinsky.

The instrumentation was faultless, but the melody was not comparable with that of the first number, Handel's "Concerto Grosso in B minor." An Oriental influence pervades this work, a Russian folk tale set to music and the result was bizarre to an Occidental. By a long stretch of the imagination one could conceive of Princesses playing in an enchanted garden but the music was not of the spirited dance tempo which one generally associates with fairies of terpsichore. The final movement, "The Infernal Dance," of the lackeys of the Russian Cetibos, was not at all infernal, for its awe inspiring qualities faded under the glare of the arc lights.

Handel's Concerto was a pleasing introduction to the programme. Opening with a movement in which the principals of the string groups engaged in some pleasing instrumentations, it was interpolated by the deeper strings, which at times threatened to exclude the more lighter passages. The selection which was substituted for the Concerto in D major by Bach was a pleasing exchange.

The orchestra was at its best in Schumann's Symphony in B flat major. The heavy and drawn passages which have come to be accepted as parts of many symphonies are in this supplanted to a major degree by the lyrical tones which permeate the symphony and carry it, to a degree, from the beaten path of symphonies. It has a peculiar charm, all its own, and was capably interpreted by Koussevitsky and his musicians.

THIS CLIPPING FROM EVERY EVENING
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 19 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE JANUARY 31

The preliminary seat sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will make its first appearance in Wilmington in The Shubert Playhouse on the evening of January 31, under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association, is under direction of Mrs. William N. Bannard, who will continue to take orders until the tickets are placed on sale at the box office a few days before the concert.

The interest which the forthcoming engagement has aroused occasions no surprise. The Delaware Musical Association officials say that in booking the Boston Symphony Orchestra they have secured the finest attraction it has thus far been able to offer the association's friends and patrons.

The Boston Symphony combines a force of 108 musicians, each of whom is a trained and accomplished artist, with a leader whose record is one of outstanding achievement. This is Serge Koussevitzky, who had been its director since 1924. Born in 1874 in Tver, North Russia, he became a conductor at the age of 12.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 19 1927

Boston Symphony

"Prokofieff's opera, from which his Suite is derived, is based on Gozzi's satirical fairy play, which might well excite the imagination of any composer. "This is the comment of Philip Hale in the "Boston Herald."

"A remarkable man this Serge Prokofieff, to us the most original, the most imaginative, and the best equipped composer now creating music. With the hearing of each work by him our admiration for him waxes stronger.

"There is no need in this instance of restating the old saw: 'This music is for the stage and suffers when it is transferred to the concert hall,' for the movements are interesting, yes, delightful, as absolute music. One feels throughout the suite the honesty of Prokofieff. Thus he thought; so he expressed himself; and how well it!"

This suite will be played with Boston Symphony appears Feb at the Capitol Theater. Seats ing at McCoy's. Reservations, Frank A. Sedgwick, management

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 20 1927

Boston Symphony

Two eminent names joined together for one purpose when Serge Koussevitzky came to America and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924. The fact that a conductor about whom almost incredible reports were heard from Europe was to direct one of the finest and oldest orchestras in the world, put our public in a state of expectancy.

Two seasons of Boston Symphony concerts under Koussevitzky's leadership have exceeded the most sanguine expectations. The hundred and eight musicians respond as a single, rare instrument to Koussevitzky's slightest gesture. In a word, it continues to be the orchestra whose name is traditionally associated with perfection in symphonic performance.

Even before Koussevitzky first arrived in America, all places for the Boston Symphony concerts were taken for the season. There are now waiting lists for each series in Boston, New York, and elsewhere. The coming concert here offers an opportunity which is not available to non-subscribers in the orchestra's own city.

Seats now selling at McCoy's for the Hartford concert February 6. Phone for reservations 2-2251 Management Frank A. Sedgwick.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 20 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Two eminent names joined together for one purpose when Serge Koussevitzky came to America and the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1924. The fact that a conductor about whom almost incredible reports were heard from Europe was to direct one of the finest and oldest orchestras in the world, put our public in a state of expectancy.

Two seasons of Boston Symphony concerts under Koussevitzky's leadership have exceeded the most sanguine expectations. When the great orchestra begins to play, there is evidence in every bar of the exacting, yet persuasive hand of the born commander. The hundred and eight musicians respond as a single, rare instrument to Koussevitzky's slightest gesture. In a word, it continues to be the orchestra whose name is traditionally associated with perfection in symphonic performance.

Seats are now selling at McCoy's for the Hartford concert on February 6, Phone for reservations, 2-2251, Frank A. Sedgwick, manager.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

82

In addition to the mighty "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, which will occupy half of the program, and the suite in the modern vein of Prokofieff from his opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," Mr. Koussevitzky will perform three other numbers from Germany, France and Finland, respectively —Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin," Debussy's Nocturne, "Fetes," and Sibelius' "Finlandia.' Each of these is considered to have a particularly fine and eloquent performance at the hands of Koussevitzky. Debussys Nocturnes, "Fetes"

("Festivals"), distinctly reveals this master as an impressionist painter, and the fact that he painted in tones instead of in pigments, makes the classification all the more striking. It is in the nature of a professional and is more brilliant and outspoken than the Debussy one usually meets.

The seat sale is now in progress at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Reservations may be made through Frank A. Sedgwick, 'phone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 17 1927

SYMPHONY TO GIVE CONCERTO BY BACH

Boston Orchestra Will Appear Here To-morrow Night in the Albee.

KOUSSEVITZKY TO CONDUCT

Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, Also on Programme, Will Have First Performance in Providence

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will take place at 8:15 o'clock to-morrow night, in the Albee Theatre. The Russian conductor will then present a concerto by Philip Emanuel Bach, son of Johann Sebastian Bach, which Maximilian Steinberg has rescored for string orchestra with a small wind choir added.

Emanuel Bach is one of the most remarkable figures in the transitional period between J. S. Bach and Hayden. He was remarkable for his general culture in a period when elegance was regarded as the ideal, "when the potent word was taste." However, in spite of the restrictions of his age, he became such a moulder of artistic form that his works surpass those of his contemporaries. His music is shallow, but is cheerful, and not without charm.

A modern score of high repute, which is then to have its first performance in Providence, is the Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, the Fire-Bird. The music presents a fiery tale of the Russian folk. Composed in 1909, it is replete with charm and melody. Resplendent with masterful use of orchestral color, it has some of the daring but not all of the harshness of the later Stravinsky. Perhaps its true place lies somewhere between the encomia of its many admirers and this somewhat pessimistic outlook of Daniel Gregory Mason: "Anyone who tries nowadays to write more music—expressive of emotion through beauty—is more than ever a commonplace person. The person of parts are those who give it the quaint local color of folk-songs, like Percy Grainger; or who make it an agreeable accessory of dance or stage picture, like Ravel and Stravinsky, or of colored lights and perfumes, like Scriabine; or who spin it into mathematical formulae as a spider spins web, like Roger; or who use it as a vehicle for a priori intellectual theories, like Schoenberg, or as a noise for a nerve stimulant, like Leo Ornstein."

The symphony of the evening will be the first of Schumann, in B flat major, opus 38. Schuman said that he wrote this symphony "while the first breath of spring was in the air." To those on the lookout for titles this has suggested "Spring Symphony." He wrote it in the year that followed his marriage with Clara Wieck, who later served him so well as interpreter of his pianoforte works.

According to the composer's "programme," the opening phrase of the symphony, B flat major, andante, un poco Maestoso, given out by trumpets and horns and repeated and developed by the whole orchestra, is "a summons from on high to which the gentle zephyrs blowing softly to and fro respond. Everywhere the dormant forces of nature awake and make their way to the light."

Then in the Allegro "the spring comes laughing in, in the full beauty of youth." This is the significance of the introductory section, and the succeeding Alegro molto vivace, B-flat, 2-4 time. The very vital theme, full of buoyancy and fervor, is developed with great consistency. The second figure, in the nature of a contrast, makes a masterly use of the "woodwinds." The development follows, scholarly and vigorous. After "recapitulation" the movement closes with a coda.

The second movement, E-flat major, Larghetto, 3-8 time, consists of varied treatment of one theme. "This movement, so full of romantic suggestion, yet tempered by a reserve well-nigh classic, is one of Schumann's most genial conceptions, and fully justifies the assertion that of all the post-Beethoven symphonists he stands pre-eminent, closes of the Larghetto. The principal theme—G-minor, molto vivace, three-quarters time—is most Schumannesque in its syncopations, offset by trios 1 and 11, the first suggesting Beethoven in the alternation of chords between "strings" and "woodwind." After the trios come the Scherzo proper and a coda.

The principal theme of the Finale—B-flat, allegro animato e grazioso alla breve—in its strength, directness, and vigor of rhythm, reflects the opening of the symphony. It fairly pulsates and scintillates with life. And with its animation it has, besides, all that grazioso suggests.

The second theme suggests Mendelssohn—with a difference.

It is said that Schumann wrote this symphony with a steel pen found on the grave of Schubert. What a theme for the sentimental writer of quasi-biography.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 17 1927

SYMPHONY TO GIVE CONCERT BY BACH TO-MORROW NIGHT

Boston Orchestra Will Appear at Albee Theatre.—Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet on Programme.—Koussevitzky to Be Conductor.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will take place at 8:15 o'clock to-morrow night, in the Albee Theatre. The Russian conductor will then present a concerto by Philip Emanuel Bach, son of Johann Sebastian Bach, which Maximilian Steinberg has rescored for string orchestra with a small wind choir added.

Emanuel Bach is one of the most remarkable figures in the transitional period between J. S. Bach and Hayden. He was remarkable for his general culture in a period when elegance was regarded as the ideal, "when the potent word was taste." However, in spite of the restrictions of his age, he became such a moulder of artistic form that his works surpass those of his contemporaries. His music is shallow, but is cheerful, and not without charm.

A modern score of high repute, which is then to have its first performance in Providence, is the Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, the Fire-Bird. The music presents a fiery tale of the Russian folk. Composed in 1909, it is replete with charm and melody. Resplendent with masterful use of orchestral color, it has some of the daring but not all of the harshness of the later Stravinsky. Perhaps its true place lies somewhere between the encomia of its many admirers and this somewhat pessimistic outlook of Daniel Gregory Mason: "Anyone who tries nowadays to write more music—expressive of emotion through beauty—is more than ever a commonplace person. The person of parts are those who give it the quaint local color of folk-songs, like Percy Grainger; or who make it an agreeable accessory of dance or stage picture, like Ravel and Stravinsky, or of colored lights and perfumes, like Scriabine; or who spin it into mathematical formulae as a spider spins web, like Roger; or who use it as a vehicle for a priori intellectual theories, like Schoenberg, or as a noise for a nerve stimulant, like Leo Ornstein."

The symphony of the evening will be the first of Schumann, in B flat major, opus 38. Schuman said that he wrote this symphony "while the first breath of spring was in the air." To those on the lookout for titles this has suggested "Spring Symphony." He wrote it in the year that followed his marriage with Clara Wieck, who later served him so well as interpreter of his pianoforte works.

According to the composer's "programme," the opening phrase of the symphony, B flat major, andante, un poco Maestoso, given out by trumpets and horns and repeated and developed by the whole orchestra, is "a summons from on high to which the gentle zephyrs blowing softly to and fro respond. Everywhere the dormant forces of nature awake and make their way to the light."

Then in the Allegro "the spring comes laughing in, in the full beauty of youth." This is the significance of the introductory section, and the succeeding Alegro molto vivace, B-flat, 2-4 time. The very vital theme, full of buoyancy and fervor, is developed with great consistency. The second figure, in the nature of a contrast, makes a masterly use of the "woodwinds." The development follows, scholarly and vigorous. After "recapitulation" the movement closes with a coda.

The second movement, E-flat major, Larghetto, 3-8 time, consists of varied treatment of one theme. "This movement, so full of romantic suggestion, yet tempered by a reserve well-nigh classic, is one of Schumann's most genial conceptions, and fully justifies the assertion that of all the post-Beethoven symphonists he stands pre-eminent.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 19 1927

FINE CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Serge Koussvitzky at His Brilliant Best at Albee Theatre Last Evening

While the audience sat enthralled at the Albee last evening Serge Koussevitzky revelled in the bars and passages of Stravinsky's suite from "The Fire-Bird." It was Koussevitzky at his brilliant best, the forceful, vigorous Koussevitzky, threatening, entreating, now appearing to thrust and jab and punch the color and flame of the Russian dance legend from his assembled artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And the orchestra was willing under the lash of its conductor's imperious will.

Perhaps the most effective passage of the suite as presented by Koussevitzky last evening was "The Infernal Dance of Katschi's Subjects." With the audience swaying back and forth in their seats as Ivan swings the magic egg to and fro, finally to crash it to the ground. Koussevitzky interpreted the crash as Koussevitzky would, much to the consternation of some who had succumbed to the swaying rythym and were dozing in their seats.

The program last evening opened with Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, in B minor, which was substituted for Bach's Concerto in D major. Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, the "Spring Symphony," was selected to close the program. Even though it followed the vivid musical picture of "The Fire-Bird," those who heard it were able to readjust themselves to catch something of the plaintive longing for the coming of spring which Schumann felt when he composed the opening movement.

The program:

Handel...Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12.
Largo—Allegro—Larghetto e piano—Largo—Allegro.

Stravinsky...Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Fire-Bird"), A Danced Legend.
a. Introduction; Katschei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird.
b. Supplication of the Fire-Bird.
c. The Princesses Play with the Golden Apples.
d. Dance of the Princesses.
e. Infernal Dance of all the Subjects of Katschei.

Schumann..Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38.
1. Andante un poco maestoso; Al-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 19 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A program of exceeding brilliance, which represents the foremost achievements of symphonic music, has been made by Serge Koussevitzky for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra of 108 musicians, to Hartford, in the Capitol theater, Sunday afternoon, February 6, at 3 o'clock.

The Russian conductor is now in his third season in America and at the head of this famous orchestra. Once the foremost figure in the orchestral concerts of Russia and later in Paris, London and western Europe, this leader has likewise succeeded in America in no uncertain fashion. His brilliant and magnetic personality, his intense artistic vision and sincerity, his exacting command as a leader have all made their impress upon the performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra. This organization, long known as one of the very finest in the world, has in general opinion never sounded more eloquent than under Koussevitzky's direction. The principal number on the program will be Beethoven's Third Symphony, "Eroica." Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra plan to observe the centennial anniversary of the master's death next spring with a series of performances of his principal works.

Seats are now selling at McCoy's Music store, Asylum street. Reservations may be made through Manager Frank Sedgwick, 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 19 1927

Boston Symphony

Last evening at the Albee Theatre, under the wand of Serge Koussevitsky, Stravinsky's opportunity came to let his light shine, and the naughty playboy made quite an illumination. Long ago he had scrapped Debussy's clouds and impressions and reflections, and had cast the fragments out on the junk pile in his Corybantian back yard; and had made the Debussy dreamland and the French Impressionism look like a Cloud-Cuckoo Town left all topsy-turvy by the winged Hound of Heaven.

He was introduced by Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, in B minor, No. 12; for, not to dull the edge of expectancy, Mr. Koussevitsky substituted this number for the Emanuel Bach concerto, which appeared in the programme. The first movement of this concerto was interesting from the point of view of a string quartet played by the principals of the string choirs, interrupted at regular intervals by rather gruff comment from the entire string orchestra. In this movement the basses seemed at times heavy enough to spoil the fine effect of a perfect balance in the ensemble. The simplicity of the whole work and the vivid melody of the Allegro offered just the right material to set against the startling contrast that followed.

Glory be to the Fire-Bird, if not honor It gave poor Handel quite a shock—tore his lace and tousled his wig; and cast obloquy likewise on Schumann, the distiller of spring perfumes, because he did not use the right sort of atomizer. And moreover it revealed the richness of its own panoply —the audacity of the woodwind, the ravishing note of the reeds, the heart-throb of the strings, and the frigid incisiveness of the harp. The princesses playing with apples in the garden were not unlike Greek princesses playing ball on the seashore, but the music of their dance brought slight inspiration. On the other hand, the Infernal Dance was quite engaging. There the Russian seems at his best. But his demons were rather dainty and unterrifying—nothing to frighten Heracles nor even Dionysius. But the piece as a whole is by no means an antidote for tense nerves. It tends to make one feel like

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
JAN 19 1927

Symphony Pleases Audience at Albee

Koussevitzky's penchant for the modern in music was demonstrated at the Albee Theatre last night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under his masterly direction, presented "The Fire Bird," a suite from a composition by Stravinsky.

The instrumentation was faultless, but the melody was not comparable with that of the first number, Handel's "Concerto Grosso in B minor." An Oriental influence pervades this work, a Russian folk tale set to music and the result was bizarre to an Occidental. By a long stretch of the imagination one could conceive of Princesses playing in an enchanted garden but the music was not of the spirited dance tempo which one generally associates with fairies of terpsichore. The final movement, "The Infernal Dance," of the lackeys of the Russian Cetibos, was not at all infernal, for its awe inspiring qualities faded under the glare of the arc lights.

Handel's Concerto was a pleasing introduction to the programme. Opening with a movement in which the principals of the string groups engaged in some pleasing instrumentations, it was interpolated by the deeper strings, which at times threatened to exclude the more lighter passages. The selection which was substituted for the Concerto in D major by Bach was a pleasing exchange.

The orchestra was at its best in Schumann's Symphony in B flat major. The heavy and drawn passages which have come to be accepted as parts of many symphonies are in this supplanted to a major degree by the lyrical tones which permeate the symphony and carry it, to a degree, from the beaten path of symphonies. It has a peculiar charm, all its own, and was capably interpreted by Koussevitsky and his musicians.

THIS CLIPPING FROM EVERY EVENING
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 19 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE JANUARY 31

The preliminary seat sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will make its first appearance in Wilmington in The Shubert Playhouse on the evening of January 31, under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association, is under direction of Mrs. William N. Bannard, who will continue to take orders until the tickets are placed on sale at the box office a few days before the concert.

The interest which the forthcoming engagement has aroused occasions no surprise. The Delaware Musical Association officials say that in booking the Boston Symphony Orchestra they have secured the finest attraction it has thus far been able to offer the association's friends and patrons.

The Boston Symphony combines a force of 108 musicians, each of whom is a trained and accomplished artist, with a leader whose record is one of outstanding achievement. This is Serge Koussevitzky, who had been its director since 1924. Born in 1874 in Tver, North Russia, he became a conductor at the age of 12.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 19 1927

Boston Symphony

"Prokofieff's opera, from which his Suite is derived, is based on Gozzi's satirical fairy play, which might well excite the imagination of any composer. "This is the comment of Philip Hale in the "Boston Herald."

"A remarkable man this Serge Prokofieff, to us the most original, the most imaginative, and the best equipped composer now creating music. With the hearing of each work by him our admiration for him waxes stronger.

"There is no need in this instance of restating the old saw: 'This music is for the stage and suffers when it is transferred to the concert hall,' for the movements are interesting, yes, delightful, as absolute music. One feels throughout the suite the honesty of Prokofieff. Thus he thought; so he expressed himself; and how well it!"

This suite will be played when Boston Symphony appears Feb at the Capitol Theater. Seats ing at McCoy's. Reservations, Frank A. Sedgwick, management

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 20 1927

Boston Symphony

Two eminent names joined together for one purpose when Serge Koussevitzky came to America and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924. The fact that a conductor about whom almost incredible reports were heard from Europe was to direct one of the finest and oldest orchestras in the world, put our public in a state of expectancy.

Two seasons of Boston Symphony concerts under Koussevitzky's leadership have exceeded the most sanguine expectations. The hundred and eight musicians respond as a single, rare instrument to Koussevitzky's slightest gesture. In a word, it continues to be the orchestra whose name is traditionally associated with perfection in symphonic performance.

Even before Koussevitzky first arrived in America, all places for the Boston Symphony concerts were taken for the season. There are now waiting lists for each series in Boston, New York, and elsewhere. The coming concert here offers an opportunity which is not available to non-subscribers in the orchestra's own city.

Seats now selling at McCoy's for the Hartford concert February 6. Phone for reservations 2-2251 Management Frank A. Sedgwick.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 20 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Two eminent names joined together for one purpose when Serge Koussevitzky came to America and the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1924. The fact that a conductor about whom almost incredible reports were heard from Europe was to direct one of the finest and oldest orchestras in the world, put our public in a state of expectancy.

Two seasons of Boston Symphony concerts under Koussevitzky's leadership have exceeded the most sanguine expectations. When the great orchestra begins to play, there is evidence in every bar of the exacting, yet persuasive hand of the born commander. The hundred and eight musicians respond as a single, rare instrument to Koussevitzky's slightest gesture. In a word, it continues to be the orchestra whose name is traditionally associated with perfection in symphonic performance.

Seats are now selling at McCoy's for Hartford concert on February 6. Phone for reservations, 2-2251, Frank A. Sedgwick, manager.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

The program of the Symphony concerts this week, as it now stands, is as follows: Handel, Grosso Concerto, B minor, No. 12; Bach, Concerto for solo violin, two flutes and strings; Suite in F major by Roussel; and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." Roussel's Suite, one of his latest works, was composed expressly for Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra. It is in three movements. Handel's Concerto has not been played at these concerts since April 8, 1905, when Mr. Gericke was the conductor. Bach's Concerto is probably unknown to the Symphony audience. It is the fourth of the Brandenburg set, and is noteworthy for the conspicuous part taken by the solo violin. To Spitta, the long-winded biographer of Bach, the slow movement, "a beautiful and grave piece, in mournful measure" seemed music for a funeral procession. This concerto was performed by the Philadelphia orchestra on Dec. 30, 31 of last year. H-R JAN 8

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 19 1927

Boston Symphony

Last evening at the Albee Theatre under the wand of Serge Koussevitsky Stravinsky's opportunity came to le his light shine, and the naughty play boy make quite an illumination. Lon ago he had scrapped Debussy's cloud and impressions and reflections, an had cast the fragments out on the junk pile in his Corybantian back yard; and had made the Debussy dreamland and the French Impression ism look like a Cloud-Cuckoo-Town left all topsy-turvy by the winged Hound of Heaven.

He was introduced by Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, in B minor, No. 12; for, not to dull the edge of expectancy, Mr. Koussevitsky substituted this number for the Emanuel Bach concerto, which appeared in the programme. The first movemen of this concerto was interesting from the point of view of a string quarte played by the principals of the strin choirs, interrupted at regular interval by rather gruff comment from the en tire string orchestra. In this move ment the basses seemed at times heav enough to spoil the fine effect of perfect balance in the ensemble. Th simplicity of the whole work and th vivid melody of the Allegro offered jus the right material to set against th startling contrast that followed.

Glory be to the Fire-Bird, if no honor. It gave poor Handel quite shock—tore his lace and tousled hi wig; and cast obloquy likewise o Schumann, the distiller of spring per fumes, because he did not use the righ sort of atomizer. And moreover it re vealed the richness of its own panopl —the audacity of the woodwind, th ravishing note of the reeds, the heart throb of the strings, and the frigid in cisiveness of the harp. The princesse playing with apples in the garden wer not unlike Greek princesses playin ball on the seashore, but the music o their dance brought slight inspiration On the other hand, the Infernal Dance was quite engaging. There the Russia seems at his best. But his demons wer rather dainty and unterrifying—nothing to frighten Heracles nor ever Dionysus. But the piece as a whol is by no means an antidote for tens nerves. It tends to make one feel lik keeping in off the streets through fea of mischief afoot or evil abroad.

Mr. Koussevitzky did full justice t Schumann's lyrical genius in his in terpretation of the symphony. In fac he made the composition sound mo like a lyrical cycle than a real sym phony. But it was delightfully playe and made clear the fact that, for the bungling orchestration that se sitive critics read into it, it has n yet outlived its day, nor lost in a wise its pecular charm.

The programme:

Handel—Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B-minor, No 12
Largo, Allegro, Larghetto e piano, Largo, Allegro.
Stravinsky—Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu ("The Fire-Bird"), a Danced Legend.
a. Introduction; Katschei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird.
b. Supplication of the Fire-Bird.
c. The Princesses Play with the Golden Apples.
d. Dance of the Princesses.
e. Infernal Dance of all the Subjects of Katschei.
Schumann—Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38.
I. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace.
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo; Molto vivace. Trio I: More piu vivace; Trio II.
IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 20 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT JAN. 31

The preliminary seat sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will make its first appearance in Wilmington at the Shubert Playhouse on the evening of January 31, under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association, is now in charge of Mrs. William N. Bannard, who will continue to take orders until the tickets are placed on sale at the box office a few days before the concert.

The interest which the forthcoming engagement has aroused [illegible] sions no surprise. The Delaware Musical Association feels that in booking the Boston Symphony it has secured the finest attraction it has thus far been able to offer its friends and patrons and that had it searched the world for something better it could not have found it.

The reason for this is that the Boston Symphony combines a force a trained and accomplished artist, of 108 musicians, each of whom is with a leader whose record is one of outstanding achievement. This leader is Serge Koussevitzky, who has been its director since 1924. Born in 1874 in Tver, the north of Russia, he became a conductor at the age of 12 and has ever since continued to advance towards that perfection which now distinguishes his work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 19 1927

-:- MUSIC -:-

The "Fire-Bird" Suite

The main attraction at the Boston Symphony concert last night—the fourth of the season—was Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" suite played for the first time in Providence but not unfamiliar to many in the audience. For Mr. Damrosch played it in New York in 1916, Mr. Stokowski in Philadelphia in 1917 and Mr. Monteux in Boston in 1919. Besides, part of it—perhaps the very loveliest part—has been available as a phonograph record for some time.

Mr. Koussevitsky lived up to our faith that he would give a notable reading of this fantastic ballet music. Rarely does he fail to excel in interpreting the music of fantasy, especially of Slavic fantasy which is the weirdest mixture of barbaric mystery and sophisticated comment we know of. Stravinsky was, we understand, a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov, but he was more than a pupil. He is, indeed, a spiritual son of the composer of "Scheherazade," carrying on and extending the oriental genius of the master in his ballet music. It is a genius that goes back to the first days of the dance when human beings sought through rhythmic movements and dramatic gestures to express the mysteries of nature or to placate the elemental gods. For all its emotional subtlety it has become a form conceived in pure intellect. Hence, we think, why that selective mind of M. Koussevitsky likes so well to play with its subtle implications. Last night it held the audience spellbound and, at least in the famous "lullaby," enchanted.

The first number on last night's program was Handel's "Concerto for Orchestra in D-major," music full of grave and reverend sentimentality characteristic of the eighteenth century, the only century which fully knew how to pose without being ridiculous. M. Koussevitzky played it with fine discrimination, giving the full, flowing melody its richest value, touching perilous things only with the fingertips and withdrawing into the conviction that beauty is born and lives only in a mood of quiet ecstasy. We rejoice that M. Koussevitzky substituted this concerto for the undistinguished concerto of the lesser Bach which he intended to play.

The concert wound up with Schumann's "Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38," a saccharine composition through which the ghosts of many pre-Schumann composers flit in and out and leave but a wreck behind. It is, however, popular; it has always been popular; it will always be popular with lovers of undisturbing things. There were long, dreary passages last night when M. Koussevitsky's baton seemed to hypnotize his players rather than to inspire them, so bored did he appear. The last movement had some life in it, to be sure, but not enough to justify the playing of this symphony in a short concert series.

But it is hard to please everybody. No doubt some people who were not equal to the challenge of Stravinsky found Schumann's symphony as satisfying as one of Ella Wheeler Wilcox's spring lyrics. That's what the spiritual content of the symphony recalls.

R. de A. J.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 21 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The New York Herald-Tribune of Sunday, January 9, comments on the new work of Jan Sibelius offered by the Boston Symphony: "The feature of yesterday's Boston Symphony matinee at Carnegie hall was the first performance in New York of the Seventh Symphony of Jan Sibelius. This symphony published in 1925 was introduced to America last spring by Mr. Stokowski, who played it in Philadelphia, but did not bring it with him on any of his visits to Carnegie hall. Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed the symphony to Boston a month ago. This symphony in its finest movements is moving and impressive music—music that is not easily forgotten. Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra played it superbly, with an eloquence which must have done full justice to the music."

The work of Jan Sibelius will be represented by Finlandia Symphonic poem, Op. 26, No. 7, in the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Capitol theater, February 6. Tickets may be secured by calling McCoy's, 2-2251. The concert is being given under the management of Frank Sedgwick.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 21 1927

Boston Symphony

A rustle and perusal of programs—a friendly discussion and exchange of views—an appreciative applause as the conductor appears on the stage—an appreciative hush as the conductor raises his baton. With one accord all eyes are focused on the leader. A faint shimmer of violins—a rise and fall of violin bows—a precise beating of padded hammers on the kettle drums—the concert has begun!

Many are fortunate enough and enabled through delightful means, to hear the Boston Symphony concerts at home. Reality! How much greater the privilege of watching the motions and interpretations of the talented musicians and their distinguished leader Mr. Sergei Koussevitzky.

A large majority of the desired locations have already been assigned and those desirous of attending the concert on February sixth should obtain their reservations promptly by calling McCoy's, 2-2251, Frank A. Sedgwick, manager.

VARIED PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Works by Bach, Handel, and Two Moderns Played

GLOBE JAN 22

Mr Koussevitzky chose a varied program for yesterday's Symphony concert. Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" was the chief number. The first part of the program included a Handel Concerto Grosso in B minor, last played here in 1905. Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto, not previously heard at these concerts and a new Suite in F by the Parisian composer, Albert Roussel, written especially for Mr Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony and performed yesterday for the first time anywhere.

Mr Koussevitzky was applauded with exceptional warmth at his first appearance yesterday, presumably because of the recent announcement that he has consented to stay as conductor for two more seasons, perhaps because Casella conducted last week.

Roussel's new suite would, if the work of a man under 30, be regarded as showing great promise, despite frequent and obvious traces of the influence of such leading contemporary composers as Stravinsky. But Roussel was born in 1869, and is thus almost 60.

The suite, unlike nearly all the many previous works of Roussel, has no program. He describes it as "pure music," with no attempt to tell a story or paint a picture. There are but three movements, entitled prelude, sarabande, and gigue. The work is scored for full modern orchestra, of the type used in Stravinsky's "Sacre." The old dance forms are obscured in the two latter movements by a conscientious rather than hilarious syncopated rhyme.

The prelude is so elaborate a polyphonic allegro that one queries the use of the title. Its style is the recently fashionable curious attempted amalgam of Bach and jazz.

Cordial Applause

One was distinctly of opinion that this suite is not a modern masterpiece, but the work of one who follows rather than leads the procession of musical history. Roussel, if he does not belong of right to the vanguard of progress, at least marches not far behind it. It is a long way from "La Ville Rose," written in 1909, to this suite, composed last year.

Mr. Koussevitsky and the orchestra spared no pains on the performance, which was cordially applauded.

The "Brandenburg Concerto" in G major, for violin, two flutes and strings, heard yesterday is an example of Bach's ability to write graceful and light-hearted music which after [illegible] still sou[illegible] fres[illegible] He from the original score. The two flutes were modern flutes, not obsolete "flute-a-bec," which seems to have been the same, roughly speaking, as the "recorder" referred to in our Elizabethan poets. The "continuo," or figured bass, which in the 18th century would have been played on a harpsichord by the conductor, was replaced yesterday by two double basses not in the original score. One assumes that since these could not of themselves supply the missing harmonies indicated by the figures some additional changes of scoring were made.

"Poem of Ecstasy"

The Handel Concerto Grosso, eloquently played as it was, did not seem one of that master's major works The slow movement has a ponderous dignified emotionalism.

Mr Koussevitzky excels in the music of Skriabin. He chose the "Poem of Ecstasy," it will be recalled, as the chief number on his very first Boston program and gave then a reading hitherto unequalled here. Yesterday's performance of this strange, tortured, baffling music, full of ejaculatory fervor, was as remarkable for eloquence, and distinguished by a higher degree of competence from the orchestra, which has improved notably in the past two seasons.

One doubts if this piece has ever been better played anywhere than it was yesterday. Yet one cannot wholeheartedly admire it or understand its full significance.

Next week Aaron Copland will play the piano part in his new concerto for its first public performance. Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," and, rather curiously, Schumann's recently played B flat major symphony are the other numbers announced. P. R.

HEARTIEST GREETING TO CONDUCTOR

Symphony Audience Warmly Cordial to Koussevitzky

POST JAN 22

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Returning to a Friday afternoon audience in Symphony Hall after an absence of two weeks, Mr. Koussevitzky was greeted yesterday with almost as much warmth as though the concert had been the first one of the season. In fact at no other time during the afternoon was there to be heard applause of like heartiness and fervor, although the concert was one of uncommon excellence.

BEAUTY OF STRING TONE

Like Mr. Casella at the concerts of last week, Mr. Koussevitzky had in hand yesterday a modern piece in ancient style, a Suite in M major by Albert Roussel, written especially for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky, and like Mr. Casella he chose to give this new-old music an 18th century setting, placing before it both a Concerto Grosso of Handel (No. 12, in B minor) and the Fourth Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra.

Hearing Handel's Concerto yesterday one could but recall Beethoven's repeated assertion that Handel was the master of masters. Beside this noble music, as colossally great in invention as it is unpretentious in form and texture, the Concerto of Bach, so far as its thematic substance is concerned, seemed almost paltry. But in Bach's piece there was for compensation the charm of color, created by the two flutes and the handful of strings, and also the perfection of the performance. And, for the matter of that, is there any other orchestra in the world today whose string choir, even with a Koussevitzky to guide and inspire it, could have played the music of Handel with such mingled richness and vitality of tone, such depth and breadth of expression?

In Casella's Favor

As was indicated above, Roussel's new Suite, like Mr. Casella's Partita, aims at a union of the older style of composition and the newer musical formulas. Comparisons are, of course, odious although sometimes unavoidable; but of the two men the Italian seems to have done the sounder, the more convincing job.

Of the three movements that make Roussel's suite, the Prelude is marked by a certain strength of sinews, not of lungs; the Sarabande by the same strength plus no small degree of musical beauty; while the Gigue is essentially cheerful and invigorating. In short, a music ably made but smacking more of contrivance than of inner compulsion.

"Poem of Ecstasy"

It was with Scriabin's gorgeous-toned, superbly sensuous "Poem of Ecstasy," relatively inarticulate in Symphony Hall until Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed its true voice, its full possibilities, that the conductor closed his [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORKER
JAN 22 1927

THE "BACK TO BACH" movement has been responsible for many oddities, of which one of the oddest is the De Falla concerto for harpsichord and a fistful of instruments, produced here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the miraculous Wanda Landowska playing the harpsichord score. De Falla has done many charming things, but his new concerto is exempt from that classification. The orchestration for the miniature band is so thick that the harpsichord emerges only at intervals, and most of the intervals are disagreeable.

The twisting of Spanish folk rhythms into modernist patterns is a pointless bit of near-cleverness. The best commentary on the work was the ensuing Mozart rondo for harpsichord and orchestra. Mozart is still the best living composer for this combination.

SIBELIUS' competition with Beethoven as the most played composer of the year continues vigorously. The Northman's seventh symphony was performed within a week by the Boston Symphony under Mr. Koussevitzky and the New York Symphony under Mr. Klemperer, the latter performance coming too late for comment in this issue. Sibelius is the grimmest of composers, although his grimness is not of the literary variety. His music rarely makes any sensuous passes at the ear and most of it is a tremendously skillful projection of a somber mood. It is not captivating stuff at a first hearing, but it wears well, and when one becomes accustomed to the Sibelius idiom one discovers a strange underlying tender-ness

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
JAN 22 1927

KOUSSEVITZKY RETURNS

Directs Boston Symphony Orchestra Tonight, WJZ Broadcasting.

Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has returned to Boston and will conduct the thirteenth concert of the orchestra, which will be broadcast tonight from Symphony Hall in Boston.

Handel and Bach hold the feature position on the musical bill. In addition, the orchestra will be heard in a suite by Roussel, which is of more modern construction, and "The Poem of Ecstasy" by Scriabin, which was written about 20 years ago, before the new movement of ultra-modernism in musical composition became recognized.

Just prior to the opening of the program, Professor John Patten Marshall, head of the music department of the Boston University and Holy Cross College, will discuss the Concerto Grosso of Handel, which is in the form of a dialogue between a number of the solo instruments and the string orchestra. His remarks will also include the Bach Fourth Brandenburg Concerto, one of a set of works written especially for the Margrave of Brandenburg in 1721. This number provides a particularly favorable [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 22 1927

Boston Symphony

Much will happen, musically speaking, at the coming concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its famous Russian conductor, Sergei Koussevitzky, in the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, February 6, at 3 o'clock.

In addition to the mighty "Eroica Symphony" of Beethoven, which will occupy half of the program, and the Suite in the modern vein of Prokolieff from his opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," Mr. Koussevitzky will perform three other numbers from Germany, France and Finland, respectively. The new work of Jan Sibelius will be represented by Finlandia Symphonic Poem, Op. 26, No. 7.

This symphony in its finest moments is moving and impressive, music that is not easily forgotten. Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra play it superbly and with an interpretation which does full justice to the music.

Reservations for the concert may be obtained by calling Frank Sedgwick of McCoy's, 89 Asylum street, 2-2251.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

The program of the Symphony concerts this week, as it now stands, is as follows: Handel, Grosso Concerto, B minor, No. 12; Bach, Concerto for solo violin, two flutes and strings; Suite in F major by Roussel; and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." Roussel's Suite, one of his latest works, was composed expressly for Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra. It is in three movements. Handel's Concerto has not been played at these concerts since April 8, 1905, when Mr. Gericke was the conductor. Bach's Concerto is probably unknown to the Symphony audience. It is the fourth of the Brandenburg set, and is noteworthy for the conspicuous part taken by the solo violin. To Spitta, the long-winded biographer of Bach, the slow movement, "a beautiful and grave piece, in mournful measure" seemed music for a funeral procession. This concerto was performed by the Philadelphia orchestra on Dec. 30, 31 of last year. #ER JAN 20

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 19 1927

Boston Symphony

Last evening at the Albee Theatre under the wand of Serge Koussevitsky Stravinsky's opportunity came to let his light shine, and the naughty playboy make quite an illumination. Long ago he had scrapped Debussy's clouds and impressions and reflections, and had cast the fragments out on the junk pile in his Corybantian backyard; and had made the Debussy dreamland and the French Impressionism look like a Cloud-Cuckoo-Town left all topsy-turvy by the winged Hound of Heaven.

He was introduced by Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, in B minor, No. 12; for, not to dull the edge of expectancy, Mr. Koussevitsky substituted this number for the Emanuel Bach concerto, which appeared in the programme. The first movement of this concerto was interesting from the point of view of a string quartet played by the principals of the string choirs, interrupted at regular intervals by rather gruff comment from the entire string orchestra. In this movement the basses seemed at times heavy enough to spoil the fine effect of perfect balance in the ensemble. The simplicity of the whole work and the vivid melody of the Allegro offered just the right material to set against the startling contrast that followed.

Glory be to the Fire-Bird, if no honor. It gave poor Handel quite a shock—tore his lace and tousled his wig; and cast obloquy likewise on Schumann, the distiller of spring perfumes, because he did not use the right sort of atomizer. And moreover it revealed the richness of its own panoply—the audacity of the woodwind, the ravishing note of the reeds, the heart throb of the strings, and the frigid incisiveness of the harp. The princesses playing with apples in the garden were not unlike Greek princesses playing ball on the seashore, but the music of their dance brought slight inspiration. On the other hand, the Infernal Dance was quite engaging. There the Russian seems at his best. But his demons were rather dainty and unterrifying—nothing to frighten Heracles nor even Dionysus. But the piece as a whole is by no means an antidote for tense nerves. It tends to make one feel like keeping in off the streets through fear of mischief afoot or evil abroad.

Mr. Koussevitzky did full justice to Schumann's lyrical genius in his interpretation of the symphony. In fact he made the composition sound more like a lyrical cycle than a real symphony. But it was delightfully played and made clear the fact that, for all the bungling orchestration that sensitive critics read into it, it has not yet outlived its day, nor lost in a wise its pecular charm.

The programme:

Handel—Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B-minor, No 12
Largo, Allegro, Larghetto e piano, Lai Allegro.
Stravinsky—Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu ("The Fire-Bird"), a Danced Legend.
a. Introduction; Katschei's Enchai Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird.
b. Supplication of the Fire-Bird.
c. The Princesses Play with the Gol Apples.
d. Dance of the Princesses.
e. Infernal Dance of all the Subjects Katschei.
Schumann—Symphony in B-flat majo No. 1, Op. 38.
I. Andante un poco maestoso; Alle molto vivace.
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo; Molto vivace. Trio I: M piu vivace; Trio II.
IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

M. C. W

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 20 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT JAN. 31

The preliminary seat sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will make its first appearance in Wilmington at the Shubert Playhouse on the evening of January 31, under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association, is now in charge of Mrs. William N. Bannard, who will continue to take orders until the tickets are placed on sale at the box office a few days before the concert.

The interest which the forthcoming engagement has aroused [illegible] sions no surprise. The Delaware Musical Association feels that in booking the Boston Symphony it has secured the finest attraction it has thus far been able to offer its friends and patrons and that had it searched the world for something better it could not have found it.

The reason for this is that the Boston Symphony combines a force a trained and accomplished artist, of 108 musicians, each of whom is with a leader whose record is one of outstanding achievement. This leader is Serge Koussevitzky, who has been its director since 1924. Born in 1874 in Tver, the north of Russia, he became a conductor at the age of 12 and has ever since continued to advance towards that perfection which now distinguishes his work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 19 1927

-:- MUSIC -:-

The "Fire-Bird" Suite

The main attraction at the Boston Symphony concert last night—the fourth of the season—was Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" suite played for the first time in Providence but not unfamiliar to many in the audience. For Mr. Damrosch played it in New York in 1916, Mr. Stokowski in Philadelphia in 1917 and Mr. Monteux in Boston in 1919. Besides, part of it—perhaps the very loveliest part—has been available as a phonograph record for some time.

Mr. Koussevitsky lived up to our faith that he would give a notable reading of this fantastic ballet music. Rarely does he fail to excel in interpreting the music of fantasy, especially of Slavic fantasy which is the weirdest mixture of barbaric mystery and sophisticated comment we know of. Stravinsky was, we understand, a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov, but he was more than a pupil. He is, indeed, a spiritual son of the composer of "Scheherazade," carrying on and extending the oriental genius of the master in his ballet music. It is a genius that goes back to the first days of the dance when human beings sought through rhythmic movements and dramatic gestures to express the mysteries of nature or to placate the elemental gods. For all its emotional subtlety it has become a form conceived in pure intellect. Hence, we think, why that selective mind of M. Koussevitsky likes so well to play with its subtle implications. Last night it held the audience spellbound and, at least in the famous "lullaby," enchanted.

The first number on last night's program was Handel's "Concerto for Orchestra in D-major," music full of grave and reverend sentimentality characteristic of the eighteenth century, the only century which fully knew how to pose without being ridiculous. M. Koussevitzky played it with fine discrimination, giving the full, flowing melody its richest value, touching perilous things only with the fingertips and withdrawing into the conviction that beauty is born and lives only in a mood of quiet ecstasy. We rejoice that M. Koussevitzky substituted this concerto for the undistinguished concerto of the lesser Bach which he intended to play.

The concert wound up with Schumann's "Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38," a saccharine composition through which the ghosts of many pre-Schumann composers flit in and out and leave but a wreck behind. It is, however, popular; it has always been popular; it will always be popular with lovers of undisturbing things. There were long, dreary passages last night when M. Koussevitzky's baton seemed to hypnotize his players rather than to inspire them, so bored did he appear. The last movement had some life in it, to be sure, but not enough to justify the playing of this symphony in a short concert series.

But it is hard to please everybody. No doubt some people who were not equal to the challenge of Stravinsky found Schumann's symphony as satisfying as one of Ella Wheeler Wilcox's spring lyrics. That's what the spiritual content of the symphony recalls.

R. de A. J.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 21 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The New York Herald-Tribune of Sunday, January 9, comments on the new work of Jan Sibelius offered by the Boston Symphony: "The feature of yesterday's Boston Symphony matinee at Carnegia hall was the first performance in New York of the Seventh Symphony of Jan Sibelius. This symphony published in 1925 was introduced to America last spring by Mr. Stokowski, who played it in Philadelphia, but did not bring it with him on any of his visits to Carnegie hall. Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed the symphony to Boston a month ago. This symphony in its finest movements is moving and impressive music—music that is not easily forgotten. Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra played it superbly, with an eloquence which must have done full justice to the music.'

The work of Jan Sibelius will be represented by Finlandia Symphonic poem, Op. 26, No. 7, in the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Capitol theater, February 6. Tickets may be secured by calling McCoy's, 2-2251. The concert is being given under the management of Frank Sedgwick.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 21 1927

Boston Symphony

A rustle and perusal of programs—a friendly discussion and exchange of views—an appreciative applause as the conductor appears on the stage—an appreciative hush as the conductor raises his baton. With one accord all eyes are focused on the leader. A faint shimmer of violins—a rise and fall of violin bows—a precise beating of padded hammers on the kettle drums—the concert has begun!

Many are fortunate enough and enabled through delightful means, to hear the Boston Symphony concerts at home. Reality! How much greater the privilege of watching the motions and interpretations of the talented musicians and their distinguished leader, Mr. Sergei Koussevitzky.

A large majority of the desired locations have already been assigned and those desirous of attending the concert on February sixth should obtain their reservations promptly by calling McCoy's, 2-2251, Frank A. Sedgwick, manager.

VARIED PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Works by Bach, Handel, and Two Moderns Played

GLOBE JAN22

Mr Koussevitzky chose a varied program for yesterday's Symphony concert. Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" was the chief number. The first part of the program included a Handel Concerto Grosso in B minor, last played here in 1905. Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto, not previously heard at these concerts and a new Suite in F by the Parisian composer, Albert Roussel, written especially for Mr Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony and performed yesterday for the first time anywhere.

Mr Koussevitzky was applauded with exceptional warmth at his first appearance yesterday, presumably because of the recent announcement that he has consented to stay as conductor for two more seasons, perhaps because Casella conducted last week.

Roussel's new suite would, if the work of a man under 30, be regarded as showing great promise, despite frequent and obvious traces of the influence of such leading contemporary composers as Stravinsky. But Roussel was born in 1869, and is thus almost 60.

The suite, unlike nearly all the many previous works of Roussel, has no program. He describes it as "pure music," with no attempt to tell a story or paint a picture. There are but three movements, entitled prelude, sarabande, and gigue. The work is scored for full modern orchestra, of the type used in Stravinsky's "Sacre." The old dance forms are obscured in the two latter movements by a conscientious rather than hilarious syncopated rhyme.

The prelude is so elaborate a polyphonic allegro that one queries the use of the title. Its style is the recently fashionable curious attempted amalgam of Bach and jazz.

Cordial Applause

One was distinctly of opinion that this suite is not a modern masterpiece, but the work of one who follows rather than leads the procession of musical history. Roussel, if he does not belong of right to the vanguard of progress, at least marches not far behind it. It is a long way from "La Ville Rose," written in 1909, to this suite, composed last year.

Mr Koussevitsky and the orchestra spared no pains on the performance, which was cordially applauded.

The "Brandenburg Concerto" in G major, for violin, two flutes and strings, heard yesterday is an example of Bach's ability to write graceful and light-hearted music which after [illegible] still [illegible] fresh. He [illegible] from the original score. The two flutes were modern flutes, not obsolete "flute-a-bec," which seems to have been the same, roughly speaking, as the "recorder" referred to in our Elizabethan poets. The "continuo," or figured bass, which in the 18th century would have been played on a harpsichord by the conductor, was replaced yesterday by two double basses not in the original score. One assumes that since these could not of themselves supply the missing harmonies indicated by the figures some additional changes of scoring were made.

"Poem of Ecstasy"

The Handel Concerto Grosso, eloquently played as it was, did not seem one of that master's major works. The slow movement has a ponderous dignified emotionalism.

Mr Koussevitzky excels in the music of Skriabin. He chose the "Poem of Ecstasy," it will be recalled, as the chief number on his very first Boston program and gave then a reading hitherto unequalled here. Yesterday's performance of this strange, tortured, baffling music, full of ejaculatory fervor, was as remarkable for eloquence, and distinguished by a higher degree of competence from the orchestra, which has improved notably in the past two seasons.

One doubts if this piece has ever been better played anywhere than it was yesterday. Yet one cannot wholeheartedly admire it or understand its full significance.

Next week Aaron Copland will play the piano part in his new concerto for its first public performance. Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," and, rather curiously, Schumann's recently played B flat major symphony are the other numbers announced. P. R.

HEARTIEST GREETING TO CONDUCTOR

Symphony Audience Warmly Cordial to Koussevitzky

POST JAN 22

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Returning to a Friday afternoon audience in Symphony Hall after an absence of two weeks, Mr. Koussevitzky was greeted yesterday with almost as much warmth as though the concert had been the first one of the season. In fact at no other time during the afternoon was there to be heard applause of like heartiness and fervor, although the concert was one of uncommon excellence.

BEAUTY OF STRING TONE

Like Mr. Casella at the concerts of last week, Mr. Koussevitzky had in hand yesterday a modern piece in ancient style, a Suite in M major by Albert Roussel, written especially for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky, and like Mr. Casella he chose to give this new-old music an 18th century setting, placing before it both a Concerto Grosso of Handel (No. 12, in B minor) and the Fourth Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra.

Hearing Handel's Concerto yesterday one could but recall Beethoven's repeated assertion that Handel was the master of masters. Beside this noble music, as colossally great in invention as it is unpretentious in form and texture, the Concerto of Bach, so far as its thematic substance is concerned, seemed almost paltry. But in Bach's piece there was for compensation the charm of color, created by the two flutes and the handful of strings, and also the perfection of the performance. And, for the matter of that, is there any other orchestra in the world today whose string choir, even with a Koussevitzky to guide and inspire it, could have played the music of Handel with such mingled richness and vitality of tone, such depth and breadth of expression?

In Casella's Favor

As was indicated above, Roussel's new Suite, like Mr. Casella's Partita, aims at a union of the older style of composition and the newer musical formulas. Comparisons are, of course, odious although sometimes unavoidable; but of the two men the Italian seems to have done the sounder, the more convincing job.

Of the three movements that make Roussel's suite, the Prelude is marked by a certain strength of sinews, not of lungs; the Sarabande by the same strength plus no small degree of musical beauty; while the Gigue is essentially cheerful and invigorating. In short, a music ably made, but smacking more of contrivance than of inner compulsion.

"Poem of Ecstasy"

It was with Scriabin's gorgeous-toned, superbly sensuous "Poem of Ecstasy," relatively inarticulate in Symphony Hall until Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed its true voice, its full possibilities, that the conductor closed his

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORKER
JAN 22 1927

THE "BACK TO BACH" movement has been responsible for many oddities, of which one of the oddest is the De Falla concerto for harpsichord and a fistful of instruments, produced here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the miraculous Wanda Landowska playing the harpsichord score. De Falla has done many charming things, but his new concerto is exempt from that classification. The orchestration for the miniature band is so thick that the harpsichord emerges only at intervals, and most of the intervals are disagreeable.

The twisting of [illegible] folk rhythms into modernist patterns is a pointless [illegible] business. The best commentary on this work was the ensuing Mozart [illegible] harpsichord and orchestra. Mozart is still the best living composer for this combination.

SIBELIUS' composition with Beethoven as the most played composer of the year continues apace. The Northman's seventh symphony was performed within a week by the Boston Symphony under Mr. Koussevitzky and the New York Symphony under Mr. Klemperer, the latter performance coming too late for comment in these columns. Nielsen is the grimmest of composers, although his grimness is not of the literary variety. His music [illegible] makes many sensuous passes at the [illegible] but most of it is a tremendously skillful suggestion of a somber mood. It is a captivating stuff at a first hearing, but it wears well, and when one becomes accustomed to the Sibelius idiom [illegible] covers a strange [illegible] ness

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
JAN

KOUSSEVITZKY RETURNS

Directs Boston Symphony Orchestra Tonight, WJZ Broadcasting

Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has returned to Boston and will conduct the thirteenth concert of the orchestra, which will be broadcast tonight from Symphony Hall in Boston.

Handel and Bach hold the feature position on the musical bill. In addition, the orchestra will be heard in a suite by Roussel, which is of more modern construction, and "The Poem of Ecstasy" by Scriabin, which was written about 20 years ago, before the new movement of ultra-modernism in musical composition became recognized.

Just prior to the opening of the program, Professor John Patten Marshall, head of the music department of the Boston University and Holy Cross College, will discuss the Concerto Grosso of Handel, which is in the form of a dialogue between a number of the solo instruments and the string orchestra. His remarks will also include the Bach Fourth Brandenburg Concerto, one of a set of works written especially for the Margrave of Brandenburg in 1721. This number provides a particularly favorable opportunity [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 22 1927

Boston Symphony

Much will happen, musically speaking, at the coming concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, in the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, February 6, at 3 o'clock.

In addition to the mighty "Eroica Symphony" of Beethoven, which will occupy half of the program, and the Suite in the modern vein of Prokolieff from his opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," Mr. Koussevitzky will perform three other numbers from Germany, France and Finland, respectively. The new work of Jan Sibelius will be represented by Finlandia Symphonic Poem, Op. 26, No. 7.

This symphony in its finest moments is moving and impressive, music that is not easily forgotten. Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra play it superbly and with an interpretation which does full justice to the music.

Reservations for the concert may be obtained by calling Frank Sedgwick of McCoy's, 89 Asylum street, 2-2251.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

The program of the Symphony concerts this week, as it now stands, is as follows: Handel, Grosso Concerto, B minor, No. 12; Bach, Concerto for solo violin, two flutes and strings; Suite in F major by Roussel; and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." Roussel's Suite, one of his latest works, was composed expressly for Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra. It is in three movements. Handel's Concerto has not been played at these concerts since April 8, 1905, when Mr. Gericke was the conductor. Bach's Concerto is probably unknown to the Symphony audience. It is the fourth of the Brandenburg set, and is noteworthy for the conspicuous part taken by the solo violin. To Spitta, the long-winded biographer of Bach, the slow movement, "a beautiful and grave piece, in mournful measure" seemed music for a funeral procession. This concerto was performed by the Philadelphia orchestra on Dec. 30, 31 of last year. HER JAN 20

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 19 1927

Boston Symphony

Last evening at the Albee Theatre under the wand of Serge Koussevitsky Stravinsky's opportunity came to le his light shine, and the naughty play boy make quite an illumination. Lon ago he had scrapped Debussy's cloud and impressions and reflections, and had cast the fragments out on the junk pile in his Corybantian backyard; and had made the Debussy dreamland and the French Impressionism look like a Cloud-Cuckoo-Town left all topsy-turvy by the winged Hound of Heaven.

He was introduced by Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, in B minor, No. 12; for, not to dull the edge of expectancy, Mr. Koussevitsky substituted this number for the Eman uel Bach concerto, which appeared i the programme. The first movemen of this concerto was interesting from the point of view of a string quarte played by the principals of the strin choirs, interrupted at regular interval by rather gruff comment from the en tire string orchestra. In this move ment the basses seemed at times heav enough to spoil the fine effect of perfect balance in the ensemble. Th simplicity of the whole work and th vivid melody of the Allegro offered jus the right material to set against th startling contrast that followed.

Glory be to the Fire-Bird, if no honor. It gave poor Handel quite shock—tore his lace and tousled hi wig; and cast obloquy likewise o Schumann, the distiller of spring per fumes, because he did not use the righ sort of atomizer. And moreover it re vealed the richness of its own panopl —the audacity of the woodwind, th ravishing note of the reeds, the heart throb of the strings, and the frigid in cisiveness of the harp. The princesse playing with apples in the garden wer not unlike Greek princesses playin ball on the seashore, but the music o their dance brought slight inspiration On the other hand, the Infernal Dance was quite engaging. There the Russia seems at his best. But his demons were rather dainty and unterrifying—nothing to frighten Heracles nor ever Dionysus. But the piece as a whol is by no means an antidote for tens nerves. It tends to make one feel lik keeping in off the streets through fea of mischief afoot or evil abroad.

Mr. Koussevitzky did full justice t Schumann's lyrical genius in his in terpretation of the symphony. In fac he made the composition sound mo like a lyrical cycle than a real sym phony. But it was delightfully playe and made clear the fact that, for t the bungling orchestration that se sitive critics read into it, it has n yet outlived its day, nor lost in a wise its pecular charm.

The programme:

Handel—Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B-minor, No 12
Largo, Allegro, Larghetto e piano, Lar Allegro.
Stravinsky—Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu ("The Fire-Bird"), a Danced Legend.
a. Introduction; Katschei's Enchan Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird.
b. Supplication of the Fire-Bird.
c. The Princesses Play with the Gol Apples.
d. Dance of the Princesses.
e. Infernal Dance of all the Subjects Katschei.
Schumann—Symphony in B-flat majo No. 1, Op. 38.
I. Andante un poco maestoso; Alle molto vivace.
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo; Molto vivace. Trio I: M piu vivace; Trio II.
IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

M. C. W

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 20 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT JAN. 31

The preliminary seat sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will make its first appearance in Wilmington at the Shubert Playhouse on the evening of January 31, under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association, is now in charge of Mrs. William N. Bannard, who will continue to take orders until the tickets are placed on sale at the box office a few days before the concert.

The interest which the forthcoming engagement has aroused o sions no surprise. The Delaware Musical Association feels that in booking the Boston Symphony it has secured the finest attraction it has thus far been able to offer its friends and patrons and that had it searched the world for something better it could not have found it.

The reason for this is that the Boston Symphony combines a force a trained and accomplished artist, of 108 musicians, each of whom is with a leader whose record is one of outstanding achievement. This leader is Serge Koussevitzky, who has been its director since 1924. Born in 1874 in Tver, the north of Russia, he became a conductor at the age of 12 and has ever since continued to advance towards that perfection which now distinguishes his work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 19 1927

-:- MUSIC -:-

The "Fire-Bird" Suite

The main attraction at the Boston Symphony concert last night—the fourth of the season—was Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" suite played for the first time in Providence but not unfamiliar to many in the audience. For Mr. Damrosch played it in New York in 1916, Mr. Stokowski in Philadelphia in 1917 and Mr. Monteux in Boston in 1919. Besides, part of it—perhaps the very loveliest part—has been available as a phonograph record for some time.

Mr. Koussevitsky lived up to our faith that he would give a notable reading of this fantastic ballet music. Rarely does he fail to excel in interpreting the music of fantasy, especially of Slavic fantasy which is the weirdest mixture of barbaric mystery and sophisticated comment we know of. Stravinsky was, we understand, a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov, but he was more than a pupil. He is, indeed, a spiritual son of the composer of "Scheherazade," carrying on and extending the oriental genius of the master in his ballet music. It is a genius that goes back to the first days of the dance when human beings sought through rhythmic movements and dramatic gestures to express the mysteries of nature or to placate the elemental gods. For all its emotional subtlety it has become a form conceived in pure intellect. Hence, we think, why that selective mind of M. Koussevitsky likes so well to play with its subtle implications. Last night it held the audience spellbound and, at least in the famous "lullaby," enchanted.

The first number on last night's program was Handel's "Concerto for Orchestra in D-major," music full of grave and reverend sentimentality characteristic of the eighteenth century, the only century which fully knew how to pose without being ridiculous. M. Koussevitzky played it with fine discrimination, giving the full, flowing melody its richest value, touching perilous things only with the fingertips and withdrawing into the conviction that beauty is born and lives only in a mood of quiet ecstasy. We rejoice that M. Koussevitzky substituted this concerto for the undistinguished concerto of the lesser Bach which he intended to play.

The concert wound up with Schumann's "Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38," a saccharine composition through which the ghosts of many pre-Schumann composers flit in and out and leave but a wreck behind. It is, however, popular; it has always been popular; it will always be popular with lovers of undisturbing things. There were long, dreary passages last night when M. Koussevitzky's baton seemed to hypnotize his players rather than to inspire them, so bored did he appear. The last movement had some life in it, to be sure, but not enough to justify the playing of this symphony in a short concert series.

But it is hard to please everybody. No doubt some people who were not equal to the challenge of Stravinsky found Schumann's symphony as satisfying as one of Ella Wheeler Wilcox's spring lyrics. That's what the spiritual content of the symphony recalls.

R. de A. J.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 21 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The New York Herald-Tribune of Sunday, January 9, comments on the new work of Jan Sibelius offered by the Boston Symphony: "The feature of yesterday's Boston Symphony matinee at Carnegia hall was the first performance in New York of the Seventh Symphony of Jan Sibelius. This symphony published in 1925 was introduced to America last spring by Mr. Stokowski, who played it in Philadelphia, but did not bring it with him on any of his visits to Carnegie hall. Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed the symphony to Boston a month ago. This symphony in its finest movements is moving and impressive music—music that is not easily forgotten. Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra played it superbly, with an eloquence which must have done full justice to the music."

The work of Jan Sibelius will be represented by Finlandia Symphonic poem, Op. 26, No. 7, in the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Capitol theater, February 6. Tickets may be secured by calling McCoy's, 2-2251. The concert is being given under the management of Frank Sedgwick.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 21 1927

Boston Symphony

A rustle and perusal of programs—a friendly discussion and exchange of views—an appreciative applause as the conductor appears on the stage—an appreciative hush as the conductor raises his baton. With one accord all eyes are focused on the leader. A faint shimmer of violins—a rise and fall of violin bows—a precise beating of padded hammers on the kettle drums—the concert has begun!

Many are fortunate enough and enabled through delightful means, to hear the Boston Symphony concerts at home. Reality! How much greater the privilege of watching the motions and interpretations of the talented musicians and their distinguished leader, Mr. Sergei Koussevitzky.

A large majority of the desired locations have already been assigned and those desirous of attending the concert on February sixth should obtain their reservations promptly by calling McCoy's, 2-2251, Frank A. Sedgwick, manager.

VARIED PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Works by Bach, Handel, and Two Moderns Played

GLOBE JAN 22

Mr Koussevitzky chose a varied program for yesterday's Symphony concert. Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" was the chief number. The first part of the program included a Handel Concerto Grosso in B minor, last played here in 1905. Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto, not previously heard at these concerts and a new Suite in F by the Parisian composer, Albert Roussel, written especially for Mr Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony and performed yesterday for the first time anywhere.

Mr Koussevitzky was applauded with exceptional warmth at his first appearance yesterday, presumably because of the recent announcement that he has consented to stay as conductor for two more seasons, perhaps because Casella conducted last week.

Roussel's new suite would, if the work of a man under 30, be regarded as showing great promise, despite frequent and obvious traces of the influence of such leading contemporary composers as Stravinsky. But Roussel was born in 1869, and is thus almost 60.

The suite, unlike nearly all the many previous works of Roussel, has no program. He describes it as "pure music," with no attempt to tell a story or paint a picture. There are but three movements, entitled prelude, sarabande, and gigue. The work is scored for full modern orchestra, of the type used in Stravinsky's "Sacre." The old dance forms are obscured in the two latter movements by a conscientious rather than hilarious syncopated rhyme.

The prelude is so elaborate a polyphonic allegro that one queries the use of the title. Its style is the recently fashionable curious attempted amalgam of Bach and jazz.

Cordial Applause

One was distinctly of opinion that this suite is not a modern masterpiece, but the work of one who follows rather than leads the procession of musical history. Roussel, if he does not belong of right to the vanguard of progress, at least marches not far behind it. It is a long way from "La Ville Rose," written in 1909, to this suite, composed last year.

Mr Koussevitsky and the orchestra spared no pains on the performance, which was cordially applauded.

The "Brandenburg Concerto" in G major, for violin, two flutes and strings, heard yesterday is an example of Bach's ability to write graceful and light-hearted music which after [illegible] still sou[illegible] fresh. He from the original score. The two flutes were modern flutes, not obsolete "flute-a-bec," which seems to have been the same, roughly speaking, as the "recorder" referred to in our Elizabethan poets. The "continuo," or figured bass, which in the 18th century would have been played on a harpsichord by the conductor, was replaced yesterday by two double basses not in the original score. One assumes that since these could not of themselves supply the missing harmonies indicated by the figures some additional changes of scoring were made.

"Poem of Ecstasy"

The Handel Concerto Grosso, eloquently played as it was, did not seem one of that master's major works. The slow movement has a ponderous dignified emotionalism.

Mr Koussevitzky excels in the music of Skriabin. He chose the "Poem of Ecstasy," it will be recalled, as the chief number on his very first Boston program and gave then a reading hitherto unequalled here. Yesterday's performance of this strange, tortured, baffling music, full of ejaculatory fervor, was as remarkable for eloquence, and distinguished by a higher degree of competence from the orchestra, which has improved notably in the past two seasons.

One doubts if this piece has ever been better played anywhere than it was yesterday. Yet one cannot wholeheartedly admire it or understand its full significance.

Next week Aaron Copland will play the piano part in his new concerto for its first public performance. Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," and, rather curiously, Schumann's recently played B flat major symphony are the other numbers announced. P. R.

HEARTIEST GREETING TO CONDUCTOR

Symphony Audience Warmly Cordial to Koussevitzky

POST JAN 22

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Returning to a Friday afternoon audience in Symphony Hall after an absence of two weeks, Mr. Koussevitzky was greeted yesterday with almost as much warmth as though the concert had been the first one of the season. In fact at no other time during the afternoon was there to be heard applause of like heartiness and fervor, although the concert was one of uncommon excellence.

BEAUTY OF STRING TONE

Like Mr. Casella at the concerts of last week, Mr. Koussevitzky had in hand yesterday a modern piece in ancient style, a Suite in M major by Albert Roussel, written especially for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky, and like Mr. Casella he chose to give this new-old music an 18th century setting, placing before it both a Concerto Grosso of Handel (No. 12, in B minor) and the Fourth Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra.

Hearing Handel's Concerto yesterday one could but recall Beethoven's repeated assertion that Handel was the master of masters. Beside this noble music, as colossally great in invention as it is unpretentious in form and texture, the Concerto of Bach, so far as its thematic substance is concerned, seemed almost paltry. But in Bach's piece there was for compensation the charm of color, created by the two flutes and the handful of strings, and also the perfection of the performance. And, for the matter of that, is there any other orchestra in the world today whose string choir, even with a Koussevitzky to guide and inspire it, could have played the music of Handel with such mingled richness and vitality of tone, such depth and breadth of expression?

In Casella's Favor

As was indicated above, Roussel's new Suite, like Mr. Casella's Partita, aims at a union of the older style of composition and the newer musical formulas. Comparisons are, of course, odious although sometimes unavoidable; but of the two men the Italian seems to have done the sounder, the more convincing job.

Of the three movements that make Roussel's suite, the Prelude is marked by a certain strength of sinews, not of lungs; the Sarabande by the same strength plus no small degree of musical beauty; while the Gigue is essentially cheerful and invigorating. In short, a music ably made, but smacking more of contrivance than of inner compulsion.

"Poem of Ecstasy"

It was with Scriabin's gorgeous-toned, superbly sensuous "Poem of Ecstasy," relatively inarticulate in Symphony Hall until Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed its true voice, its full possibilities, that the conductor closed his

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORKER
JAN 22 1927

THE "BACK TO BACH" movement has been responsible for many oddities, of which one of the oddest is the De Falla concerto for harpsichord and a fistful of instruments, produced here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the miraculous Wanda Landowska playing the harpsichord score. De Falla has done many charming things, but his new concerto is exempt from that classification. The orchestration for the miniature band is so thick that the harpsichord emerges only at intervals, and most of the intervals are disagree[illegible]

The twisting of Spanish folk rhythms into modern patte[illegible] is a pointless bit of near-cleverness. The best commentary on the work was the ensuing Mozart rondo for harpsichord and orchestra. Mozart is still the best living composer for this combination.

SIBELIUS' comparison with Beethoven as the most played [illegible] of the year contain[illegible] The Northman's seventh [illegible] performed within a week by the Boston Symphony under Mr. Koussevitzky and the New York [illegible] under Mr. Klemperer, the latter performance coming too late for comment in this issue. Sibelius is the grimmest of composers, although his grimness is not [illegible] literary variety. His music rarely makes any sensuous passes at the ear, and most of it is a tremendously skilful [illegible] of a somber mood. It is not captivating stuff at a first hearing, but it wears well, and when one becomes accustomed to the Sibelius idiom [illegible] covers a strange underly[illegible] ness

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES
JAN [illegible]

KOUSSEVITZKY RETURNS

Directs Boston Symphony Orchestra Tonight, WJZ Broadcasting

Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has returned to Boston and will conduct the thirteenth concert of the orchestra, which will be broadcast tonight from Symphony Hall in Boston.

Handel and Bach hold the feature position on the musical bill. In addition, the orchestra will be heard in a suite by Roussel, which is of more modern construction, and "The Poem of Ecstasy" by Scriabin which was written about 20 years ago, before the new movement of ultra-modernism in musical composition became recognized.

Just prior to the opening of the program, Professor John Patten Marshall, head of the music department of the Boston University and Holy Cross College, will discuss the Concerto Grosso of Handel, which is in the form of a dialogue between a number of the solo instruments and the string orchestra. His remarks will also include the Bach Fourth Brandenburg Concerto, one of a set of works written especially for the Margrave of Brandenburg in 1721. This number provides a particularly favorable opportunity to enjoy Bache's skillful use of orchestral instruments and his unequalled genium in weaving melodies together.

Boston Symphony

Much will happen, musically speaking, at the coming concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, in the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, February 6, at 3 o'clock.

In addition to the mighty "Eroica Symphony" of Beethoven, which will occupy half of the program, and the Suite in the modern vein of Prokofieff from his opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," Mr. Koussevitzky will perform three other numbers from Germany, France and Finland, respectively. The new work of Jan Sibelius will be represented by Finlandia Symphonic Poem, Op. 26, No. 7.

This symphony in its finest moments is moving and impressive, music that is not easily forgotten. Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra play it superbly and with an interpretation which does full justice to the music.

Reservations for the concert may be obtained by calling Frank Sedgwick of McCoy's, 89 Asylum street, 2-2251.

SYMPHONY IN 13TH CONCERT

HER JAN 22

Boston Orchestra Gives Fine Performance of Rousel's Suite

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso for strings, B minor, No. 12; Bach, Brandenburg Concerto, No. 4, G major, for violin, two flutes and strings; Roussel Suite in F major (first performance) Scriabin, "The Poem of Ecstasy."

Whenever we hear one of Handel's concertos we realize the justice of Joh F. Runciman's characterization of th composer: "Mr. George Frideric Hand is by far the most superb personag one meets in the history of music." An if he "lived his life straight through the grand manner," he also wrote the grand manner.

It was interesting to note yesterda the contrast between the concertos Handel and Bach. In each work the is a "concertino" or group of solo i struments: in Handel's, two violins an a violoncello, played yesterday Messrs. Burgin, Theodorowicz and B detti; in Bach's, a solo violin and two flutes (Messrs Burgin, Laurent and Bladet). There the resemblance ceases. There is difference in manner of workmanship, as there is in mood and spirit.

The grand style is evident throughout Handel's music; the concerto of Bach is more in the manner of a chamber work. Handel is authoritative, sure of himself, exulting in his strength. What he has to say is worth saying; when he has said his say, he stops. The performance of the solo players in Bach's concerto was worthy of all praise. It was not their fault that the music for them seemed inconsequential, interminable chatter; pattern music, music writen by the yard; music that might have stopped anywhere after a dozen or more measures, or gone on for half an hour. Handel, with the simplest means, produced music of astonishing vitality. What other composer has composed a slow movement so full of sonorous beauty, at once majestic and tender, as that in this 12th concerto, which for some unaccountable reason is seldom played! Note, too, the little transitional slow movement just before the fugal finale is attacked. And so, after the performance of "The Poem of Ecstasy," the one abiding memory was that of Handel's music as interpreted, also in the grand and simple manner, by Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky, always fortunate in his reading of 18th century music, fully answered the demand of Romain Rolland with regard to the performance of Handel's instrumental works: "When you have studied with minute care each detail, obtained from your orchestra an irreproachable precision, tonal purity, and finish, you will have done nothing unless you have made the face of the improvising genius rise from the work."

Roussel's Suite for full orchestra was composed last year expressly for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky, to whom the score is dedicated. Roussel had no literary program in mind while he was writing the suite. To use his own words it is "de la musique pure."

The musical idiom of this composer, disclosed in works that have been performed in Boston, has been to us as a foreign tongue, except possibly in "The Spider's Festival," which was written as a ballet for the stage. French critics admire his compositions; Mr. Koussevitzky thinks highly of him. Roussel has been described by M. Coeuroy as "pure music." It has been said that his soul, wishing to be only tenderness and modesty, "palpitates" in his more important works. To us these works may contain emotion, but it is as repressed as if Roussel had lived in the New England of the 18th century; as if, whatever passion ravaged his soul, in his music he would be the Spartan boy; as if, appreciating beauty, he would blush if he were caught in the act of appreciation.

In the Sarabande of this Suite we find glimpses of the Roussel known to us of old, now imbued with a certain warmth; possessed also by the stately, melancholy mood of the Spanish dance; but in the Prelude and the Gigue, lo, a new Roussel, obviously lively, joyous, laughing as he neatly foots it. Is it possible that he thus thought to please American taste, and wrote the Sarabande to please himself? If in the merry movements he let himself go, he did it as an accomplished musician and a well-bred man. There is no bid for immediate popularity; no deliberate introduction of that which, though common and unclean, would excite noisy applause even from a Symphony audience in Boston.

We all know the devotion and affection shown by Mr. Koussevitzky toward Scriabin living and dead. They worked together, they toured together in Scriabin's life time; now that Scriabin is no more, his former colleague and his still faithful friend delights in paying tribute to his memory. It is not surprising then that Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday gave an extraordinarily eloquent reading of a work, which—no doubt to our misfortune—does not appeal to us. Leaving out of the question the strange inflated poem written by Scriabin for this composition; paying no attention to his theosophic and neoplatonic theories, we cannot admire the musical form, contents, expression.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Prokofieff, Classic symphony (first time in Boston); Aaron Copland, Concerto for piano and orchestra (first performance); Schumann,

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 22 1927

HANDEL AND BACH, BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, after a brief respite from his arduous duties of the season thus far, has returned to Boston and will conduct the 13th Saturday evening concert of the orchestra, which will be broadcast by Station WBZ direct from Symphony hall in Boston tonight.

The concert will be broadcast also by Station WJZ in New York city with the broadcast originating at WBZA in Boston. The concert is one which should prove of great interest to lovers of the classics of Handel and Bach, for these two composers hold the feature position on the musical bill. In addition, the orchestra will be heard in a suite by Roussel, which is of more modern construction, and "The Poem of Ecstasy" by Scriabin, which was written about 20 years ago, before the new movement of ultra-modernism in musical composition became recognized.

Just prior to the opening of the program, Prof John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston university and Holy Cross college, will discuss the Concerto Grosso of Handel, which is in the form of a dialog between a number of the solo instruments and the string orchestra. His remarks will also include the Bach Fourth Brandenburg Concerto, one of a set of works written especially for the Margrave of Brandenburg in 1721.

This number provides a particularly favorable opportunity to enjoy Bach's skilful use of orchestral instruments, and his unequaled genius in weaving melodies together.

The suite by Roussel, modern French composer, was finished only last August. This was written especially for the Boston Symphony orchestra and is dedicated to Mr Koussevitzky, the conductor.

During the intermission, Prof Marshall will treat the Scriabin "Poem of Ecstasy." The is one of the great Russian composer's most important works, in which, according to his own statements, he sought to express "the emotional side of his own philosophy of life." In his remarks during the intermission, Prof Marshall will have the assistance of Nicholas Slonimsky, personal secretary to Mr Koussevitzy, and a pianist of note. The illustrations in the earlier talks will be presented by Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist. The complete program

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 22 1927

business meeting.

MUCH INTEREST SHOWN IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

Interest in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will make its first local appearance on Monday evening, January 31, at the Shubert Playhouse under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association, grows more intense as the date approaches.

This is only natural. The Orchestra is one of the really great musical organizations of the world and its present leader, Seige Koussevitzky, who has been with it since 1924, came to this country from Europe preceded by a record of achievements that assured him an unrivalled place among contemporary directors.

He has prepared the program for the Wilmington concert that is designed to please admirers of both classic and modern music.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr Koussevitzky conductor, will give its third concert of the Monday evening series tomorrow in Symphony hall at 8:15. On Tuesday and Wednesday, Jan 25 and 26, at 4 o'clock there will be young people's concerts, to be conducted by Richard Burgin. The 14th regular pair of Symphony concerts will be given on the following Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the 28th and 29th.

HER

The Monday program will include Handel's Concerto for Strings, No. 1 Vaughan Williams's "Norfolk Rhapsody," Achron's Concerto for Violin an orchestra and Schumann's Symphony B flat major. Joseph Achron will be the soloist.

JAN 23

At the 14th program of concerts Aaron Copeland, the American composer, will appear as soloist in his new piano concerto. The concert will open with Prokofieff's classical symphony and close with a repetition of the first symphony of Schumann in B flat.

The young people's program will be overture to "Fra Diavolo"; a ballet-suite from Gluck's operas, arranged by Mott Saint-Saens's "Danse Macabre," Grieg "Spring," a violin solo from Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake," by Julius Theodorowicz; Grainger's "Molly on the Shore" and a processional from the second act of Wagner's "Tannhaeuser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
JAN 22 1927

'Nother Concert by Boston Symphony

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will be broadcast by WJZ at 8:30 o'clock this evening. This concert will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, and the pick-up made by the engineering staff of WBZ and relayed to WJZ by wire line.

Professor John P. Marshall, the head of the department of music at Boston University and Holy Cross College, will interpret the symphony program for the benefit of the radio audience. Professor Marshall's experience along musical lines renders him particularly fitted for this important work. He was organist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1909 to 1918, and during the World War he served as musical aide to the commanding general of the Northeastern and Western departments of the United States Army and was later appointed assistant director of camp music of the entire army. With such an excellent musical background, Professor Marshall is well qualified for the task of interpreting the symphony programs to radio listeners, and his broadcasts are certain to make the symphony program more valuable and appreciated by the listeners.

THIS CLIPPING FROM AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 22 1927

THE concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky will be broadcast by WJZ and WBZ at 8.30 o'clock tonight. This concert will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, and the pick-up made by the engineering staff of WBZ and relayed to WJZ by wire line.

Prof. John P. Marshall, the head of the Department of Music at Boston University and Holy Cross College, will interpret the symphony program for the benefit of the radio audience. Professor Marshall's experience, along musical lines renders him particularly fitted for this important work. He was organist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1909 to 1918 and during the World War he served as musical aide to the commanding general of the Northeastern and Western Departments of the United States Army, and was later appointed assistant director of camp music of the entire Army. With such an excellent musical background, Professor Marshall is well qualified for the task of interpreting the symphony programs to radio listeners, and his broadcasts are certain to make the symphony program more valuable and appreciated by the listeners.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
JAN 22 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHE' WPCH INAUGURA

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will be broadcast by WJZ at 8:30 o'clock to-night. This concermt will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, and the pick-up made by the engineering staff of WBZ and relayed to WJZ by wire line.

Professor John P. Marshall, the head of the department of music at Boston University and Holy Cross College, will interpret the symphony program for the benefit of the radio audience. Professor Marshall's experience along musical lines renders him particularly fitted for this important work. He was organist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1909 to 1918 and during the World War he served as musical aide to the commanding general of the Northeastern and Western departments of the United States Army, and was later appointed assistant director of Camp Music of the entire army. With such an excellent musical background Professor Marshall is well qualified for the task of interpreting the symphony programs to radio listeners, and his broadcasts are certain to make the symphony program more valuable and appreciated by the listeners.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 22 1927

HANDEL AND BACH, BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitsky Will Conduct 13th Radio Concert of the Series Tonight from WBZ

Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, after a brief respite from his arduous duties of the season thus far, has returned to Boston and will conduct the 13th Saturday evening concert of the orchestra, which will be broadcast by Station WBZ direct from Symphony hall in Boston tonight.

The concert will be broadcast also by Station WJZ in New York city with the broadcast originating at WBZA in Boston. The concert is one which should prove of great interest to lovers of the classics of Handel and Bach, for these two composers hold the feature position on the musical bill. In addition, the orchestra will be heard in a suite by Roussel, which is of more modern construction, and "The Poem of Ecstasy" by Scriabin, which was written about 20 years ago, before the new movement of ultra-modernism in musical composition became recognized.

Just prior to the opening of the program, Prof John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston university and Holy Cross college, will discuss the Concerto Grosso of Handel, which is in the form of a dialog between a number of the solo instruments and the string orchestra. His remarks will also include the Bach Fourth Brandenburg Concerto, one of a set of works written especially for the Margrave of Brandenburg in 1721. This number provides a particularly favorable opportunity to enjoy Bach's skilful use of orchestral instruments, and his unequaled genius in weaving melodies together.

The suite by Roussel, modern French composer, was finished only last August. This was written especially for the Boston Symphony orchestra and is dedicated to Mr Koussevitzky, the conductor.

During the intermission, Prof Marshall will treat the Scriabin "Poem of Ecstasy." The is one of the great Russian composer's most important works, in which, according to his own statements, he sought to express "the emotional side of his own philosophy of life." In his remarks during the intermission, Prof Marshall will have the assistance of Nicholas Slonimsky, personal secretary to Mr Koussevitzy, and a pianist of note. The illustrations in the earlier talks will be presented by Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr Mc

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
JAN 22 1927

PROF. MARSHALL TO GIVE MUSIC COURSE

State Extension Class For All Who Are Interested Opens Monday

John P. Marshall, professor of music at Holy Cross and Boston university, and radio lecturer from Station WBZ on Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will give the State University Extension course in classical and modern music at Worcester. The course will open Monday evening at 7.15 o'clock at the Classical High school.

Previous to this year many Worcester residents have gone to Boston to take courses by Prof. Marshall. In offering this course here an endeavor has been made by the State educational department to serve music lovers in their own city. This series of eight lectures is designed to be attractive both to persons who have a considerable knowledge of music and to those who have little knowledge but great appreciation.

Included in the course will be a study of the characteristics of the classical style with emphasis on the sonata, symphony, concerts and classical overture. There will be a discussion of the three great classical masters, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, with an outline of their lives and works. Study of the early romanticists will be centered about Schumann, Chopin, Liszt and Berlioz.

Of especial interest will be the lectures on modern schools of composition including movements in France and Russia as well as other countries. Some time will also be devoted to a study of the recent changes in music and the tendencies in contemporaneous musical development. Mr. Marshall will illustrate this series of talks, playing compositions referred to on the piano.

The course may be taken by simply attending the lectures with no outside preparation. Certificates will be granted, however, only to students who satisfactorily complete assigned work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILMINGTON, DEL.
STAR
84
JAN 23 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE ON JANUARY 31

The first appearance in Wilmington of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place on Monday evening, January 31, at the Shubert Playhouse under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association. This engagement has aroused much interest in the local musical world, both by reason of the excellence of the orchestra, which is one of the outstanding organizations of its kind, and because of the dynamic personality of Serge Koussevitzky who has been its leader since 1924.

Koussevitzky is a native of Tver in the North of Russia and his career began when he was twelve. This sounds like a fairy tale but it is true that at that advanced age he was conducting the orchestra in his old home town, a job which he relinquished to enter the conservatory of Moscow.

While still but a youth he learned of a vacancy in the orchestra of the St. Petersburg Imperial Grand Opera Theatre and he decided to compete for it. The aspirants were mostly graduates from the local conservatory. One among them was pointed out as the "star" who would certainly get the position.

But, undaunted, Koussevitsky, a virtuoso on the doublebass, who had much opposition, responded to the call of the judges and was the first one to play. He finished amid spontaneous applause which was against the rules in a contest of this character.

He comes to Wilmington preceded by a wonderful reputation as leader, artist and program builder. Those who hear him and the Boston Symphony are assured of a rare treat.

THIS CLIPPING FROM POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 23 1927

Klemperer and Koussevitzky Conduct Here Feb. 1 and 2

OTTO KLEMPERER, famous German guest conductor, who achieved a brilliant success with the New York Symphony Orchestra last season during his first American tour with that organization, has been invited to return for a short season. He will conduct the New York Orchestra in Washington at Poli's Theater under Mrs. Wilson-Greene's management Tuesday afternoon, February 1, at 4:30 o'clock. This will be the last concert here by the orchestra for 1926-27.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has re-established that famous organization on the high artistic plane it occupied prior to the war, will conduct the orchestra when it makes its first appearance of the season in Washington at Poli's Theater Wednesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock. This will be the second in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic course of afternoon concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SENTINAL
JAN 22 1927

LISTEN

By DIAL

NEITHER the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, broadcast by the blue chain, nor the concert by the New York Symphony orchestra, broadcast by the red chain, came thru perfectly last night.

Only the latter part of the Boston Symphony came thru with such clarity that all of the many instruments of the orchestra could be heard. The concert by the New York Symphony, under the direction of Walter Damrosch, came almost an hour later and had the advantage of a clearer air.

I went all over the dial last night. There was the general run of Saturday night programs familiar to all radio listeners. In general the air was

SYMPHONY IN 13TH CONCERT

HER JAN 22

Boston Orchestra Gives Fine Performance of Rousel's Suite

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso for strings, B minor, No. 12; Bach, Brandenburg Concerto, No. 4, G major, for violin, two flutes and strings; Roussel Suite in F major (first performance) Scriabin, "The Poem of Ecstasy."

Whenever we hear one of Handel's concertos we realize the justice of Johr F. Runciman's characterization of th composer: "Mr. George Frideric Hande is by far the most superb personag one meets in the history of music." An if he "lived his life straight through i the grand manner," he also wrote i the grand manner.

It was interesting to note yesterda the contrast between the concertos b Handel and Bach. In each work ther is a "concertino" or group of solo ir struments: in Handel's, two violins an a violoncello, played yesterday b Messrs. Burgin, Theodorowicz and Be detti; in Bach's, a solo violin and two flutes (Messrs Burgin, Laurent and Bladet). There the resemblance ceases. There is difference in manner of workmanship, as there is in mood and spirit.

The grand style is evident throughout Handel's music; the concerto of Bach is more in the manner of a chamber work. Handel is authoritative, sure of himself, exulting in his strength. What he has to say is worth saying; when he has said his say, he stops. The performance of the solo players in Bach's concerto was worthy of all praise. It was not their fault that the music for them seemed inconsequential, interminable chatter; pattern music, music written by the yard: music that might have stopped anywhere after a dozen or more measures, or gone on for half an hour. Handel, with the simplest means, produced music of astonishing vitality. What other composer has composed a slow movement so full of sonorous beauty, at once majestic and tender, as that in this 12th concerto, which for some unaccountable reason is seldom played! Note, too, the little transitional slow movement just before the fugal finale is attacked. And so, after the performance of "The Poem of Ecstasy," the one abiding memory was that of Handel's music as interpreted, also in the grand and simple manner, by Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky, always fortunate in his reading of 18th century music, fully answered the demand of Romain Rolland with regard to the performance of Handel's instrumental works: "When you have studied with minute care each detail, obtained from your orchestra an irreproachable precision, tonal purity, and finish, you will have done nothing unless you have made the face of the improvising genius rise from the work."

Roussel's Suite for full orchestra was composed last year expressly for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky, to whom the score is dedicated. Roussel had no literary program in mind while he was writing the suite. To use his own words it is "de la musique pure."

The musical idiom of this composer, disclosed in works that have been performed in Boston, has been to us as a foreign tongue, except possibly in "The Spider's Festival," which was written as a ballet for the stage. French critics admire his compositions; Mr. Koussevitzky thinks highly of him. Roussel has been described by M. Coeuroy as "pure music." It has been said that his soul, wishing to be only tenderness and modesty, "palpitates" in his more important works. To us these works may contain emotion, but it is as repressed as if Roussel had lived in the New England of the 18th century; as if, whatever passion ravaged his soul, in his music he would be the Spartan boy: as if, appreciating beauty, he would blush if he were caught in the act of appreciation.

In the Sarabande of this Suite we find glimpses of the Roussel known to us of old, now imbued with a certain warmth; possessed also by the stately, melancholy mood of the Spanish dance; but in the Prelude and the Gigue, lo, a new Roussel, obviously lively, joyous, laughing as he neatly foots it. Is it possible that he thus thought to please American taste, and wrote the Sarabande to please himself? If in the merry movements he let himself go, he did it as an accomplished musician and a well-bred man. There is no bid for immediate popularity; no deliberate introduction of that which, though common and unclean, would excite noisy applause even from a Symphony audience in Boston.

We all know the devotion and affection shown by Mr. Koussevitzky toward Scriabin living and dead. They worked together, they toured together in Scriabin's life time; now that Scriabin is no more, his former colleague and his still faithful friend delights in paying tribute to his memory. It is not surprising then that Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday gave an extraordinarily eloquent reading of a work, which—no doubt to our misfortune—does not appeal to us. Leaving out of the question the strange inflated poem written by Scriabin for this composition; paying no attention to his theosophic and neo-platonic theories, we cannot admire the musical form, contents, expression.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Prokofieff, Classic symphony (first time in Boston); Aaron Copland, Concerto for piano and orchestra (first performance); Schumann,

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 22 1927

HANDEL AND BACH, BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, after a brief respite from his arduous duties of the season thus far, has returned to Boston and will conduct the 13th Saturday evening concert of the orchestra, which will be broadcast by Station WBZ direct from Symphony hall in Boston tonight.

The concert will be broadcast also by Station WJZ in New York city with the broadcast originating at WBZA in Boston. The concert is one which should prove of great interest to lovers of the classics of Handel and Bach, for these two composers hold the feature position on the musical bill. In addition, the orchestra will be heard in a suite by Roussel, which is of more modern construction, and "The Poem of Ecstasy" by Scriabin, which was written about 20 years ago, before the new movement of ultra-modernism in musical composition became recognized.

Just prior to the opening of the program, Prof John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston university and Holy Cross college, will discuss the Concerto Grosso of Handel, which is in the form of a dialog between a number of the solo instruments and the string orchestra. His remarks will also include the Bach Fourth Brandenburg Concerto, one of a set of works written especially for the Margrave of Brandenburg in 1721.

This number provides a particularly favorable opportunity to enjoy Bach's skilful use of orchestral instruments, and his unequaled genius in weaving melodies together.

The suite by Roussel, modern French composer, was finished only last August. This was written especially for the Boston Symphony orchestra and is dedicated to Mr Koussevitzky, the conductor.

During the intermission, Prof Marshall will treat the Scriabin "Poem of Ecstasy." The is one of the great Russian composer's most important works, in which, according to his own statements, he sought to express "the emotional side of his own philosophy of life." In his remarks during the intermission, Prof Marshall will have the assistance of Nicholas Slonimsky, personal secretary to Mr Koussevitzy, and a pianist of note. The illustrations in the earlier talks will be presented by Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist. The complete program

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 22 1927

business meeting.

MUCH INTEREST SHOWN IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

Interest in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will make its first local appearance on Monday evening, January 31, at the Shubert Playhouse under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association, grows more intense as the date approaches.

This is only natural. The Orchestra is one of the really great musical organizations of the world and its present leader, Seige Koussevitzky, who has been with it since 1924, came to this country from Europe preceded by a record of achievements that assured him an unrivalled place among contemporary directors.

He has prepared the program for the Wilmington concert that is designed to please admirers of both classic and modern music.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, will give its third concert of the Monday evening series tomorrow in Symphony hall at 8:15. On Tuesday and Wednesday, Jan 25 and 26, at 4 o'clock there will be young people's concerts, to be conducted by Richard Burgin. The 14th regular pair of Symphony concerts will be given on the following Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the 28th and 29th.

HER JAN 23

The Monday program will include Handel's Concerto for Strings, No. 12 Vaughan Williams's "Norfolk Rhapsody," Achron's Concerto for Violin and orchestra and Schumann's Symphony in B flat major. Joseph Achron will be the soloist.

At the 14th program of concerts Aaron Copeland, the American composer, will appear as soloist in his new piano concerto. The concert will open with Prokofieff's classical symphony and close with a repetition of the first symphony of Schumann in B flat.

The young people's program will be overture to "Fra Diavolo"; a ballet-suite from Gluck's operas, arranged by Mottl Saint-Saens's "Danse Macabre," Grieg's "Spring," a violin solo from Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake," by Julius Theodorowicz; Grainger's "Molly on the Shore" and a processional from the second act of Wagner's "Tannhaeuser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
JAN 22 1927

'Nother Concert by Boston Symphony

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will be broadcast by WJZ at 8:30 o'clock this evening. This concert will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, and the pick-up made by the engineering staff of WBZ and relayed to WJZ by wire line.

Professor John P. Marshall, the head of the department of music at Boston University and Holy Cross College, will interpret the symphony program for the benefit of the radio audience. Professor Marshall's experience along musical lines renders him particularly fitted for this important work. He was organist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1909 to 1918, and during the World War he served as musical aide to the commanding general of the Northeastern and Western departments of the United States Army and was later appointed assistant director of camp music of the entire army. With such an excellent musical background, Professor Marshall is well qualified for the task of interpreting the symphony programs to radio listeners, and his broadcasts are certain to make the symphony program more valuable and appreciated by the listeners.

THIS CLIPPING FROM AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 22 1927

THE concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky will be broadcast by WJZ and WBZ at 8.30 o'clock tonight. This concert will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, and the pick-up made by the engineering staff of WBZ and relayed to WJZ by wire line.

Prof. John P. Marshall, the head of the Department of Music at Boston University and Holy Cross College, will interpret the symphony program for the benefit of the radio audience. Professor Marshall's experience along musical lines renders him particularly fitted for this important work. He was organist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1909 to 1918 and during the World War he served as musical aide to the commanding general of the Northeastern and Western Departments of the United States Army, and was later appointed assistant director of camp music of the entire Army. With such an excellent musical background, Professor Marshall is well qualified for the task of interpreting the symphony programs to radio listeners,

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
JAN 22 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHES WPCH INAUGURA

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will be broadcast by WJZ at 8:30 o'clock to-night. This concermt will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, and the pick-up made by the engineering staff of WBZ and relayed to WJZ by wire line.

Professor John P. Marshall, the head of the department of music at Boston University and Holy Cross College, will interpret the symphony program for the benefit of the radio audience. Professor Marshall's experience along musical lines renders him particularly fitted for this important work. He was organist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1909 to 1918 and during the World War he served as musical aide to the commanding general of the Northeastern and Western departments of the United States Army, and was later appointed assistant director of Camp Music of the entire army. With such an excellent musical background Professor Marshall is well qualified for the task of interpreting the symphony programs to radio listeners, and his broadcasts are certain to make the symphony program more valuable and appreciated by the listeners.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 22 1927

HANDEL AND BACH, BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitsky Will Conduct 13th Radio Concert of the Series Tonight from WBZ

Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, after a brief respite from his arduous duties of the season thus far, has returned to Boston and will conduct the 13th Saturday evening concert of the orchestra, which will be broadcast by Station WBZ direct from Symphony hall in Boston tonight.

The concert will be broadcast also by Station WJZ in New York city with the broadcast originating at WBZA in Boston. The concert is one which should prove of great interest to lovers of the classics of Handel and Bach, for these two composers hold the feature position on the musical bill. In addition, the orchestra will be heard in a suite by Roussel, which is of more modern construction, and "The Poem of Ecstasy" by Scriabin, which was written about 20 years ago, before the new movement of ultra-modernism in musical composition became recognized.

Just prior to the opening of the program, Prof John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston university and Holy Cross college, will discuss the Concerto Grosso of Handel, which is in the form of a dialog between a number of the solo instruments and the string orchestra. His remarks will also include the Bach Fourth Brandenburg Concerto, one of a set of works written especially for the Margrave of Brandenburg in 1721. This number provides a particularly favorable opportunity to enjoy Bach's skilful use of orchestral instruments, and his unequaled genius in weaving melodies together.

The suite by Roussel, modern French composer, was finished only last August. This was written especially for the Boston Symphony orchestra and is dedicated to Mr Koussevitzky, the conductor.

During the intermission, Prof Marshall will treat the Scriabin "Poem of Ecstasy." The is one of the great Russian composer's most important works, in which, according to his own statements, he sought to express "the emotional side of his own philosophy of life." In his remarks during the intermission, Prof Marshall will have the assistance of Nicholas Slonimsky, personal secretary to Mr Koussevitzy, and a pianist of note. The illustrations in the earlier talks will be presented by Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr Mc-

THIS CLIPPING FROM TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
JAN 22 1927

PROF. MARSHALL TO GIVE MUSIC COURSE

State Extension Class For All Who Are Interested Opens Monday

John P. Marshall, professor of music at Holy Cross and Boston university, and radio lecturer from Station WBZ on Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will give the State University Extension course in classical and modern music at Worcester. The course will open Monday evening at 7.15 o'clock at the Classical High school.

Previous to this year many Worcester residents have gone to Boston to take courses by Prof. Marshall. In offering this course here an endeavor has been made by the State educational department to serve music lovers in their own city. This series of eight lectures is designed to be attractive both to persons who have a considerable knowledge of music and to those who have little knowledge but great appreciation.

Included in the course will be a study of the characteristics of the classical style with emphasis on the sonata, symphony, concerts and classical overture. There will be a discussion of the three great classical masters, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, with an outline of their lives and works. Study of the early romanticists will be centered about Schumann, Chopin, Liszt and Berlioz.

Of especial interest will be the lectures on modern schools of composition including movements in France and Russia as well as other countries. Some time will also be devoted to a study of the recent changes in music and the tendencies in contemporaneous musical development. Mr. Marshall will illustrate this series of talks, playing compositions referred to on the piano.

The course may be taken by simply attending the lectures with no outside preparation. Certificates will be granted, however, only to students who satisfactorily complete assigned work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILMINGTON, DEL.
STAR
84
JAN 23 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE ON JANUARY 31

The first appearance in Wilmington of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place on Monday evening, January 31, at the Shubert Playhouse under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association. This engagement has aroused much interest in the local musical world, both by reason of the excellence of the orchestra, which is one of the outstanding organizations of its kind, and because of the dynamic personality of Serge Koussevitzky who has been its leader since 1924.

Koussevitzky is a native of Tver in the North of Russia and his career began when he was twelve. This sounds like a fairy tale but it is true that at that advanced age he was conducting the orchestra in his old home town, a job which he relinquished to enter the conservatory of Moscow.

While still but a youth he learned of a vacancy in the orchestra of the St. Petersburg Imperial Grand Opera Theatre and he decided to compete for it.

The aspirants were mostly graduates from the local conservatory. One among them was pointed out as the "star" who would certainly get the position.

But, undaunted, Koussevitsky, a virtuoso on the doublebass, who had much opposition, responded to the call of the judges and was the first one to play. He finished amid spontaneous applause which was against the rules in a contest of this character.

He comes to Wilmington preceded by a wonderful reputation as leader, artist and program builder. Those who hear him and the Boston Symphony are assured of a rare treat.

THIS CLIPPING FROM POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 23 1927

Klemperer and Koussevitzky Conduct Here Feb. 1 and 2

OTTO KLEMPERER, famous German guest conductor, who achieved a brilliant success with the New York Symphony Orchestra last season during his first American tour with that organization, has been invited to return for a short season. He will conduct the New York Orchestra in Washington at Poli's Theater under Mrs. Wilson-Greene's management Tuesday afternoon, February 1, at 4:30 o'clock. This will be the last concert here by the orchestra for 1926-27.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has re-established that famous organization on the high artistic plane it occupied prior to the war, will conduct the orchestra when it makes its first appearance of the season in Washington at Poli's Theater Wednesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock. This will be the second in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic course of afternoon concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SENTINAL
JAN 22 1927

LISTEN

By DIAL

NEITHER the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, broadcast by the blue chain, nor the concert by the New York Symphony orchestra, broadcast by the red chain, came thru perfectly last night.

Only the latter part of the Boston Symphony came thru with such clarity that all of the many instruments of the orchestra could be heard. The concert by the New York Symphony, under the direction of Walter Damrosch, came almost an hour later and had the advantage of a clearer air.

I went all over the dial last night. There was the general run of Saturday night programs familiar to all radio listeners. In general the air was

...2 1927

...ACH" movement
...sible for many
...e of the oddest
...erto for harpsi-
...of instruments,
...Boston Symphony
...raculous Wanda
...the harpsichord
...as done many
...his new concerto
...assification. The
...iniature band is
...sichord emerges
...most of the in-
...e.

Spanish folk
...t patterns is a
...leverness. The
...e work was the
...for harpsichord
...is still the best
...this combina-

...with Beetho-
...ayed composer
...gorously. The
...ymphony was
...k by the Bos-
...Ir. Koussevit-
...rk Symphony
..., the latter
...oo late for
...Sibelius is the
...although his
...literary va-
... makes any
... and most of
...ul projection
...not captivat-
... but it wears
...omes accus-
...m one dis-
...ing tender-

...MES

...TURNS
...Orchestra
...sting.
... Russian
...Symphony
...o Boston
...enth con-
...h will be
...ymphony
...e feature
... in ad-
...be heard
...ch is of
...nd "The ...n, which
...ago, be-
...f ultra-
...position
... of the
... Patten
... depart-
...ity and
...us, the
...which is
...tween a
...nts and
...remarks
... Fourth
...of a set
... for the
... 1721.
...cularly

...ny
...lly speak-
...y the Bos-
... under its
...r," Serge
...d Theater
...ary 6, at
... "Erotica
...which will
... and the ... Prokofieff
...for Three
... will per-
...from Ger-
...spective-
...delius will
...symphonic
... moments
...usic that
... Kousse-
...tra play
...pretation
... music.
... may be
...wick of
...1.

SYMPHONY IN 13TH CONCERT

HER JAN 22

Boston Orchestra Gives Fine Performance of Rousel's Suite

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso for strings, B minor, No. 12; Bach, Brandenburg Concerto, No. 4, G major, for violin, two flutes and strings; Roussel Suite in F major (first performance) Scriabin, "The Poem of Ecstasy."

Whenever we hear one of Handel's concertos we realize the justice of Joh F. Runciman's characterization of th composer: "Mr. George Frideric Hand is by far the most superb personag one meets in the history of music." An if he "lived his life straight through i the grand manner," he also wrote i the grand manner.

It was interesting to note yesterda the contrast between the concertos b Handel and Bach. In each work ther is a "concertino" or group of solo ir struments: in Handel's, two violins an a violoncello, played yesterday b Messrs. Burgin, Theodorowicz and Be detti; in Bach's, a solo violin and two flutes (Messrs Burgin, Laurent and Bladet). There the resemblance ceases. There is difference in manner of workmanship, as there is in mood and spirit.

The grand style is evident throughout Handel's music; the concerto of Bach is more in the manner of a chamber work. Handel is authoritative, sure of himself, exulting in his strength. What he has to say is worth saying; when he has said his say, he stops. The performance of the solo players in Bach's concerto was worthy of all praise. It was not their fault that the music for them seemed inconsequential, interminable chatter; pattern music, music written by the yard; music that might have stopped anywhere after a dozen or more measures, or gone on for half an hour. Handel, with the simplest means, produced music of astonishing vitality. What other composer has composed a slow movement so full of sonorous beauty, at once majestic and tender, as that in this 12th concerto, which for some unaccountable reason is seldom played! Note, too, the little transitional slow movement just before the fugal finale is attacked. And so, after the performance of "The Poem of Ecstasy," the one abiding memory was that of Handel's music as interpreted, also in the grand and simple manner, by Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky, always fortunate in his reading of 18th century music, fully answered the demand of Romain Rolland with regard to the performance of Handel's instrumental works: "When you have studied with minute care each detail, obtained from your orchestra an irreproachable precision, tonal purity, and finish, you will have done nothing unless you have made the face of the improvising genius rise from the work."

Roussel's Suite for full orchestra was composed last year expressly for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky, to whom the score is dedicated. Roussel had no literary program in mind while he was writing the suite. To use his own words it is "de la musique pure."

The musical idiom of this composer, disclosed in works that have been performed in Boston, has been to us as a foreign tongue, except possibly in "The Spider's Festival," which was written as a ballet for the stage. French critics admire his compositions; Mr. Koussevitzky thinks highly of him. Roussel has been described by M. Coeuroy as "pure music." It has been said that his soul, wishing to be only tenderness and modesty, "palpitates" in his more important works. To us these works may contain emotion, but it is as repressed as if Roussel had lived in the New England of the 18th century; as if, whatever passion ravaged his soul, in his music he would be the Spartan boy: as if, appreciating beauty, he would blush if he were caught in the act of appreciation.

In the Sarabande of this Suite we find glimpses of the Roussel known to us of old, now imbued with a certain warmth; possessed also by the stately, melancholy mood of the Spanish dance; but in the Prelude and the Gigue, lo, a new Roussel, obviously lively, joyous, laughing as he neatly foots it. Is it possible that he thus thought to please American taste, and wrote the Sarabande to please himself? If in the merry movements he let himself go, he did it as an accomplished musician and a well-bred man. There is no bid for immediate popularity; no deliberate introduction of that which, though common and unclean, would excite noisy applause even from a Symphony audience in Boston.

We all know the devotion and affection shown by Mr. Koussevitzky toward Scriabin living and dead. They worked together, they toured together in Scriabin's life time; now that Scriabin is no more, his former colleague and his still faithful friend delights in paying tribute to his memory. It is not surprising then that Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday gave an extraordinarily eloquent reading of a work, which—no doubt to our misfortune—does not appeal to us. Leaving out of the question the strange inflated poem written by Scriabin for this composition; paying no attention to his theosophic and neoplatonic theories, we cannot admire the musical form, contents, expression.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Prokofieff, Classic symphony (first time in Boston); Aaron Copland, Concerto for piano and orchestra (first performance); Schumann,

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 22 1927

HANDEL AND BACH, BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, after a brief respite from his arduous duties of the season thus far, has returned to Boston and will conduct the 13th Saturday evening concert of the orchestra, which will be broadcast by Station WBZ direct from Symphony hall in Boston tonight.

The concert will be broadcast also by Station WJZ in New York city with the broadcast originating at WBZA in Boston. The concert is one which should prove of great interest to lovers of the classics of Handel and Bach, for these two composers hold the feature position on the musical bill. In addition, the orchestra will be heard in a suite by Roussel, which is of more modern construction, and "The Poem of Ecstasy" by Scriabin, which was written about 20 years ago, before the new movement of ultra-modernism in musical composition became recognized.

Just prior to the opening of the program, Prof John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston university and Holy Cross college, will discuss the Concerto Grosso of Handel, which is in the form of a dialog between a number of the solo instruments and the string orchestra. His remarks will also include the Bach Fourth Brandenburg Concerto, one of a set of works written especially for the Margrave of Brandenburg in 1721.

This number provides a particularly favorable opportunity to enjoy Bach's skilful use of orchestral instruments, and his unequaled genius in weaving melodies together.

The suite by Roussel, modern French composer, was finished only last August. This was written especially for the Boston Symphony orchestra and is dedicated to Mr Koussevitzky, the conductor.

During the intermission, Prof Marshall will treat the Scriabin "Poem of Ecstasy." The is one of the great Russian composer's most important works, in which, according to his own statements, he sought to express "the emotional side of his own philosophy of life." In his remarks during the intermission, Prof Marshall will have the assistance of Nicholas Slonimsky, personal secretary to Mr Koussevitzy, and a pianist of note. The illustrations in the earlier talks will be presented by Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist. The complete program

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JAN 22 1927

business meeting.

MUCH INTEREST SHOWN IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

Interest in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will make its first local appearance on Monday evening, January 31, at the Shubert Playhouse under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association, grows more intense as the date approaches.

This is only natural. The orchestra is one of the really great musical organizations of the world and its present leader, Seige Koussevitzky, who has been with it since 1924, came to this country from Europe preceded by a record of achievements that assured him an unrivalled place among contemporary directors.

He has prepared the program for the Wilmington concert that is designed to please admirers of both classic and modern music.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, will give its third concert of the Monday evening series tomorrow in Symphony hall at 8:15. On Tuesday and Wednesday, Jan 25 and 26, at 4 o'clock there will be young people's concerts, to be conducted by Richard Burgin. The 14th regular pair of Symphony concerts will be given on the following Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the 28th and 29th.

HER JAN 23

The Monday program will include Handel's Concerto for Strings, No. 12; Vaughan Williams's "Norfolk Rhapsody," Achron's Concerto for Violin and orchestra and Schumann's Symphony in B flat major. Joseph Achron will be the soloist.

At the 14th program of concerts Aaron Copeland, the American composer, will appear as soloist in his new piano concerto. The concert will open with Prokofieff's classical symphony and close with a repetition of the first symphony of Schumann in B flat.

The young people's program will be overture to "Fra Diavolo"; a ballet-suite from Gluck's operas, arranged by Mottl; Saint-Saens's "Danse Macabre," Grieg's "Spring," a violin solo from Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake," by Julius Theodorowicz; Grainger's "Molly on the Shore" and a processional from the second act of Wagner's "Tannhaeuser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegram
JAN 22 1927

'Nother Concert by Boston Symphony

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will be broadcast by WJZ at 8:30 o'clock this evening. This concert will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, and the pick-up made by the engineering staff of WBZ and relayed to WJZ by wire line.

Professor John P. Marshall, the head of the department of music at Boston University and Holy Cross College, will interpret the symphony program for the benefit of the radio audience. Professor Marshall's experience along musical lines renders him particularly fitted for this important work. He was organist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1909 to 1918, and during the World War he served as musical aide to the commanding general of the Northeastern and Western departments of the United States Army and was later appointed assistant director of camp music of the entire army. With such an excellent musical background, Professor Marshall is well qualified for the task of interpreting the symphony programs to radio listeners, and his broadcasts are certain to make the symphony program more valuable and appreciated by the listeners.

THIS CLIPPING FROM AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 22 1927

THE concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky will be broadcast by WJZ and WBZ at 8.30 o'clock tonight. This concert will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, and the pick-up made by the engineering staff of WBZ and relayed to WJZ by wire line.

Prof. John P. Marshall, the head of the Department of Music at Boston University and Holy Cross College, will interpret the symphony program for the benefit of the radio audience. Professor Marshall's experience along musical lines renders him particularly fitted for this important work. He was organist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1909 to 1918 and during the World War he served as musical aide to the commanding general of the Northeastern and Western Departments of the United States Army, and was later appointed assistant director of camp music of the entire Army. With such an excellent musical background, Professor Marshall is well qualified for the task of interpreting the symphony programs to radio listeners, and his broadcasts are certain to make the symphony program more valuable and appreciated by the listeners.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHES... WPCH INAUGURA...

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will be broadcast by WJZ at 8:30 o'clock to-night. This concermt will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, and the pick-up made by the engineering staff of WBZ and relayed to WJZ by wire line.

Professor John P. Marshall, the head of the department of music at Boston University and Holy Cross College, will interpret the symphony program for the benefit of the radio audience. Professor Marshall's experience along musical lines renders him particularly fitted for this important work. He was organist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1909 to 1918 and during the World War he served as musical aide to the commanding general of the Northeastern and Western departments of the United States Army, and was later appointed assistant director of Camp Music of the entire army. With such an excellent musical background Professor Marshall is well qualified for the task of interpreting the symphony programs to radio listeners, and his broadcasts are certain to make the symphony program more valuable and appreciated by the listeners.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JAN 22 1927

HANDEL AND BACH, BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitsky Will Conduct 13th Radio Concert of the Series Tonight from WBZ

Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, after a brief respite from his arduous duties of the season thus far, has returned to Boston and will conduct the 13th Saturday evening concert of the orchestra, which will be broadcast by Station WBZ direct from Symphony hall in Boston tonight.

The concert will be broadcast also by Station WJZ in New York city with the broadcast originating at WBZA in Boston. The concert is one which should prove of great interest to lovers of the classics of Handel and Bach, for these two composers hold the feature position on the musical bill. In addition, the orchestra will be heard in a suite by Roussel, which is of more modern construction, and "The Poem of Ecstasy" by Scriabin, which was written about 20 years ago, before the new movement of ultra-modernism in musical composition became recognized.

Just prior to the opening of the program, Prof John Patten Marshall, head of the music departments of the Boston university and Holy Cross college, will discuss the Concerto Grosso of Handel, which is in the form of a dialog between a number of the solo instruments and the string orchestra. His remarks will also include the Bach Fourth Brandenburg Concerto, one of a set of works written especially for the Margrave of Brandenburg in 1721. This number provides a particularly favorable opportunity to enjoy Bach's skilful use of orchestral instruments, and his unequaled genius in weaving melodies together.

The suite by Roussel, modern French composer, was finished only last August. This was written especially for the Boston Symphony orchestra and is dedicated to Mr Koussevitzky, the conductor.

During the intermission, Prof Marshall will treat the Scriabin "Poem of Ecstasy." The is one of the great Russian composer's most important works, in which, according to his own statements, he sought to express "the emotional side of his own philosophy of life." In his remarks during the intermission, Prof Marshall will have the assistance of Nicholas Slonimsky, personal secretary to Mr Koussevitzy, and a pianist of note. The illustrations in the earlier talks will be presented by Miss Marjorie Posselt, violinist, and Miss Margaret Starr McLain, pianist. The complete program follows:—

WORK...

JAN 22 ...

PROF. MARSHALL TO GIVE MUSIC COURSE

State Extension Class For All Who Are Interested Opens Monday

John P. Marshall, professor of music at Holy Cross and Boston university, and radio lecturer from Station WBZ on Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will give the State University Extension course in classical and modern music at Worcester. The course will open Monday evening at 7.15 o'clock at the Classical High school.

Previous to this year many Worcester residents have gone to Boston to take courses by Prof. Marshall. In offering this course here an endeavor has been made by the State educational department to serve music lovers in their own city. This series of eight lectures is designed to be attractive both to persons who have a considerable knowledge of music and to those who have little knowledge but great appreciation.

Included in the course will be a study of the characteristics of the classical style with emphasis on the sonata, symphony, concerts and classical overture. There will be a discussion of the three great classical masters, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, with an outline of their lives and works. Study of the early romanticists will be centered about Schumann, Chopin, Liszt and Berlioz.

Of especial interest will be the lecturs on modern schools of composition including movements in France and Russia as well as other countries. Some time will also be devoted to a study of the recent changes in music and the tendencies in contemporaneous musical development. Mr. Marshall will illustrate this series of talks, playing compositions referred to on the piano.

The course may be taken by simply attending the lectures with no outside preparation. Certificates will be granted, however, only to students who satisfactorily complete assigned work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILMINGTON, DEL.
STAR
84
JAN 23 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE ON JANUARY 31

The first appearance in Wilmington of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place on Monday evening, January 31, at the Shubert Playhouse under the auspices of the Delaware Musical Association. This engagement has aroused much interest in the local musical world, both by reason of the excellence of the orchestra, which is one of the outstanding organizations of its kind, and because of the dynamic personality of Serge Koussevitzky who has been its leader since 1924.

Koussevitzky is a native of Tver in the North of Russia and his career began when he was twelve. This sounds like a fairy tale but it is true that at that advanced age he was conducting the orchestra in his old home town, a job which he relinquished to enter the conservatory of Moscow.

While still but a youth he learned of a vacancy in the orchestra of the St. Petersburg Imperial Grand Opera Theatre and he decided to compete for it.

The aspirants were mostly graduates from the local conservatory. One among them was pointed out as the "star" who would certainly get the position.

But, undaunted, Koussevitsky, a virtuoso on the doublebass, who had much opposition, responded to the call of t judges and was the first one to play. I finished amid spontaneous applau which was against the rules in a contes of this character.

He comes to Wilmington preceded by a wonderful reputation as leader, artist and program builder. Those who hear him and the Boston Symphony are assured of a rare treat.

THIS CLIPPING FROM POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 23 1927

Klemperer and Koussevitzky Conduct Here Feb. 1 and 2

OTTO KLEMPERER, famous German guest conductor, who achieved a brilliant success with the New York Symphony Orchestra last season during his first American tour with that organization, has been invited to return for a short season. He will conduct the New York Orchestra in Washington at Poli's Theater under Mrs. Wilson-Greene's management Tuesday afternoon, February 1, at 4:30 o'clock. This will be the last concert here by the orchestra for 1926-27.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has re-established that famous organization on the high artistic plane it occupied prior to the war, will conduct the orchestra when it makes its first appearance of the season in Washington at Poli's Theater Wednesday afternoon, February 2, at 4:30 o'clock. This will be the second in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic course of afternoon concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SENTINAL
JAN 22 1927

LISTEN

By DIAL

NEITHER the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, broadcast by the blue chain, nor the concert by the New York Symphony orchestra, broadcast by the red chain, came thru perfectly last night.

Only the latter part of the Boston Symphony came thru with such clarity that all of the many instruments of the orchestra could be heard. The concert by the New York Symphony, under the direction of Walter Damrosch, came almost an hour later and had the advantage of a clearer air.

I went all over the dial last night. There was the general run of Saturday night programs familiar to all radio listeners. In general the air wa...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 23 1927

Brilliant Program Will Be Played By Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky Selects Beethoven's "Eroica" as Feature of Concert

A program of exceeding brilliance, which represents the foremost achievements of symphonic music, has been made by Serge Koussevitzky for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 108 musicians, to Hartford in the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 6, at 3 o'clock.

The Russian conductor is now in his third season in America and at the head of this famous orchestra. Once the foremost figure in the orchestral concerts of Russia and later in Paris, London and western Europe, this leader has likewise succeeded in America in no uncertain fashion. His brilliant and magnetic personality, his intense artistic vision and sincerity, his exacting command as a leader have all made their impress upon the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This organization, long known as one of the very finest in the world, has in general opinion never sounded more eloquent than under Koussevitzky's direction.

Serge Koussevitzky

The principal number on the program will be Beethoven's Third Symphony, "Eroica." Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra plan to observe the centennial anniversary of the master's death next spring with a series of performances of his principal works. Prominent in this festival will be the mighty Eroica Symphony, and its performance in Hartford will also be in the nature of a tribute to Beethoven. A notable novelty on this program will be a suite from Prokofieff's Opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." This talented young Russian composer is perhaps best known by the opera which was produced by the Chicago Opera Company several seasons ago, and this season in Germany, with conspicuous success. The remaining numbers will be Debussy's Nocturne, "Fetes" ("Festivals"), the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," and to close, the symphonic Poem, "Finlandia," by Sibelius.

The concert will be given under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick.

Seats are now on sale at McCoy's Music Store at No. 89 Asylum street. For reservations, phone 2-2251.

CONCERTO PLAYED BY COMPOSER

Achron's Work on Hebrew Themes Heard With Symphony

Post JAN

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In accordance with the custom established for the Monday evening Symphony concerts by Mr. Koussevitzky, that of last evening, the third of the current series, offered three orchestral pieces previously heard this season and one fresher item as vehicle for the assisting artist, namely, Joseph Achron's new Violin Concerto on Hebrew themes, in which the composer was himself the solo-

WITH SYMPATHY

Some 15 chants of the synagogue, "treated freely," comprise the melodic thought of the first of the two movements of Mr. Achron's Concerto, and two Palestinian dances make that of the second. As composer Mr. Achron has handled this material with evident sympathy. The hoarse cry for wind-instruments at the outset conjures up the vision of ancient, half-barbaric Jewry to which the music of Bloch has already wonted us, and the piece abounds in characteristic passages.

Before the Concerto came Handel's splendid Concerto Grosso, No. 12, in B minor, awakened by Mr. Koussevitzky last week from its 20 years' sleep on the library shelf, and Vaughan Williams' first Norfolk Rhapsody, which, beautifuly performed, further strengthened the marked impression made on its first hearing a few weeks ago, while for his share in this performance Mr. Lefranc, the first violist took a well-deserved bow. Here is a most valuable addition to the repertory of our orchestra.

Schumann's tuneful if unsymphonic B-flat major Symphony brought t

ORCHESTRA GIVES MONDAY CONCERT

Symphony Program Includes Handel Concerto

Herald Jan 24

The third symphony concert of the Monday series. Mr. Koussevitzky led off grandly with Handel's concerto, Grosso, for string orchestra, that in B minor, No. 12. If this music pleased last Friday, as by all accounts it did, on Saturday it must have given, by all report, deeper pleasure still. But only last night did this music appear in the full majesty of its glory. The wonder is that the grandeur of the first movement did not bring the hearers to their knees; still meekly kneeling they might fittingly have listened to the pure beauty of the second. And to the mystery-haunted measures of the finale's introduction everybody must indeed have listened in amaze, to think that Handel, in his century, could have written them. The performance was superb.

So was that of Schumann's B flat symphony, so splendid that the audience at the end broke into that snapping kind of hearty applause one does not hear after every piece. They must have forgotten for the moment that poor Schumann, in his ignorance of orchestration, did wrong to try his hand at a symphony.

Whether he did or not, the symphony sounded extremely well last night, which fact would seem to suggest that conductors are a factor in the matter. Or can it be that Schumann, actually ahead of his time, liked a type of instrumentation that once seemed thick and muddy, but now sounds clear enough and not too dense, after all that has come between? Or may it be only that idle talk, once set on foot, is slow to die? To talk of ignorance, in face of last night's performance of Schumann's beautiful music, savors in truth of idleness.

Between these two great pieces came a violin concerto by Joseph Achron, with the composer in person to play the solo part. Mr. Achron states in the program book: "The first part is built on elements of Hebrew synagogue chants. The themes are 15 in number."

They seemed too many by far last night for a single movement of a concerto. Though association may have made them clear to some listeners, to other people they sounded, all but two or three, formless and unmeaning. The harmonic treatment Mr. Achron dealt them made many sound downright unpleasant—and lacking, withal, in the vitality that keeps some of Mr. Block's Hebraic music absorbing.

The second movement, based on Palestinan dances, at the least of it is not dismal. But though a composer of today can hardly treat folk tunes archaically, still, unless he is stirred to some extent to picture the conditions under which folk tunes thrive, might he not better let them alone? To pull those dances about—pleasant in themselves—in Mr. Achron's way, helped them not at all. Neither did it result in music either beautiful or picturesque. Mr. Achron played the solo music smoothly and with evident ease. Grate-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 24 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A feature of the interesting program selected for the coming Hartford concer of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Capitol theater, February 6, will be Wagner's "Lohengrin."

Liszt described Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin" as "a sort of magic formula which, like a mysterious initiation, prepares our souls for the sight of unaccustomed things, and of a higher significat n than that of our terrestrial life." It begins with soft, unearthly chords in the topmos register of the orchestra. It is Wagner's first music of the Holy Grail. It descends and becomes full-bodied, as man struggles to rise to the divine, ineffable gift. The prelude ends as it began—in the "clear blue of heaven and the presence of the angelic hosts."

Public opinion prevails that Mr. Koussevitzky's brilliant and sympathetic interpretations serve the music to full measure.

Reservations may be obtained by calling Frank Sedgwick at McCoy's Music store, No. 89 Asylum street, telephone 2-2251.

THIRD OF MONDAY EVENING CONCERTS

Achron Plays Solo Part in New Violin Concerto

GLOBE JAN 24

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard in Works Previously Given

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave last night its third concert of the Monday evening series. With the exception of a new violin concerto by Joseph Achron, who himself played the solo part, all the works forming the program had already been heard at concerts of the Friday and Saturday series. There are none, however, that it was not pleasing to hear again, even after so short a lapse of time.

There was the Handel Concert Grosso in B minor for string orchestra—music which in its original, most est setting must have worn a simple dignity, a more naive charm, than when sung by so large, so sonorous and so well disciplined a body strings as that to which it was confided last night.

The Vaughan Williams "Norfo Rhapsody, which followed, is an extremely beautiful and sincere wor Its marvelous evocation of the Norfo land scape, the tang of its salt and the plaintive notes of its wat fowl, wrought their charm even up those, and they were of course t majority, to whom it brought no me ories. The skill with which folk son have been used to build up the pictu without seeming to have been drag in by the hair, the extraordin charm and economy of the orches tion and the coherence of the str ture are all evidence of a techni none the less masterly for being obtrusive.

Joseph Achron's Concerto for Vi and Orchestra, op 60, is a work wh at first repels the hearer with the l ancy of its orchestration, the rel less cacophony of its harmonies the whirling illusiveness of its m dic scheme. Of its two parts, the f is built upon Hebrew synagogue cha 15 of them, elaborately and con puntally developed and much extend as the composer's program notes us. The second part is based upon t Palestinian dance melodies, handl in a manner which Mr Achron h self describes as "jugglery."

Despite its undoubted clumsiness a overelaboration the work does succe in conveying to an uncanny degree spirit of the Jewry of the ghettos, fanaticism, its hysteria and strident its naive humor and sentimental and that disorderliness and appar irreverence which Pepys was shocked to observe in its synagogue

Mr Achron, who played the diffic violin part with transcendent vi tuosity, received warm, if somewh puzzled, applause.

The evening ended more mildly wi Schumann's "First Symphony" in flat, a work ingratiating in a variet of ways, all romantic, in which M Koussevitzky spread himself wit great gusto and tremendous effective ness.

The next concert in this series tak place Feb 21.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 24 1927

Boston Symphony

A feature of the interesting program selected for the coming Hartford concert of the Orchestra at the Capitol Theater, February 6, will be Wagner's "Lohengrin." Liszt described Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin" as "a sort of magic formula which, like a mysterious initiation, prepares our souls for the sight of unaccustomed things, and of a higher signification than that of our terrestrial life." It begins with soft, unearthly chords in the topmost register of the orchestra. It is Wagner's first music of the Holy Grail. It descends and becomes full-bodied, as man struggles to rise to the divine, ineffable gift. The prelude ends as it began, in the "clear blue of heaven, and the presence of the angelic hosts." Public opinion prevails that Mr. Koussevitzky's brilliant and sympathetic interpretations serve the music to full measure. Reservations may be obtained by calling Frank A. Sedgwick at McCoy's music store, No. 89 Asylum street,—2-2251.

ACHRON PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

TRAV JAN 25

Violinist Performs Own Composition at Symphony Concert

Joseph Achron, violinist, was soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening, when Serge Koussevitzky conducted the third of this season's series of Monday evening concerts.

Mr. Achron played with the orchestra his new violin concerto. In addition, the program included the Concerto Grosso by Handel, which was played at the regular concerts of the orchestlast week; Vaughan Williams's first Norfolk Rhapsody and Schumann's first symphony.

Mr. Achron's concerto makes lavish use of Hebrew themes. The first movement, which boast no less than 15 themes of varied lengths, is built, according to the composer's own description, on elements of synagogue chants treated freely. The result is brilliant snatches, but more frequently incoherent and baffling. The second part, which juggles dextrously two Palestinian dance melodies, has more to reward a first hearing. The concerto is dedicated to Jascha Heifetz, fittingly, for it seems prodigiously difficult. Mr. Achron played with skill and plenty of fire.

Vaughan Williams's lively rhapsody bridged the gap neatly between Handel and Achron. The concert ended with very notable performance of Schumann's charming "Spring" symphony.

The next concert of this series will take place Feb. 21.

HANDEL'S DAY AND THIS

TRANS JAN 25

Mr. Koussevitzky Blends the Eighteenth Century with Music of Today—Vaughan Williams and Schumann — Achron and His Multiple Themes for Contrast

IT was an evening in which pure beauty was first in men's minds—and that from negative as well as positive considerations. The occasion was the third Monday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Upon the program stood Handel's twelfth Concerto Grosso, forgotten these many years until last week's concerts brought it welcome revival; Vaughan Williams's first Norfolk Rhapsody, based on five folk melodies from Old England; Joseph Achron's Violin Concerto, Opus 60, with the composer as soloist; Schumann's first Symphony—of the Spring.

That a composition such as Handels concerto should gather the dust of years on library shelves is an anomaly. Master works there are in great quantity, in great variety, upon the shelves of the library at Symphony Hall. Not too many of them may claim pure beauty such as that which inheres in this concerto. In other ways many of them interest, justify themselves. But for beauty in and of itself none can surpass this work. Witness the striding dignity, warm and sonorous, of the opening Largo, the play of the Allegro, the unearthly melody of the Larghetto, the color of the next Largo, the rhythms of the final Allegro. What if this last Allegro does not maintain the sustained plane of elevation of the other movements? Standing by itself one would call it most excellent Handel; coming after the exceptional earlier movements it does in no wise detract from the impression made by them. But what does it matter? If ever Handel was transported to the heavens while in the act of composition, as he is supposed to have said to himself while composing the "Messiah," it must have been while writing some of the music of his concerto. And to play such music the strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with their leader, Mr. Koussevitzky, are ideal vehicle. Does one consider performance from the point of view of tone, or of balance of parts, or of purity of line or sweep of rhythm, of imaginative expressiveness, or—most important of all—from the point of view of spiritual message, one can only reiterate, it was ideal.

Again, pure beauty sat upon every note, every measure of Vaughan Williams's Norfolk Rhapsody. Oh, the delicious sonorities he summons! And when were ever two three-note motives so freighted with mysterious significance, so utterly weighted down with inexpressible poetry as those two motives which Mr. Vaughan Williams so lovingly fondles at the beginning and near the close of his Rhapsody? From one beauty one passes to another. The tones, the pliant curves of the ciola solo are lovely sequel to the imaginative beginning. Increasing in motion as in volume, the climactic sections conceal all their contrapuntal tricks, maintain and amplify the mood in which the beginnings have already drenched the hearer. And the descent to the simplicities and the graces of the beginning is as laden with beauty as the beginning itself. If this be folk-song, there must be sweetness unlimited in the soul of him who gives it such setting. And a match for him last evening were Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Lefranc, and the gentlemen of the orchestra. Yes, last evening Mr. Vaughan Williams, Mr. Serge Koussevitzky, Mr. J. Lefranc, and a hundred others, were high priests in the temple of pure beauty. Nothing less—pure beauty.

After an intermission one listened to the joys of Schumann's Spring Symphony. If some of the procedures of dear Robert (he was little more than a newly-wed when he composed this symphony) by their occasional naiveté of orchestration or of rhythmic grouping or of theme itself, tend to draw a smile from the experienced listener, what matters it? Again beauty stands high in the list of qualities which one must ascribe to this symphony. But its exuberance, its youthful freshness, makes it a perennial joy. One always likes to listen to this symphony. With Dr. Muck it gave surprising pleasure; with Mr. Koussevitzky not a whit less. With a strong arm he hurls out its occasional martial motives; but with delicacy and finesse he etches its playful, sportive measures; while with full voice he sings its songs. The whole leaves a good taste in the mouth. It is, as the common phrase runs, "delightfully refreshing."

Between Williams's Rhapsody and Schumann's Symphony stood Mr. Achron's concerto. "Pure beauty" may still be our text, but considered now somewhat regretfully, because of its temporary eclipse. Mr. Achron tells us (also a bit naively?) in a program note, "The themes are fifteen in number; some being many measures in length; others, only a few." And this applied only to the first of the two parts. Before one hea a single note the vision themes brought uneasiness to the mind. Mr. Achron takes his seventeen themes (there were two in the last division) from Hebraic sources. As Mr. Vaughan Williams busies himself with the folk lore of England, so Mr. Achron would busy himself with the folk lore of his race. He has written violin pieces in which he has done high service for this folk lore. But in the concerto of last evening he sought to deck it out with all the harmonic trappings which the art of music spewed out during that noisy period of from about 1912 to about 1924. Two representations one must make to Mr. Achron. The genius who could succeed in producing a movement well knit, unified, coherent, orderly, out of fifteen unrelated themes, is yet to be born. Secondly, the harmonic noises of the era 1912-1924 as a rule find their justification in some unusual programmatic scheme. They were the result of a search to widen the bounds of musical expressiveness, not expressiveness as one finds it in abstract music, but the expressiveness which desires to communior picture or amplify certain things outside of musical art itself. As such they usually made their point, created a little astonishment on the side, and were promptly discarded by their makers in favor of new experiments. From such discarded devices Mr. Achron has made choice, has juxtaposed them as background for his seventeen themes. But what would make sense with programmatic justification (possibly even at second-hand) is utterly sterile without.

TRAN JAN 25

Blessed be the modernists! Every great period in the history of music has had its imitators, its hangers-on, its followers of method without message. From such parasites Wagner and Debussy have perhaps suffered the worst. But when one of these 1912-24 modernists (to use a common phrase) "crawls into a hole" with a given piece, he "takes the hole in after him" and none thereafter, no, not the composer himself (the figure breaks down here, the fact remains) may explore in those same regions with impunity. Further, this entire group of composers seem to have broken with its past, to be going back to the eighteenth century for its ideals. This break is so definite, so complete, so thorough-going, that none may dare ignore it without labelling himself definitely as of a discarded and wornout past. Thus the copier of models in the year 1927 on two scores knows not where to lay his weary and searching head Blessed be the modernists!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 25 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Debussy's Nocturne "Fetes" constitutes one of the numbers of the brilliant program selected by Sergei Koussevitzky for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Hartford at the Capitol theater, February 6.

The score is dedicated to Georges Hartman, the late music publisher. Jean Marnold contributed an elaborate study of these Nocturnes and in anaylsis arrived at the conclusion "that in ten centuries of the evolution of our musical art there is, perhaps, not one instance of such an important step as this in advance." Philip Hale in reviewing the Boston concert comments that, "surely Debussy must have wished his 'Festivals' to be performed as Koussevitzky read it, for only from Mr. Koussevitzky has so gorgeous, so thrilling, so festal a performance been heard in Boston."

Reservations may be secured at McCoy's Music store, No. 89 Asylum street, telephone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 25 1927

Boston Symphony

Debussy's Nocturne "Fetes" constitutes one of the numbers of the brilliant program selected by Sergei Koussevitzky for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Hartford at the Capitol Theater, February sixth. The score is dedicated to Georges Hartman, the late music publisher. Jean Marnold contributed an elaborate study of these Nocturnes and in analysis arrived at the conclusion; "that in ten centuries of the evolution of our musical art there is, perhaps, not one instance of such an important step as this in advance."

Philip Hale, in reviewing the Boston concert, comments that, "surely Debussy must have wished his 'Festivals' to be performed as Koussevitzky read it, for only from Mr. Koussevitzky has so generous, so thrilling so festal a performance been heard in Boston."

Reservations may be secured at McCoy's Music store, 89 Asylum street. Phone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RECORD
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
JAN 25 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A programme of exceeding brilliance, which represents the foremost achievements of symphonic music, has been made by Sergei Koussevitzky for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 108 musicians, to Hartford, in the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon,

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 23 1927

Brilliant Program Will Be Played By Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky Selects Beethoven's "Eroica" as Feature of Concert

A program of exceeding brilliance, which represents the foremost achievements of symphonic music, has been made by Serge Koussevitzky for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 108 musicians, to Hartford in the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 6, at 3 o'clock.

The Russian conductor is now in his third season in America and at the head of this famous orchestra. Once the foremost figure in the orchestral concerts of Russia and later in Paris, London and western Europe, this leader has likewise succeeded in America in no uncertain fashion. His brilliant and magnetic personality, his intense artistic vision and sincerity, his exacting command as a leader have all made their impress upon the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This organization, long known as one of the very finest in the world, has in general opinion never sounded more eloquent than under Koussevitzky's direction.

Serge Koussevitzky

The principal number on the program will be Beethoven's Third Symphony, "Eroica." Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra plan to observe the centennial anniversary of the master's death next spring with a series of performances of his principal works. Prominent in this festival will be the mighty Eroica Symphony, and its performance in Hartford will also be in the nature of a tribute to Beethoven. A notable novelty on this program will be a suite from Prokofieff's Opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." This talented young Russian composer is perhaps best known by the opera which was produced by the Chicago Opera Company several seasons ago, and this season in Germany, with conspicuous success. The remaining numbers will be Debussy's Nocturne, "Fetes" ("Festivals"), the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," and to close, the symphonic Poem, "Finlandia," by Sibelius.

The concert will be given under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick.

Seats are now on sale at McCoy's Music Store at No. 89 Asylum street. For reservations, phone 2-2251.

CONCERTO PLAYED BY COMPOSER

Achron's Work on Hebrew Themes Heard With Symphony

Post JAN

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In accordance with the custom established for the Monday evening Symphony concerts by Mr. Koussevitzky, that of last evening, the third of the current series, offered three orchestral pieces previously heard this season and one fresher item, a vehicle for the assisting artist, namely, Joseph Achron's new Violin Concerto on Hebrew themes, in which the composer was himself the soloist.

WITH SYMPATHY

Some 15 chants of the synagogue, "treated freely," comprise the melodic thought of the first of the two movements of Mr. Achron's Concerto, and two Palestinian dances make that of the second. As composer Mr. Achron has handled this material with evident sympathy. The hoarse cry for wind-instruments at the outset conjures up the vision of ancient, half-barbaric Jewry to which the music of Bloch has already wonted us, and the piece abounds in characteristic passages.

Before the Concerto came Handel's splendid Concerto Grosso, No. 12, in B minor, awakened by Mr. Koussevitzky last week from its 20 years' sleep on the library shelf, and Vaughan Williams' first Norfolk Rhapsody which, beautifuly performed, further strengthened the marked impression made on its first hearing a few weeks ago, while for his share in this performance Mr. Lefranc, the first violist took a well-deserved bow. Here is a most valuable addition to the repertory of our orchestra.

Schumann's tuneful if unsymphonic B-flat major Symphony brought the

ORCHESTRA GIVES MONDAY CONCERT

Symphony Program Includes Handel Concerto

Herald Jan 24

The third symphony concert of the Monday series. Mr. Koussevitzky led off grandly with Handel's concerto, Grosso, for string orchestra, that in B minor, No. 12. If this music pleased last Friday, as by all accounts it did, on Saturday it must have given, by all report, deeper pleasure still. But only last night did this music appear in the full majesty of its glory. The wonder is that the grandeur of the first movement did not bring the hearers to their knees; still meekly kneeling they might fittingly have listened to the pure beauty of the second. And to the mystery-haunted measures of the finale's introduction everybody must indeed have listened in amaze, to think that Handel, in his century, could have written them. The performance was superb.

So was that of Schumann's B flat symphony, so splendid that the audience at the end broke into that snapping kind of hearty applause one does not hear after every piece. They must have forgotten for the moment that poor Schumann, in his ignorance of orchestration, did wrong to try his hand at a symphony.

Whether he did or not, the symphony sounded extremely well last night, which fact would seem to suggest that conductors are a factor in the matter. Or can it be that Schumann, actually ahead of his time, liked a type of instrumentation that once seemed thick and muddy, but now sounds clear enough and not too dense, after all that has come between? Or may it be only that idle talk, once set on foot, is slow to die? To talk of ignorance, in face of last night's performance of Schumann's beautiful music, savors in truth of idleness.

Between these two great pieces came a violin concerto by Joseph Achron, with the composer in person to play the solo part. Mr. Achron states in the program book: "The first part is built on elements of Hebrew synagogue chants. The themes are 15 in number."

They seemed too many by far last night for a single movement of a concerto. Though association may have made them clear to some listeners, to other people they sounded, all but two or three, formless and unmeaning. The harmonic treatment Mr. Achron dealt them made many sound downright unpleasant—and lacking, withal, in the vitality that keeps some of Mr. Block's Hebraic music absorbing.

The second movement, based on Palestinan dances, at the least of it is not dismal. But though a composer of today can hardly treat folk tunes archaically, still, unless he is stirred to some extent to picture the conditions under which folk tunes thrive, might he not better let them alone? To put those dances about—pleasant in themselves—in Mr. Achron's way, helped them not at all. Neither did it result in music either beautiful or picturesque. Mr. Achron played the solo music smoothly and with evident ease. Grate-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 24 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A feature of the interesting program selected for the coming Hartford concer of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Capitol theater, February 6, will be Wagner's "Lohengrin."

Liszt described Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin" as "a sort of magic formula which, like a mysterious initiation, prepares our souls for the sight of unaccustomed things, and of a higher significat n than that of our terrestrial life." It begins with soft, unearthly chords in the topmos register of the orchestra. It is Wagner's first music of the Holy Grail. It descends and becones full-bodied, as man struggles to rise to the divine, ineffable gift. The prelude ends as it began—in the "clear blue of heaven and the presence of the angelic hosts."

Public opinion prevails that Mr. Koussevitzky's brilliant and sympathetic interpretations serve the music to full measure.

Reservations may be obtained by calling Frank Sedgwick at McCoy's Music store, No. 89 Asylum street, telephone 2-2251.

THIRD OF MONDAY EVENING CONCERTS

Achron Plays Solo Part in New Violin Concerto

GLOBE JAN 24

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard in Works Previously Given

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave last night its third concert of the Monday evening series. With the exception of a new violin concerto by Joseph Achron, who himself played the solo part, all the works forming the program had already been heard at concerts of the Friday and Saturday series. There are none, however, that it was not pleasing to hear again, even after so short a lapse of time.

There was the Handel Concert Grosso in B minor for string orchestra—music which in its original, modest setting must have worn a simple dignity, a more naive charm, than when sung by so large, so sonorous and so well disciplined a body of strings as that to which it was confided last night.

The Vaughan Williams "Norfolk Rhapsody, which followed, is an extremely beautiful and sincere work. Its marvelous evocation of the Norfolk land scape, the tang of its salt air and the plaintive notes of its water fowl, wrought their charm even upon those, and they were of course the majority, to whom it brought no memories. The skill with which folk songs have been used to build up the picture without seeming to have been dragged in by the hair, the extraordinary charm and economy of the orchestration and the coherence of the structure are all evidence of a technique none the less masterly for being unobtrusive.

Joseph Achron's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, op 60, is a work which at first repels the hearer with the bluntness of its orchestration, the relentless cacophony of its harmonies and the whirling illusiveness of its melodic scheme. Of its two parts, the first is built upon Hebrew synagogue chants, 15 of them, elaborately and contrapuntally developed and much extended, as the composer's program notes tell us. The second part is based upon two Palestinian dance melodies, handled in a manner which Mr Achron himself describes as "jugglery."

Despite its undoubted clumsiness and overelaboration the work does succeed in conveying to an uncanny degree the spirit of the Jewry of the ghettos, its fanaticism, its hysteria and strident its naive humor and sentimental and that disorderliness and apparent irreverence which Pepys was shocked to observe in its synagogue.

Mr Achron, who played the difficult violin part with transcendent virtuosity, received warm, if somewhat puzzled, applause.

The evening ended more mildly with Schumann's "First Symphony" in B flat, a work ingratiating in a variety of ways, all romantic, in which Mr Koussevitzky spread himself with great gusto and tremendous effectiveness.

The next concert in this series takes place Feb 21.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 24 1927

Boston Symphony

A feature of the interesting program selected for the coming Hartford concert of the Orchestra at the Capitol Theater, February 6, will be Wagner's "Lohengrin." Liszt described Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin" as "a sort of magic formula which, like a mysterious initiation, prepares our souls for the sight of unaccustomed things, and of a higher signification than that of our terrestrial life." It begins with soft, unearthly chords in the topmost register of the orchestra. It is Wagner's first music of the Holy Grail. It descends and becomes full-bodied, as man struggles to rise to the divine, ineffable gift. The prelude ends as it began, in the "clear blue of heaven, and the presence of the angelic hosts." Public opinion prevails that Mr. Koussevitkky's brilliant and sympathetic interpretations serve the music to full measure. Reservations may be obtained by calling Frank A. Sedgwick at McCoy's music store, No. 89 Asylum street,—2-2251.

ACHRON PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

TRAV JAN 25

Violinist Performs Own Composition at Symphony Concert

Joseph Achron, violinist, was soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening, when Serge Koussevitzky conducted the third of this season's series of Monday evening concerts.

Mr. Achron played with the orchestra his new violin concerto. In addition, the program included the Concerto Grosso by Handel, which was played at the regular concerts of the orchestra last week; Vaughan Williams's first Norfolk Rhapsody and Schumann's first symphony.

Mr. Achron's concerto makes lavish use of Hebrew themes. The first movement, which boast no less than 15 themes of varied lengths, is built, according to the composer's own description, on elements of synagogue chants treated freely. The result is brilliant snatches, but more frequently incoherent and baffling. The second part, which juggles dextrously two Palestinian dance melodies, has more to reward a first hearing. The concerto is dedicated to Jascha Heifetz, fittingly, for it seems prodigiously difficult. Mr. Achron played with skill and plenty of fire.

Vaughan Williams's lively rhapsody bridged the gap neatly between Handel and Achron. The concert ended with a very notable performance of Schumann's charming "Spring" symphony.

The next concert of this series will take place Feb. 21.

HANDEL'S DAY AND THIS

TRANS JAN 25

Mr. Koussevitzky Blends the Eighteenth Century with Music of Today—Vaughan Williams and Schumann — Achron and His Multiple Themes for Contrast

IT was an evening in which pure beauty was first in men's minds—and that from negative as well as positive considerations. The occasion was the third Monday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Upon the program stood Handel's twelfth Concerto Grosso, forgotten these many years until last week's concerts brought it welcome revival; Vaughan Williams's first Norfolk Rhapsody, based on five folk melodies from Old England; Joseph Achron's Violin Concerto, Opus 60, with the composer as soloist; Schumann's first Symphony—of the Spring.

That a composition such as Handels concerto should gather the dust of years on library shelves is an anomaly. Master works there are in great quantity, in great variety, upon the shelves of the library at Symphony Hall. Not too many of them may claim pure beauty such as that which inheres in this concerto. In other ways many of them interest, justify themselves. But for beauty in and of itself none can surpass this work. Witness the striding dignity, warm and sonorous, of the opening Largo, the play of the Allegro, the unearthly melody of the Larghetto, the color of the next Largo, the rhythms of the final Allegro. What if this last Allegro does not maintain the sustained plane of elevation of the other movements? Standing by itself one would call it most excellent Handel; coming after the exceptional earlier movements it does in no wise detract from the impression made by them. But what does it matter? If ever Handel was transported to the heavens while in the act of composition, as he is supposed to have said to himself while composing the "Messiah," it must have been while writing some of the music of this concerto. And to play such music the strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with their leader, Mr. Koussevitzky, are ideal vehicle. Does one consider performance from the point of view of tone, or of balance of parts, or of purity of line or sweep of rhythm, of imaginative expressiveness, or—most important of all—from the point of view of spiritual message, one can only reiterate, it was ideal.

Again, pure beauty sat upon every note, every measure of Vaughan Williams's Norfolk Rhapsody. Oh, the delicious sonorities he summons! And when were ever two three-note motives so freighted with mysterious significance, so utterly weighted down with inexpressible poetry as those two motives which Mr. Vaughan Williams so lovingly fondles at the beginning and near the close of his Rhapsody? From one beauty one passes to another. The tones, the pliant curves of the ciola solo are lovely sequel to the imaginative beginning. Increasing in motion as in volume, the climactic sections conceal all their contrapuntal tricks, maintain and amplify the mood in which the beginnings have already drenched the hearer. And the descent to the simplicities and the graces of the beginning is as laden with beauty as the beginning itself. If this be folk-song, there must be sweetness unlimited in the soul of him who gives it such setting. And a match for him last evening were Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Lefranc, and the gentlemen of the orchestra. Yes, last evening Mr. Vaughan Williams, Mr. Serge Koussevitzky, Mr. J. Lefranc, and a hundred others, were high priests in the temple of pure beauty. Nothing less—pure beauty.

After an intermission one listened to the joys of Schumann's Spring Symphony. If some of the procedures of dear Robert (he was little more than a newly-wed when he composed this symphony) by their occasional naiveté of orchestration or of rhythmic grouping or of theme itself, tend to draw a smile from the experienced listener, what matters it? Again beauty stands high in the list of qualities which one must ascribe to this symphony. But its exuberance, its youthful freshness, makes it a perennial joy. One always likes to listen to this symphony. With Dr. Muck it gave surprising pleasure; with Mr. Koussevitzky not a whit less. With a strong arm he hurls out its occasional martial motives; but with delicacy and finesse he etches its playful, sportive measures; while with full voice he sings its songs. The whole leaves a good taste in the mouth. It is, as the common phrase runs, "delightfully refreshing."

Between Williams's Rhapsody and Schumann's Symphony stood Mr. Achron's concerto. "Pure beauty" may still be our text, but considered now somewhat regretfully, because of its temporary eclipse. Mr. Achron tells us (also a bit naively?) in a program note, "The themes are fifteen in number, some being many measures in length; others, only a few." And this applied only to the first of the two parts. Before one hears a single note, the violin [illegible] themes brought uneasiness to the mind. Mr. Achron takes his seventeen themes (there were two in the last division) from Hebraic sources. As Mr. Vaughan Williams busies himself with the folk lore of England, so Mr. Achron would busy himself with the folk lore of his race. He has written violin pieces in which he has done high service for this folk lore. But in the concerto of last evening he sought to deck it out with all the harmonic trappings which the art of music spewed out during that noisy period of from about 1912 to about 1924. Two representations one must make to Mr. Achron. The genius who could succeed in producing a movement well knit, unified, coherent, orderly, out of fifteen unrelated themes, is yet to be born. Secondly, the harmonic noises of the era 1912-1924 as a rule find their justification in some unusual programmatic scheme. They were the result of a search to widen the bounds of musical expressiveness, not expressiveness as one finds it in abstract music, but the expressiveness which desires to communicate or picture or amplify certain things outside of musical art itself. As such they usually made their point, created a little astonishment on the side, and were promptly discarded by their makers in favor of new experiments. From such discarded devices Mr. Achron has made choice, has juxtaposed them as background for his seventeen themes. But what would make sense with programmatic justification (possibly even at second-hand) is utterly sterile without.

TRAN JAN 25

Blessed be the modernists! Every great period in the history of music has had its imitators, its hangers-on, its followers of method without message. From such parasites Wagner and Debussy have perhaps suffered the worst. But when one of these 1912-24 modernists (to use a common phrase) "crawls into a hole" with a given piece, he "takes the hole in after him" and none thereafter, no, not the composer himself (the figure breaks down here, the fact remains) may explore in those same regions with impunity. Further, this entire group of composers seem to have broken with its past, to be going back to the eighteenth century for its ideals. This break is so definite, so complete, so thorough-going, that none may dare ignore it without labelling himself definitely as of a discarded and wornout past. Thus the copier of models in the year 1927 on two scores knows not where to look his weary and [illegible]

Blessed [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 25 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Debussy's Nocturne "Fetes" constitutes one of the numbers of the brilliant program selected by Sergei Koussevitzky for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Hartford at the Capitol theater, February 6.

The score is dedicated to Georges Hartman, the late music publisher. Jean Marnold contributed an elaborate study of these Nocturnes and in his analysis arrived at the conclusion: "that in ten centuries of the evolution of our musical art there is, perhaps, not one instance of such an important step as this in advance."

Philip Hale, in reviewing the Boston concert, comments that, "surely Debussy must have wished his 'Festivals' to be performed as Koussevitzky read it, for only from Mr. Koussevitzky has so generous, so thrilling so festal a performance been heard in Boston."

Reservations may be secured at McCoy's Music store, 89 Asylum street. Phone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 25 1927

Boston Symphony

Debussy's Nocturne "Fetes" constitutes one of the numbers of the brilliant program selected by Sergei Koussevitzky for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Hartford at the Capitol Theater, February sixth. The score is dedicated to Georges Hartman, the late music publisher. Jean Marnold contributed an elaborate study of these Nocturnes and in his analysis arrived at the conclusion; "that in ten centuries of the evolution of our musical art there is, perhaps, not one instance of such an important step as this in advance."

Philip Hale, in reviewing the Boston concert, comments that, "surely Debussy must have wished his 'Festivals' to be performed as Koussevitzky read it, for only from Mr. Koussevitzky has so generous, so thrilling so festal a performance been heard in Boston."

Reservations may be secured at McCoy's Music store, 89 Asylum street. Phone 2-2251.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RECORD
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
JAN 25 1927

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A programme of exceeding brilliance, which represents the foremost achievements of symphonic music, has been made by Sergei Koussevitzky for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 108 musicians, to Hartford, in the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 23 1927

Brilliant Program Will Be Played By Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky Selects Beethoven's "Eroica" as Feature of Concert

A program of exceeding brilliance, which represents the foremost achievements of symphonic music, has been made by Serge Koussevitzky for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 108 musicians, to Hartford in the Capitol Theater Sunday afternoon, February 6, at 3 o'clock.

The Russian conductor is now in his third season in America and at the head of this famous orchestra. Once the foremost figure in the orchestral concerts of Russia and later in Paris, London and western Europe, this leader has likewise succeeded in America in no uncertain fashion. His brilliant and magnetic personality, his intense artistic vision and sincerity, his exacting command as a leader have all made their impress upon the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This organization, long known as one of the very finest in the world, has in general opinion never sounded more eloquent than under Koussevitzky's direction.

Serge Koussevitzky

The principal number on the program will be Beethoven's Third Symphony, "Eroica." Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra plan to observe the centennial anniversary of the master's death next spring with a series of performances of his principal works. Prominent in this festival will be the mighty Eroica Symphony, and its performance in Hartford will also be in the nature of a tribute to Beethoven. A notable novelty on this program will be a suite from Prokofieff's Opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." This talented young Russian composer is perhaps best known by the opera which was produced by the Chicago Opera Company several seasons ago, and this season in Germany, with conspicuous success. The remaining numbers will be Debussy's Nocturne, "Fetes" ("Festivals"), the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," and to close, the symphonic Poem, "Finlandia," by Sibelius.

The concert will be given under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick.

Seats are now on sale at McCoy's Music Store at No. 89 Asylum street. For reservations, phone 2-2251.

CONCERTO PLAYED BY COMPOSER

Achron's Work on Hebrew Themes Heard With Symphony

POST JAN 24

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In accordance with the custom established for the Monday evening Symphony concerts by Mr. Koussevitzky, that of last evening, the third of the current series, offered three orchestral pieces previously heard this season and one fresher item as vehicle for the assisting artist, namely, Joseph Achron's new Violin Concerto on Hebrew themes, in which the composer was himself the soloist.

WITH SYMPATHY

Some 15 chants of the synagogue, "treated freely," comprise the melodic thought of the first of the two movements of Mr. Achron's Concerto, and two Palestinian dances make that of the second. As composer Mr. Achron has handled this material with evident sympathy. The hoarse cry for wind-instruments at the outset conjures up the vision of ancient, half-barbaric Jewry to which the music of Bloch has already wonted us, and the piece abounds in characteristic passages.

Before the Concerto came Handel's splendid Concerto Grosso, No. 12, in B minor, awakened by Mr. Kousse vitzky last week from its 20 years' sleep on the library shelf, and Vaugha Williams' first Norfolk Rhapsod which, beautifuly performed, furthe strengthened the marked impressio made on its first hearing a few week ago, while for his share in this pe formance Mr. Lefranc, the first viol took a well-deserved bow. Here is most valuable addition to the repe tory of our orchestra.

Schumann's tuneful if unsymphor B-flat major Symphony brought t

ORCHESTRA GIVES MONDAY CONCERT

Symphony Program Includes Handel Concerto

Herald Jan 24

The third symphony concert of the Monday series. Mr. Koussevitzky led off grandly with Handel's concerto, Grosso, for string orchestra, that in B minor, No. 12. If this music pleased last Friday, as by all accounts it did, on Saturday it must have given, by all report, deeper pleasure still. But only last night did this music appear in the full majesty of its glory. The wonder is that the grandeur of the first movement did not bring the hearers to their knees; still meekly kneeling they might fittingly have listened to the pure beauty of the second. And to the mystery-haunted measures of the finale's introduction everybody must indeed have listened in amaze, to think that Handel, in his century, could have written them. The performance was superb.

So was that of Schumann's B flat symphony, so splendid that the audience at the end broke into that snapping kind of hearty applause one does not hear after every piece. They must have forgotten for the moment that poor Schumann, in his ignorance of orchestration, did wrong to try his hand at a symphony.

Whether he did or not, the symphony sounded extremely well last night, which fact would seem to suggest that conductors are a factor in the matter. Or can it be that Schumann, actually ahead of his time, liked a type of instrumentation that once seemed thick and muddy, but now sounds clear enough and not too dense, after all that has come between? Or may it be only that idle talk, once set on foot, is slow to die? To talk of ignorance, in face of last night's performance of Schumann's beautiful music, savors in truth of idleness.

Between these two great pieces came a violin concerto by Joseph Achron, with the composer in person to play the solo part. Mr. Achron states in the program book: "The first part is built on elements of Hebrew synagogue chants. The themes are 15 in number."

They seemed too many by far last night for a single movement of a concerto. Though association may have made them clear to some listeners, to other people they sounded, all but two or three, formless and unmeaning. The harmonic treatment Mr. Achron dealt them made many sound downright unpleasant—and lacking, withal, in the vitality that keeps some of Mr. Block's Hebraic music absorbing.

